The controversy raged again after the appointment of Archbishop Droste zu Vischering. In his youth he had belonged to the circle around the Princess Gallitzin with its mystic and Platonic tendencies. Now, quite unjustly, he suspected the Hermesians of making common cause with the Prussian government in order to secretly undermine Catholicism. The archbishop also intended to destroy the influence of the department of theology at the University of Bonn and to replace it with the diocesan seminary in Cologne.[2] He demanded from the professors an express submission to the papal brief and from all ecclesiastical candidates a sworn agreement with the eighteen theses in which the errors condemned by the Pope were even more sharply formulated; they were in fact very tactlessly phrased.[3] According to the anti-Hermesian Franz Werner, Droste also was guilty of a number of mistakes: he was incapable of recognizing what was correct in some of the scholarly demands of the Hermesians. But primarily he lacked the pastoral tact and the conciliatoriness which would have allowed the Hermesians a graceful retreat. He wanted to drive them to an unconditional surrender, but instead only succeeded in embittering them and confirming them in their excessive adherence to the doctrines of their teacher, of which they did not want to change one iota. They also were contemptuous of the archbishop's magisterial office, which desired to contradict with arguments of authority a philosophical system whose spirit it had evidently not grasped at all.

---

[1] Bernasconi II, 85ff. This papal brief was supplemented by another one on 7 January 1836 condemning the last two volumes of the Dogmatik, which had appeared in the meantime.

Toward the end of 1835 F. X. Biunde, professor at the seminary at Trier, established contact with Rome in order to enable the Hermesians to explain the meaning of the condemned writings, which, according to their opinion, had been misunderstood by the Roman censors. The result was that at the beginning of 1837 two delegates went to Rome. They were P. J. Elvenich, layman and philosopher, fully acquainted with the Hermesian system and also a capable Latinist, and J. W. Braun, a theologian of great erudition, "the best mind of the Bonn faculty" (Schrörs), with good connections in Rome. They were initially well received—much better than Lamennais—and asked to discuss their case with the Jesuit general Roothaan, who spoke German. But they quickly discovered that everything rested on a misunderstanding: The Roman authorities were solely interested in determining whether the Latin translation which the censors had used was correct, while Elvenich and Braun wished to explain the essential nature of the doctrines in order to justify them. The Index congregation refused to consider this approach and did not even wish to see the Latin summary, Meletemata theologica,[4] which the two had prepared. Other misunderstandings and the intervention of Metternich, who saw in rationalism a danger to the principle of authority and feared that the religious ferment could degenerate into political disturbances,[5] served to discredit them entirely. With the departure from Rome of Capaccini and the Prussian envoy Bunsen they lost two valuable supporters, and their eleven-month stay ended in total defeat. Because they insisted that they agreed with the Pope in condemning all of the errors which he had cited, including the method of positive doubt, but denied that Hermes' writings contained such errors, Secretary of State Lambruschini in a letter of 6 April 1838 accused them of lacking obedience and of taking recourse to the Jansenist differentiation between quaestio iuris and quaestio facti.[6] The letter, immediately published by their opponents, hastened the decline of Hermesianism which had begun two to three years earlier. Although the Hermesians active in pastoral care delivered excellent service, the majority of the clergy and the militant Catholics, who were increasingly ultramontane, distanced themselves completely from these "ivory tower theologians" who openly opposed the Holy See. The intellectuals began to turn to Anton Günther, the new rising star, who also attracted some of the best speculative minds among the Hermesians. After a renewed attempt by the Breslau Church historian Ritter in 1845–46 in defense of Hermes failed even to reach Rome, the bishops had no difficulty in gradually purging the main centers of Hermesianism at the universities of Bonn, Munich, and Breslau, and the seminary of Trier. Nor were the rearguard actions by the uncompromising Hermesians, among others Braun and Achterfeld, to any avail. They believed to have reasons for hope when Pius IX in his inaugural encyclical Qui pluribus,[7] directed against the fideists, emphasized the importance of the rational basis of the act of faith. The Hermesians interpreted the passage as a revocation of the brief of 1835. But the Pope put a quick end to this tactical maneuver.[8] The time of the Hermesians was gone irrevocably.

---

[2] The importance of these nontheological aspects in the Hermesian controversy—not to mention the personal rivalries which occasionally poisoned the atmosphere even more—were underscored by H. Schrörs, according to whom the Cologne events were "basically more caused by Hermesianism than by the question of mixed marriages" (Geschichte der katholisch-theologischen Fakultät zu Bonn [Cologne 1922], 69, n. 1).

[3] ThGl 21 (1929), 316–28.

[4] I.e., "Theological Studies." Concerning the weaknesses of this study, first published in Latin and then, after the return of the two to Germany also published in German, see Schrörs, Braun, 272–73.

Rise and Fall of Güntherianism

Anton Günther (1783–1863), like Hermes a pious and concerned priest, attempted to reconcile faith and reason and to enable Catholic intellectuals to remain in the Church while they confronted the great philosophical currents of their time. Like Hermes he became the revered teacher of a whole generation of philosophers and theologians who rejoiced that Catholic speculation was exploring new paths better suited to the modern mentality. And like Hermes he was accused—not without grounds—of semirationalism. But the differences between the two thinkers were considerable. Hermes endeavored to overcome Kantian criticism and to create a rational basis for the acceptance of revelation. Günther dealt with Hegel's pantheistic idealism and Feuerbach's materialistic monism in order to work out a philosophical justification of the great Christian dogmas. The differences between the two men were even greater when one considers their intellectual background. Hermes and his followers were late representatives of the dry rationalism of the Enlightenment of the eighteenth century, while Günther and most of his enthusiastic students were deeply influenced by the Catholic romanticism of the restoration period. P. Wenzel characterized their system as a kind of gnosis of romanticism and added that their semirationalism was also a type of semi-irrationalism.[9]

---

[5] With respect to the political importance which the Austrian chancellor attached to the Hermesian controversy and his intervention in the matter in Rome after 1833, see J. Pritz, op. cit., 133–35 and H. Bastgen, op. cit., 27, 408.

[6] After their return to Germany, Elvenich and Braun published all documents concerning their negotiations in Rome under the title Acta Romana (1838).

[7] Text in Acta Pii IX I (Rome 1854), 4–24.

[8] Letter to the archbishop of Cologne, 25 July 1847. See H. J. Stupp, Pius IX. und die Katholische Kirche in Deutschland mit besonderer Berücksichtigung des Hermesianismus (Solingen 1848).

Günther was born in northern Bohemia and received his philosophical education in the rationalistic atmosphere of Prague, where he studied under Bernhard Bolzano.[10] After surviving a personal crisis of faith, caused by studying the idealistic German philosophers, he developed an intense religiosity and began the study of theology with the help of the Redemptorist Clemens Maria Hofbauer. In 1821 he became a priest and settled in Vienna, where he lived as a private scholar until his death. He failed to obtain a teaching position in Vienna and rejected all offers coming from Germany. He lived surrounded by like-minded admirers, clerics, and laymen, who were equally attracted to his apostolic temperament, his metaphysical genius, and the charm of his discourse. Among them were the Cartesian naturalist J. H. Pabst, Günther's chief collaborator, and the famous preacher J. E. Veith, a former Jew.[11]

With his numerous books,[12] written in a very personal, sometimes very condensed, sometimes free and humorous style, Günther's influence reached far beyond this personal circle. Without much system they offered original and often far-seeing observations and astute criticisms of the most important philosophical systems, especially of Hegelianism. There is no doubt that Günther recognized the intellectual greatness of Hegelianism, but he also recognized the danger it presented much more clearly than most of the other theologians of his time. He was also convinced that Scholasticism was not only outdated but, like any philosophy of concepts, was connected to a kind of semipantheism, and therefore he devoted himself with unusual intellectual enthusiasm to a new scholarly proof of theology with an anthropological base. He presented Catholic dogma in the language of the "phenomenology of the mind" and tried to show how it is possible to understand creation through the Trinity and the Trinity through human self-consciousness. As in all of German idealism, the accent was placed on the concept of man as "nature and mind." Worked out between 1822 and 1835, Günther's essential thought was contained in his Vorschule zur spekulativen Theologie (1828–29). From that point onward, his influence superceded that of Hermes. During the 1840s Günther dominated the German Catholic intellectual world, the more so as the Prussian government appointed numerous Güntherians to philosophical and theological university teaching posts. It wanted to avoid appointing Hermesians in order not to anger the ecclesiastical hierarchy, but it also did not wish to appoint men who were compromised by the Catholic reaction to the Cologne events.

---

[9] H. Witetschek is also of the opinion that Günther "connected theology with a radical belief in reason as well as with irrational romantic aspects" (HJ 86 [1966], 110).

[10] Concerning Bernhard Bolzano (1781–1841), a priest with progressive ideas who quickly became suspect to the defenders of the Catholic restoration, a religious philosopher who was primarily notable as a precursor in the area of logic and mathematics, see E. Winter, Bernhard Bolzano und sein Kreis (Leipzig 1933); E. Winter, Bernhard Bolzano, ein Denker und Erzieher im österreichischen Vormärz (Vienna 1967); E. and M. Winter, Der Bolzanokreis 1824–33 (Vienna 1970).

[11] Among Günther's followers were a good number of Jewish converts.

[12] Index, LThK IV, 1277.

The chief centers of the movement were Vienna, Silesia, and the Rhineland. In Silesia, Güntherianism dominated the theological department at the University of Breslau, thanks to the protection of Prince-Bishop Diepenbrock, the former Hermesian Baltzer, and J. H. Reinkens, the future Old Catholic bishop. In the Rhineland, there was formed a "German Port-Royal" (P. Wenzel) by F. Knoodt and H. Nickes. The brothers Wolter, who founded the abbey of Beuron, also belonged to their circle. In the atmosphere of a romantic mysticism they dreamed of overcoming the rationalism around them through the combined effect of Güntherian speculation and a return to the monastic Middle Ages. In addition to enthusiastic and frequently intolerant adherents, there were also numerous sympathizers elsewhere. Among them were Professor Löwe in Prague, the future Cardinals Schwarzenberg and Tarnoczy, the bishop of Ermland, A. Thiel, several professors in Trier and Bamberg, the Benedictine abbot Gangauf in Augsburg, Görres in Munich, Zukrigl in Tübingen, as well as a good number of Protestants. The Güntherians had an eager protector even in Rome in the person of Pappalettere, the abbot of Monte Cassino, who saw in them the agents for Germany's liberation from rationalism.[13]

But soon there were also opposing voices. The philosophers whom Günther had criticized mercilessly, especially the students of Baader and those who favored a return to Scholasticism, were the first ones to counterattack. Then theologians became involved, accusing Günther of claiming to provide a rational proof of supernatural mysteries. The philosopher F. J. Clemens and the jurist K. E. Jarcke in Katholik and Historisch-Politische Blätter wrote of his disregard of the great thinkers of earlier times. The arrogance of Günther's students, many of whom did not share the deep religiosity and the apostolic dash of their teacher and who, as is often the case, emphasized the debatable aspects of many of his thoughts, only magnified the discontent. By 1845, the old front of the anti-Hermesians, who rigorously rejected any compromise with modern philosophy, deployed itself against Güntherianism, especially in the Rhineland, where Knoodt, having made of Bonn a very active center of the movement, managed to arouse the ire of Archbishop Geissel. After the crisis of 1848, during which the Güntherians played a predominant role in the Catholic movement, they founded the new philosophical journal Lydia (1849–54) for the purpose of spreading their views, but the absolutist reaction in Austria, accusing them of sympathy for the liberal tendencies of the time, was ill-disposed toward them. The position of the Güntherians was endangered by the appointment in 1853 of Rauscher as archbishop of Vienna; for the past twenty years he had been their enemy. This happened precisely at a time when attacks against them increased on the doctrinal level. These were started in 1851 by the Benedictine Sorg, in 1852 by Dieringer and Schwetz, in 1854 by Michelis, and especially by F. J. Clemens, their bitterest enemy, whose pamphlet Die spekulative Theologie Anton Günthers und die katholische Kirchenlehre (1853) found a great echo and started a war of pamphlets. When the controversy passionately agitated Germany's and Austria's theologians and philosophers, surpassing in acidity the dispute over Hermesianism fifteen years earlier, the archbishop of Cologne submitted the problem to the Holy See. Günther had powerful protectors, who were grateful to him for having freed Catholic intellectuals from their fascination with Hegel and who sensed the danger of offending the universities, which already viewed the official Church hierarchy with mistrust. Matters probably could have been settled satisfactorily had not Baltzer and Knoodt, authorized to defend their system in Rome directly, spoiled everything by their cool attitude toward the Jesuits and the contempt which they showed for the development of Roman philosophy. Still, Rome hesitated two years before it finally decided to act. The opponents of the Güntherians did not cease their attacks, especially the authoritarian Archbishop Geissel, who made condemnation a point of prestige. Finally, in January 1857, Pius IX decided to place Günther's works on the Index, even though he paid strong compliments to the person and the intentions of the author.[14] Günther submitted despite his deep disappointment. But many of his friends asserted that it was perfectly all right to continue to teach the essentials of his system, as the papal decree had not condemned a single one of his theses. Geissel, supported in Rome by Cardinal Count von Reisach, therefore extracted a papal brief which defined the condemnation.[15] The moderate Güntherians submitted, while the radical ones, like Baltzer, Knoodt, and Reinkens, refused, arguing that it was a matter of academic integrity. They continued the controversy for many more years and provided the most active support for Old Catholicism after 1870.

---

[13] On the support which Günther received from Simplicio Pappalettere, abbot of Subiaco since 1846, see P. Wenzel, Der Freundeskreis um Anton Günther, 133–245.

Tübingen and Munich

Theological life in the German-speaking countries was not limited to the activity of the Hermesians and Güntherians and the controversies which they caused. Even in Bonn, one of their citadels, not all professors agreed with their teachings. H. Klee (1800–40), "the outstanding mind of the first Mainz circle" (Lenhart), taught there from 1829 to 1839 and in 1843 Archbishop Geissel succeeded in placing F. X. Dieringer (1811–76) on the chair of dogmatics. He was a priest strongly engaged in the Catholic movement which in 1844 founded the Katholische Zeitschrift für Wissenschaft und Kunst in response to the journal of the Hermesians. Klee[16] lacked speculative acumen, but he had a very pronounced feeling for the supernatural character of revealed religion and was also one of the rare Catholics capable of holding his own in comparison with his Protestant colleagues. His unusual patristic scholarship enabled him to write a Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte (2 vols. [1832]), one of the first written by a Catholic and of value. Dieringer[17] had studied in Tübingen and was better known for his inspired love of the Church and the ingenious clarity of his teaching than for his creative powers or his depth. The honorary doctoral degree awarded to him by the University of Munich was a response to his book System der göttlichen Thaten des Christentums (1841).

---

[14] E. Winter, op. cit., 232 ff. and supplement B, provides a wealth of documentation on the trial.

[15] Papal brief Eximiam tuam, 15 June 1857, in Acta Pii II, 585–90.

[16] See the biographical sketch in volume 1 of the Katholische Dogmatik (Mainz 1844), XXIII–XLIII and LThK VI, 324.

[17] See J. Wetzel in FreibDiözArch 72(1952), 198–212, and NDB III, 657.

In southern Germany, theological life was concentrated chiefly in the theological departments of the universities of Tübingen and Munich. The generation of the founders gradually disappeared in Tübingen—Möhler and Herbst in 1836, Hirscher in 1837, and Drey in 1846—and their places were taken by younger men. There was A. Graf, who as holder of the chair for pastoral theology developed remarkable ecclesiological points of view; he left the university too early in 1843, a victim of the tensions existing for about ten years between a number of the faculty and the Württemberg government over church political issues;[18] K. J. Hefele, who took Möhler's place as professor of church history and demonstrated his abilities after the middle of the century; and J. E. Kuhn,[19] professor of dogmatics after 1839, who for forty years remained the uncontested head of the school, impressing his students and the readers of his many books[20] by the clarity and depth of his thoughts and the brilliance of his dialectic. In his evolutionary view, Scholasticism was a useful phase in the history of Christian thought, but now outdated. Inspired by Hegel's method, he tried to get to the bottom of the Christian mystery; but his faith-rooted speculation was based on the facts of revelation and took account of the history of dogma. Kuhn remained faithful to the principles of the Tübingen School and was also a talented metaphysician and thoroughly familiar with the Greek Church Fathers and Saint Augustine. He also was an able exegete and in 1832 published his Leben Jesu wissenschaftlich bearbeitet to counteract the book on the life of Jesus by David Friedrich Strauß. Kuhn was less tied to romantic idealism than his teachers and placed the concept of mind, spirit, intellect before that of life. In him and his younger colleagues of the Tübingen School "the movement gained speculative depth and systematizing power" (Scheffczyk).

The influence of the Tübingen School extended to other universities. To Münster, where Anton Berlage,[21] a student of Drey and Möhler, became professor of moral theology and dogmatics in 1835; but especially to Gießen and Freiburg im Breisgau. The department of theology at Gießen[22] was established in 1830 as a substitute for the Mainz seminary in spite of the protest of the chapter. From the beginning two Tübingen-educated professors left their imprint: Kuhn, holding the chair for New Testament studies from 1832 to 1837, and Franz Anton Staudenmaier,[23] who taught dogmatics from 1830 until 1837, when he moved to Freiburg. In Freiburg he was joined by Hirscher, another respected Tübingen-educated professor. After its reorganization in 1832, the theology department at Freiburg had gone through a crisis which was ended with the arrival of these two. There was also Alban Stolz (1808–83), who in 1847 assumed Hirscher's chair of pastoral theology. The influence of Staudenmaier, long neglected by historians of theology, was not any less than that of the Tübingen people. In his time his Geist des Christentums (1835), which saw eight editions within half a century and was a seminal work in liturgical theology, was even compared to Chateaubriand's[24] Gênie du christianisme. His Christliche Dogmatik (4 vol. [1844–52]) also was a very personal work, in which the central ecclesiological perspectives are grounded in a trinitarian theology and in a history of theology which replaces Hegel's dialectical philosophy of history with the living and free working of God among men as revealed by revelation.

---

[18] On this conflict, see M. Müller, op. cit.

[19] Concerning Johann Evangelist Kuhn (1806–87), see in addition to LThK VI, 656–57, A. Hagen, Gestalten aus dem schwäbischen Katholizismus II (Stuttgart 1948–54), 59–95, and J. R. Geiselmann, Die lebendige Überlieferung als Norm des christlichen Glaubens dargestellt im Geiste der Traditionslehre Johann Evangelist Kuhns (Freiburg i. Br. 1959).

[20] His major book, Lehrbuch der Dogmatik, appeared in three volumes between 1846 and 1868. As early as 1832, he had presented his views in an article of the ThQ, "Über den Begriff und das Wesen der spekulativen Theologie."

[21] On Anton Berlage (1805–81), see LThK II, 231. He also was under the influence of Hermes and Günther and in Munich also under that of Baader, Schelling, and Görres. His Christ-katholische Dogmatik (7 vols. [1839–64]), together with Liebermann's Institutiones, became one of the most widely used reference books in ecclesiastical circles.

In Munich it was the lay professors who initially played a role. Görres remained the center of the group until his death in 1848. Inspired by the native initiative of Sailer as well as the influence of Tübingen, especially Möhler's presence from 1835 to 1838, the department of theology also improved over time. Of course, not all areas were equally well covered. Work in dogmatics remained tentative in spite of the contributions made by A. Buchner between 1827 and 1838, and moral theology remained inadequately taught for a long time. Canon law, however, did not escape the influence of George Phillips,[25] who as a member of the law school opened new avenues by employing the methods of historical law in the service of his ultramontane views. After the rather lackluster Joseph Franz von Allioli[26] retired in 1835, exegesis was given new life by Möhler, who was equally interested in finding a firm philological base and in confronting Protestant views; his successors Reithmayr and Haneberg continued the trend. Church history gradually acquired a scholarly character through the young Döllinger and Franz Michael Permaneder,[27] who during the Lola Montez crisis between 1847 and 1849 assumed Döllinger's place. Under Möhler's prodding, the theological faculty at Munich gradually moved away from the intoxicating speculations of Baader and Schelling and adopted a genetic view of history.

---

[22] It existed only for a short time, for in 1851 Ketteler stopped its students from attending by reopening the seminary at Mainz. The undeniably rationalistic tendencies of two professors (L. Schmid and A. Lutterbeck) provided him with a good pretext. See F. Vigener, "Die katholisch-theologische Fakultät in Gießen und ihr Ende," Mitteilungen des oberhessischen Geschichtsvereins, n.s. 24 (1922), 28–96.

[23] Concerning Franz Anton Staudenmaier (1800–56), see F. Lauchert, Franz Anton Staudenmaier (Freiburg i. Br. 1901); P. Weindel, Das Verhältnis von Glauben und Wissen in der Theologie Staudenmaiers (Düsseldorf 1940); A. Burhart, Der Mensch, Gottes Ebenbild und Gleichnis. Ein Beitrag zur dogmatischen Anthropologie Staudenmaiers (Freiburg i. Br. 1962); P. Hünermann, Trinitarische Anthropologie bei Staudenmaier (Munich 1962); A. Scholz in ThQ 147 (1967), 210–39.

[24] See W. Trapp in Liturgische Zeitschrift 4 (1931–32), 52–54, and F. X. Arnold, Grundsätzliches und Geschichtliches zur Theologie der Seelsorge (Freiburg i. Br. 1949).

After 1826, Döllinger[28] belonged to the faculty to which he had been appointed in consequence of Sailer's help. Connected in his youth with the Mainz group, he had become acquainted with Görres and for two decades stood in the forefront of the journalistic polemic for religious and academic freedom. He had a remarkable talent for dogmatic analysis, which he displayed in his doctoral thesis, Die Lehre von der Eucharistie in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten. Regarding university teaching as an apostolate, he turned to church history in the awareness that the Catholics were far inferior to the Protestants in this area. After initial work on Hartig's textbook he published his own Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte (2 vols. [1836–38]), which was acclaimed for the clarity of his presentation and the originality of his thought. Not merely chronicling events, it treated the development of ecclesiastical institutions in the areas of religion, discipline, and constitution. The book was quickly translated into other languages: into English in 1840–42, French in 1841, and Italian in 1845. In 1837 Döllinger was elected as a member of the Bavarian Academy of Sciences. In 1842 he founded an Archive for Theological Literature as the organ of expression of the professors of the theology department.

---

[25] Volume I of his Kirchenrecht appeared in 1845.

[26] On Joseph Franz von Allioli (1793–1873), see LThK I, 352, and J. Zinkl, Magnus Jocham (Freiburg i. Br. 1950), 54ff. He became known chiefly through his Bible translation, the notes for which were taken from the best commentaries of the time (6 vols. [1830–32]); it was approved by numerous German and Austrian bishops and by the Pope in 1838 and of all German versions was the most widely read.

[27] Concerning Franz Michael Permaneder (1794–1862), see LThK VIII, 279–80. He taught canon law and church history at the high-school for girls in Freising and published a reliable Bibliotheca patristica (2 vols. [1841–44]), which introduced into Catholic education the Protestant differentiation between "patrology" (literary history of early Christian writings) and "patristics" (theological treatment of doctrines).

[28] Of Ignaz von Döllinger (1799–1890), one of the most remarkable personalities of German Catholicism in the second and third quarter of the nineteenth century, there exists as yet no satisfying biography. See J. Friedrich, Ignaz von Döllinger, 3 vols. (Munich 1899–1901); F. Vigener, Drei Gestalten aus dem modernen Katholizismus (Munich 1926), 108–88; S. Lösch, Döllinger und Frankreich. Eine geistige Allianz (Munich 1955); G. Schwaiger, Ignaz von Döllinger (Munich 1963); DHGE XIV 553–63. His correspondence is widely dispersed and so far only a small portion has been published.

In the course of the following years he was affected by the hardening of the denominational fronts which under the influence of the converts Jarcke and Phillips superceded the indifferentism of the Enlightenment as well as Sailer's irenism and Möhler's dialogue. His first great work, Die Reformation, ihre Entwicklung und ihre Wirkung (3 vols. [1846–48]) was an anti-Protestant polemic. It was designed to refute the assertions made by Ranke in his Deutsche Geschichte im Reformationszeitalter. Based on a considerable number of primary sources drawn from the reformers, he attempted to show the destructive character of the Reformation and its unfortunate cultural consequences; yet he also tried to indicate the reasons for it. This portrait of Lutheranism was rejected by the Protestants because it only treated the dark side of the Reformation, but it caused Catholics to look upon the author as one of the outstanding champions of the Church and to regard Munich as the shining center of Catholic scholarship.

The Catholic University of Louvain

Soon after the creation of the Kingdom of Belgium, the episcopate, suspicious of the moral and religious atmosphere of the state universities, started an experiment which during the nineteenth century frequently attracted the attention of foreign Catholics. In October 1832 it decided to establish a Catholic university with academic freedom and two years later translated this decision into reality. In the attempt to avoid the impression among the liberals that profane education was subject to Rome, the episcopate refused to make it into a papal university. The decision was quite contrary to the usage under the Old Regime and worried the Holy See. Its fears that the new institution could grow into a citadel of Catholic liberalism were confirmed by the appointment of several of Lamennais's followers, among them the university president Xavier De Ram,[29] the metaphysician Gerhard Ubaghs, and especially the Frenchman Charles de Coux, a former editor of L'Avenir. Considering the lack of qualified personnel in the country, it was necessary to turn to foreign professors.[30] They were won with salaries equivalent to those paid by the state universities. Although the faculty included several autodidacts, it became possible from the beginning to provide students with an education qualitatively comparable to that of the other universities of the country. The medical school, for example, opened the first clinic for ophthalmology in Belgium. During its first period, the university became particularly well known for its Middle Eastern studies. In 1841–43 the Dutchman T. Beelen, a Hebraicist, published a Chrestomathia rabbinica et chaldaica, which displayed an originality rare for its time, and his research was augmented by that of F. Nève, a specialist in Sanskrit. The president, a sound scholar, was the first to remove national church history from a hagiographic and edifying emphasis and instead based it on a study of the original sources. Thanks to his intervention, the Belgian Jesuits were able in 1837—after an interruption of half a century—to continue the work of the Bollandists.[31] Twenty years later Renan assigned this enterprise first place among the products of the Catholic renaissance of the nineteenth century which he considered serious.

---

[29] Concerning Xavier De Ram (1804–65), the real organizer of the new university which he headed for thirty-one years, see LThK VIII, 982–83.

In the theology department, which quickly attracted students from the neighboring countries, the outstanding person was Jean-Baptiste Malou,[32] professor of dogmatics from 1837 to 1849. He displayed his patristic scholarship in the book which he published a few years later on L'Immaculée Conception de la bienheureuse Vierge Marie (1857). Educated in Rome, he became at Louvain the defender of Scholasticism against his ontological and traditionalist colleagues Arnould Tits[33] and Ubaghs.[34] Their views were published in the Revue catholique, established in 1843 by the professors at Louvain, and read in the seminaries and by educated laymen, but met growing resistance by the Jesuits and the opponents of Lamennais. The rather lively dispute ultimately was decided by Rome. Ubaghs's Théodicée and Logique were sent to the Congregation of the Index by Nuncio Fornari, and on 23 June 1843 the congregation came to the conclusion that several theses needed to be corrected. But the Holy See considered it advisable not to publish this decision, in order not to hurt the Catholic university. Thus Ubaghs felt justified in continuing his courses in the same vein, which he regarded as more suitable than traditional Scholasticism to ward off the perils of rationalism. After Malou became bishop in 1849, he reopened the case and obtained an unequivocal condemnation from Rome. Ubaghs obediently submitted and resigned his professorial chair.

---

[30] Two eminent converts came from Germany: W. Arendt for Greek and Roman antiquity, and J. Moeller, a student of Niebuhr's, for history. Windischmann joined the medical school.

[31] See H. Delahaye, L'œuvre des Bollandistes (Brussels 1959), 129–35.

[32] On Jean-Baptiste Malou (1809–64), the future bishop of Bruges, see B. Jungmann in Katholik 46 (1866) I, 716–41, II, 74–90, 129–56.

[33] Concerning Arnould Tits (1807–51), professor of fundamental theology since 1840, who died early but left a lasting impression, and whom Monsignor De Ram compared to Klee, see Annuaire de l'Université catholique de Louvain 16 (1852), 171–94.

[34] On Gerhard Casimir Ubaghs (1800–75), professor of philosophy from 1834 to 1866, see H. van Grunsven, Gerhard Ubaghs (Heerlen 1933) and LThK X, 427–28.

Tentative Attempts by the Catholic Intellectuals in France

While Germany retained the considerable lead of the first decades of the century and even enlarged it, the Latin countries on the whole presented a sad picture.

In Spain, with the Church suffering the aftereffects of the chaotic political situation, theological studies stagnated.[35] But the training of the clergy in the seminaries was clearly superior to that in France and Italy, even though it was limited to reading the great writers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Any openness to modern problems was lacking, with the result that Spanish theologians exerted no influence outside of Spain before the Thomist renaissance during the last third of the century. The only exception—aside from the essayist Donoso Cortés, a layman who in 1851 published the strictly conservative monograph Essai sur le catholicisme, le libéralisme et le socialisme—was the Catalan priest Jaime Balmes (1810–48), a prolific author of philosophical, historical, and apologetic books. His work was seminal in several areas, but precisely for that reason he found only limited reception among the Spanish clergy.[36] His fame was based on a refutation of Guizot; his El Protestantismo comparado con el catolicsismo en sus relaciones con la civilizacion europea (1842) was immediately translated into French.

Italy enjoyed three advantages: the scholarly tradition of the eighteenth century was not totally disrupted by the revolutionary events; it had in Rosmini a Christian philosopher of great stature; and the Roman College was for some of its theologians the means by which they attained international acclaim. But other scholars were not able to work within the framework of famous universities and this could not but have an impact on the quality of their work, no matter how meritorious it was. A case in point was Cardinal Angelo Mai,[37] the tireless editor of classical and patristic texts.

---

[35] This judgment by Hocedez II, 185, is confirmed by the very small number of Spanish authors of the nineteenth century cited in the DThC (see Tables générales, 1226).

[36] Concerning the limited degree to which he became a precursor of Neo-Thomism, see Hocedez II, 195–97.

[37] On Angelo Mai (1782–1854), see LThK VI, 1289–90; DACL X, 1196–1202; G. Gervasoni, Angelo Mai (Bergamo 1954).

Rosmini was admired by the educated public as well as in the Lombard seminaries, where he contributed to freeing instruction from Febronian tendencies. But after 1840 he saw his doctrines passionately attacked.[38] In the area of philosophy he was accused by Gioberti[39] and his students and the adherents of the Scholastic tradition of ontological inclinations; theologically he was attacked by the Jesuits, who, reacting sharply to the criticism to which Rosmini had subjected probabilism in his Trattato della coscienza morale (1840), polemicized against what they regarded as his erroneous concept of original sin, in which they saw the basis of his moral doctrines.[40] Although Gregory XVI, asked by the Jesuits to intervene, in 1843 imposed silence on both parties, the spreading of Rosmini's thought in the Catholic circles under the influence of the Jesuits suffered in consequence of these polemics.

The Roman College, closed to innovation in methods and the perception of problems, offered a qualitatively disappointing education. The German professors complained about it and so did the general of the Jesuits.[41] In philosophy the authors of the preceding century were studied without any originality, and the pioneers of the Thomist renaissance were ignored, as for example Father Taparelli with his work on natural law.[42] In the field of theology, only two names stand out from the general mediocrity. They were F. X. Patrizi, professor of exegesis, a conscientious scholar whose De interpretatione Scriptuarum sacrarum (1844) was the first Catholic monograph on the typological interpretation of the Bible, and Giovanni Perrone,[43] from 1824 to 1848 professor of dogmatics, whose Praelectiones theologicae (9 vols. [1835–42]) saw thirty-four editions. He was a vulgarizer without much originality who much preferred the dispute with the Protestants and the rationalists to genuine theological reflection. But it was to his credit that the relatively new treatment of the relationship between reason and faith was introduced into classical theology. He also sensed the importance of positive theology, which during the pontificate of Pius IX came to full bloom in the Roman College under his students Carlo Passaglia and Johannes Franzelin.

---

[38] New documentation in G. Martina in RRosm 61 (1967), 130–70.

[39] Gioberti, whose influence was great among a portion of the Italian clergy, in 1841 published a bitter indictment, Degli errori di Antonio Rosmini, which started a long controversy.

[40] F. Ruffini, La vita religiosa di Alessandro Manzoni II (Bari 1931), 247ff., justifiably pointed out that the conflict between the Society of Jesus and Rosmini was based not only on the competition between two religious congregations, active in the same field, but also on profoundly differing doctrinal and spiritual concepts.

[41] See P. Pirri, P. Giov. Roothaan (Isola del Liri 1930), 306–7, citing a letter of 20 December 1842.

[42] On Luigi Taparelli d'Azeglio (1793–1862), whose principal book Saggio teoretico di Diritto naturale appoggiato sul fatto dates from 1840, see R. Jacquin, Taparelli d'Azeglio (Paris 1943), B. Armando, Il concetto di proprieta nel Padre Taparelli (Pinerolo 1960), and Aubert-Martina, 299, n. 20.

[43] On Giovanni Perrone (1794–1876), see DThC XII, 1255–56, and Hocedez II, 353–55.

In France around 1830 there had been two hopes for renewal of Catholic thought: the School of La Chênaie and Malestroit under Lamennais and, on a much more modest level, the School of Molsheim near Strasbourg under Louis Bautain. Lamennais's condemnation was especially disastrous for his school because the Holy See had condemned both his church-political theories and his philosophical system, which constituted the basis for his program of renewal. In addition, of course, the vague and moderate condemnation[44] was exploited extensively by his enemies.[45] It did not immediately curtail the influence of philosophical traditionalism, especially not in Belgium, the Netherlands, Germany, Italy, Spain, and Poland.[46] But after 1835 most of Lamennais's students preferred practical work to now suspect speculations. Thus the changing of the guard which the school of La Chênaie had promised ultimately did not take place and instruction was mediocre, not least because Bautain's work, undertaken completely independently from Lamennais, gradually atrophied.

In 1832 Bautain[47] published a pamphlet on L'enseignement de la philosophie en France au XIX^e^ siècle which became the manifesto of his school. He criticized in it both the eclecticism of Victor Cousin and the Cartesian Scholasticism reigning in the seminaries. Bautain's numerous opponents asked the bishop of Strasbourg, Monsignor Le Pappe de Trévern, to intercede. His opponents consisted of Sulpicians offended by his attacks against their methods of instruction, Jesuits, among them the influential Father Rozaven, followers of Lamennais who did not care for his criticism of the philosophy of common reason, a portion of the Strasbourg clergy, who regarded him as an interloper, and the seminary teachers of Besançon who were jealous of the competition by the Molsheim group. In the spring of 1834, Monsignor de Trévern, who for six years had had no complaints about Bautain, submitted to him six questions on the relationship between faith and reason. There is no doubt that Bautain, lacking adequate theological training, presented fairly correct views on religious knowledge in terms seemingly incompatible with traditional formulations, and that under the influence of Kantianism he was inclined to denigrate human reasoning. But the questions of the bishop were also unfortunately framed. The consequence was a dialogue among deaf people, carried on for years and worsened by personal dislikes. After the bishop had deemed Bautain's answers unsatisfactory, he published a notice on 15 September 1834 and sent it to the Holy See and to all bishops in France. He desired Roman intervention against the "new Lamennais." But the exploitation of the notice by the Hermesians in favor of their semirationalistic views caused Rome to react circumspectly.

---

[44] See L. Le Guillou, L'évolution de la pensée de F. Lamennais (Paris 1966), 197–98.

[45] Ibid., 213–22.

[46] See Hocedez II, 83–112. Concerning Germany, see Schrörs, Braun, 289–95, 426.

[47] Concerning the controversy of 1834 to 1840, see F. Ponteil in RH 164 (1930), 225–87 and especially P. Poupard, L'abbé Louis Bautain (Tournai-Paris 1961), 181–226; concerning his stay in Rome in 1838, see P. Poupard, Journal romain de l'abbé Louis Bautain (Rome 1964), also the letters from Rozaven (Bulletin critique 23 [1902], 194–98, 353–60) and from Roothaan (CivCatt [1929] III, 316–19).

Bautain was convinced that the bishop was exceeding his jurisdiction, as in his opinion it was not a problem of dogmatic but only of philosophical questions. In addition he failed to comprehend how a philosophical doctrine based on faith could be accused of "destroying religion." He published a comprehensive work, La philosophie du christianisme, in which he presented the essence of his thought in the form of letters to his students. Except for some small exceptions, it was accepted by Möhler at Tübingen, which awarded him the title of doctor of theology.[48] Toward the end of 1835 everything seemed to calm down when Bautain indicated his willingness to sign statements modified with the help of the suffragan bishop of Nancy, Monsignor Donnet. But the Strasbourg bishop insisted that the new sentences were not really any different from his earlier formulations and sent Bautain's writings to Rome so that with the help of his friend Rozaven they would be placed on the Index. Following Lacordaire's advice, Bautain traveled to Rome in order to defend himself personally.

He was received politely, as Rome did not wish to give the Hermesians new food for thought. He also made an excellent impression during his three months in Rome with his declared willingness to submit himself to Rome's decision, so different from the arrogance of the German professors. The authorities limited themselves to requesting him to correct a few passages of his book and of a new one which he carried with him in manuscript form. Bautain was more than willing to do so, as the discussions with Roman theologians had revealed to him where he was exaggerating and as he had also discovered that condemnation of rationalism was a far cry from condemnation of reason. He acknowledged that it was possible to regard reason as a first step toward faith without denying the necessity of grace for the awakening of the soul.

---

[48] See P. Poupard in RSPhTh 42 (1958), 455–82; also ThQ 17 (1835), 421–53.

From this perspective he published his Psychologie expérimentale (2 vols. [1839]), on which he had labored for longer than eighteen years and which he considered as the major achievement of his life. But the old bishop of Strasbourg refused to reinstate Bautain and his followers in their former positions in spite of a request from Rome. On 8 September 1840, Bautain signed a more refined version of his questionable propositions, drafted by Monsignor Räß, the new suffragan of Strasbourg,[49] and retired to Paris. There, for a quarter of a century, he was active as a respected lecturer and preacher. But the long debate over a single point of his system diverted attention from the importance of his attempt to rejuvenate apologetics. Additionally, he failed to raise the standards of priestly education with respect to the problems caused by modern currents of thought.

Most of the seminaries clearly ignored these problems. Especially at Saint Sulpice "the cult of modesty and caution prevented any attempt at a spiritual rejuvenation" (X. de Montclos). The only notable exception was Charles Baudry,[50] a great patristic scholar who liked to be innovative. In the episcopate as well there was only one man with any sensitivity for these questions: Monsignor Affre, who in 1840 became archbishop of Paris. Results, unfortunately, corresponded little to his intentions.[51] He succeeded as little as his predecessor in breathing new life into the department of theology at the Sorbonne,[52] and he was able only to plan a graduate school of ecclesiastical studies, subordinated to the archbishop. Newman detected in this plan the seed for a future Catholic university, but actually the plan found little echo in France.

Yet the overall balance of the July Monarchy was not only negative. Some—in view of the contemporary circumstances even much—of the vitality and originality of Lamennais's movement survived. It had the goal of reaching the intellectual standards of the Protestants and the faithless and to establish a new humanism in which Catholic dogma was to be the guide for all manifestations of intellectual life without putting the mind in a straitjacket. Even if the plan to send a number of young Catholic intellectuals to Munich (1833–34) was dropped again within a few months, it at least led to important translations. They enabled the French public to become acquainted with some characteristic writings from beyond the Rhine, among them Möhler's Symbolik (1836) and Döllinger's Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte (1841). The good reputation which Lamennais's followers gained for German Catholic scholarship survived among French Catholics for a long time. It encouraged a few clerics—unfortunately much too few—to study at German universities. One who did so was Henri Maret, one of the few great French theologians of the next generation.

---

[49] The text of the various proposition lists is in P. Poupard, L'abbé Louis Bautain, 393–96. In 1844, on the occasion of a canonical approbation by the Congregatio Episcoporum et Regularium of a congregation founded by him, Bautain was requested to sign a number of new statements revised by P. Perrone. They were even more refined than the statements worked out in 1840 in Strasbourg.

[50] On Charles Baudry (1817–63), see de Montclos, 64–75, 605–6.

[51] See R. Limouzin-Lamothe, J. Leflon, Monseigneur D.-A. Affre (Paris 1971), 179–87.

[52] On this question which repeatedly surfaced during the second third of the nineteenth century, but was never resolved owing to the mistrust of the Holy See, see R. Limouzin-Lamothe, Monseigneur de Quélen (Paris 1955–57) I, 263–66, II, 247–52; R. Limouzin-Lamothe, "Monseigneur d'Astros et la réorganisation des facultés de théologie en 1838–39," BLE 52 (1951), 178–86; de Montclos, 108–10; J. Maurain, La politique ecclésiastique du Second Empire (Paris 1930), 104–10, 688–92; G. Bazin, Vie de Monseigneur Maret (Paris 1891) I, 397–419, II, 9–21, III, passim; Annales de philosophie chrétienne 26 (1843), 72–80.

The attempt by Gerbet to reconstitute in the college of Juilly a part of the group from Malestroit failed to have a lasting effect. But with the help of some of them he founded in 1836 the periodical L'Université Catholique,[53] with the intent of interesting a wide readership. It had a circulation of 1,600, a considerable figure for that period, among them Germans and Englishmen. Because a university independent from the state analogous to the Catholic University of Louvain could not be established in France, the founders of the journal wanted to offer the educated public the equivalent of lectures and presentations in the spirit of Lamennais: research capable of enriching the interpretation of dogma, and critical studies with the aim of refuting rationalistic propositions through extensive reliance on German research, especially that of the Munich School. One of the chief contributors of the new journal was Augustin Bonnetty, who also continued to publish his Annales de philosophie chrétienne.[54] With prodigious amounts of labor he collected gigantic numbers of historical documents for the defense of Christianity. He became a precursor of comparative religious studies and his findings and documents were used by other authors for their successful books. Chief among them were the Histoire du monde depuis sa création by Henri de Riancé (4 vols. [1838–44]) and the Études philosophiques sur le christianisme by Auguste Nicolas (4 vols. [1843–45]; twenty-six editions in forty years). Enthusiasm in the service of truth and the acknowledgement of the central importance of history in intellectual studies unfortunately did not provide for these self-taught writers the critical spirit and methodical discipline, the lack of which was one of the chief deficiencies of French Catholicism until the end of the century. Such deficiencies were quite evident in the voluminous Histoire universelle de l'Église catholique by René-François Rohrbacher (29 vols. [1842–

---

[53] See C. de Ladoue, Monseignieur Gerbet II (Paris 1872), 118–46.

[54] On Augustin Bonnetty (1798–1879), see DHGE IX, 1058–60, and N. Hötzel, op. cit., XVI–XVIII and 140–369 passim.

49]). A great number of the French clergy regarded this work as a monument to scholarship, but compared to Döllinger's writings it was a sad enterprise. Similar deficiences explain the naivety of the short-lived Société hagiographique, founded in 1836 with the aim of completing within a span of ten years, with three volumes per year, the Acta sanctorum of the Bollandists.

In the absence of genuinely scholarly works, it was nevertheless to the credit of French Catholics under the July Monarchy that they reissued the classical writers of ecclesiastical scholarship. Advised by clerics, a number of Catholic publishers issued collections of old texts, added fresh commentaries, and hoped to adapt traditional instruction to the progress of modern society. Among them were Antoine de Genoud,[55] also a former follower of Lamennais, who published twelve volumes with excerpts from 196 writers of the preceding four centuries with the aim of providing an apologetics (La Raison du christianisme [1834–35]) and seven volumes of translations of the Church Fathers (1835–49). Another one was Jacques-Paul Migne.[56] With the help of a number of excellent scholars and thanks to his own business acumen, Migne published three parallel series as tools for the clergy. These were: the most important Bible commentaries of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries (25 vols. [1834–40]); a number of theological tracts of the sixteenth to nineteenth centuries (28 vols. [1839–45]); and the most important apologists from Tertullian to Wiseman (16 vols. [1842–43]). He also published a Collection universelle et complète des orateurs sacrés (99 vols. [1844–66]), an Encyclopédie théologique (52 vols. [1844–52], supplemented from 1851 to 1866 by another 119 volumes) which combined updated excerpts from old encyclopedias (like that by Bergier) with articles by contemporary authors, and finally the two famous Patrologia series (the Series Latina, 217 vols. [1844–55], and the Series Graeca, 161 vols. [1857–66]). The last was the more meritorious, as a similar project in Italy a few years earlier with the financial support of Gregory XVI had foundered.

To a large degree Migne was able to publish the two Patrologia series owing to the assistance of a monk from Solesmes, Dom Jean-Baptiste Pitra,[57] a scholar of high caliber. Unfortunately, Pitra remained an exception among the French Benedictines. Dom Guéranger, in his youth an adherent of Lamennais's ideal of a rejuvenation of ecclesiastical scholarship in France, intended to fashion his abbey into a workshop in which the tradition of the Maurists, albeit with an anti-Gallican orientation, could again blossom. Unfortunately, he was not able to gather the necessary qualified people, and even Dom Pitra's work was handicapped by the financial difficulties of the monastery. Guéranger's own works, his Institutions liturgiques, of which the first two volumes appeared in 1840 and 1841,[58] and even more his Histoire de Sainte Cécile (1849) suffered, like all writings of French theologians at that time, from a fundamental lack of sound scholarship. On the other hand, he started an original and remarkable undertaking in 1841 when he published the first volume of his Annéе liturgique,[59] at first not very successful, but later regarded as a true monument of Christian culture through the ages. Eventually it contributed more than any other work to the rejuvenation of Catholic piety.

---

[55] Concerning the journalist Antoine de Genoude (1792–1849), who in 1835 after the death of his wife became a priest, see CThC VI, 1225f.

[56] On Jacques-Paul Migne (1800–75), see F. de Mely in Revue apologétique, 5th ser. 2 (1915), 203–58; DThC X, 1722–40; DACL XI, 948–57.

[57] Concerning Jean-Baptiste Pitra (1812–89), see the two complementing biographies by F. Cabrol (Paris 1891) and A. Battandier (Paris 1896).

On this level of Catholic culture, the French could be proud of a number of other original and contemporary achievements. Lamennais's former student Alexis-François Rio[60] was concerned with the essence of Christian culture, for which he became what Winckelmann had been for the art of classical antiquity. His book De la poésie chretiénne (1836), in reality an introduction to early Italian art in which Schelling's aesthetics can be seen, had only limited success in France, but found great acclaim in Italy and Germany. With all of its preconceived apologetic opinions and methodological weaknesses, his book tried to demonstrate that the paintings of the Middle Ages were inseparably connected with a definite Christian view of man and life. Surpassing the Génie du christianisme, it wished "to cause a revolution in aesthetics equal to that which metaphysics based on original revelation had tried to cause in the area of philosophy" (Derre). Montalembert started a similar work in the field of Gothic architecture. He fought the demolition of monasteries and in his Histoire de Sainte Élisabeth de Hongrie (1836) he wrote a poetic hagiography in honor of the Christian Middle Ages. He intended to demonstrate the atmosphere of medieval piety through a representative which German romanticism had made accessible to him. At the same time he devoted pages of panegyrics to the Marburg Elizabeth Church, connecting the achievement of Gothic art with the religious sentiments of the contemporaries of Saint Francis of Assisi and Saint Louis. His book was similar to that which Ozanam, with greater scholarship, wrote on the literature of the Middle Ages. In his lectures at the Sorbonne on Saint Francis of Assisi, in his two books on Dante (1838 and 1839), and in his Études germaniques (1847–49) Ozanam, within the framework of comparative literature, always also taught religion and made "the long and arduous education which the Church imparted to modern peoples" the central topic.

---

[58] Volume I was translated into German in 1854.

[59] Nine volumes appeared between 1841 and 1866; they were later completed by the students of Guéranger. See O. Rousseau, Histoire du mouvement liturgique (Paris 1945), 45–53.

[60] On Alexis-François Rio (1797–1874), see M. C. Bowe, F. Rio, sa place dans le renouveau catholique en Europe (Paris, n.d.), and J. R. Derré, op. cit., 615–69.

It was another accomplishment of Ozanam that at the age of twenty he persuaded the archbishop of Paris to introduce at Notre-Dame on the occasion of Lent a style of preaching designed for the young intellectuals and radically different from usual sermons; additionally he convinced the archbishop to assign these Lent sermons to Abbé Henri Lacordaire,[61] in spite of the prevailing preconceptions about this former follower of Lamennais. As a romanticist who completely grasped the attitude of the new generation, Lacordaire introduced a new style of preaching in 1835 and followed new avenues in apologetics. To a generation captured by the picturesque and by emotions, he offered the eloquence of paintings, colors, enthusiasm, and indignation. He knew how to speak of eternity in everyday language without fruitless bemoaning of the lost past and without condemning the values held by his audiences. Instead of offering methodically a philosophy of spiritualism in the fashion of Frayssinous, proceeding from there to a presentation of the facts of revelation, he allowed himself to be guided by the experience of his own conversion. He accepted Christianity and the Church as givens by attempting to show how much they corresponded to the needs of the present as well as to the essential needs of human nature. His success[62] indicated that he had found the right approach.[63]

The Growth of the Catholic Press

The picture of Catholic achievements in the intellectual sphere is not complete without reference to newspapers and periodicals. Many of them have been mentioned earlier. But it is useful to summarize the essence of these publications in order to show the universality of this phenomenon which started during the first quarter of the century and increasingly grew after 1830. In 1844, the Revue des deux mondes noted: "In order to preach more freely on topics other than morality and charity, the press was employed. Priests in large numbers entered the new arena; laymen became theologians and theologians turned into journalists. Today, journalism has become for some members of the clergy a branch of the pulpit in the recognition that the power of the press is mightier than sermons." This observation was true not only for France, but for all of western Europe.

---

[61] Lacordaire preached the Lent sermons in Notre-Dame de Paris in 1835 and 1836, and after his return from Rome, having become a Dominican, he preached the Advent sermons from 1843 to 1846 and the Lent sermons from 1848 to 1851. From 1837 to 1846 his place was taken by the Jesuit de Ravignan, an excellent but more classical orator.

[62] He did not find approval everywhere. By the old clergy as well as by the rationalists, this "Savonarola of the modern pulpit" was accused of acting more like a religious tribune than like a theologian.

[63] At the same period there were in Italy some similar but less famous attempts to adapt sermons to modern concerns. This was the case, for example, with the young Franciscan Arrigoni (see M. Maccarrone, Il concilio Vaticano e il "Giornale" di Monsignor Arrigoni I [Padua 1966], 15–17).

In Germany some astute leaders of the Catholic movement like Lennig and Döllinger quickly grasped the importance of the press. Yet at first great obstacles had to be overcome, not only because there was a dearth of qualified people and of money, but also because of administrative red tape and the hostility of a part of the clergy which was apprehensive about the interference of journalists in internal Church matters. Quickly there appeared a number of journals which addressed themselves to clerics and educated laymen.[64] Among them were Der Katholik,[65] founded in Mainz in 1821 "for instruction, warning, and defense against attacks on the Church"; because of state censorship (Görres as editor strove for greater discipline, more careful selection, and reliable expertise), the journal moved to Strasbourg in 1823, where it remained until 1827, then moving to Speyer and publishing there until 1844 under the editorship of Dieringer, finally returning to Mainz in 1844, when it became a weekly; the journal Eos, edited by Görres in Munich and transformed by him into the organ of conservative Catholicism in southern Germany, treating both literary questions and church-political problems, although it was published only from 1828 to 1832; the Zeitschrift für Philosophie und katholische Theologie,[66] founded in 1832 in Bonn by Braun, a few other Hermesians, and a few bishops in order to provide Catholicism in Prussia with a respectable publication in place of the banned Katholik, even though after a few years it adopted an increasingly hostile stance toward the hierarchy; the Historisch-Politische Blätter of Jarcke and Phillips in Munich, more accessible to the broad public but, in the view of Prussian Catholics, edited from a too strongly southern German perspective; and the Rheinisches Kirchenblatt,[67] founded in 1844 in Düsseldorf as a monthly and converted into a weekly in 1848 in order better to spread Archbishop Geissel's views. The daily press, on the other hand, especially in the Rhineland, had a difficult beginning and for a long time was limited to papers with purely local circulation, edited in pronounced anti-Protestant, apologetic fashion.[68] They only came into their own during the second half of the century.

---

[64] Not mentioned there were scholarly theological journals like the Theologische Quartalschrift in Tübingen. Its index is listed in CathEnc XI, 678.

[65] See H. Schwalbach, Der Mainzer "Katholik" 1821–50 (diss., Mainz 1966).

[66] See Schrörs, Braun, 153–87.

[67] See R. Pesch, Die kirchlich-politische Presse der Katholiken in der Rheinprovinz vor 1848 (Mainz 1966), 25–82.

In France there also appeared a few notable periodicals: the Annales de philosophie chrétienne (since 1830) and the Université Catholique (since 1836); also the Revue européenne,[69] which between 1831 and 1834 took the place of the Correspondant and after the demise of L'Avenir—with the exception of political aims—served as forum for the followers of Lamennais; and Le Correspondant itself, reappearing in 1843 in order to support Montalembert in his struggle for freedom of education. There were also journals of more popular bent, such as the Journal des personnes pieuses, founded by P. d'Exauvillez and Abbé Glaire. With the exception of Le Correspondant, the French periodicals were more concerned with the problems of ideas than with church-political questions. Such questions were treated in the daily press and especially in L'Univers, founded in 1833 by Abbé Migne. In 1843, Louis Veuillot became its dynamic and pugnacious chief editor.[70] The fact that France in the 1830s could boast of several Catholic dailies with a national circulation must not be misread, however. It was at best a modest beginning, for their combined circulation was less than that of a single large liberal paper. Besides, they were scarcely read in Paris, the center of intellectual and political movements and controversies.[71]

In Belgium also there were a number of Catholic newspapers in the provinces, but hardly in the capital. But in 1834 the layman Pierre Kersten founded in Liège a journal of general interest, the Journal historique et littéraire.[72] This excellently edited monthly found readers even beyond the borders of the country. Shortly afterwards there appeared in the Netherlands the monthly De Katholiek (1842) and the daily De Tijd (1845), both of which were to have a long and productive life.[73]

---

[68] Ibid., 197–226, with a chronological listing of the Catholic newspapers of Germany.

[69] See J. R. Derré, op. cit., 500–528 and passim.

[70] Concerning the beginning period, see C. de Ladoue, Monseigneur Gerbet II (Paris 1872), 91–118, and A. Trannoy, Le romantisme politique de Montalembert (Paris 1942), 437–56; on the role of Veuillot, see E. Veuillot, Louis Veuillot (Paris 1899seqq.) I, 282–90, 313–25, II, passim.

[71] A few figures are given in the Revue des deux mondes 25 (1844), 355–56.

[72] See A. Vermeersch, Bijdrage tot de Geschiedenis van de Belgische Pers 1830–48 (Louvain 1958), 36–44.

[73] Concerning the beginnings of De Tijd, see Rogier, KathHerleving, 257–61.

In Great Britain, the first Catholic monthly appeared in 1831; but the regular Catholic press really began to appear only between 1835 and 1840. At first there was the Dublin Review, founded in 1836 by Wiseman with the support of two Irish laymen, Daniel O'Connell and M. Quin, as a counterweight to the strongly anti-Catholic Edinburgh Review. It was followed by the monthly The Tablet, founded in 1840 by the convert F. Lucas.[74] These were joined by a few less important publications.[75] In 1846 The Lamp was founded as an inexpensive paper for the workers.

Religious periodicals also appeared in the Mediterranean countries. In Italy this was due chiefly to the labors of the Amicizia cattolica. In Spain, thanks chiefly to Balmes, there appeared in 1830 in quick succession La Civilizacion, La Sociedad, and El Pensamiento de la Nacion.[76]

Even if the history of the Church in the nineteenth century in many areas was a series of missed opportunities, it must be noted that the Catholics in most countries quickly recognized that the press was destined to play a large role in modern society. But it must also be mentioned that owing to a lack of material and intellectual means, the journalistic achievements, especially with respect to the daily press, were only second-best compared to the freethinking press.

---

[74] See J. J. Dwyer, English Catholics, ed. by G. A. Beck (London 1950), 475–76, 482–84. The participation of the converts of the Oxford movement in the Catholic press was weak before the turn of the century (see J. Altholz, The Liberal Catholic Movement in England [London 1962], 7).

[75] See T. Wall, "Catholic Periodicals of the Past," IER 101 (1964), 206–23, 234–44, 289–303, 375–88, 102 (1964), 17–27, 86–100.

[76] See CathEnc XI, 690.

SECTION TWO

The Ascension of Pius IX and the Crisis of 1848

CHAPTER 4

The First Years of the Pontificate of Pius IX: From the Neoguelf Mythos to the Roman Revolution

When Gregory XVI died on 1 June 1846, the religious situation of the Church posed no problems, but the political condition of the Papal State was tense. In view of the administrative and constitutional attempts at reform and the desire of patriots to free Italy from the tutelage of Austria, the regime represented by the late Pope and Secretary of State Lambruschini was at the nadir of its prestige. For this reason internal political considerations were of primary concern in the conclave, the more so as it was decided in view of the serious political situation to open the conclave immediately, without waiting for the arrival of the foreign cardinals. The intransigents favored the election of Lambruschini, as it would guarantee the continued support of Austria in the suppression of revolutionary elements. Others, led by Cardinal Bernetti, considered a few concessions to public opinion necessary and were in favor of a Pope from the Papal State in order to manifest their independence from foreign influences. The preferred candidate of this second group was Cardinal Mastai. Gizzi was regarded by many as too progressive.[1] On the first ballot, Mastai received fifteen votes, Lambruschini seventeen. Those who feared a victory of Lambruschini then rallied behind Mastai, who received a two-thirds majority on 16 June, the second day of the conclave.

Giovanni Maria Mastai-Ferretti was relatively young; in memory of his benefactor Pius VII he chose the name Pius IX. He was born on 13 May 1792 in Senigallia in the Marches, and from the beginning of his clerical career demonstrated piety, pastoral concern, and administrative ability. A journey to South America (1823–25), undertaken as auditor of the apostolic delegate to Chile, provided him with insight into the new dimensions of missionary problems and into the difficulties which liberal, regalistically oriented governments could cause for the Church. But as archbishop of Spoleto (1827–32), and as bishop of Imola he succeeded in gaining the respect of the area's very active liberals. He was full of charity toward the members of his diocese, regardless of their views, he was open-minded, and he seriously tried to improve the antiquated nature and the police-state aspects of the government of the Papal State.[2] Yet these administrative reforms were not designed to allow the public actively to participate in affairs of state, as this seemed to him incompatible with the religious character of the papal government. On the other hand, there is no doubt that he was open to the stirring of Italian patriotism. Contrary to the widely accepted view, he thought it impossible to implement the neoguelf program and thought that the Pope as the spiritual head of all Christians should not play the role of the president of an Italian federation. But he intensely felt the national enthusiasm which was being fed by the romantic movement, and the brutalities of which the Austrian troops were accused deeply hurt his generous soul. They brought him into agreement with the forces which desired Italy's liberation from the foreign yoke.

---

[1] It should be noted that the Austrian veto was not directed against him but against Bernetti. It allows the conclusion that Metternich was less concerned with the Italian problem than with the fear of French influence on Rome. (Engel-Janosi I, 15–16).

The first decision of the new Pope seemed to confirm the "liberal" attitude of which Rome's reactionaries accused this enlightened conservative: On 17 July he decreed a generous amnesty; he appointed Cardinal Gizzi, wrongly suspected of being a representative of Massimo d'Azeglio's ideas, as secretary of state;[3] he selected Monsignor Corboli-Bussi, a young prelate with an open mind for new ideas, as his confidential adviser; he was generous to Father Ventura, the eloquent follower of Lamennais; he kindly received a number of persons known for their connection with the moderate liberals; and he fully agreed to some long-desired reforms, even though they were not part of a comprehensive concept.

In this heated atmosphere and at a time, just before 1848, when the romantic concepts of Catholicism joined with the goals of democracy, even these very limited gestures of the Pope received the acclaim of the masses. Ignoring the encyclical Qui pluribus of 8 November 1846, which again condemned the basic principles of liberalism,[4] people preferred to see in Pius IX "a messenger of God sent to complete the great work of the nineteenth century, the alliance between religion and liberty" (Ozanam). Metternich, on the other hand, whose initial response to the attitude of the Pope had been favorable, was beginning to worry that the Church was headed by a man "with the fire of the heart, but weak in planning and without any real ability to lead." All of liberal Europe responded positively, even such countries as England,[5] which could not be said to be harboring any papist sympathies.

---

[2] In 1845 he had even drafted a characteristic reform program (see G. Soranzo in Aevum 27 [1953], 22–46). It was more a reform of abuses than a change of structures, either administratively or politically.

[3] On the true personality of Gizzi (1787–1849), who basically was conservative and antiliberal, see the revealing remarks by A. Simon, Documents relatifs à la nonciature de Bruxelles 1834–38 (Brussels 1958), 51–91.

[4] Text in Acta Pii IX I, 4–24. See A. Latreille, L'explication des textes historiques (Paris 1944), 228–230.

For several months the authority of the papacy was at a peak, the more so as at the same time a reconciliation between Rome and the Ottoman Empire seemed possible and the negotiations with Russia, begun in 1845 after a visit of Tsar Nicholas I to Gregory XVI, led to the signing of a relatively favorable treaty.

In Italy, where all demonstrations against the rule of the Austrians or against reactionary governments were accompanied by shouts of "Long live Pius IX," enthusiasm reached a high point. The myth of the "liberal Pope" acted like a catalyst for the disparate elements which before 1848 held progressive opinions; former opponents of the Church, Catholics won over to modern ideas, and the patriotic clergy,[6] all were temporarily united in a common hope. Their disappointment was so much greater when facts began to speak and the actions of the Pope failed to fulfill the hopes which had been placed in him.

The disenchantment began in the area of internal reforms. Pius IX had to take account of the growing opposition on the part of most of the Curia prelates; although he was seriously concerned with an improvement of the situation of his subjects, he himself was not prepared to go beyond the limits of what can be called ecclesiastical paternalism. He was afraid that by relinquishing a part of his priestly kingdom to laymen he would limit the independence which the Holy See required for the fulfillment of its spiritual tasks. Quazza in his book Pio IX e Massimo d'Azeglio nelle vicende romane del 1847 shows in great detail that Pius IX, even during the period of the most trusting cooperation with Massimo d'Azeglio, when he appeared to approve of the daring opinions of Father Ventura, never went beyond a limited benevolent despotism. He remained far from a liberal attitude toward people and society and by no means wished to change the Papal State into a constitutional and modern state based on the precepts of 1789. A few activists, playing with great skill on his desire to be popular, succeeded in pushing him in this direction, without, however, changing his basic convictions. The results were freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, formation of a council of twenty-four notables in October 1847, and introduction of a lay element into the government in January 1848. Gradually he agreed to several concessions and also immediately attempted to circumscribe them as much as possible. But after the fall of Louis-Philippe in France he was forced to a hasty approval of the constitution which had been demanded for months.[7] Even this decision appeared only as a half-measure and agitated more than it satisfied the increasingly impatient public opinion.

---

[5] In the United States as well the reaction to the election was enthusiastic. See H. R. Marraro: CH 25 (1956), 42–44.

[6] See, for example, B. De Giorgio, Aspetti dei moti del 1847 e del 1848 in Calabria (Reggio 1955).

Such hesitation on the part of the Pope, who constantly wavered between advice from the right and the left and thought that he could avoid offending anyone with his decisions, was displayed also and with grave consequences in his attitude toward the Italian movement. On the one hand it is impossible to agree with many historians of the Risorgimento that Pius IX initially supported the liberal program of Italian unification, only to abandon it later; it would be equally incorrect to assert, as has been done by many Catholic historians, that the Pope never had a clear Italian policy and only made a few meaningless gestures to which more significance was attached than they warranted. The truth lies between the two extremes. Pius IX evidently could not accept Mazzini's idea of a unified Italian republic, as it would mean the suppression of papal sovereignty; equally unacceptable was the neoguelf program.

Still, after a period of tentative moves he agreed with some moderates who wanted to reduce Austrian influence in Italy and who wanted to establish the prerequisites for such a development through strengthening the bonds among the various Italian states. Therefore the Pope tried to give a political direction to the negotiations which began in August 1847 with the objective of establishing a customs union with Tuscany and Piedmont. The idea of a union of the Italian sovereigns in a defensive league, sponsored by Florence and supported by the Pope's chief adviser, Monsignor Corboli-Bussi, was also very agreeable to him. This solution automatically would have associated the Papal State with a national resistance in case of military intervention by Austria for the suppression of revolts which were threatening everywhere, without directly forcing the Pope into a declaration of war. But the ambitions of Piedmont, desirous of claiming for itself all of the advantages accruing from a war of liberation, prevented the formation of the league. Thereafter, events quickly overtook Pius IX.

---

[7] Text of the "Statuto" of 14 March 1848 in Atti del S. Pontefice Pio IX V/1 (Rome 1857), 222–38. See L. Wollenberg in RStRis 22 (1935), 527–94, and A. Ara, Lo statuto fondamentale dello Stato della Chiesa (Milan 1966; also G. Martina in RSTI 21 [1967], 131–46). The latter clearly demonstrates the vain attempt to change the Papal States into a constitutional state.

What has been called the "miracle of 1848" rested in part on a misunderstanding; but for a few months it actually existed. A few remarks by Pius IX, contradicting the negative attitude of Gregory XVI, sufficed to awaken in many Italians the conviction that the new Pope was willing to implement the entire national program and was prepared, according to a promise by Gioberti, to place himself at the head of a crusade in order to drive the Austrians from the peninsula and to effect national unification. Such illusions were also nourished by the evident reserve which Pius IX since the beginning of his pontificate had exercised toward the Austrian ambassador; this reserve, however, stemmed not only from his sympathy for the Italian cause, but also from his dissatisfaction with the Josephinist religious policy of the Empire, especially in Lombardy. When on 10 November 1848 Pius IX in a public address attempted to lessen belligerency but at the same time implored God's blessing for Italy, public enthusiam reached its zenith. Convinced that the Pope was on their side, the clergy as well as the faithful in all of Italy during the subsequent weeks of national agitation lent a large degree of support to the national uprisings.[8] When the Piedmontese government went to war against Austria in support of the nationalists, it was expected that the papal troops would follow suit. A number of papal advisers in Rome encouraged such a step in order to avoid the displeasure of the people. But the majority of the Curia theologians and cardinals spoke out for neutrality, which seemed more fitting for the head of the Church. Pius IX himself, overcome by the events, was in conflict between his genuine Italian patriotism and the awareness of his religious responsibility, which went beyond national concerns. In order to clear the air, the Pope made his famous speech of 29 April, whose recently discovered draft allows us a direct glimpse at his contradictory feelings.[9] In the first version of the speech the Pope said that while he could not intervene against Austria militarily because its subjects like his own were his spiritual sons, he had full sympathy for the Italian demands. The published text, however, probably corrected by Cardinal

---

[8] The clergy, including the upper clergy, in the north provided strong and in the central part (except for Rome proper) considerable help. In the Kingdom of Naples the bishops on the whole continued to support the Bourbons, but although the lower secular and regular clergy were divided, the majority favored the national cause. A good number of bibliographical references can be found in Rassegna storica toscana 4 (1948), 277, n. 28. Not even the Jesuits everywhere assumed the reactionary position generally ascribed to them. See G. De Rosa, I Gesuiti in Sicilia e la rivoluzione del '48 (Rome 1963).

[9] Text in Acta Pii IX I, 92–98. See J. Muller, Die Allokution Pius' IX. vom 29. April 1848 (Basel 1928); M. Monaco in Studi Romani 3 (1955), 175–94; especially G. Martina in RStRis 53 (1966), 527–82, 54 (1967), 40–47.

Antonelli, placed the chief emphasis on the first point and left the second one obscure. In his simplicity, Pius IX was unaware of the consequences of these changes, and when a few days later in response to the angry reaction of the Italian opposition he explained that his words had been designed to clarify the special position of the Pope and were in no way to be a disapproval of the national struggle, it was too late.[10] The equivocal epithet of "liberal pope" was replaced by the equally erroneous designation of "antinational pope."

The progressives in Rome immediately tried to benefit from the deep disappointment, caused by what many considered to be traitorous conduct, at the expense of the moderate liberals, who were discredited by the trust which they had placed in the Pope.

The situation was aggravated by the discontent caused by the economic crisis affecting the Papal State and all of Europe. It made the people an easy prey of agitators. Anarchy continued to spread. At the end of March, public demonstrations forced the Pope to ask the Jesuits to leave the Papal State. They were generally thought to be reactionary and pro-Austrian. In May he had to accept a lay ministry exposed to the continuous pressure of radical elements. Political assassinations increased. To establish mastery over such a volatile situation would have required the abilities of an extraordinary statesman. Pius IX, however, very receptive to superficial suggestions, wavered between the reformatory advice tendered him by the likes of Rosmini[11] and the fear of losing his religious independence. It was a fear fed by the reactionary party at the papal court and the result was a growing lack of morale. He finally consented to entrust the administration to the energetic Count Pellegrino Rossi,[12] who wanted to form a constitutional government after the model of France. But he was unpopular with both the parties of the right and the left and was assassinated shortly after his appointment.

Now things happened quickly: The revolutionaries besieged the Pope in the Quirinal Palace and demanded the convocation of a constituent assembly and a declaration of war on Austria. In the city, cardinals and prelates were exposed to all kinds of threats. Under these circumstances the Pope decided on 24 November, primarily advised by Cardinal Antonelli, who feared that the Pope could be pressured into making ill-considered concessions, to leave Rome Disguised, he went to the Neapolitan port of Gaeta[13] in order to board ship for France. He was dissuaded, however, by those who feared that he would fall under the influence of a republican country, and instead accepted the invitation of the king of Naples to seek refuge in his kingdom, where he stayed for seventeen months. Two days after his flight Pius IX dissolved the government which he had left behind and placed Cardinal Antonelli at the helm of the papal administration with the title of prosecretary of state. For the next twenty-five years, Antonelli was in charge of the fate of the Holy See.

---

[10] On 3 May he sent a letter to the Austrian chancellor (see F. Gentili in Nuova Antologia 256 [1914], 458–59), in which he advised him to forgo imposing Austrian domination on the Italian provinces by force and thus implicitly to acknowledge the superiority of the right of nationality over the divine right of kings or the unassailable character of treaties. Concerning the imperial reply, see F. Engel-Janosi in RömHM 10 (1967), 244–48.

[11] Consult F. Traniello, Societa religiosa e societa civile in Rosmini (Bologna 1966), 283–335.

[12] See M. Ruini, La vita di Pellegrino Rossi (Milan 1962).

Antonelli[14] was an easy-going prelate, ambitious and avaricious, and in spite of his genuine faith more a man of the world than a man of the cloth. He was industrious and energetic and possessed a limited intelligence, but without any perspicacity. He had those abilities peculiar to excellent civil servants, and in fact he had risen quickly in the papal administration, successful on each rung of the ladder. Sensitive and observant, cunning and winning in his ways, a diligent pupil of Bernetti, but without any convictions of his own, he now showed himself as a nimble diplomat. But his ability consisted primarily in finding excuses, in adjusting to the conditions of the moment, and in avoiding difficulties, rather than in attacking a problem at its roots and finding new solutions. He was by no means a reactionary and initially supported the reform movement introduced by Pius IX. But events convinced him that a partial laicization and liberalization of the government of the Papal State would not produce results and that the independence of the Pope as head of the Church could be guaranteed only by the return to a theocratic form of government. He thus decided to pursue a hard-line policy toward the politically active in Rome, and placed all of his hopes in a foreign intervention which would return the Pope to his throne. While Rosmini advised the Pope not to burn his bridges to the Roman parliament, Antonelli emphatically refused to receive a Roman delegation which wanted to ask the Pope to return to the capital. On 4 December he urged the European powers to use force in order to return the Pope to his temporal position. He then advised the Pope against a proclamation in the conciliatory form drafted by Rosmini and encouraged him to disavow the provisional government officially. Rosmini, who clearly recognized the disadvantages of a connection of the papal cause with Austria and the conservative powers, in vain advised the Pope to seek a solution with Piedmont as intermediary rather than through the aid of foreign troops. Antonelli, determined to achieve a solution through force, easily succeeded in exploiting the prejudices of Pius IX against the government of Turin and after a few weeks the rivalry between Rosmini and Antonelli ended with a complete victory of the latter. The Pope valued the devotion and skill which he displayed during the critical November days.

---

[13] About the flight to Gaeta see, complementary to the article by G. Mollat in RHE 35 (1939), 266–82, the treatments by P. Pirri: Miscellanea P. Paschini II (Rome 1949), 421–51 and F. L. Berro in Studi romani 5 (1957), 672–82. See also Positio super introductione causae I, 59–60, 69, 117–26, 336, 878–80.

[14] On Giacomo Antonelli (1806–76), see Dizionario biografico degli Italiani III, 484–93. A definitive study has not yet been written.

In Rome, where the flight of Pius IX made a very bad impression, Antonelli's inflexibility completely discredited the moderates and allowed the radicals to gain the upper hand. The constituent assembly, elected on 21 January 1849 with 134 against 123 votes, declared the Pope devoid of all claims to political power over the Roman state and proclaimed a republic. The government was entrusted to a triumvirate under the leadership of Guiseppe Mazzini. Ghisalberti accurately described the peculiarly Roman character of the republic; it was much more the work of the Roman people than of agitators from other Italian states. Moreover, the people had been won over less because of the republican ideology than because of extreme irritation with the "government of priests" and the abuses associated with it. Of the three phases of this six-month republic, only the second one can be regarded as influenced by Mazzini. But Mazzini's role had great significance, for it was he who, like a prophet, made Rome the focal point in the struggle for Italian rejuvenation, a role which it had not played during the time of Gregory XVI. It was now the ideological capital of the Risorgimento.

Joint military action by Austria, Spain, Naples, and France within a few months put an end to the republican government. The Catholics in France, encouraged by the events in Austria, were able to persuade Louis Napoleon to undertake the Roman campaign despite the opposition of the democratic elements.[15] The conference of Gaeta (30 March to 22 September 1849) established the foundation for the restoration of papal power. The French government desired the restoration to take place in a liberal atmosphere. But while Antonelli considered a return to the form of government of 1848 impossible, he untiringly worked to prevent the implementation of the statute of March 1848 which the Pope had conceded. He was supported by the diplomats of the conservative powers; contrary to expectations, Austria's representative was not the most obstinate; in fact, he was very much aware of the dangers of an excessive reaction. The end result was the motu proprio[16] of 12 September 1849, which promised great freedom on the communal level and reforms of the judiciary and the administration, but which brought no political freedom. The regulation, which in effect merely implemented the recommendations of the memorandum of 1831, was "about eighteen years behind the requirements of the present" (Ghisalberti). Even so, there was a large number of cardinals who considered even this regime as too progressive. They were supported by the Neapolitan court in their delay of the implementation of the recommendations of the motu proprio. They undertook repressive measures in an atmosphere of passionate prejudices, totally justifying Monsignor Corboli-Bussi's description of the papal restoration as reactionary and inept.

---

[15] After an initial failure in April, the occupation of Rome finally took place on 3 July 1849 under the leadership of General Oudinot.

Even more remarkable than the obsolete character of the political restoration was the change in the attitude subsequently demonstrated by Pius IX. At Gaeta, in contrast to the people around him, his concern for a religious revival predominated and was the real cause for the ideas of political reaction. It is well known to what extent people can be influenced by disappointed illusions. His advisers missed no opportunity to keep alive in his impressionable soul the memories of the bloody Roman revolution and especially the murder of Pellegrino Rossi, the defender of a far-reaching liberalization of institutions, by radical elements. Aside from the psychological level, the opinions of Pius IX also hardened, especially his distrust of principles whose dangerous consequences had become evident. More than ever before he was now convinced of the connection between the principles of 1789 and the destruction of traditional social, moral, and religious values. As A. M. Ghisalberti noted with respect to the address by Pius IX on 20 April 1849,[17] the entire Syllabus was embryonically present in these experiences. The new orientation began with the placing on the Index on 30 May 1849 of the works in which Gioberti, Rosmini, and Ventura had presented their reform program.[18] The Civiltà cattolica became for the Pope, who very much encouraged its founding by a group of Jesuits under the leadership of Father Curci,[19] an instrument of doctrine and a carrier of propaganda effective far beyond the borders of Italy.

---

[16] Text in Atti del S. Pont. Pio IX V/1, 286–90 (cf. 293–94).

[17] Text in Acta Pii IX I, 167–94. See also A. Gambaro, Ferrante Aporti nel I° centenario della morte (Brescia 1962), 235–50.

[18] See R. Rensch, Der Index der verbotenen Bücher II (Bonn 1885), 1132–41, and G. Martina, "La censura romana del 1848 alle opere di Rosmini," Rivista rosminiana 62 (1968), 384–409, 63 (1969), 24–49.

[19] On the beginnings of the Civiltà cattolica, see CivCatt (1949) II, 5–40; P. Pirri, Il P. Roothaan (Rome 1930), 463ff.; A. Dioscoridi in RStRis 42 (1955), 258–66.

CHAPTER 5

The Consequences of the Events of 1848 in France

French Catholics initially were chagrined by the news of the abolition of the monarchy, evoking in them sad memories of the Terror. But then they noted with joy that the new government harbored no hostile sentiments and that the revolutionaries even displayed a respectful attitude toward the Church. It would be too simplistic, of course, to equate the insults hurled at priests in 1830 or the destruction of the residence of the archbishop in Paris with the appeal of 1848 which asked the clergy to bless the liberty trees, for the short period of friendship between Church and Republic was essentially limited to Paris. Yet there is no doubt that a change of mind had taken place since 1830 and that many people in 1848 as heirs of romanticism were motivated by a kind of Christian sentimentalism and were taken by the evangelical message of brotherly love and human equality. They were also impressed by the liberal stance taken by Pius IX at the beginning of his pontificate and by the fact that the clergy, less involved in politics than during the restoration period and even occasionally treated with coldness by the authorities, had come closer to the people. Thus, clergy and flocks, after a momentary disquiet, were calmed by the thought that religion flourished in the American republics and accepted the new government with sympathy. Numerous clerics, regarding themselves as successors to the priests of 1789, became candidates for the constituent assembly, which confirmed their initial hopes. Through the introduction of the universal franchise in a country in which many peasants were still under the influence of the clergy, the Church was assured of a larger political role than under the earlier class voting arrangement.

But the revolution of 1848 posed a much more difficult problem for the conscience of French Catholics than the simple acceptance of the Republic: it was its socialistic character which exercised a disturbing influence on the broad masses of the Catholics, especially in the rural areas, and among the petite bourgeoisie and the landowners. There were also a few groups who under the July Monarchy had become concerned with the problems of the workers. From the beginning these people favored the socialistic tendencies of the young republic. A few clerics and laymen, among them Ozanam and Lacordaire, were even willing to support them actively, and with the approval of the archbishop of Paris, Monsignor Affre, they founded the newspaper L'Ère Nouvelle, designed to defend not merely the principles of 1789 and the republican ideal, but also various social reforms, some of which were still rather daring at this time.

The program also found an echo in some Catholic newspapers in the provinces and initially was somewhat successful chiefly among the young clergy. But a large majority of Catholics were above all interested in the maintenance of order and the inviolability of property. Their worries, caused by financial impositions designed to pay for the initial social legislation, turned into panic after the June disturbances which were caused by the closing of the state-run workshops. They convinced the French Church for the next twenty years that religion, morality, and the traditional social order were threatened. Confirmed in its fears by the events in Rome, it essentially returned to a conservative position, and because of its fear of the socialists was prepared for all kinds of compromises. While the bishops painted democracy as the heresy of the nineteenth century and Louis Veuillot began to attack socialism, to which were attributed the areligious antifamilial tendencies of some of its leaders, Montalembert became the leader of the countermovement against the radicals, in whose aims he saw a threat to the true concept of freedom.

This rapid development was favored by the Orleanist bourgeoisie, which now was perfectly willing to make common cause with the Church for the purpose of defending property. To be sure, Montalembert and Falloux,[1] together with Thiers and Molé, the leaders of the large "party of order," were concerned about the preservation of the interests of religion and obtained significant advantages for the Church; but their clever calculation on the parliamentary level took insufficient account of the dangers inherent in this pact between religion and capitalist interests. On the other hand, French Catholics strongly supported the increasingly antidemocratic measures with which the National Assembly in 1849 and 1850 attempted to reduce the influence of the left. Thus they appeared not only as antisocialists but as antirepublicans as well and their attitude toward Louis Napoleon Bonaparte reinforced the impression. Without a doubt, they preferred him to Cavaignac as president because he promised them the freedom of secondary education and the support of France for the restoration of the secular power of the Pope. To the same degree that he revealed himself as dictator, clergymen flocked to him, as the traditionalist movement increased their sympathies for the authoritarian forms of power.

The attitude of the Catholics to the coup d'état of 2 December 1851 was therefore predictable. With a few exceptions—among them Lacordaire, Ozanam, Dupanloup, and the small group of Christian Democrats—they agreed after brief hesitation with Veuillot: "There is only a choice between Bonaparte as Emperor and the socialistic republic." Montalembert exhorted people to vote "yes" in the plebiscite "in order to defend our churches, houses, and women against those whose greed does not respect anything." The legitimist Monsignor Clausel de Montals was not the only bishop who regarded the coup d'état which drove away the specter of a red republic "as the greatest miracle of God's benevolence known to history." But the praises to God which the clergy sang in public on the occasion of the coup d'état aroused the anger of the republican leaders. Unceasingly they denounced the "alliance between saber and aspergillum" and gradually imbued their followers with their violent anticlericalism.

---

[1] On Alfred de Falloux (1811–86), who played a significant role during this period, see DHGE XVI, 1499–1513.

For the moment, however, the four years of the Second Republic had clearly been positive for the French Church. The tactic employed by Montalembert during the July Monarchy had borne fruit. The Catholics, well represented in the parliament and needed against the left, succeeded in obtaining a number of institutionally and administratively favorable decisions. They were not able, as they had hoped initially, to do away with the so-called Organic Articles which limited the freedom of the Church,[2] but the new constitution quite satisfactorily regulated some points important to the Catholic interests. Favored by generous legislation, orders expanded quickly.[3] Relations with the authorities were easy and often even friendly, and the reconstruction of parish churches increased. Three new dioceses for the Antilles and Réunion Island were established. Advised by Dupanloup, Falloux appointed excellent bishops and they, strictly supervised by the nuncio, gradually grew accustomed to dealing directly with Rome without interference from the government, which in any case granted them more freedom than they had had under the monarchy. After brief hesitation, the government even gave in to the importunings of Monsignor Sibours and permitted the convocation of provincial synods, last held in 1727. These councils regulated a number of ecclesiastical administrative problems which had been left unattended for more than fifty years. They also provided proof for the clergy that large portions of the population had become estranged from the Church and that new methods of pastoral care needed to be employed.

---

[2] Monsignor Affre, archbishop of Paris, supported by some other bishops, planned an even more radical reform which intended to renounce the advantages of the concordat in order to assure the independence of the Church from the government. The election of the bishops by the bishops of their church province further was to replace the appointment of bishops by the government. A letter from the Pope, inspired by the nuncio, put an end to the plan. On the fruitless efforts of the Comité des Cults, see P. Pradie, La question religieuse en 1682, 1790, 1802 et 1848 (Paris 1849) and E. Ponteil, Les institutions de la France de 1814 à 1870 (Paris 1966), 328–30; on the initiative of Monsignor Affre, see J. Leflon in Revue des travaux de l'Academie des sciences morales 121 (1968) I, 221–28.

[3] There were 207 new authorizations within three years compared to 384 during the eighteen years of the July Monarchy, and the total number of regular clergy rose from 28,000 in 1848 to 37,357 in 1851.

The major advantage for the Church during the Second Republic was in the field of education. Fear of the "socialist danger" and apprehension of the elementary school teachers, many of whom seemed to be enamored of socialism, drove the middle class to the Church which it had fought for so long. Thiers was willing to entrust the entire primary school education to the clergy, whose expectations had been far lower. In secondary education, however, designed for the children of the bourgeoisie, there were still numerous defenders of the monopoly of the state. At all costs they were determined to achieve a series of conditions which seriously would have restricted the freedom promised in ARTICLE 9 of the constitution. For four months the matter was discussed in a special committee created by Secretary of Education Falloux, but finally the skill of Abbé Dupanloup, Thiers, and Cousin succeeded in winning substantial concessions. The draft developed by the commission was adopted on 15 March 1850 by the Chamber of Deputies in spite of the opposition of university professors and the left. The Falloux Law,[4] for thirty years the basis of a dual school system, brought about a total reform of the state and private systems of education. It was based on two principles: freedom of private education, producing some very favorable conditions for schools run by the Church, and influence by the Church on the education system of the state.

The Falloux Law promoted an increase in the number of Catholic schools and perforce gradually deepened the gap which ideologically separated the former pupils of the ecclesiastical colleges from the high schools of the state and the former pupils of the school brothers from the lay schools. By increasingly making the Church a rival of the state in the area of education, this law contributed to the formation of a broad anticlerical movement, which half a century later led to drastic measures against the orders, through which it was hoped to deliver a mortal blow to Catholic education. For the moment, however, the law was a great victory for the Church after forty years of a monopoly by the university.

But it was also a victory for Catholic liberalism. The tactic inspired by Montalembert had made success possible. On the other hand, the acceptance of this compromise law meant for the Church the official renunciation of its claims to the monopoly of education which it had had under the Old Regime and of which many still dreamed. A portion of the clergy, supported by intransigent journalists led by Louis Veuillot, regarded this "Edict of Nantes of the nineteenth century" (Lacordaire) as an unacceptable capitulation, signifying in an essential point the end of the system of an established religion. The discussions soon grew so heated that the Pope, warned by Montalembert and Dupanloup, had to force the episcopate to accept the law. It made the split in the Catholic bloc final and any small incident could not but deepen it. This was demonstrated, for example, in the discussion of the ideas of Abbé Gaume concerning the treatment of pagan classics in the Catholic colleges.[5] Initially a bagatelle, it quickly grew with the aid of the newspaper L'Univers into a controversy between lay journalists and the bishops, and sharpened the contrast between Gallicans and ultramontanes.

---

[4] Text in H. Michel, op. cit., 484ff. By this time Falloux was no longer secretary of education, but his name remains connected with the law whose real creator he was.

---

[5] See DThC XV, 2807–8.

CHAPTER 6

The Consequences of the 1848 Revolution in the States of the German Confederation and the Netherlands

The States of the German Confederation

Buoyed by the news from France of the revolution in February 1848, the liberal movement in Germany in March 1848 could have either taken over the government in various German federal states or gained a degree of participation. After general elections, the National Assembly met in Frankfurt in May, confronted with the double responsibility of creating a unified state and a liberal constitution. It wrote the constitution, but by the time it was passed in March 1849 the Assembly no longer had the strength to withstand the individual states, which had regained much of their power. In the larger states by this time the governments had managed to impose constitutions of their own—in Prussia in December 1848, in Austria in March 1849—and while these realized many liberal demands, they actually started a counterrevolutionary phase.

Most of the German Catholics greeted the changes in March 1848 with approval. Brought up in the tradition of empire, they desired national unification and welcomed the fall of police state administrations which had oppressed the Church. The old ecclesiastical demands for freedom could be articulated effectively within the framework of the March movement and the leaders of the Catholics immediately took advantage of the recently decreed principles of freedom of the press, association, and assembly. From now on they pursued two large goals: The Church in Germany was to gain effective unity of action and lasting autonomy with respect to the governments; and in the desired national state the Catholics were to regain their proportional influence, lost after the secularization. Catholic activity was focused on the three new areas of associations, parliaments, and joint actions of the episcopate. Once again laymen and lower clergy were in the vanguard.

The first impulses which pointed the way were generated in Mainz. In March, Adam Franz Lennig,[1] cathedral chapter member, together with Professor Kaspar Riffel, Pastor Moufang and Chaplain Heinrich,[2] founded the "Pius Association for Religious Freedom," whose program was publicized by the Katholik and the Mainzer Journal (editor Franz Sausen),[3] founded in the spring of 1848. Several other associations followed, first in the Rhineland, in Westphalia, and in Baden, where Andlaw and Buß were the organizers, then also in Bavaria, Tyrol, and the east (Breslau and Danzig). By September there existed seven central associations and several hundred branches, many of them directed by laymen. In addition to religious freedom, the associations demanded social measures and some, especially in the Rhineland, also favored political liberalism.[4] The most important daily papers founded in 1848 were the Greater-German federalist Deutsches Volksblatt (Stuttgart) and the Rheinische Volkshalle (Cologne), with the motto: "Freedom for everything and for everyone."

During the elections for the National Assembly, the associations, together with Catholic election committees and the active support of the clergy, worked for the election of Catholic candidates. When the role of religion was debated in Frankfurt in the summer of 1848, the associations generated a flood of petitions which made the public aware of the Catholic demands.

In Prussia, the movement was led by Archbishop Geissel. In consultation with his suffragans he adopted Lennig's suggestion of a synod of all German bishops and pursued it diligently. He drafted a religious policy program which attenuated the desire of liberal Catholics for a separation of church and state and held fast to a continued parallelism to the extent that it was useful for the Church. It demanded autonomy but simultaneously also the maintenance of protection by the state and of legal privileges for the Church. It had great significance for the future development of the Church in Germany.

---

[1] Adam Franz Lennig (1803–66), in 1845 cathedral chapter member in Mainz, and after 1848 one of the most influential leaders of the Catholic association movement, decisively involved in the elevation of Ketteler as bishop of Mainz, his vicar general since 1852 (see, besides the biography of Brück, G. Lenhart: StL III, 924ff.; L. Lenhart in LThK VI, 944).

[2] Kaspar Riffel (1807–56), professor of moral theology at Gießen, forced to retire in 1842, in 1851 professor at the new clerical seminary in Mainz.

[3] H. J. Wieseotte, "F.J. Sausen und die Gründung des Mainzer Journals," AMrhKG 5 (1953), 267–98.

[4] See the program of the Cologne election committee: Heinen I, 115–19.

The active Catholics among the Frankfurt delegates worked for the realization of this program. They belonged to different political factions and were therefore not yet a regular party but only a working group under the name of "Catholic Club." Its leading members were the bishops Diepenbrock, Geritz (Ermland), Müller (Münster), and Sedlag (Kulm); the clerics Döllinger, Ketteler, and Beda Weber; and the laymen Buß, Gagern, Lasaulx, Linde, Müller (Würzburg), Osterrath, Phillips, Radowitz, and August Reichensperger.

Geissel, attempting skillfully to coordinate these forces, was a member of the Prussian Diet, where he led the Catholic representatives, among them Peter Reichensperger and the Bonn law professors Walter and Bauerband. At the same time the archbishop followed the path of direct negotiations with the government. As parliamentary work in Berlin made only slow progress and there were strongly anticlerical forces on the left, this way was realistic as well as programmatic. Most of the Church leaders wanted greater freedom, but they also wanted to maintain the alliance between throne and altar. Alternatives were not considered. Geissel was not in favor of cooperation between Rhenish Catholics and political liberalism, and he and Diepenbrock defended the threatened authority of the crown. In this matter Geissel was a tough politician: he demanded a price for the services which he offered the state.

In Frankfurt the position of the Church also was debated vigorously, but in September a compromise was found which satisfied central demands of the Churches.[5] In the section on basic rights, all Germans were guaranteed freedom of religion and of conscience; all groups were permitted the public exercise of religion, and civil rights were neither a precondition of nor limited by religion. The greatest success of the Churches consisted of being granted the right to regulate and administer themselves within the framework of general laws. Autonomy was achieved and separation from the state was avoided. Combined with the freedom for Churches was their equality; the privileged existence of some denominations was abandoned. The liberal parliamentary majority also insisted on some core demands of its concepts of state and society, in the face of which the Churches were pushed into a helpless defensive. Civil marriage was introduced, and all public education was placed under the authority of the state, with the exception of religious instruction. Private schools, however, were permitted.

---

[5] Reichsverfassung Section VI, ARTICLE V, pars. 144–51, ART. VI, pars. 152–54. Text: Huber, Dokumente I, 319f.

In spite of the failure of the National Assembly, the religious policy compromise of the constitution was significant and even influenced the Weimar constitution. It also had direct results, thanks to Geissel's exertions. The Frankfurt concessions to the Churches became part of the Prussian constitution imposed by the King. It renounced the right of approval, the right of the state to participate in the filling of clerical positions, and it facilitated the founding of orders.[6] The revised constitution of January 1850 confirmed these rights.[7] Under the influence of the conservative reaction it also accepted the Christian religion as the basis of all those state institutions which were connected with religion. It was generally assumed that this basis was provided by the two major denominations. The regulation of civil marriage was postponed until later (it was introduced only during the Kulturkampf), and for elementary schools consideration of denominational conditions was accepted. The relaxation of tension in the relationship between church and state thus reached its zenith and the religious paragraphs of the Prussian constitution were regarded justifiably as the Magna Carta of religious freedom.

During the celebration of the building of the Cologne Cathedral in August 1848, an affair equally ecclesiastic and national, Lennig's suggestion of a national meeting of the representatives of Catholic associations met with general approval. At the beginning of October the first German Catholic Conference took place in Mainz; it was characteristic for its structure that it was presided over by a layman, Buß, and that the bishop of Mainz, Kaiser, did not take part in the proceedings. Twenty-three representatives came from Frankfurt, and Döllinger made a programmatic speech in which he demanded a greater degree of freedom for the Church than the National Assembly had granted. He pleaded for a uniform, nationally and historically based organization of the German Church; it would not limit papal primacy, but it would give the Church the weight it deserved. While the majority applauded the speech, the ultramontanes began to have their first doubts. They did not know how to reconcile such autonomy with their centralistic concept. Ketteler, confronting the assembly with the social problems facing the Church, received undivided approval.

---

[6] Constitution imposed by Prussia, II, ARTICLES 11–21. Text: Huber, Dokumente I, 386f.

[7] Prussian revised constitution, II, ARTICLES 12–24. Text: Huber, Dokumente I, 402f.

The Mainz Catholic Conference was the start of a lasting integration of German Catholicism. The most important concrete results were the creation of a central organization, the "German Catholic Association," and religious decisions which were directed not against the thrones but merely against the concept of established Churches, demanding freedom of religion as well as guarantees under law. The Catholic Association was to be led by laymen and to pursue national goals, very much like O'Connell's Irish Catholic Organization. But the increasing anticlericalism of many liberals, the failure of the Frankfurt National Assembly, and the subsequent rise of a revolutionary radicalism allowed the growth of uncertainty with respect to political goals. The two Catholic conferences in Breslau and Regensburg in 1849 agreed on political neutrality and on concentration of energies on ecclesiastical concerns. The Regensburg conference declared religious freedom to be the prerequisite for national unity and accused the Frankfurt National Assembly of not having considered this historical truth adequately.

In 1848 Archbishop Geissel managed to convince most of his colleagues to convene a bishops' conference and to invite eminent theologians, among them Döllinger, and laymen as advisers. He designed a tentative program, calling for freedom of religion and reforms in ecclesiastical structure and preaching. Reiterating Döllinger, the archbishop came out in favor of a structural unity of the German Church, which measure was not to be understood as directed against Rome but only against tutelage by the state. He also favored greater rights for the lower clergy and laity and greater use of German in liturgy.

The first German bishops' conference took place from 22 October to 16 November 1848 in Würzburg under Geissel's chairmanship and largely adopted his program. Of the Austrian bishops, only Cardinal Schwarzenberg (Salzburg) participated.[8] In an extensive memorandum to all German governments the conference formulated its religious demands, thus placing the episcopate in the lead of the ecclesiastical movement for freedom. The memorandum contained a consistent maximal program for the emancipation of the Church from the state and thereby determined the direction for future disputes, especially in southern and southwestern Germany. After lively discussions the majority of the bishops voted in favor of a national organization under the leadership of a primate as well as for timely reforms of church regulations and liturgy. The Pope was asked for permission for a formal national council which was to implement the decisions.

---

[8] Friedrich Prince zu Schwarzenberg (1809–85), 1836 archbishop of Salzburg, 1842 cardinal, 1850 archbishop of Prague, as a defender of Bohemian autonomy opponent of Viennese centralism, remained in Prague, where in 1860 a general meeting of German Catholics took place. In the 1860s Schwarzenberg occasionally was active as a mediator between Rome and German theologians. In 1869–70 he belonged to the most vocal opponents of the dogma of infallibility (see, in addition to the biography by Wolfsgruber, Wurzbach, 33, 71–78; E. Winter, Die geistige Entwicklung Anton Günthers und seiner Schule [Paderborn 1931]; K. zu Schwarzenberg, Geschichte des reichsständischen Hauses Schwarzenberg II [Neustadt/Aisch, 1964]).

The papal reply was half a year in coming and was negative. The novel initiative of the German bishops had caused suspicion and doubts in the Curia; in fact, Rome had tried to torpedo the conference. Pius IX was not prepared to grant the bishops supradiocesan responsibilities and in ignorance of the people active in Germany (including Döllinger!), shades of Febronius and of the Ems Congress were conjured. Suspicion was awakened and fed persistently by the intransigent Munich internuncio Sacconi[9] and Archbishop Reisach, who closely cooperated with him. Their criticism was focused on the plans for a national church organization and the liturgical reforms and clearly presaged the internal divisions of the Church during the subsequent two decades.

The German bishops accepted the papal decision postponing a national council for an indefinite period of time. After all, they had not intended an action unacceptable to the Pope, and besides, national enthusiasm had considerably diminished in the meantime. Once again the Church had to deal with the individual states after the revolutions. Geissel therefore distanced himself from some of his reform proposals, in part because they had contributed to some far-reaching demands for codetermination by his clergy under the leadership of Pastor Binterim. In southwestern Germany as well the old demands for diocesan synods were strongly raised in the wake of the revolution.[10] Perhaps Geissel and the majority of his colleagues realized only during the period of disenchantment in 1849 that the organizational concentration without the participation of intermediate levels was inseparable from the authoritarian restoration which they also regarded as necessary.

---

[9] Carlo Sacconi (1808–89), in 1845 envoy in Florence, in 1847 internuncio, in 1851 nuncio in Munich and in 1853 in Paris, in 1861 Curia cardinal. (Schmidlin, PG II, 162, 302, 338ff., 345f.; Aubert, Pie IX, 110f.; Lill, Bischofskonferenzen, 17–51).

[10] The Freiburg professor and cathedral chapter member J. B. Hirscher, with his sensational pamphlet Die kirchlichen Zustände der Gegenwart (Tübingen 1849), pleaded for the introduction of synods at which clergy and laymen should jointly formulate canon law. At the same time he attacked Catholic associations, which he accused of superficiality and lack of concern for the real tasks of the Church. He thus assumed an antipolitically motivated position, connected with the polemicism of F. X. Kraus and his pupils against political Catholicism. On the synodal movement under the Rhenish clergy, see especially H. Schrörs in AHVNrh 105 (1921), 106 (1922).

Thanks to the bold efforts of Anton Günther, Sebastian Brunner (1814–93),[11] and Emanuel Veith (1787–1870),[12] the association movement in 1848 spread to Austria. The leaders of restoration Catholicism were compromised by their connection with Metternich, and the majority of bishops remained silent for Josephinist reasons. Cardinal Schwarzenberg, a disciple of Günther's, in August 1848 conducted a conference with his suffragan bishops and sent petitions to the Reichstag; after his return from Würzburg he intensified his efforts for the activation of the episcopate. Only when there was no longer any doubt about the victory of the counterrevolution did the Josephinist Viennese archbishop Vincenz Milde (1777–1853) ask the young Emperor Franz Joseph for the convocation of an all-Austrian bishops' conference. The Emperor, who in the Patent of 4 March appended to the Constitution had granted all Christian denominations the right to the autonomous regulation of their affairs, and the government led by Prince Felix Schwarzenberg, a brother of the Cardinal, agreed to the project. The conference took place in Vienna between 27 April and 17 June 1849; its chief participants were Schwarzenberg, Rauscher (prince-bishop of Seckau and administrator of Leoben since 1849),[13] and Diepenbrock, entitled to participate because of the Austrian part of Breslau. Basing itself on the Patent of 4 March, the conference appealed to Emperor and government for the dismantling of Josephinist legislation and for a concordat for the border areas. From now on, this was a persistent demand by the bishops. Franz Joseph, a pupil of Rauscher's, quite in keeping with the recommendations by Metternich, was desirous of assuring his restoration policy through an agreement with the Church. His decrees of 18 and 23 April 1850 satisfied the most important demands of the bishops (among others lifting of the placet, freedom of communication with Rome, free exercise of episcopal disciplinary powers),[14] thus starting the Church policy which led to the concordat of 1855.

---

[11] On Brunner, the founder (1848) and editor of the Wiener Kirchenzeitung, see especially K. Ammerl, Sebastian Brunner und seine publizistische Stellungnahme in der Wiener Kirchenzeitung (diss., Vienna 1934); J. Treimer, Sebastian Brunner als Historiker (diss., Vienna 1945); E. Alker in NDB 2, 683f.; ÖBL 1, 121f.

[12] C. Wolfsgruber, Veith als Homileth (Vienna 1911); E. Hosp, Das Erbe des heiligen Klemens Maria Hofbauer (Vienna 1953).

[13] Rauscher owed his bishopric to Schwarzenberg, who as archbishop of Salzburg had the right of appointment for three of his suffragan bishoprics (Lavant, Seckau-Loeben, Gurk).

[14] Text: Walter, Fontes, 276–80.

The Netherlands

The support given to Thorbecke's liberal party by the Catholic middle class in the northern provinces made a peaceful revolution possible, leading to the constitution of 1848. The Catholics, desirous of complete freedom in education, had to be satisfied with a compromise, but received full satisfaction in all other areas. Owing to freedom of assembly, the last obstacles were removed for religious orders. In spite of the efforts of the conservatives among the Reformed to give the country the character of a "Protestant nation," the new constitution proclaimed the equality of all religious denominations before the law and the right of each denominational community to regulate its own affairs.

The restoration of a regular episcopal organization, on the agenda for longer than thirty years, had to appear as the crowning point of this complete and legal emancipation. But in reality it was not desired by many priests. In the rural south they were satisfied, ever since in 1842 the vicars apostolic had assumed the character of an Ordinarius loci, and in the cities of the north the archpriests and regular clergy feared the loss of their autonomy. The laymen of the north, supported by a few priests of the group clustered around Warmond and the bishop of Liège, Van Bommel, who was of Dutch descent,[15] pleaded with Rome for real bishops. Their main reason was their wish to have a local authority capable of guiding them in all political questions touching the interests of the Church.

They all agreed in principle, but differed in the modalities. Those who were close to the office in The Hague responsible for the Catholic religion would have preferred a concordatory solution or at least an agreement with the state negotiated on the basis of the Mechelen School; the strongly liberal group of the young Papo-Thorbeckians of the Tijd chiefly desired the independence of the Church from the state, even at the cost of complete separation. The demands of the government, which had to take into account the rejection by the Protestants of the establishment of dioceses in the north, forced the Holy See to accept the second solution and to decide unilaterally how to restore the hierarchy. In order to offend the Protestants as little as possible, it was at first planned, in agreement with the suggestions of the inter-nuncio and vicar apostolic of 's-Hertogenbosch, Monsignor Zwijsen, to establish only one diocese in the north and three in the south, including the see of the metropolitan. But the prefect of the Propaganda, on the occasion of a visit, convinced himself not only of the numerically growing importance of Catholicism in the north, but also of its dynamic nature,[16] and it was finally decided in a kind of restoration of the pre-Reformation hierarchy to make Utrecht the archepiscopal see and to add four suffragen dioceses: Haarlem for the large coastal cities, Breda, 's-Hertogenbosch, and Roermond for Brabant and Limburg.

---

[15] See A. Manning, De betekenis van C. Van Bommel (Utrecht 1956), 218–60.

The establishment bull of 4 March 1853 caused a wave of protest on the part of the Protestants which became known as the "April Movement," but it had a more political than religious nature. The prejudices of many Calvinists against the Pope were exploited by the reactionaries opposed to the liberal cabinet which had made the Roman decision possible. These attempts to place in question the favorable articles of the constitution of 1848 nevertheless failed because of the hesitant attitude of King Willem II. The King held no sympathies for the Roman Church, but considered it dangerous for the unity of the country to drive the Catholics to the extreme. In spite of a few offending decrees, ultimately everything ended with a rather harmless law on the exercise of religion.[17]

Disregarding the Protestant agitation, the new bishops, under the directorship of Zwijsen,[18] who was appointed archbishop of Utrecht, immediately began to rewrite Church regulations according to canon law. He was an industrious pastor, had no interest in intellectual pursuits, but possessed common sense and strength of character. During this difficult period these virtues were of use, but they also contributed their healthy share to the ultramontane ghetto character of Dutch Catholicism for the next one hundred years.

Under the strict leadership of an episcopate whose authority was limited by neither government nor traditions, surrounded by a pious, active and steadily growing clergy,[19] and ministered to by regular clergy of both sexes, whose growth was even greater, the faithful had hardly any opportunity to make efforts of their own. Like the Irish Catholics they accepted this clericalism, unthinkable in any other environment, without any hesitation and supported the clergy with remarkable generosity. For all areas of life the Catholics founded associations. Thus they guaranteed the maintenance of religious life, and nonpracticing Catholics, aside from the workers, remained an exception. But at the same time these social organizations contributed to keeping the Catholics away from most expressions of national life.

---

[16] Among others, through the immigration of a number of enterprising Germans from the Münster area.

[17] Among others, it raised the small Jansenist Church with about ten thousand members to the rank of an officially recognized religious community. The bishops of this Church—with seats in Utrecht and Haarlem—lodged protests with the government against the appointments by Rome of prelates to sees already occupied by "regular" successors of the former bishops (see B. Moss, The Old Catholic Movement [London 1948], 161–68, and Albers, Herstel I, 253–57, II, 433–34).

[18] On the other hand, because of the impossibility of cooperation between the internuncio Vecchiotti and the Dutch bishops it was not until 1865 that the first provincial council took place (see J. van Laarhoven, Een Kerkprovincie in concilie [Utrecht 1965]).

[19] The number of priests under the pontificate of Pius IX rose from 1,500 to 2,200, while the Catholic population increased by only 15 percent (1,439,137 in the year 1878, i.e., 35.86 percent of the total population; in 1840 it was 38.28 percent).

The isolation was noticeable especially on the cultural level. While a small body of Catholic intellectuals came into being among the urban middle class, intellectual life on the whole stagnated, especially in comparison to the ferment of the 1830s. While Catholics were well represented in music and architecture—here as everywhere else the Neo-Gothic was in full flower—their contribution to literature was minimal. Much more serious was the fact that their shortsighted suspicions of educational literature mired them in an almost total ignorance of the great literary movements of the time. In philosophy and theology, Catholic Dutch publications hardly rose above the level of reference books for seminaries or popular apologetic writings. Only a few exceptions stood out from the prevailing mediocrity. There were Theodor Borret,[20] who on the basis of his knowledge of Christian archeology became the first Catholic member of the Royal Academy; Willem Nuyens,[21] a talented polemicist who undertook a reassessment of the history of the religious wars of the sixteenth century; and especially Joseph Alberdingk Thijm,[22] the author of scholarly works on art history and Dutch literature. His sympathetic understanding and his intellectual qualities gained him recognition outside of Catholic circles and for many years he alone acted as the mediator between Catholics and Protestants. Only around 1870 did a moderate rejuvenation begin, finding expression primarily in higher academic standards of the Katholiek and in the founding of a new journal, De Wachter. The latter was especially concerned with those problems which resulted from the participation of Catholics in public life. It was the beginning of a new phase in the gradual emancipation of the Catholics.

---

[20] Concerning Theodor Borret (1812–90), see P. Dessens in De Katholiek 99 (1891), 4–35; a more detailed presentation is given by Rogier, KathHerleving, 239–41.

[21] On Willem Nuyens (1823–94), see G. Gorries, Willem Nuyens (Nijmegen 1908).

[22] On Joseph Alberdingk Thijm (1820–89), see W. Bennink, Alberdingk Thijm (Utrecht 1952) and G. Brom, Alberdingk Thijm (Utrecht 1956).

PART TWO

The Catholic Reaction to Liberalism

INTRODUCTION

Pius IX after 1848

Pius IX was still relatively young when at the age of fifty-four he was chosen Pope by cardinals chiefly concerned with a solution of the political problems of the Papal State. Yet in this very area he failed completely. On the other hand, his unusually long pontificate (1846–78) profoundly and lastingly affected the fate of the Catholic Church.

He was not at all a strong personality, such as his successor Leo XIII. But in contrast to his predecessor, Gregory XVI, who lived isolated from the world and whose influence did not reach beyond the narrow circle of his immediate collaborators, Pius IX managed rather effortlessly to win a large number of the clerics and of the faithful for his ecclesiastic, theological, and spiritual concepts.

His contemporaries were unanimous in agreeing on his fascinating charm. He loved being in contact with people and increased the number of audiences, during which with loving good nature he received not only a few notables, as his predecessors had done, but also numerous priests and laymen, who, owing to the improvement of transportation, flocked to Rome in ever greater numbers. The visitors, taken by their kind reception, after returning to their home countries broadcast their impressions, and consequently there developed a real papal adulation in the Catholic world, whose excesses, according to inclination, generated either smiles or irritation. The adulation facilitated to a high degree the enthusiastic agreement of many to an increasingly centralized leadership of the Church and to a coordination of the regional Churches with a certain type of Catholicism preferred by Rome.

The Pope, because of his fervent piety, trust in providence, and strength of soul in adversity, praised by many as a saint during his lifetime, appeared to others, including many clerics and many a militant layman whose devotion to the Church was unquestioned, as no more than a vain autocrat or a puppet maneuvered by insensitive reactionaries. Both impressions are one-sided and simplistic. It is possible to arrive at a realistic portrait, in spite of the absence of a good biography going beyond the framework of a naive hagiography, and to show both man and Pope as a concrete and differentiated personality.

Pius IX labored under three handicaps. In his youth he suffered from epileptic attacks which left him with an extreme excitability. It makes understandable many of his summary declarations and the fact that he frequently changed his mind according to the opinion last heard. Consequently, many observers regarded him as a hesitant and indecisive person. Only when he was convinced that it was a matter of consequence did he demonstrate unshakable resolution and boldly defended his position. The second handicap was that like most of the Italian clerics of his age, raised during the first two decades of the nineteenth century with the upheavals of the Napoleonic era, his education was rather inadequate. His superficial training often did not permit him to recognize the complexity of problems or the implications of many statements which he was expected to judge. This lack was partly compensated for by his Italian shrewdness, which allowed him to understand much without being very erudite. Thus Pius IX was able to apply common sense in assessing concrete situations, at least as long as they were reported to him accurately. Unfortunately, and that was his third handicap, his staff was not always able to inform him with the required care. His trusted advisers were generally conscientious and industrious, but also rather exalted and often viewed matters with the uncompromising attitude of theoreticians out of touch with contemporary views. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that Pius IX failed to adapt the Church to new conditions. These were on the one hand the profound evolution which was in the process of completely altering the structures of bourgeois society, and on the other the totally changed perspectives by which certain theological positions needed to be viewed in light of the progress made in the natural sciences and historical research.

If the capabilities of Pius IX had undeniable limits, especially regrettable in a superior who increasingly was compelled to make solitary decisions in many areas, he must also be credited with qualities and achievements which cannot be regarded as small. This was first of all true on the personal level. Pius IX was a genuinely unpretentious and good person,[1] equipped with a sensitivity which permitted him to make charming gestures and have happy ideas, without excluding, if he considered it advisable, a sometimes rude frankness. He was sufficiently supple to make occasional concessions which at first sight looked dangerous, because more than the tacticians in his environment, he relied on trust built on personal relations. Father Isaac Hecker, who regretted that Pius frequently allowed himself to be guided more by impulses than by judgment, also thought that his impulses were great, noble, and universal.[2] He was not an intellectual, but was interested in all kinds of problems, and in his youth had read extensively.[3] After he became Pope, he kept abreast of modern inventions. He knew how to pray, and the depth of his religious sentiments was undeniable, even if in this area, as in others, he combined weaknesses with virtues. He attached too much weight to prophecies and other manifestations of the miraculous, and tended to see in the political convulsions which involved the Church a new episode in the great battle between God and Satan instead of realistically subjecting the events to a technical analysis.

---

[1] With two provisos: the excessive receptivity for impressions stemming from the illness of his youth occasionally drove him to fits of anger, as violent as they were sudden, but they never lasted long and had few consequences for those who had occasioned them. To this was added toward the end of his life a predisposition for flattery and the inability to be contradicted. But it would not be just to take account only of the weaknesses of an eighty-year-old man when assessing the personality of Pius IX.

At the beginning of his priestly life, at a time when most young clerics are concerned with making a career, he completely renounced ecclesiastical honors and devoted himself to orphans and other poor. As bishop he impressed the people of his diocese by the apostolic strength with which he rose above party struggles in order to minister to everyone, including the enemies of the papal government. Even after he became Pope, his chief concern was to act as priest and pastor, responsible before God for the defense of Christian values, which were jeopardized by rationalism and the increasing ungodliness of laicism. He increasingly encouraged the ultramontane movement, but not for reasons of personal ambition or love of theocracy, which tempted him less than his successor Leo XIII. He was ultramontane only because this movement appeared to him as the prerequisite for a rejuvenation of Catholic life wherever the intervention of governments in the Church seemed to throttle it, and because he saw it as the best means to coordinate all vital forces of Catholicism for the struggle against the rising flood of anti-Christian liberalism. This attitude explains his resistance to liberalism and his ever more violent condemnation of it. The Pope was part of the political philosophy of the traditionalistic type prevalent among Catholics during the middle of the nineteenth century. As such he was incapable of differentiating among the confused strivings of his time between those of positive value, which actually prepare the ground for a stronger spiritualization of the Catholic understanding of faith, and senseless concessions to fleeting fashions or even unconscious compromises with ideologies which failed to correspond to the Christian spirit. Above all he lacked realism in his church-political ideal, which throughout his entire pontificate he chased with an uncontrollable energy better expended on a worthier cause. As P. Martina pointed out astutely, it was "a historical impossibility to achieve at one and the same time complete freedom for the Church and the support of the state: a choice needed to be made."[4]

---

[2] Quoted by W. Elliot, Vie du Père Hecker (Paris 1897), 250. Many contemporaries emphasized the degree to which Pius IX allowed himself to be guided "by impressions and the heart."

[3] See L. Sandri, "La biblioteca privata di Pio IX," RstRis 25 (1938), 1426–32. Concerning the interest of Pius IX in scientific problems, see L. v. Pastor, Tagebücher, ed. by W. Wühr (Heidelberg 1950), 362.

In contrast to these doubtlessly grave defects and missed opportunities, which we can easily see from today's perspective, stands the fact that the long pontificate also had great positive effects. Many things changed in the world and in the Church after Pius IX became Pope. The strongest ecclesiastical change took place with respect to the quality of the average Catholic life, beginning with the spiritual and pastoral standards of the clergy, the chief instrument of preaching the faith in the view of that century. Without a doubt, many elements contributed to this development, but Pius IX also contributed a considerable share, primarily by providing his contemporaries with his personal example of piety and Christian rebirth, which characterized the second third of the nineteenth century. Even more important than his personal example was Pius's activity. Determined and conscious of his authority, he devoted a great deal of his time and of his energy to the activation and promotion of the slow development which started immediately after the great revolutionary crisis. Because a tough attitude in practical and doctrinal terms appeared to him as indispensable for complete success, he forced himself, in spite of a personal inclination to mediation and mitigation, to the reiteration of principles which constituted the basis of his doctrine. Occasionally he did so with a deplorable lack of subtlety.

No Pope, no matter how active and independent, can perform without advisers. Of those who for many years enjoyed the confidence of Pius IX there were chiefly Monsignor Borromeo, Monsignor Ricci, and Monsignor Stella, devoted and scrupulous men, yet without great vision and guided by reactionary tendencies. Of greater weight were two foreigners, Monsignor George Talbot,[5] an Englishman related to Borghese, and Monsignor Xavier de Merode,[6] half Belgian, half French, who together with Prince Gustav von Hohenlohe[7] were appointed in 1850 after the return of Pius IX to Rome for the purpose of underscoring the international role of the papacy. Talbot and Merode were intelligent men, holding less simplistic views with respect to modern society than was generally the case in Rome. But in their judgments both failed to consider the pros and cons and more than once encouraged the Pope, who placed great confidence in them, to assume an intransigent stance. Talbot did so in connection with English persons and affairs, in which his views generally were identical with those of Manning, and Merode did so with respect to the Roman Question and the French prelates with good connections to the government of Napoleon III.

---

[4] Pio IX e Leopoldo II (Rome 1967), 50.

[5] On George Talbot de Malahide (1816–86), see Wiseman Review no. 502 (1964), 290–308.

[6] Concerning Xavier de Merode (1820–74), see L. Besson, F.F.X. de Merode (Lille 1908) and R. Aubert in Revue générale belge (May and June 1956), 1102–43, 1316–34.

[7] Prince Gustav Adolf Hohenlohe (1823–96) was liked by Pius IX because of his modesty and was useful because of his linguistic skills, but he exercised no political influence; he became a cardinal in 1866, but fell into disgrace because of his relationship to the opposition during the First Vatican Council (see Hubert Jedin, "Gustav Hohenlohe und Augustin Theiner," RQ 66 [1971]).

While Pius IX's immediate entourage thus played a larger, if unofficial, role than that of his predecessors and successors—"influence without responsibility" Dom C. Butler called it—a noticeable reduction in the importance of the College of Cardinals took place, both with respect to the secular administration of the Papal State and the religious direction of the Church. With respect to the Papal State, Antonelli conducted affairs; concerning the cardinals, their selection occurred under new criteria. When in 1850 Pius IX created ten foreign and only four Italian cardinals, he signalled clearly that the essential task of the Sacred College was no longer that of administering the Papal State. The internationalization of the College of Cardinals continued. At the time of the death of Gregory XVI there were eight foreign and fifty-four Italian cardinals; when Pius IX died, there were twenty-five foreign and thirty-nine Italian cardinals.[8] The Italians by themselves were no longer able to produce the two-thirds majority required for the election of a Pope. The internationalization went hand in hand with another change. The representatives of the Roman aristocracy and the high functionaries in important administrative and political positions, who in the past had constituted the majority in the College of Cardinals, were gradually replaced by men of the Church of often modest background who excelled in pastoral work, theological knowledge, or ultramontane zeal. But in spite of this development the role of the College of Cardinals in the religious leadership of the Church grew smaller to such a degree that on the eve of the council the French ambassador wrote: "Never before was the role of the cardinals so modest and their influence so insignificant as today." The reason was in part the lack of personalities of high caliber, noted by many contemporary observers, but primarily it was Pius IX's personal style. He liked to inform himself directly about matters and did not hesitate, in the process of reaching a decision, to ignore regular channels. Unfortunately, all too often he relied on informants who were partisan or who lacked a sense for the complexity of concrete situations daily facing the Church.[9] While the meetings of the consistories and commissions of cardinals for the discussion of problems touching upon the Church became rarer, individual cardinals personally played a significant role. Some of them headed primary agencies—the most important of them were Giacomo Antonelli,[10] secretary of state from 1848 until his death in 1876, and Alessandro Barnabo, the competent and energetic head of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith from 1856 until 1874—others simply enjoyed the personal confidence of the Pope. Among the latter were Cardinals Gaude and Bilio, in charge of dogmatic questions, Mertel for legal affairs, Franchi for church-political problems, and Reisach for the concerns of German-speaking countries but especially there was Cardinal Patrizi, a friend of the Pope, who for thirty years had unhindered access to him. Patrizi was an example of virtue and piety, but with a rather narrow mind.[11]

---

[8] Of the 123 cardinals created by Pius IX, 71 were Italians and 52 were foreigners, including 16 Frenchmen, 12 Spaniards, 11 Austrians, 4 Germans, and 3 Portuguese.

The continuing centralization of the Church naturally enlarged the importance of the nunciatures and of the Roman congregations. But most of the contemporary observers noted with regret the frequent mediocrity of the staff of both institutions. The men concerned were generally very respectable concerning their morals and piety and well versed in the subtleties of canon law and the theology of reference books, but overwhelmingly they lacked an understanding of the modern world and its developments. They "favored everything that was old, from dress to opinions, from labels to theology," Cochin wrote in 1862. They displayed a hostility toward critical methods which expressed not only their distrust of the new direction of philosophy, history, and natural sciences, but also the thoughtlessness with which they accepted and even encouraged denunciations of all who intellectually and religiously failed to share their conformist views. This well-meant but short-sighted attitude merely postponed the solution of problems, and the more open-minded approaches under Leo XIII often came too late. These could not completely make up for lost time, so that, even recognizing the positive aspects, the actual roots of the crisis of modernism go back to the pontificate of Pius IX.

---

[9] See, for example, G. Martina, Pio IX e Leopoldo II, 375.

[10] During the first two years of the pontificate, one secretary of state replaced another one in quick succession: Gizzi (8 August 1846–7 July 1847); Ferretti (17 July 1847–20 January 1848); Bofondi (1 February–9 March 1848); Antonelli (10 March–2 May 1848); Orioli, ad interim (4 May–2 June 1848); Soglia (3 June–29 November 1848). See also G. de Marchi, Le Nunziature apostoliche dal 1800 al 1956 (Rome 1957), 10–11, and L. Pasztor in Annali della Fondazione italiana per la storia amministrativa 3 (1966), 314–18. After the death of Antonelli (6 November 1876) Pius IX appointed Cardinal Giovanni Simeoni (1816–92) as his successor (on him see L. Teste, op. cit., 257–61). Pius IX is supposed to have explained this appointment which created great astonishment as follows: "This is not going to be for long and I thus leave to my successor and to the conclave full freedom of action by selecting a cardinal who is destined for neither the papacy nor for political office" (quoted by Aubert, Pie IX, 498).

[11] Concerning Costantino Patrizi (1798–1876), see L. Teste, op. cit., 73—81, and M. Maccarrone, Il concilio Vaticano I (Padua 1966 I, 399–400 and n. 2.

There were numerous positive sides. Already mentioned as one of the most important was the intensification of Christian life, in which, in addition to local efforts, Pius IX and some of his collaborators had a large personal share. At the expense of many valuable traditions which once had made up the prestige of the French clergy or Sailer's school, but whose quality seems to have affected only a small elite, there now arose a large movement of popular piety and priestly spirituality. It has often been accused of too much superficiality, but this simplifying condemnation is contradicted by the flowering of church activities and the tremendous growth of orders. At the same time, during these three decades, the Church also became stronger externally. Promoted by the colonial expansion of Europe, there was on all five continents a missionary expansion under the centralizing impulse of the Vatican. The immigration of Catholics led to the creation of new Churches in Canada, Australia, the United States, and Latin America. The old Churches, existing under difficult conditions since the Reformation, were reorganized in England, the Netherlands, and above all in Germany. The resistance recorded during the Kulturkampf demonstrated the vitality which this Church was able to develop within a few years through its connection with the Holy See. For together with the quantitative expansion of the Catholic Church[12] went its closer ties with the Pope. The growth of Roman centralization, solemnly sanctioned by the Vatican Council, without a doubt represented one of the most striking phenomena of this pontificate. It caused bitter regret among those who knew the advantages of pluralism, but had positive effects where the regalistic traditions of the Old Regime had weakened the Churches.

The triumph of ultramontanism caused the reaction of governments which did not like the removal of the local clergy from their influence. Additionally, the parties of the left mobilized against the Church in the wake of its compromises with the antirevolutionary systems, underscored by sensational condemnations of liberalism. Thus the last years of the pontificate were darkened by numerous conflicts. At the moment of Pius IX's death (7 February 1878) it was easy to assume at first sight that the Church was totally stranded in a sea of hostile public opinion.

---

[12] Between 1846 and 1878, Pius IX established 206 new dioceses and apostolic vicariates.

But in reality it was not only consolidated internally, but had begun, precisely at the moment when the disappearance of the Papal State eliminated the papacy from the traditional diplomatic chess board of Europe, "to become a world power of which every policy must take account" (H. Marc-Bonnet). This was demonstrated at the start of the pontificate of Leo XIII.

SECTION ONE

The Temporary Improvement in the Situation of the Church

The Church appeared to have emerged with flying colors from the crisis of 1848, so worrisome to its officials, on two levels. In part it profited from a turn toward conservatism, which, concerned about the rise of democratic demands, expected from it assistance in stabilizing the bourgeois order. After all, Tocqueville's statement that "the fear of socialism has the same effect on the bourgeoisie as the Revolution had on the aristocracy," applied not only to France. At the same time the Church benefitted from the concessions to liberalism of which governments were compelled to take account through a moderation of their regalistic policies or even through the granting of complete independence to the Church. This stabilized condition enabled the Holy See to arrange a number of favorable concordats.[1] The most spectacular one was that signed with Austria in 1855. Recognition of freedom of religion, already in effect for Belgium, Great Britain, and the United States, was also incorporated in the new constitutions of Prussia and the Netherlands and produced the same beneficial results for the growth of Catholicism in these states. Finally, systematically resumed missionary work, in conjunction with European colonial expansion, resulted in noticeable successes after the middle of the century. They permitted the impression that the Church had overcome the great crisis of the past one hundred years and could look optimistically to the future. But the euphoria was of short duration. The situation worsened again after the 1860s and again brought home the truth that it was always a mistake for the Church to rely too much on institutional advantages which it had obtained through nothing more than good fortune. Yet the favorable condition almost everywhere in evidence during the first years of the pontificate of Pius IX made possible the stabilization and spiritual intensification of the Catholic renaissance. In spite of the uncertainties in many countries this condition must therefore not be underestimated when one attempts to form an exact picture of the religious situation during the final quarter of the nineteenth century.

---

[1] In 1851 with Spain, Tuscany, and Bolivia; in 1852 with Costa Rica and Guatemala; in 1855 with Austria; in 1857 with Portugal, Württemberg, and the Duchy of Modena; in 1859 with the Grand Duchy of Baden; in 1860 with Haiti; in 1861 with Honduras and Nicaragua; in 1862 with San Salvador, Venezuela, Ecuador, and Brazil. This policy of concordats was only resumed much later in 1881.

CHAPTER 7

The Seeming Success of the Church in France during the Second Empire and the "Moral Order"

The Privileged Status of the Church

The favoritisms extended to the Church under the Second Republic were increased at the beginning of the Second Empire. The Emperor and his advisers were not particularly interested in giving preference to the Church, but as conservative opportunists they were aware of the advantages of the moral and social force of religion in checking revolutionary propaganda. Moreover, association with the Church seemed to them a good way of binding legitimist circles to the Empire.

The government visibly enlarged the religious budget, made virtually no attempt to apply the Organic Articles, closed its eyes to the rapid growth of orders, suppressed antireligious tendencies in public education, and looked for opportunities to let the Church share in the prestige of the state. In response to the revolutionary excesses a good number of the middle class—and not only property owners—returned to the Church, seeing in it an effective guaranty for the maintenance of the social order. Having gradually regained its influence on the leading elements since the beginning of the century, the clergy now also obtained the assistance of many high officials. In an authoritarian regime their power was not to be underestimated and through them the benevolent attitude of the government toward the Church found strong expression. In addition, the universal right to vote, introduced in 1848, provided the lower clergy, which had maintained close contact with the people in the rural areas and small towns, a power which it had not yielded before.

But the clergy failed to exercise restraint, and to the extent that revolutionary threats diminished the government began to be suspicious of the growing importance of clerics in public life. The tactless policy of Nuncio Sacconi (1853–61) and the systematic efforts of the ultramontane party to exclude completely any influence of the government in ecclesiastical matters led to a reawakening of the Gallican tradition of a Ministry of Religion. The crisis, present in embryo after 1856, erupted with the development of the Roman Question after the Italian War (1859). The leaders of the Catholic movement, having until now hailed Napoleon III as a latter-day Charlemagne, were very disappointed when the Emperor agreed to a division of the Papal State. They tried to raise a wave of protest in the country, but did not have much success. This convinced the government that the people no longer followed the lead of the clergy as much as before. It decided to deal with the advances of the Church by introducing a plan worked out by Minister Rouland. It appointed bishops who refused to accept the increasing interference of the Roman Curia in France, stopped the further growth of orders and religious communities, and gave preference to the public schools. It increasingly resorted to chicanery in order to destroy the influence of the clergy, but ostensibly continued to promote religion in and outside of the country[1] so as not to lose the confidence of the Catholic population.

The policy, moderated by the benevolent neutrality of many Catholic civil servants, created indignation among the clergy. It also succeeded in drawing a number of notables to the side of the opposition. The growth of the Republican Party after 1863 therefore persuaded the government to return to a less hostile policy in order to regain the good will of the "Clerical Faction."[2] While the cabinet continued to tolerate the attacks of the anticlerical press against the Church, it tried in other ways to regain the confidence of the clergy. It hoped that after the appointment of a number of Gallican-oriented bishops[3] the clergy would less compliantly adhere to the increasingly intransigent positions of the Vatican with respect to problems of modern civilization.

Owing to the Roman Question and the convention of September 1864, this pacification policy did not have immediate results. But after the intervention of French troops in Mentana (1867) nothing stood any longer in the way of the reconciliation desired by both sides. The joint fear of the republican opposition led the two powers to cooperation. Once again it tied the declining Empire to the conservative force of the clergy, which, in turn, was apprehensive of the anticlericalism displayed by the republicans.

---

[1] In Syria, where French troops protected the Maronites; in China and Indochina where they defended the persecuted missionaries; in Mexico, where they attempted to replace the anticlerical republic of Juárez with the Catholic empire of Maximilian, the Emperor appeared as the defender of the Church, whose interests happened to coincide with those of France.

[2] With the exception of a few areas, the clergy was without a doubt increasingly less able to influence the majority of the voters; this fact was pointed out by Maurain and confirmed by L. M. Case (French Opinion on War and Diplomacy during the Second Empire [Philadelphia 1954]). But the vote of the followers of the clergy nevertheless in many instances was a significant factor.

[3] On this policy, applied especially by Minister Baroche, see numerous references in J. Maurain, op. cit. and recent more detailed indications, especially about the important role played by Lavigerie, in de Montclos, 288–99.

The reputable standing of religion and the improvement of the material and moral condition of the rural clergy, which until the middle of the century stood on the sidelines of Christian intellectual life, soon had its effects on the number of priests. This increase was also affected by the Falloux Law. The number of ordinations in France climbed by more than a third,[4] and the total number of priests rose from 46,969 in 1853 to 56,295 in 1869. The increase enabled the bishops to fill numerous vicariates, to raise the number of clerics in public service from 1,541 to 2,467, and to establish 1,600 new parishes. This made the Second Empire appear as the "high point between a period of moderate development during the July Monarchy and a period of hastening decline under the Third Republic" (Pouthas).

The training of the clergy, however, remained deficient. In spite of the efforts of a few discerning bishops—Cardinal de Bonald in Lyon, Dupanloup in Orléans, and Lavigerie and Foulon in Nancy—seminary instruction, imparted by insufficiently educated teachers, hardly rose above the level of a catechism taught in Latin. The priests trained in them were virtuous,[5] but more inclined to minister to the "converted" than to make contact with the increasingly indifferent populace or to counter the prejudices of upwardly mobile people. It is not surprising, therefore, that the clergy—with the exception of a numerically limited elite—regarded Louis Veuillot as their model. With absolutely uncritical zeal they followed the directions of L'Univers, a paper which fed the clergy's ultramontane enthusiasm and its mistrust of the "modern world."

If the majority of the lower clergy after the 1850s became ultramontane, they did so primarily in the hope of gaining in the Roman Curia a counterweight to the authoritarian stance of the bishops. While the majority of the bishops did not openly agree with Cardinal de Bonnechose, who compared himself to a general in charge of a regiment, they nevertheless displayed a decided bent for the centralization of diocesan administrations. They strengthened controls, transferred personnel without consideration of their personal desires, put out detailed regulations on Church discipline and pastoral work, and left little initiative to their priests. This systematic and dutiful activity[6] resulted from their wish to guide their dioceses in the best interest of religion, but in most cases their efforts regrettably were not matched by pastoral sensitivity. On the whole, the upper clergy was extremely colorless and—with a few exceptions, such as Dupanloup or Freppel—not at all the belligerent episcopate depicted by the anticlerical press. Instead of thoroughly rethinking the methods of the apostolate, the bishops were satisfied with the institutionalization of those methods which had proved effective during the first half of the century. Thus, disregarding the migration of people resulting from the industrialization, positions in the countryside were increased while there was a crying need for additional parishes in the burgeoning cities.[7]

---

[4] This favorable development was not universal, however, and in the center of the countries concerns were being raised over the decline of applications.

[5] Only a small elite, which was at the same time a social elite, attended the French Seminary opened in Rome in 1853 (see Y. -M. Hilaire in ArchSR 23 [1967], 135–40) or the seminary of Saint Sulpice in Paris, whose standards by no means equalled those of clerical training in Germany, but which was clearly above those of the provincial seminaries (details in A. Castellani, Il beato Leonardo Murialdo, I [Rome 1966], 767–806).

The work of the bishops and the clergy was much facilitated by the assistance of the orders. For them the Second Empire was a time of growth; this was especially true for the female congregations, which were favored by the law of 31 January 1852. Between 1851 and 1861 the number of nuns increased from 34,208 to 89,243. During the same period, membership in the male orders rose from 3,000 to 17,656.

The rapid growth of orders and congregations provided the Church with the necessary manpower for reaching two goals. These were entry into public education and free education. The Church was not satisfied with the exercise of supervision of the teachers by the pastors; the practice was made possible by the Falloux Law, but gave rise to frequent friction. The Church wanted to obtain from communal councils, which were often kindly disposed toward the Church, permission to entrust public schools to the supervision by members of orders. Simultaneously, advantage was taken of a favorable tax law facilitating gifts of money and property to increase the number of Catholic schools and colleges. By preferentially admitting students from socially prominent families they attracted the attention of the middle class and contributed to a change in its attitude. Between 1850 and 1875 the number of children educated by teachers of orders rose from 953,000 to 2,168,000, while the number of students in the lay schools rose only from 2,309,000 to 2,649,000.

---

[6] The best-known case is that of Dupanloup in Orléans, thanks to the researches of Madame Marcilhacy. But he was not alone. On the French episcopate around 1870, see the well-documented description by J. Gadille, op. cit. I, 15–45.

[7] Two typical cases: Paris, where in 1861 there was one priest for 2,498 inhabitants of the parishes in the center, and one priest for 4,955 inhabitants in the parishes of the suburbs, inhabited by the common people (see Y. Daniel, L'équipement paroissial d'un diocèse urbain, Paris 1802–1956 [Paris 1957]); Lille, where in spite of the population explosion only one church was built before 1870 and after 1854 in some parishes there were more than four thousand people for one priest (see P. Pierrard, op. cit., 372–78).

The dubious character of this achievement was clearly recognized by A. Latreille: "The kind disposition of the government of Napoleon III to congregations and their schools must be regarded as the most significant fact of the history of French Catholicism between 1830 and 1880. It provided the Church with a large degree of satisfaction and possibilities of influence which it had been denied ever since the Revolution. But more than anything else it contributed to the growing distrust of the Church." This distrust became militant especially after 1870, but even during the Second Empire the desire to stop the progress of the Church grew stronger among those who suspiciously watched the influence of the "clericals" (the expression was coined during this period). After a few years, during which public education in view of the republican sympathies of the public teachers consciously had been neglected, Rouland undertook his reorganization in order to fashion public schools into a viable competitor for the schools maintained by the congregations. In spite of repeated protests by the episcopate, Victor Duruy after 1863 with varying success obstructed the development of free Catholic education and freed public schools from the influence of the Church.[8] His ministerial policy found a ready echo as the success of the Ligue française pour l'enseignement public attested. This organization was founded by Jean Macé in 1866 and by 1870 counted one thousand eight hundred members.

Although the government was not willing to allow the Church to drive it out of charitable work, it nevertheless pointedly requested the Catholics to participate in this social work. Thus, in addition to poorhouses and hospitals, Catholic facilities of all kinds were established. There were welfare associations and works for poor sick people; mutual help associations, especially in southern France; youth homes and other organizations devoted to young laborers, although their growth was a slow one (in 1866 there were only 165 homes in all of France). The initiators of these enterprises generally were religious congregations (some of them founded expressly for this purpose), laymen from the rural nobility, and wealthy people from the middle class. Many of them were branches of the Society of Saint Vincent de Paul, whose legitimist orientation on the part of some of its leaders in 1861 occasioned sensational interference by the Ministry of the Interior, or of the Société d'économie charitable. The latter, reorganized in 1855, had as its chief sponsor Vicomte Armand de Melun, whose name—in addition to that of Monsignor de Segur—was closely connected with the French Caritas movement until his death in 1877.

---

[8] J. Rohr, op. cit., 163–75. Although the opposite has been asserted, Duruy, anticlerical but not sectarian-oriented, can hardly be regarded as the precursor of the defenders of lay schools in the Third Republic.

In addition to these charitable actions there were many others which, while very active, were too fragmented to achieve a national stature. There were apologetic works, directed against the "bad press"; missionary works which enjoyed particular popularity; and works of piety (eternal adoration, nocturnal adoration, priest associations, congregations of the Most Blessed Virgin, etc.), all of which showed that beyond the social utility of religion an elite of the French middle class rediscovered genuine Christian values. Finally, one event in the France of the Second Empire must not be forgotten: Lourdes in a very short time "became not only the most visited object of pilgrimage in a country already rich in historical holy places, but the world center of prayer and active charity" (Latreille).

This apparently magnificent condition was hardly affected by the fall of the Empire in 1870. The seizure of power by the republicans, almost without exception anticlerical and Freemasons, initially worried the Catholics, but the excesses of the Commune led, just as in 1848, to a shift to the right. The National Assembly, consisting largely of conservative rural nobility and upper bourgeoisie, was especially friendly to the Church. The government of the "Moral Order," whose leaders were friends of Monsignor Dupanloup, tried, much to the dismay of the paper L'Univers, to present Catholicism more as a useful social force than as the official state religion. But it did not at all object to the desire of the Church to infuse the state's institutions with a Christian spirit. Disregarding the republican concept of secularization, it strengthened the influence of the clergy in the army, public welfare, and education. Dupanloup succeeded in thwarting the plans of Jules Simon, which were to be the first steps toward the laicization of elementary education. Dupanloup in 1875 obtained freedom of higher education; soon several Catholic universities opened their doors, even though this legislation only barely passed the National Assembly.

The Church was able to exploit its legal advantages because it could call on more personnel. There was also a dark cloud, however: except for a few secluded areas like the Jura or the southern part of the central region of the country, the number of seminarists was declining. Inasmuch as the mortality rate of the clergy was still low and the number of active priests increasing, the threat was not yet perceived. In 1870 the ratio of priests to flock was 1:730, by 1876 it was 1:654. Membership in the orders grew so much that M. Pouthas regarded the growth of the congregations as a characteristic of the Church during the beginning years of the republic. In 1877 there were 30,287 male and 127,753 female members of orders, a three-fold increase from the year 1789. It enabled France to provide by far the strongest contingent of missionaries for the evangelization of the pagan peoples.

This large number of people alone, coming from all walks of life and signifying more than mere social climbing, together with the continued rise in piety and good works on the regional and national level, would be sufficient proof that the impression of a powerful Church was anything but a facade and that it still commanded large reserves of Christian strength. Actually, the religious awakening in 1870 extended far beyond this elite. Many people viewed the military defeats and the tragic convulsions of the Commune as divine punishment or at least as the logical consequence of the spread of "socialistic atheism" and the frivolity displayed by the Second Empire. The religious awakening found expression in more faithful attendance at Sunday services, greater morality, and in the growth of popular literature devoted to the adoration of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, Mary, and the saints. More spectacularly it was displayed in large pilgramages of faith and repentence centered on the shrines of Lourdes, La Salette, and Paray-le-Monial. Under the direction of the dynamic Assumptionists thousands of pilgrims visited them under the motto Gallia poenitens et devota. It was through the efforts of the Assumptionists that Catholicism in these years again became popular and developed into the religion of the people. They took a long-range approach, addressed a broad public, moved the masses, and talked to them in plain language. After an interval of fifty years they resumed the work of the missions of the period of restoration. The visible crowning of their efforts was the construction of the cathedral of Sacre-Cœur on Montmartre.

The Ambivalence of the Actual Religious Situation

The just-described favorable conditions should not obscure the truth, however. There was no doubt that the successes of the established Church—accompanied especially on the local level by the clergy's will to dominate—were matched by a religious intensification. It found expression in pious fraternities, in the rise of the veneration of Mary and the Eucharist, in the growth of the comtemplative and missionary orders, and in the great number of outstanding Christians and saints. But at the very moment when contemporaries were able to record these achievements, the signs of that religious crisis began to appear which was to emerge fully during the final quarter of the century. The seemingly brilliant condition of the institutions on one hand and the effects of a small spiritual elite on the other tended too often to conceal the actual condition of the great mass of the people, which, after all, was the important ingredient of the Church. Thanks to the sociological and historical research inspired by G. Le Bras and conducted during the recent past on the regional level, we have a detailed, if incomplete, image of the situation.

First of all, geographical differences must be considered. A large part of the west, the central region, the Alps, and the Jura, remained closely tied to their faith until the end of the century. Religion was practiced there by many men, the supply of recruits for the priesthood, missions, and orders was abundant, and the new types of piety were received well, especially in the rural areas. The populace, increasingly well integrated with a growing number of priests and a network of Catholic schools, resisted fairly well the blandishments of a society which tried to laicize it.

In other areas, even under the July Monarchy in the process of becoming alienated from Christianity, considerable efforts were undertaken to win them back. The efforts were guided by active bishops such as Dupanloup in Orléans, Dupont des Loges in Metz, and Parisis in Arras. These prelates were actively assisted by people specially trained for preaching in the parish missions. This intensive missionary activity during the Second Empire has been inadequately studied. These efforts, spurred on by the administration and high notables, in some cases resulted in a considerable revival of religious practices, at least before 1870. But in essence they touched only the middle class of small towns and the stale parishes in devout areas. Elsewhere, the differences between the sexes became more pronounced. The women tended to take their religion seriously, while the men largely stayed away from Sunday and Easter services.[9]

The situation was worse in the area of Paris, in the departments of the Charente, in the southeast, and in Provence, where religious practice, weak even before 1848, sank to a level below the present one, in spite of hundreds of missions which had been conducted there. In some parishes not a single soul attended Easter services; the religious practice of the men was close to zero; about half of all marriages took place in front of a civil registrar only; many boys no longer went to their first Communion; and processions were molested. As the years went by, such conditions became more widespread.

Seen as a whole, a considerable part of France fell prey to religious indifference, notwithstanding the efforts of the regular and secular clergy, an indifference generally accompanied by a relentless hostility to the Church. In the countryside the hostility was strengthened by the growth of the means of communication and the more intimate contacts with the new urban civilization which they facilitated. There was also the systematic drumfire of the anticlerical newspapers, only feebly countered by the Catholic press, which was not sufficiently popular. It was further encouraged by the frequent conflicts erupting in the villages over the establishment of Catholic schools and the expensive building of parsonages. Frequently a role was played by the clergy's lust for power and money, their identification with the legitimist landlords,[10] and their rigoristic and negative habit of preaching morality.

---

[9] Thus, in the diocese of Orléans the receipt of the Easter sacrament by men rose from 3.8 percent in 1852 to 5.8 percent in 1868. Frequent Communion by women, on the other hand, was habit with 28 percent of them (detailed information in C. Marcilhacy, op. cit., [II], 239–339).

The world of artisans and laborers, still a minority but visibly growing, adhered to a kind of Christian atavism; in most areas of the country their alienation from the Catholic Church grew more pronounced.[11] Separated from their rural roots, the workers easily succumbed to the immorality and the anticlericalism of the burgeoning cities.[12] Generally, the clergy neglected them. Scheduling of services and ecclesiastical customs were not fitted to the working conditions of the industrial proletariat. The proletariat was being pushed to the sidelines of the Church, and many priests of rural background were discouraged by the difficulties of the workers' environment. The active religious participation of these people, aside from a small female minority, was limited to the chief events in life. The Oeuvre des cercles in which Albert de Mun and Abbé Maignen wanted to gather the workers after 1870 lasted only briefly, as they failed to reach the real laborers. Doubtlessly, the workers were also repulsed by the paternalistic attitude of the middle class to social problems. While the mass of the workers had not yet articulated its discontent, the militants accused the Church of hindering the social rise of the working class. Priests and bishops, in their own view tied to a divinely inspired static and hierarchical concept of society, condemned the attempts to improve the lot of the working class as "antisocial" and only emphasized in their sermons that earthly miseries would be rewarded in the next world. The outbreaks of violence directed against the clergy after the fall of the Empire in Paris, Lyon, and along the Mediterranean coast, all in sharp contrast to their indulgent behavior in 1848, was an indication of the rapid change in the attitude of the workers. The proletariat increasingly developed its own class consciousness, felt alienated socially and psychologically from traditional Catholicism, and began to regard the priests as enemies in the battle against the conservative forces. Only a few areas were spared this development. In Lille and other municipalities in the east small but strong Christian workers' associations were formed, and around the turn of the century their membership constituted the first Christian labor unions.

---

[10] It must be noted that most Catholic-influenced regional newspapers (there were about fifty) were legitimist.

[11] Without, however, turning to Protestantism, which appeared to them as a "religion of aristocrats," insufficiently affable, and too sober (see G. Duveau, "Protestantisme et prolétariat en France au milieu du XIX^e siècle", RHPhR 31 [1951], 417–28).

[12] See G. Duveau, Histoire du peuple français IV (Paris 1953), 72–141.

While the Church lost ground among the mass of the people, especially in the cities, it could console itself with gains among the middle class. But even here the situation was not entirely satisfactory. To be sure, a large part of the middle class, especially in the provinces in which the population remained faithful to the Church, returned to a genuine Christianity, generously gave of its time and money for Catholic works, and provided young people for the orders. But many others returned to the Church only because romanticism had made cathedrals fashionable and because, after the great fear of 1848, they saw in the Church a guarantee for social stability. Their attitude was more clerical than believing and contributed to exposing the Church in the eyes of the people, the more so as its morality, castigated by Veuillot in his Odeurs de Paris, left much to be desired.

On the other hand, religion, especially in the provinces, became an external sign of respectability, even though the professions largely continued to remain anticlerical. In fact, especially among the left, which was angered by the agreement between Church and the Bonapartist government, anticlericalism was on the rise. Among the important reasons for this attitude were the anachronistic character of the Papal State, stoutly defended by the clergy, and the publication of the Syllabus, which was seen as the manifesto of the unreasonable demands of traditionalistic Catholic circles on society. Even more serious was the fact that the intellectuals—writers, scientists, historians, and philosophers—influenced by rationalism and positivism, which had taken the place of romanticism, became alienated not only from the Church but from the Christian faith and religion itself. The success of the book La vie de Jésus by Renan (1863) was symptomatic. Especially devastating around 1870 was the spiritualism of Jules Simon.

At about the same time the spiritualistic Freemasons adopted that hostility to religion which was to become characteristic for them. The lodges, increasing from 244 to 392 between 1857 and 1870, became the active centers of the idea of laicization. Based on the progress of science, it was not only to free society from the clerical yoke but also to liberate the human spirit from the fetters of dogma and the false belief in supernaturalism.[13]

The men responsible for the fate of the Church in France began to be concerned, but they failed to grasp the true situation and, especially after 1870, their views lagged far behind the developments in their country. Most of them believed that all difficulties would cease if only the government gave stronger support to the Church. This was the view of all those who agreed with Monsignor Pie and Louis Veuillot; basically, however, Monsignor Dupanloup and other bishops did not see things differently.[14] Even the small group of liberal Catholics around the Correspondant, which was aware of the illusory character of state protection, was unable to go beyond considerations of principles. They did not initiate actions comparable to those started at the same time by German and Belgian Catholics.

---

[13] An example: A. Bouton, Les luttes ardentes des francs-maçons manceaux pour l'établissement de la République (Le Mans 1966).

The deficiencies of French Catholicism were also evident in its intellectual life. Catholicism seemed to be incapable of countering lack of faith in its very own bailiwick of philosophy and the history of Christian origins. Apologetic literature as well as episcopal pastoral letters and sermons were characteristic of a vague and romantic phraseology, marked by the total absence of introducing the clergy to a critical spirit and the new methods of scholarship. The bishops refused to acknowledge the necessity of such acquaintance, and with few exceptions they feared that by attending universities no longer under the control of the Church the priests would absorb dangerous ideas.[15] The negotiations for the reestablishment of theological departments at universities, on the other hand, were stalled because of the distrust by the Holy See of the continuation of Gallican tendencies in France. A. J. Alphonse Gratry, conscious of the necessity to confront philosophical and religious problems, tried to give body to an idea held before him by Lamennais and Bautain. He wanted to select a few qualified priests for a kind of "apologetic workshop," but the Oratory of France, reestablished in 1852, was diverted from its original aim by the more practical enterprises of its superior. Only with the founding of Catholic universities, made possible by the law of 1875, was a serious attempt made fifty years later to remove the intellectual deficiencies of the Church.

A further weakness of the Church in France during the Second Empire was the increasingly bitter disagreements of Catholics in various areas. The opponents of an excessive Roman centralization, clinging to the traditional habits of the old French clergy, were worried about the aggressive stance of the defenders of neo-ultramontanism. Many who earlier had favored the ultramontane activity of Lamennais because they wanted to see the Church liberated from the heavy hand of the state, now moved closer to Gallicanism again because they feared that the papacy was developing into a despotic authoritarianism. Liberal

---

[14] See the astute observations by J. Gadille, op. cit., 81–89.

[15] Monsignor Meignan and Monsignor Lavigerie especially.

Catholics, convinced that the Church could regain the respect of the new leading elements through being more open-minded, and intransigent Catholics, seeing in modern liberties the reason for the decline of religious practice, accused one another of being responsible for the worsening of the situation, but failed to seek concrete ways to alleviate it. Liberal Catholics condemned the ultramontane integralism, but could not agree among themselves. While the friends of Monsignor Dupanloup and Montalembert missed no opportunity to present themselves as unreconcilable opponents of the government of Napoleon III and defenders of the secular power of the Pope, many Catholics replied to them that the rights of modern man, still totally unacknowledged by the archaic institutions of the Papal State, were adequately guaranteed by the imperial constitution. Consumed by such internal disputes, the majority did not realize that not only the future of Catholicism but of religion itself was at stake and that it was most urgent to close ranks in intellectual and social areas, where delay had worsened the situation since the time of Monsignor Affre.

The convulsions of 1870–71, far from opening the eyes of the responsible people, contributed to a further intensification of opposing views. The most agitated element of French Catholicism, confirmed in its authority by the defeat of the minority at the Vatican Council, wanted to connect the movement of religious revival with a two-fold restoration from which it expected the secular and spiritual salvation of France. These were the elevation of the Count of Chambord to the throne of the Bourbons and the installation of Pius IX in his restored Papal State. In an atmosphere of providentialistic historical interpretation and of an illuminism which reads from the calamities of today the triumphs of tomorrow, and seeing both positions threatened by the same enemy, they believed in miracles with a childlike confidence which took the place of political awareness.

The tactless manner in which this restoration was promoted, less so by the bishops, who remained relatively reserved,[16] than by the lower clergy and militant Catholics, quickly mobilized the moderates. They saw in the "most Christian King" a herald of theocracy and feared that France would be driven to "make war for the Pope." The friends of Dupanloup and Duke de Broglie recognized the danger and disavowed the anachronistic goals of the radicals. But their moderate approach, diametrically opposed to that of the ultras, angered many adherents of "political supernaturalism," who condemned such a policy as spinelessness. The dispute between liberal Catholics and intransigent Catholics grew even more bitter than it had been under the Empire.

---

[16] And not only on the liberal Catholic side. J. Gadille, op. cit., has clearly demonstrated that Monsignor Pie, for example, was a far less intransigent legitimist than presented by his first biographer, Baunard.

While the clergy in this fashion involved itself in noisy and fruitless controversies over the ideal political form of government, it continued to ignore the real problems of the hour: the training of modern-minded laymen, capable of effectively serving the Church in a society undergoing rapid secularization;[17] the definition of its position with respect to the material and intellectual progress which the Church, to the great dismay of the multiplying admirers of scientific discoveries, was disregarding; and finally, and possibly foremost, the problem of social development. As A. Latreille has pointedly noted, most of the Catholics and the leaders of the Church reacted to the rise of anticlericalism "like moralists and not as sociologists." They were convinced that the anticlerical movement had not come about spontaneously. They believed that it had been thought up by a radical intelligentsia and was not a reflection of the actual feelings of the French people, whom they saw as still strongly tied to their religious customs. They concluded that the intellectual crisis could be ended through censorship of the press. They failed to see the close connection which after 1870 in a kind of "messianic hope for the egalitarian, fraternal, and laicistic republic"[18] developed between the militant, radical, and anticlerical wing of the republican middle class and the progressive elements of the urban and agrarian working class. The workers actually remembered only with hate the brutal suppression of the Commune, for which they also held the clergy responsible, as it was sociologically related to the conservative classes. The peasants suspected the clergy of wishing to reintroduce the tithe of the Old Regime together with the restoration of the monarchy. The middle class, finally, was more than ever convinced of the incompatibility of modern society with a Church which looked upon the Syllabus as its ideal. The anticlerical offensive started in 1878 with the seizure of power by the radicals thus encountered a well-prepared soil.

---

[17] E. d'Alzon was one of the few who concerned themselves with it before 1870, but he did not arrive at a precise formulation (C. Molette, L'Association catholique de la Jeunesse Française [Paris 1968], 12).

[18] HistCathFr, 391; f. 363.

CHAPTER 8

The States of the German Confederation and Switzerland, 1848–70

The years 1848–49 showed that the partial alliance between Catholics and liberals rested on a weak foundation. Political and philosophical liberalism were difficult to separate. The same liberals who were engaged in the struggle for greater freedom, which was also of benefit for the Church, in their majority also asked for separation of Church and state, civil marriage, and public schools. Thus, they fought against positions regarded by the Church as unalterable. Furthermore, economic liberalism hurt the lower middle class and the peasants who were still loosely tied to the Church. These opposing views and the reliance of Catholics on the Roman Curia with its reactionary concepts had grave consequences after 1848. While the leaders of German Catholicism were eager to preserve the freedoms obtained in 1848 and extend them to all German states, they also turned away from liberalism and democracy and toward patriarchal conservatism. The consequence of the failed German revolution for the Church was that once again it was compelled to negotiate with the restored states and to take account of their reactionary policies during the subsequent decades.

Following the Roman example, the German bishops and leaders of the lay movement became convinced that only a monolithic Church would be able to counteract the prevailing liberalism, rationalism, and atheism. They also therefore tried to erect barriers against the intrusion of new ideas; while these barriers succeeded in preserving much of ecclesiastical substance, they also promoted the very isolation desired by opponents. The Church could think of nothing better to counter the turn to political liberalism, experienced by most of the German states toward the end of the 1850s, than an authoritarian defense. Catholics no longer participated in Germany's intellectual development, which was increasingly influenced by the technical and historical sciences.[1] Anyone who adopted the new historical view of the world came in conflict with the scholastic-juridical concepts promoted by Rome.

The leadership of the Catholic movement more and more was taken over by the circles in Mainz and Munich which most thoroughly turned away from liberalism and most effectively propagated their departure in Heinrich's and Moufang's Katholik and Jörg's Historisch-politische Blätter. Only the Rhenish Catholics remained relatively close to political liberalism; they had ties with progressive western Europe and, as a minority in the Prussian state, could expect benefits from the application of liberal principles.

In the national question as well, of tremendous concern to a large number of people, an unbridgeable rift developed in the 1850s between liberals and Catholics. The majority of the liberals were predominantly in favor of a Little German-Prussian solution. The liberals hailed the Italian unification (1859–60), whose fundamental principles were their own, regardless of the fact that implicitly it was directed against Austria and the Papal State. It encouraged their own activity,[2] and they denied the inherent validity of the Catholic protests against the Pope's loss of territory. The majority of the Catholics continued to cling to the concept of a Greater Germany, even though hopes for unification under Austria's auspices were increasingly improbable.

---

[1] The only notable exceptions were Adalbert Stifter in literature and Anton Bruckner in music. See L. Nowak in Große Österreicher XI (1957), 144–53; H. Cysarz in Große Österreicher XV (1963), 48–61.

In Prussia, thanks to the constitutions of 1848 and 1850, the Church gained a new stature and new life, which affected other German states. Geissel and Diepenbrock, the most important persons in the Prussian episcopate, were created cardinals in 1850, but Diepenbrock was able to devote himself to the solution of old and new problems only for a few more years, as he died in 1853. After that date, leadership was completely in the hands of Geissel, dynamic organizer and church politician. He tried to preserve and enlarge the legal position obtained in 1848, to intensify religious life with the aid of ultramontane forms of piety, and to coordinate pastoral care and fresh activities of laymen. He also promoted uniformity of action by the episcopate and was able to hold a provincial council in 1860 in which most of the bishops of northern and western Germany participated. Through the assistance of the bishops the association movement was able to spread, and religious orders and congregations returned, thus permitting the establishment of hospitals, orphan homes, and schools. Sacramental and rosary prayers, pilgrimages and processions were reintroduced, and the dogma of 1854 encouraged the veneration of Mary.[3] The orders also enabled Geissel to revive the missions to the people, which had languished since the Enlightenment.[4] They deepened religious knowledge and interest in the Church among the lower classes. After initial distrust, the missionaries were assisted by some state officials, as the preachers also defended conservative authority and spoke against revolution, socialism, and democracy. But the missionaries did not really have any helpful alternative suggestions for the workers mired in the proletariat. In general, the social efforts of Geissel and his people did not go beyond the traditional limits of charity; this was only done by Ketteler, who at first agreed with much of Geissel's activity and eventually grew into his position of leadership.

---

[2] See E. Portner, Die Einigung Italiens im Urteil liberaler deutscher Zeitgenossen (Bonn 1959).

[3] G. Müller, "Die Immaculata Conceptio im Urteil der mitteleuropäischen Bischöfe," KuD 14 (1968), 46–70.

[4] E. Gatz, Rheinische Volksmission im 19. Jahrhundert, dargestellt am Beispiel des Erzbistums Köln . . . (Düsseldorf 1963).

The reactionary ministry of Manteuffel (1850–58) applied specifically Prussian and therefore often anti-Catholic traditions of state, and the largely Lutheran state bureaucracy continued to prevent the full implementation of constitutional parity. In 1852, Friedrich von Raumer, minister of religion, decreed a ban on studying at the Collegium Germanicum in Rome, established state supervision of foreign clerics and of parish missions, and confined the latter to purely Catholic areas. The decrees were primarily directed against the Jesuits, as a result of whose activities a reduction in the number of Lutherans was feared. Geissel and Bishop Müller of Münster protested immediately. In addition, a political opposition came into being, leading in 1852 to the formation of a "Catholic Faction" with sixty-two representatives in the Prussian Diet. Under this dual pressure the government moderated Raumer's decrees in a way acceptable to the Catholics. Subsequently the Catholic Section in the Ministry of Religion, headed by Matthias Aulike, successfully worked toward a better understanding between state and religious interests, but the increasing gravity of the differences between Catholicism and liberalism as well as between the two denominations began to hinder its work in the 1860s. The government tried to interfere in the election of the Cologne archbishop after Geissel's death (1864), when it was called upon for help by the liberal chapter minority against the ultramontane chapter majority, but ultimately it accepted Bishop Melchers of Osnabrück, who had the approbation of the Roman Curia.[5] In Gnesen-Posen as well, Rome was able to place its candidate, Count Ledóchowski.[6]

The leaders of the Catholic Faction[7] (called "Faction of the Center" after the assignment of seats in the Diet), August and Peter

---

[5] Paulus Melchers (1813–95), in 1857 bishop of Osnabrück, in 1866 archbishop of Cologne, as such leader of the Prussian episcopate during the Kulturkampf. He was imprisoned in 1874 and after 1875 guided his diocese from exile. In the interest of religious peace, he resigned in 1885 and became a Curia cardinal (biography by H. M. Ludwigs [Cologne 1909]; A. Franzen, LThK VII, 251).

[6] Mieczyslaw Halka Count von Ledóchowski (1822–1902), in the papal diplomatic service after studies at Warsaw and Rome, in 1861 nuncio at Brussels in 1866 archbishop of Gnesen-Posen, in 1875 cardinal. Ledochówski was arrested in 1874, expelled from Prussia in 1876, after which he lived in Rome and resigned his position in 1886. After 1885 he was secretary of the briefs, in 1892 he became prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith (biography by W. Klimkiewicz, 2 vols. [Cracow 1938–39]; G. Maron in RGG IV, 261f.; B. Stasiewski in LThK VI, 874).

[7] Bachem (Zentrumspartei II, 96–220) is basic for the history of the faction and its influence on the formation of other Catholic parties (renewed founding of the Center Party in 1870). See also H. Donner, Die katholische Fraktion in Preußen 1852–58 (diss., Leipzig 1909); L. Bergsträßer, Geschichte der politischen Parteien in Deutschland (Munich 1960), 110f.

Reichensperger[8] and Hermann von Mallinckrodt,[9] were interested in developing a general political party. The immediate goal of the faction was the defense of ecclesiastical freedom, and it was only sensible to argue for the observance of the consitution as a whole. This led to the splitting off of a number of noble representatives who began to support the Catholic-conservative movement propagated in Mainz and Munich. In its church policy and its Greater German attitude the Catholic Faction differed from the liberals, in its constitutionalism it differed from the conservatives. Together with the liberals it fought against the reactionary tendencies of the 1850s; in this connection it also favored equality for the Jews. But together with the conservatives it fought bitter battles after 1859 with the liberals against the introduction of civil marriage and for the preservation of the organic unity of Church and elementary schools. Its inability to formulate for all of its members a common position during the great Prussian constitutional conflict (1862–67), however, led to its demise. The decline of the Pius Associations and the resignation of many Catholics because of the political developments contributed considerably to its decline.

In Austria, Emperor Franz Joseph, steadfastly converting his restoration policy after 1850 to a neo-absolutism, in religious questions also remained on the path taken in 1848–49. He started negotiations for a concordat, headed on the part of the state by Josef Otmar von Rauscher, who had become archbishop of Vienna; the negotiator for the Curia was Viale-Prela. Franz Joseph and his representative regarded the Catholic Church as the unifying factor in holding together the multinational state, and they also wished to make of Austria the preeminent political power of Catholicism; for this reason the Emperor strongly desired a concordat at any price.[10] The Curia exploited this desire and successfully created a precedent for its negotiations with other states. The concordat was signed on 18 August 1855; it not only liquidated Josephinism and fulfilled justified ecclesiastical expectations, but it derived these from ultramontane principles.[11] Throughout, it reflected the militantly defensive antiliberalism of both contracting partners. Literally duplicating the Bavarian concordat of 1817, the Catholic Church in the entire monarchy was guaranteed all rights to which it was entitled in keeping with "the divine order and canonical statutes" (ARTICLE 1), laws conflicting with the concordat were repealed (ART. 35), and all religious issues not specifically treated by the concordat were to be settled according to the doctrines of the Church and its regulations as authorized by the Holy See (ART. 34). The Emperor assured the Church and its institutions of his special protection (ART. 16), and he retained his right of nomination to episcopal sees (ART. 19) and most of the cathedral canonships (ART. 22). The appointment of bishops was clearly designated as a papal privilege; the permission to correspond freely with Rome was justified with the jurisdictional primacy of the Pope by divine right. The Catholic Church retained considerable influence on the education system: In general, instruction in the schools was to coincide with Catholic doctrine, and elementary schools were placed under the control of the Catholic Church (ARTS. 5,7,8). The state agreed to the suppression of all books antagonistic to the Church (ART. 9), and marriages were subjected to canon law (ART. 10).

---

[8] Biographies by L. v. Pastor and F. Schmidt. See also E. Deuerlein in StL VI, 777f.

[9] Biography by O. Pfülf. See also E. Deuerlein in StL V, 519f.

[10] Against the objections of the Hungarian episcopate, which, under its primate Cardinal Scitowski, favored the continuation of Hungary's special religious status (Weinzierl-Fischer, Konkordate, 73f).

[11] Text: Weinzierl-Fischer, Konkordate, 250–58. Text of the concordat and pertinent documents: Walter, Fontes, 280–303; Mercati I, 821–44.

The legal monopoly of the Catholic Church engendered passionate opposition among liberals, Protestants, and Josephinist Catholics. Yet the Curia and the majority of the bishops believed that they had won a great victory. They failed to recognize that less would have been more and that this concordat could not but generate new and profound controversies.

Cardinal Rauscher, who in 1856 gathered the bishops of the monarchy in Vienna and subsequently guided the episcopate in authoritarian fashion, saw to it that the concordat was strictly implemented. Through it he wanted to preserve the Christian character of all public institutions. He was convinced that he was safeguarding ecclesiastical and state interests alike. But the cardinal and the like-minded minister for religion and education, Count Thun, were faced with growing difficulties. The ratification of the concordat also saw the beginning of the struggle for its repeal or changes in it, a struggle which was to burden domestic Austrian politics for the next fifteen years. When in the 1860s Austria started on a path of liberalization (October Patent of 1860, February Patent of 1861),[12] its leading politicians realized that the concordat had pushed the state into a dead-end street; but their attempts to ameliorate the marriage and education articles, ultimately supported partially even by Rauscher, met the obstinate and short-sighted resistance of the Curia.

The domestic and foreign policy defeats of the conservatives in 1866 intensified the controversies. Beust, the new chancellor, pointed to the concordat and its propagandistic exploitation by the liberals in Germany and Italy as one of the causes of Austrian defeat. As it was his intention to gain new respect and influence in German affairs through a liberal Austrian policy, he closely cooperated with the liberal parliamentary majority.[13] In the spring of 1868 denominational laws were passed which once again subjected marriage and education to the state and guaranteed the free choice of religion. The most important clauses of the concordat were thus liberally modified.[14]

---

[12] No calming of the waters in the battle over the concordat occurred as a result of the patents published on 1 September 1859 and 8 April 1861, granting autonomy to Austria's Protestant Churches (texts: Walter, Fontes, 303–22).

While the revolution and its results in the two major states of the German Confederation produced liberalization of the legal position of the Church, the other German states continued to adhere to the practice of state regulation. Maximilian II, who became King of Bavaria in 1848, was a confirmed Catholic, but he also regarded himself as the guardian of parity and tolerance.[15] He was determined to preserve the sovereign rights of the state, and disliked ultramontanism and its representative Reisach. He pursued moderate, liberal education and religious policies, but consulted advisers of different persuasions, among them C. A. von Abel, whose influence on the liberal-conservative ministry of von der Pfordten effected some concessions to the reactionaries. Only after Pfordten's resignation in 1859 was Bavaria's domestic policy guided by liberalism. King Ludwig II (after 1864) also was a liberal.

Archbishop Reisach attempted to satisfy the demands of the Würzburg bishops' conference in Bavaria. At a Bavarian bishops' conference in Freising (October 1850) a memorandum drafted by Reisach and Windischmann was passed, demanding the complete realization of the concordat and the repeal of the religious edict. Disregarding Döllinger's warnings—in spite of his differences with Reisach he still acted as adviser to the bishops—the conference also raised educational demands, such as participation in the filling of positions, which were unacceptable for a state pledged to parity.[16]

---

[13] See H. Potthoff, Die deutsche Politik Beusts von seiner Berufung zum österreichischen Außenminister 1866 bis zum Ausbruch des deutsch-französischen Krieges 1870–71 (Bonn 1968).

[14] The controversies over these laws are treated in connection with the tensions of the late 1860s which constituted the beginnings of the Kulturkampf.

[15] H. Rall, "König Max II. von Bayern und die katholische Kirche," HJ 74 (1955), 739–47; H. Rall, "Ausblicke auf Weltentwicklung und Religion im Kreise Max' II. und Ludwigs II.," ZBLG 27 (1964), 488–522.

[16] Döllinger was also firmly opposed to Windischmann's suggestion to establish episcopal theological teaching institutes because it was directed against the departments of religion at universities (see Friedrich, Döllinger III, 90–99).

The Freising demands caused a protracted debate. The government realized that the old system could not be maintained as it was and therefore looked for an acceptable compromise. The royal decisions[17] of 8 April 1852 and 9 October 1854 met the bishops' demands with respect to priest seminaries and control of schools. In return for the concessions the government asked for the removal of Reisach, a request which Pius IX eventually granted. In December 1855 the archbishop became a Curia cardinal and in his new position had great influence on German religious affairs; his successor in Munich was the Benedictine Gregor von Scherr.

The Bavarian bishops met again in 1864 for the purpose of weighing defensive measures against the government's liberal religious and education policies; even in Catholic Bavaria, the Church had become rather isolated because of its undifferentiated resistance to the prevailing thought of the time. Also in 1864 it came to a conflict with the government leading to the closing of the seminary at Speyer which Bishop Weis had established.[18]

Under the chairmanship of Freiburg Archbishop von Vicari, a conference of the Upper Rhenish bishops in March 1851 sent a memorandum to the government which was based on the Würzburg demands. It was published and seen as a fundamental attack against the concept of a state church. The government did not respond until two years later, when it offered a number of concessions, which, however, a further joint declaration of the bishops characterized as inadequate.

Inasmuch as the governments refused to give in or to accept the conference of bishops as a negotiating partner, the five bishops were compelled in the succeeding years to negotiate individually. In electoral Hesse, Bishop Kött of Fulda achieved a temporary agreement. In Hesse-Darmstadt, Ketteler, bishop of Mainz since 1850, had considerable success.[19] He displayed an unusual degree of assurance, but also supported the government in its Greater German conservative policies and its battle against liberalism and democracy. Their mutual aversion to these movements produced an alliance, prudently employed by the bishop and his advisers Lennig, Heinrich, and Moufang[20] in the service of religious freedom. In 1851 Ketteler opened a theological studies institute at the Mainz seminary, thereby removing the reason for the existence of the state's institute at Gießen. The Dalwigk government lodged only a verbal protest. In 1854 Ketteler and Dalwigk signed an agreement which took account of the interests of both sides and kept religious peace for longer than a decade.[21] The Curia in the meantime had begun to insist on the Pope's exclusive right to negotiate concordats and was irritated by the bishop's unauthorized action and his failure to make maximum demands; Ketteler succeeded in obtaining Rome's consent only after further concessions by the government. Such success was denied to the Rottenburg Bishop Lipp, who with the aid of his vicar general Oehler in 1854 negotiated a similar agreement with the government of Württemberg; the Curia insisted on opening negotiations for a concordat, which after 1856 took place in Rome.

---

[17] Text: Walter, Fontes, 233–39. See AkathKR VIII, 403ff., 430ff.

[18] L. Stamer, "Der Streit zwischen Staat und Kirche um den Ausbau des Speyrer Priesterseminars 1864," AMrhKG 16 (1964), 249–80.

[19] The majority of the Mainz cathedral chapter in 1849 elected the moderate liberal Gießen theology professor Leopold Schmid; he was sharply opposed by Lennig and his friends and upon their instigation was not confirmed by Pius IX. The Hessian government, eager to avoid conflicts, gave in, and under pressure from Rome and Darmstadt the chapter eventually agreed on a list of three non-Hessian clerics. One of them, as a result of Lennig's intervention, was Ketteler.

The development in Baden was much more discordant. To attempts by Vicari to exercise his episcopal rights without reference to the demands of the government, the government reacted with repression. Temporarily it placed the archbishop under house arrest and punished clerics who obeyed him. Vicari responded by excommunicating several members of the High Consistory. In order to settle the resulting conflict, which was widely publicized, the Baden government in 1854 began negotiations for a concordat.

In the negotiations with the governments of Württemberg, Baden, and Nassau,[22] the Holy See, represented by Cardinal Reisach, was able to obtain some central objectives analogous to the concordat with Austria. This, however, went too far again: The concordats with Württemberg[23] (1857) and Baden[24] (1859) required parliamentary consent, which was obtained in neither state. After heated debates, the Baden concordat was rejected in 1860, that with Württemberg in 1861.

---

[20] Johann Baptist Heinrich (1816–91), in 1851 professor of dogmatics at the new Mainz seminary, in 1855 member of the cathedral chapter, in 1867 cathedral dean, in 1869 vicar general, from 1850–90, together with Moufang, editor of Katholik (see, in addition to the biography by Pastor, H. Lenhart in AMrhKG 5 [1953], 325–59; L. Lenhart in LThK V, 204).—Franz Christoph Moufang (1817–90), in 1851 regent and professor of moral philosophy and pastoral care at the Mainz seminary, after 1854 also member of the cathedral chapter, after Ketteler's death administrator of the bishopric from 1877 to 1886, and representative in the Hessian parliament after 1863 (see, in addition to the biography by Götten, K. Forschner, Hessische Biographien I [1918], 241–47; L. Lenhart in Jahrbuch für das Bistum Mainz 5 [1950], 400–441; L. Lenhart in AMrhKG 19 [1967], 157–91; G. May in AMrhKG 22 [1970], 227–36).

[21] Text: Walter, Fontes, 359–63. See Vigener, Ketteler, 258–61.

[22] The Nassau government, after 1857 again negotiating with the Limburg Bishop Blum, on 25 May 1861 published a provisional regulation for religious affairs (text: Brück, Oberrheinische Kirchenprovinz, 550). Only the annexation of the duchy by Prussia (1866) produced a brief period of religious freedom (see Höhler, Geschichte des Bistums Limburg).

Subsequently, both states regulated the affairs between Church and state unilaterally in keeping with their prevailing liberal orientation. The legislation of 9 October 1860 in Baden[25] for the first time reflected liberal goals in a German state; the compromise clauses of the National Constitution of Frankfurt, which served as a model, were interpreted to the disadvantage of the Church. The Churches were granted a position as public corporations and the autonomous regulation of their affairs (ARTICLES 1,7), but otherwise they remained subject to the laws of the state; ecclesiastic regulations which affected "the rights of citizens" required the consent of the states (ARTS. 13,15). Evidence of a "general academic education" became a prerequisite for the holding of a Church office; the government was entitled to reject applicants of whom it did not approve for "civic or political reasons" (ART. 9). Property of the Church was administered jointly by the Church and state agencies (ART. 10), the establishment of religious orders was subject to state approval (ART. 11). The entire system of public education was placed under the control of the state (ART. 6), even though the Church was empowered to establish parochial schools (ART. 12). Religious legislation in Württemberg,[26] passed on 30 January 1862, rested on the same principles, but in a few points was more favorable to the Church.

Many of the new regulations were ambivalent; it all depended on how they were applied. In Württemberg, thanks to the conciliatory conduct of King Wilhelm and to the moderate attitude of Bishop Lipp and his successor Hefele, often misunderstood by zealots among the clergy, battles were avoided. In Baden, the administration of August Lamey (1860–66) was equally conciliatory, but the subsequent ministry of Julius Jolly (1866–76) used the legislation to start the first fundamental conflict between a liberal state and the Catholic Church in Germany.

Between 1850 and 1870, seventeen Catholic Conferences continued the work begun by the previous ones. They served to unite the Catholic forces, and enabled them to look at the associations, the press, and pastoral care; to an unprecented degree, laymen became involved in ecclesiastical affairs.

---

[23] Text of the Württemberg concordat and official supplements: Walter, Fontes, 363–76; Mercati I, 853–75.

[24] Text of the Baden concordat and official supplements: Walter, Fontes, 376–404; Mercati I, 880–920.

[25] Text (with the pertinent laws, also passed on 9 October 1860): Walter, Fontes, 405–10; Friedberg, Staat und katholische Kirche im Großherzogtum Baden seit dem Jahre 1860 (Leipzig 1874), 237–40; M. Stadelhofer, Der Abbau der Kulturkampfgesetzgebung im Großherzogtum Baden 1878–1918 (Mainz 1969), 392ff.

[26] Text: Golther, Staat und Kirche in Württemberg, 541–47.

Most of the associations were founded at the Conferences, such as in 1848 in Mainz the Vincent Association by August Reichensperger, and the Boniface Association in 1849 at Regensburg upon the suggestion of Döllinger. The Vincent Association devoted itself to charity;[27] the Boniface Association, whose first president was Count Josef Stolberg (1804–59), the son of the famous convert, assisted the communities of the Diaspora.[28] Active support was also given to the journeymen associations. Their founder, Adolf Kolping (1813–65), a practical-minded educator, after 1848 developed them into a network for young craftsmen, covering all of Germany and Switzerland. When they finished their training, the journeymen often joined these associations. Kolping's concern for craftsmen and skilled workers characterizes the middle class origin of the Catholic social movement, which one encounters also in the contemporary Catholic press and in Alban Stolz's apologetics. It was an attempt to preserve the old social order by improving it and by fighting against liberalism, capitalism, and socialism. Unfortunately, the movement had no solutions for the novel problems of an industrial society and its proletariat. Ketteler was the first one to address this problem and to say that traditional methods of charity were inadequate.[29] He called for a state social program which would also engage the Church,[30] and at the same time pointed to new areas of activity for it. He singled out such matters as pastoral care for the workers, diocesan workers' associations directed by the local bishop, and social-pastoral instruction for theology students. In 1869 Ketteler confronted the entire German episcopate with the problem of the workers, but failed to induce it to make a decision along the line of his suggestions. The bishops at the time were absorbed by the problems and controversies which had arisen after the announcement of the Vatican council; the plight of the workers took a second seat behind the struggle for papal infallibility.

---

[27] H. Bolzau, Vinzenzverein und Vinzenzgeist (Cologne 1933); H. Auer, "100 Jahre Vinzenzverein in Deutschland," Vinzenz-Blätter 33 (1950), 40–54.

[28] In heiliger Sendung. 100 Jahre Diaspora-Arbeit, ed. by Generalvorstand des Bonifatiusvereins (Paderborn 1949); Handbuch des Bonifatiusvereins (Paderborn 1953).

[29] Especially with his book Die Arbeiterfrage und das Christentum (Mainz 1864, 1890), countless sermons, and in his report at the Fulda bishops' conference (September 1869) on "Fürsorge der Kirche für die Fabrikarbeiter" (Vigener, Ketteler, 435–70, 552–61; Lenhart, Ketteler I, 92–118; Lill, Bischofskonferenzen, 91f.).

[30] Important suggestions in this respect were made at the Frankfurt Catholic Conference (1863) by the Cologne religion teacher Christian Hermann Vosen (1815–71), a collaborator of Kolping.

Other organizations inspired by the Catholic Conferences were art associations, even though one-sidedly and retrospectively they clung to the examples of the Nazarenes and Neo-Gothics, as well as a Catholic Academy, which, while it was first suggested in 1852, was realized only partially in 1876 with the founding of the Görres Society.[31] In the same context belongs the project of a Catholic university, discussed during the conferences of the 1860s and promoted by the bishops. It was an understandable reaction to the snubbing of Catholics by the universities outside of Austria and Bavaria, but in view of the attitude of the governments it was impossible to realize.

The Catholic Conferences adhered to the decision made in 1849 not to become involved in everyday politics, but, interested in achieving the broadest possible effect by their attempt at rejuvenation, they voiced their opinions with respect to fundamental questions of public life. Defending the ecclesiastical status quo and opposing the spreading secularization, the Catholic Conferences and associations were increasingly pushed into the defensive by liberals and their Protestant comrades.

Controversies over the national question and the Papal State intensified the differences. The Conferences came out in favor of a Greater Germany.[32] In a Germany which included Austria, the Catholics were in the majority and therefore in a better position to obtain the rights denied them by individual German state governments; contrary to liberal polemics, the Catholic Church was an intimate part of many national traditions and wished to participate actively in the nation's unification. But Döllinger's logical call for national ecclesiastical cooperation was met with reserve which grew to decided resistance with the gradual merger of German Catholicism and ultramontanism.

The combination of ultramontane religiosity and Greater German objectives was unable to make headway, because the non-Catholic majority in the non-Austrian German states favored a Little Germany and an alliance with liberalism. The German National Association (after 1859) organizationally and ideologically modeled itself on the Italian Risorgimento. Resignation spread among the Catholics and many Pius Associations were dissolved. The Catholic Conference of 1858 at Cologne shifted the emphasis of the movement to the area of social charity, and Moufang's Greater German Party (1862) was nothing more than an episode.

---

[31] H. Finke, "Gründung, Entwicklung und Erfolge der Görres-Gesellschaft," Jahresberichte der Görres-Gesellschaft 1937 (Cologne 1938), 68–73; A. Allgeier, "Geschichtlicher Rückblick," Jahresberichte der Görres-Gesellschaft 1937, 1–62; W. Spael, Die Görres-Gesellschaft 1876–1941 (Paderborn 1957). See also J. Spörl in StL III, 1007f.

[32] Five of the Catholic Conferences between 1850 and 1870 took place in Austrian cities.

In this situation the defense of the Papal State, clearly enunciated for the first time by the Catholic Conference in 1861 at Munich, assumed an integrative character. Leaders and members of the movement were guided by their special feeling of solidarity with the Pope, a solidarity derived from the ultramontane concept of the Church. The activity of the Michael Confraternity (after 1860), the "Peter's Pence," pilgrimages, and demonstrations provided the Pope with material and spiritual assistance. With dangerous oversimplification, only comprehensible against the background of the liberal attacks on papacy and Church, the liberty of the Church was seen as dependent on that of the Pope, and his, in turn, dependent on that of the Papal State. In the course of the actual injustices inflicted on the Pope it was overlooked that the Roman priest state went counter to the political and legal principles of the century. The defense of its continued existence, which the liberals inherently denied, could not but bring further isolation and divert attention from the urgent problems of the time. Modifying statements like those of Döllinger, who doubted the necessity of the Papal State, were rejected out of hand;[33] they only fed the mistrust of the intellectual minority which objected to the growing Romanization of German Catholicism. The Catholic Conference in 1862 at Aachen merely intensified the activity. It also inspired the Club movement; it brought together Catholics of the upper and middle classes in social clubs which also in the 1860s in many areas became bases for the Catholic movement to counter the strength of the liberals through increased voting.

The reaction of the Syllabus (1864) was characteristic of the intellectual orientation of the Catholic movement. Without reserve the Catholics accepted the summary condemnation, in some points unjustified, in others inadequately reasoned, of ideological and political liberalism, even though a moderate interpretation, taking account of Germany's situation, was necessary. New disputes became unavoidable, for the papal document created tremendous excitement among liberals and Protestants, to be exceeded only by the dogma of infallibility. Although the Syllabus did not say anything new, it was seen as a declaration of war on the modern state and modern science, in view of its claim to authority and the sharpness of its formulations.

The political decisions of 1866 accentuated the contrasts further. Prussia's destruction of the German Confederation and exclusion of Austria from German affairs put an end to the political hopes of the Catholics. At first they looked upon the events more as a revolutionary break with legitimate tradition than as the beginning of a new form of national unity. The removal of Austria as a great power from the concerns of Germany and Italy was also a defeat of Catholicism. In the new North German Confederation the Catholics were only a minority; the Italian national state required only the remainders of the Papal State for its completion, whose disappearance was thus only a question of time. The change in Germany was heightened by the fact that liberal and Protestant publicists viewed the events as a victory of Protestantism; with dangerous simplification they viewed Prussia as the embodiment of progress and disposed of the Austrian Empire as a relic of the Middle Ages.[34]

---

[33] See the controversies over Döllinger's Munich Odeon lectures (1860); Friedrich, Döllinger III, 233–69; Conzemius, Briefwechsel Döllinger-Acton I.

In 1867 the Catholic Conference took place at Innsbruck, and, employing the example of Tyrol to demonstrate the synthesis of Germandom and Catholicism, it once more came out in favor of a Greater Germany. But soon the realization gained ground that an effective representation of Catholic interests could only be made on the basis of the new realities and that national unification could be achieved under Prussia's auspices only. The first to plead impressively for the integration of Catholics with the North German Confederation was Ketteler;[35] of the politicians only Peter Reichensperger seconded him.[36] This integration during the subsequent years was much more of a fact than the polemics of the 1860s against what were called the "enemies of the nation" indicated. It was facilitated by Prussia's adherence to its friendly policy toward the denominations. Initially, Bismarck wooed the Catholics and for their sake denied Italy, Prussia's ally in the war against Austria, any assistance in Italy's hostile stance to the Papal State. But Bismarck's policies in 1866 also initiated his alliance with the National Liberals, which during the succeeding decade decisively influenced Prussian-German domestic politics and steered it into the Kulturkampf.

The political transformation and the announcement of the Vatican Council gave birth in the German episcopate to the desire for closer cooperation and to the plan of a joint conference like that of 1848. This realistic plan encountered objections only in Rome, but Cardinal Rauscher succeeded in removing them. The centralism of Pius IX refused to concede initiatives and jurisdictions to the bishops which transcended the borders of their German states. In September 1867 the bishops from the North German Confederation and the south German states met at Fulda; the most important outcome of their deliberations was the institutionalization of the bishops' conference, which was to be held every two years.[37]

---

[34] See J. C. Bluntschli, Denkwürdiges, ed. by R. Seyerlen, III (Nördlingen 1884), 145; F. Gregorovius, Römische Tagebücher 1852–74 (Stuttgart 1892), entry 8, 14 July 1866; H. von Treitschke, Aufsätze, Reden und Briefe, ed. by K. M. Schiller, III (Meersburg 1929), 311, 312–30, 331–39, 360 f. Also K. G. Faber, Die nationalpolitische Publizistik Deutschlands von 1866 bis 1871 II (Düsseldorf 1963), nos. 581, 583, 591f., 596f., 599, 603, 608, 610, 612, 615ff.

[35] In the sensational book Deutschland nach dem Kriege von 1866 (Mainz 1867).

[36] August Reichensperger withdrew from active politics; Mallinckrodt and Windthorst in Diet and Reichstag remained very reserved toward Prussia but nevertheless loyal to the constitution.

The gathering of Germany's Catholic scholars in 1863, suggested by Döllinger and observed with fearful mistrust by Rome, produced no understanding between the representatives of historical and Neo-Scholastic theology; the Syllabus and the announcement of the Vatican Council only served to intensify the contrasts. The monopolization of Neo-Scholasticism, eagerly promoted by Rome, was propounded by Heinrich, Moufang, and Paul Haffner (1829–99, after 1886 bishop of Mainz); they saw in Scholasticism the best ideological basis for their own antiliberal concentration. The Cologne seminary professor Matthias Joseph Scheeben (1835–83), who far surpassed his collaborators in speculative talent, and the Würzburg professors Joseph Hergenröther (1824–90, in 1879 prefect of the Vatican Archives and cardinal) and Franz Hettinger (1819–90) worked in the same direction. The writings of the German Jesuit Joseph Kleutgen (1811–83), who taught at Rome, and the Jesuit-directed theology department at the University of Innsbruck also established Roman Neo-Scholasticism.

But the larger majority of the German theology professors, including Döllinger, who had fought for religious freedom during the 1850s, resisted the Roman uniformity of thought with theological, historical, economic, and religious arguments. They feared that the extreme ultramontanism imposed on the Church by Pius IX's Curia would destroy legitimate religious structures and traditions and would produce an intensification of the conflict with the liberal forces which was as dangerous as it was unnecessary. In contrast to the Neo-Scholastics who were harking back to an idealized past, they sought a dialogue with other scholars and a reconciliation with modern thought in general. In addition to Döllinger there were two Tübingen professors, the dogmatist Johannes E. Kuhn (1806–87) and the historian Karl Joseph von Hefele (1809–93, after 1869 bishop of Rottenburg), and the Munich abbot Daniel Bonifaz von Haneberg (1816–76, after 1872 bishop of Speyer). Friedrich Michelis (1815–86) and Döllinger's student Johannes Friedrich (1836–1917) acted very polemically. Next to Bishop Maret's French neo-Gallicans, the German theology professors were regarded as the most dangerous opponents of the Curial movement.

---

[37] The invited Austrian bishops were unable to attend the meeting at Fulda because of domestic difficulties, especially the concordat controversy, which required their presence in Austria.

Their enemies, with the Catholic masses behind them, fought, defamed, and largely isolated them. The Munich nuncio accused them frequently of rebellion against authority and of sympathies for Protestanism.

In Switzerland, the liberals consistently exploited to their advantage the victory of 1846–48 over the Catholics. Their policy, designed to narrow further the freedom of movement of the Catholic Church, was viewed as exemplary by the liberals of other countries and was imitated in the religious battles during the 1860s and 1870s; the first state to do so was neighboring Baden. After 1848 as well, a good number of monasteries and religious schools were closed, the curricula of the remaining schools and the administration of ecclesiastical property were placed under cantonal control, and the clerics were compelled to swear an oath promising to uphold the laws; some cantons suppressed religious instruction entirely. But the constitutional guarantee of freedom of religion made possible the establishment of religious communities in the Protestant cantons, aided by gifts from foreign Catholics.

Bishop Marilley of Lausanne-Geneva was the first to be involved in a basic conflict. The governments of the five cantons of Berne, Fribourg, Geneva, Neuenburg, and Waadt, which his bishopric encompassed, in 1848 concluded a concordat in which they regulated religious problems unilaterally and in disregard of ecclesiastical principles. In the concordat the governments demanded the right to designate bishops and the adaptation of religious laws to those of the state; candidates for ecclesiastical offices had to undergo an examination before cantonal officials. Marilley's protests and his order to his clerics not to swear loyalty to the laws of the state were answered by the governments first with his arrest and then with his expulsion. A large majority of the clerics and laity remained loyal to their bishop, and under pressure from public opinion the governments in 1852 began negotiations with the Vatican. By 1856 these led to an agreement. Additionally, an agreement was reached two years later in Fribourg concerning Church property.

The radical behavior of the governments met the approval of only a minority of the Catholics which had continued to develop Wessenberg's reforms in a democratic direction and which believed that it could do so in continued cooperation with the governments. Groups with such aims continued to exist in most of Switzerland's cantons and eventually joined the Old Catholic protest movement against the dogma of papal infallibility. Those antiultramontanes who remained in the Church were isolated, and such men of compromise as the Lucerne politician Anton Philipp von Segesser[38] were unable to make their voices heard as mediators between the hardened fronts. The liberals asserted to be fighting not against the Church as such, but only against hierarchism and ultramontanism, but actually their attitudes helped the growth of the movements to which they objected.

---

[38] E. F. J. Müller-Büchi in ZSKG 56 (1962), 185–200, 301–31, 60 (1966), 76–102, 275–304, 368–98, 64 (1970), 328–69; Conzemius, Katholizismus ohne Rom, 72f.

The closest possible cooperation with Rome seemed to be the best guarantee for development and continuation of religious life, and ultramontane activists like Gaspard Mermillod (1824–92) dominated the situation.[39] Mermillod worked in Geneva, where the number of Catholics increased substantially in consequence of immigration from Savoy. As the federal constitution did not permit the establishment of additional bishoprics, Pius IX in 1864 appointed Mermillod as suffragan bishop for Geneva; it seems that the Pope harbored totally unrealistic expectations of "converting" the city of Calvin.

The pressure exerted upon the Church strengthened the need for organization, which often was set up according to the German example. After the 1850s, Pius Associations and other charitable organizations sprung up, the latter under the guidance of the Capuchin Theodosius Florentini,[40] the founder of the Menzing and Ingenbohl congregations of sisters.

The predominantly agrarian structure of the Catholic cantons, which burdened the struggle with the urban liberals with additional social tensions, did not permit much intellectual activity. Only Fribourg and the abbey of Einsiedeln under the leadership of Abbot Heinrich Schmid were productive. Independent scholarly work was done by Bishop Karl Johann Greith of Saint Gallen,[41] the educator and historian Gall Morel, an Einsiedeln Benedictine,[42] and the politician and journalist Count Theodor von Scherer-Boccard.[43]

---

[39] Mermillod, who after his appointment as apostolic vicar of Geneva (1873) was exiled by the Federal Council, in 1883 became bishop of Lausanne-Geneva, and in 1890 was created Curia cardinal. Mermillod combined great social activity with extreme efforts on behalf of papalistic church doctrine (see Aubert, Pie IX, 303; biographies by L. Jeantet [Paris 1906] and C. Comte [Paris 1924]; C. Massard, L'oeuvre sociale du Cardinale Mermillod [Louvain 1914]; A. Hammann in LThK VII, 310).

[40] P. V. Gadient, Der Caritasapostel Theodosius Florentini (Lucerne 1946); A. von Wolfenschießen, Die industriellen Unternehmungen von Pater Theodosius Florentini (diss., Rome 1956), B. v. Mehr in LThK IV, 170.

[41] J. Oesch, Karl Johann Greith (St. Gallen 1909); J. B. Villiger in LThK IV, 1220.

[42] B. Kuehne, Pater Gall Morel (Einsiedeln 1875); R. Henggeler in LThK VII, 628.

[43] J. G. Mayer, Graf Theodor von Scherer-Boccard (Fribourg 1900).

CHAPTER 9

The Rise of Catholicism in the Anglo-Saxon World

England

In 1840 the number of vicars apostolic was raised from four to eight, but the solution of the problems of the Catholic Church in England, resulting from the growing number of Irish immigrants to the industrial cities, was possible only through the establishment of a diocesan episcopate. After the elevation of Pius IX, representatives of the vicars apostolic asked Rome in 1847 and in 1848 to give them immediate relief. But the Roman revolution and the exile of the Pope delayed a decision until 1850. In the meantime, the arrival of great numbers of destitute Irishmen following the great famine of 1847 burdened the ecclesiastical organization heavily.

The papal brief of 29 September 1850 established in England and Wales a Catholic hierarchy, with Westminster as the metropolitan see and twelve suffragan bishops. Wiseman was named archbishop and cardinal. A few days before journeying from Rome to England, he addressed a pastoral letter to all English Catholics in which he expressed his tremendous joy "that Catholic England once again was placed in its orbit in the ecclesiastical heavens." He was by nature effusive and optimistic, but his letter merely confirmed many Catholics in their conviction that Wiseman basically did not understand the English situation and the English character. The news of the establishment of the hierarchy generally had been well received, but his letter caused irritation. The press reacted with an outburst of bigotry, and there were street demonstrations against what was called "papal aggression," as illustrated by Wiseman's claim to govern the counties of Middlesex, Hertford, and Essex as bishop. In the process of choosing the twelve suffragan bishops mention of the Anglican dioceses had been tactfully avoided, but the designation of Westminster as residence of the archbishop caused indignation. Even though Westminster was not an Anglican diocese, the abbey was regarded as a national shrine.

Wiseman poured oil on the waters, which he had roiled unwittingly, with his skillful and effective Appeal to the Reason and Good Feeling of the English People, published shortly after his return to England. Even though in August 1851 an Ecclesiastical Titles Bill became law, imposing a penalty of one hundred pounds sterling on anyone accepting title to a non-existing episcopal see in the United Kingdom, the law was not enforced and was repealed twenty years later.

There were still conversions, but only in small numbers. The most notable one was that of Henry Edward Manning. He belonged to a group of people who in 1851 left the Anglican Church because of the Gorham decision. It involved the decision of a council of state committee which overruled an Anglican bishop who had refused to install the Rev. J. C. Gorham because his belief in the efficacy of baptism was in question. But the primary concern of the hierarchy was not the proselytization of England, but the creation of a system of parishes and the construction of churches and schools for the impoverished Catholics in the industrial areas. More than half of all Catholics lived in Lancashire (dioceses of Liverpool and Salford), whose population had swelled as a result of the strong influx of Irishmen after the famine of 1847. The rest was concentrated in London (dioceses of Westminster and Southwark) and in the industrial area of the Midlands (chiefly the diocese of Birmingham). In the remaining part of England Catholics lived so dispersed and in such small numbers that it was almost impossible to establish a diocesan organization for them.

Much, however, was achieved at the three provincial synods of 1852, 1855, and 1859, convoked by Wiseman.[1] The parish missions received their final status and the problem of obtaining priests for them was tackled. Some priests, of course, came from Ireland. In addition, Wiseman continued to employ regular clergy. This led to some difficulties, as the interests of the exempt regular clergy did not always coincide with those of the bishops. The cardinal himself founded a diocesan organization, the Oblates of Saint Charles, and appointed Manning as their superior. Additional problems resulted from the tendency of Wiseman and Manning to promote seminaries with strict Tridentine principles. Until then, it had been English practice to train candidates for the priesthood and candidates for lay occupations together. After an upsetting period of doubt and of changing methods, tradition finally won out.

Wiseman's state of health was rather bad during the last years of his life, and in 1855 George Errington from Plymouth was appointed his coadjutor. But the natures of the two men were so contrasting that Wiseman leaned more and more on Manning. When Wiseman died on 15 February 1865, it was the personal decision of Pope Pius IX to designate Manning as his successor, even though the chapter had chosen Errington for the post.

Manning, a man of iron will and firm determination, remained archbishop for twenty-seven years. Almost immediately after his conversion he had been ordained a priest and had then spent three years in Rome. There he developed extreme ultramontane views, but yet became a national figure in Victorian England. His social conscience and his concern for the poor were probably the outstanding features of his activity. This tendency had become clear even before his conversion and reached its zenith with his successful mediation during the great London dock strike in 1889. His life was also filled with the battle to obtain a fair proportion of public funds for Catholic elementary schools when, as a result of the Education Bill of 1870, public schools came into being. His genuine sympathy for Ireland also was of benefit for his pastoral care, as 80 percent of the English Catholics were of Irish descent.

---

[1] At this synod, Newman delivered one of his most important sermons: "The Second Spring." It indicated that his imagination also was fired by the hope for a conversion of England, even though temperamentally he was far more subdued than Wiseman.

Manning had a firm grasp of the intellectual problems of his age, but also a deep distrust of their effect on the Catholic faith. Although supported in the matter by almost all of the bishops, it was he who was responsible for the absolute ban on Catholics studying at Oxford or Cambridge. In 1874 he founded a Catholic university in Kensington, but it was a failure and closed its doors eight years later. Three years after his death in 1885 the prohibition on Catholics attending state universities was lifted.

The problem of university attendance led to discord between Manning and Newman. It was only a part of the underlying tensions between the so-called "Old Catholics" and the "converts." The "Protestant" tendencies of Newman agreed with much of traditional English Catholicism; Newman and the Old Catholic group were brothers under the skin and viewed with distrust the enthusiastic ultramontanism of Manning and other converts. Even though these divisions disappeared by 1880, the personal animosities between Manning and Newman continued.

After his conversion, Newman had studied theology in Rome. There he had become aware of his spiritual affinity to the oratory of Saint Philipp Neri, and after his return he founded the first English oratory in Birmingham. Its growth faced many obstacles. In view of the tensions between him and Frederick William Faber, the oratories in Birmingham and London developed independently from one another and even with a certain degree of hostility. In 1852, Newman accepted the invitation of Archbishop Cullen to go to Dublin as president of Dublin University. But his tenure was not very successful and in 1858 he resigned his position. But he left a lasting memorial to his presidency in the form of a series of lectures which he had given in May 1852 and which were published under the title The Idea of a University.

Returned to England, he founded the oratory school in 1859 and thus made a notable contribution to the tradition of Benedictine and Jesuit education.[2] In the same year, his bishop, Ullathorne of Birmingham, asked him to take over the Rambler, a journal founded in 1848 by John Moore Capes. In 1854, Richard Simpson had become its publisher, and in 1858 John Acton[3] had become a partner. The reason for Newman's appointment was ecclesiastical suspicion of the Rambler, but his own contribution to the July issue of 1858[4] was denounced by Rome, and George Talbot, the Pope's English informant, characterized Newman as the most dangerous man in England. During the next five years his attitudes were questioned, he was treated with disrespect, and became a man without influence. His earlier position was restored with the publication of his Apologia pro vita sua. It appeared in 1864 in monthly installments as a reply to accusations by the Rev. Charles Kingsley that Newman and the Catholic clergy did not regard "truth for its own sake" as a virtue.

The core of the reply bears the title: "A history of my religious opinions," and the honesty displayed by Newman was a very effective defense of his personal honor. He could hardly hope to have a similar success in 1864 when he attempted to refute the assertion that Catholic theologians were severely handicapped in their scholarly work. Two years later, Ullathorne offered him a church in Oxford, but the suggestion was blocked by Manning, Ward, and Talbot, who did not consider Newman sufficiently orthodox. In the following year, the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith prohibited Catholics from attending public universities.

In 1870 Newman published A Grammar of Assent. He had spent twenty years on it, and it is perhaps his only work which was not written as an immediate response but was the fruit of long reflection.[5] Its theme was the fundamentals of certainty and, more specifically, the reasons of faith: How can one believe something that is beyond comprehension or proof? His approach—the more interesting as it takes place independently from the scholastic tradition—is essentially a psychological analysis of "moral proof, of a collection of probabilities,"[6] not a single one of which is proof in itself, but which as a whole can produce an act of faith based on what Newman calls the "illative sense," the ability of reason to draw conclusions and arrive at judgments.

---

[2] Another important date in the development of higher education for boys is the year 1855, in which the Salesians in London opened Clapham College, the first of its kind for the middle class.

[3] John Emmerich Edward Dalberg Acton (1834–1902) was one of Döllinger's most significant students at Munich. As a political liberal and defender of freedom of religion he fought actively against ultramontanism. Unlike Döllinger he did not break with the Church after the First Vatican Council but retired to a strictly academic life. In 1886 he founded the English Historical Review. In 1895 he was appointed Regius Professor of Modern History at the University of Cambridge. During his final years he planned the Cambridge Modern History (published 1901–11) (see U. Noack, Katholizität und Geistesfreiheit nach den Schriften von John Dalberg-Acton [Frankfurt 1936]; G. E. Fasnacht, Acton's Political Philosophy [London 1952].

[4] Later published separately as "On Consulting the Faithful in Matters of Doctrine."

[5] See H. Tristram, ed., John Henry Newman, Autobiographical Writings (London 1956), 273.

Also in 1870 there was a growth of tension between Newman and Manning with respect to the definition of papal infallibility. Newman had no difficulties with the dogma as such—in fact, in a very real sense it had been a motive for his conversion—but he feared that a formal definition would create hostility outside of the Church and discontent within it, especially if it were to be pronounced in the extreme form which he had reason to believe would be used. He had no difficulty with accepting the doctrine as defined by the council.

In 1877 he returned to Oxford after thirty years in order to accept the first honorary fellowship awarded by Trinity College. Two years later Leo XIII created him a cardinal with the unusual privilege of residing in Birmingham, even though he was only a priest. There he spent the last eleven years of his life in peace. His gravestone bore the inscription, which he had written himself: "Ex umbris et imaginibus in veritatem."

Scotland

The number of Catholics in Scotland also grew noticeably as a result of Irish immigration to the industrial areas. In 1851, 18 percent of the population of Glasgow were Irish. Most of the immigrants came from the province of Ulster and brought with them the tension existing there between Catholics and Protestants. In addition, they encountered the hostility of the Scottish Presbyterians and were incapable of adjusting themselves to the native Catholics. Ever since the days of O'Connell the Irish Catholics in Glasgow were very nationalistic. Many of their priests came from Ireland and there was discord between Irish and Scottish priests. In 1851, the Irish in Glasgow started a newspaper, the Free Press, whose incessant polemics against Dr. Murdoch, the vicar apostolic, probably hastened his death. Murdoch's successor was John Gray, his former coadjutor. Rome suggested that Gray should choose his own coadjutor and hinted that an Irish priest would be suitable. But Gray was unwilling to do this and was supported by the other vicars apostolic, who, in the case of an Irish appointment, feared a general worsening of the situation of the Church in Scotland.

---

[6] Grammar of Assent, 217.

At the urging of Archbishop Cullen of Dublin the president of the Irish College in Paris, James Lynch, C.M., was finally appointed Gray's coadjutor. Regrettably, but unavoidably, the appointment increased tensions in Glasgow, where the Irish clergy followed Lynch and the Scottish clergy followed Gray. In 1867, Archbishop Manning was named apostolic visitor.[7] He suggested the transfer of both Gray and Lynch and thought that the Scottish problems could be solved only through the establishment of a diocesan hierarchy. But the government regarded such a step as premature and relayed its reservations to Manning and Rome.

Consequently, Rome hesitated to establish such a hierarchy in Scotland. The selection of the metropolitan see also proved difficult. Two-thirds of the three hundred fifty thousand Catholics lived in the metropolitan area of Glasgow. The next larger concentration was Edinburgh, Scotland's capital; Saint Andrews, the seat of the medieval archbishopric, was only a small town with very few Catholics. When the hierarchy was finally established in March 1878, an attempt was made to take all of these considerations into account. The metropolitan see was established in Saint Andrews and Edinburgh with four suffragan bishoprics, and Glasgow as archbishopric without suffragan sees was subordinated directly to the Holy See.

Ireland

It is generally taken for granted that the great famine of 1847 was a decisive turning point in the modern history of Ireland. It marked the beginning of a strong emigration which possibly raised the standard of living in Ireland slightly, but nevertheless still left behind a large agrarian proletariat, which had little hope of improvement as long as the laws concerning landownership remained unchanged. In spite of many developments which seem to point to progress, such as the construction of new churches and an increase in ecclesiastical institutions, the emigration after the famine left behind a Catholic population without any self-confidence and exposed to constant economic and political shocks.

Catholics constituted almost 80 percent of the population. The majority of the Protestants were concentrated in Ulster, while in most of the south and the west the population was almost totally Catholic. The predominant Protestants gave up their essential monopoly of wealth and political power only slowly. In 1873, a very important court judgment stated that papal jurisdiction in Ireland was still illegal, according to an unrepealed statute from the sixteenth century. In practice, however, civil courts respected the jurisdiction of the Church, as its decisions were easily accepted by the Catholics.

---

[7] V. A. McClelland, "The Irish Clergy and Archbishop Manning's Apostolic Visitation of the Western District of Scotland 1867," CHR 53 (1967), 1–27, 229–50; "A Hierarchy for Scotland 1868–78," CHR 56 (1970), 474–500.

Under the force of the Penal Code and during the days of O'Connell, a feeling of closeness had developed between the Catholic clergy and the laity; it became stronger during the nineteenth century as a consequence of the fact that the large majority of the parish clergy was educated in Ireland, chiefly at Maynooth. Only a small minority attended the few seminaries on the continent which had been reopened after the French Revolution.

In 1849, Paul Cullen, head of the Irish College at Rome, was appointed archbishop of Armagh. In 1852 he was transferred to Dublin and in 1866 became the first Irish cardinal; he dominated the Irish hierarchy until his death in 1878. He was equipped with the authority of an apostolic delegate and thus empowered to convoke a national synod at Thurles in 1850. There, Church discipline and religious practices were adapted to common canon law and the prevailing ultramontane tendencies, the planned Queen's Colleges were condemned, and the political activity of the Irish clergy was restricted.

Attempts to define these restrictions were only partially successful and resulted in the complete alienation of Cullen and the influential Archbishop MacHale of Tuam. After 1860, there was the revolutionary movement of the Fenians, which, according to Cullen's conviction, posed the same threat to the Church in Ireland as the revolutionaries on the continent or in Italy. But Cullen was wrong, for even though the Fenians refused to continue to recognize the leadership of the clergy in Irish politics, they were not unbelievers.

In his opposition, Cullen was supported by the bishops, but the clerics in some instances hesitated to follow him, as they shared the anti-British sentiments of the people. But it was not easy for them to find a theological justification for the rebellion at the very time of the Syllabus, and therefore on the whole they refrained from openly supporting the revolutionary movement. After a failed uprising in 1867, many Fenians were imprisoned; now the clerics acted less restrained and participated in the public demonstrations of sympathy for the prisoners. In order to counter this threat, Cullen in 1870 managed to obtain a formal Roman condemnation of the Fenian movement.

In 1869, Odo Russell, the unofficial British representative at Rome, reported that Cardinal Antonelli had informed him that the "conditions in Ireland filled him with distaste and pain and that he did not understand the Irish character."[8] Five years earlier, Cullen had accepted a cautious participation in politics and in spite of his Roman training and early history had shown himself to be the type of liberal Catholic which Antonelli had difficulty in understanding. Ultimately, Cullen was prepared to cooperate with the Liberal Party, then in the process of formation under the leadership of Gladstone, even though it was hostile to an ultramontane papacy.

---

[8] Odo Russell to the Earl of Clarendon, Rome, 5 May 1869; quoted in N. Blakiston, The Roman Question (London 1962), 363.

English liberals and Irish Catholics were in agreement that the Protestant Church in Ireland should be disestablished. Both parties wanted to distribute its property to all Churches in Ireland. But Cullen insisted that no Church be subsidized by the state and that each should instead be a voluntary association before the law, just as the Catholic Church had been since the Reformation. This principle was embodied in the Irish Church Act of 1869.

Cullen's association with the English liberals remained more in the area of common interests than in common principles, and his support of a "free Church in a free state" was primarily based on his Irish thought and not on any principles of liberalism. This became clear in the question of education. After 1850, the developments in the system of nondenominational elementary schools introduced in 1831 gave the bishops reasons for concern, and they tried repeatedly to gain the support of the government for a system of denominational schools. They were not able to effect such a change, but in practice it became quite denominational, as almost all children in Ireland attending public schools were Catholic. The system of secondary schools had always been established on the basis of private denominational schools. In 1878 the Intermediate Education (Ireland) Act granted small salaries for principals and stipends for students according to the scores achieved on state examinations.

University education had long been a source of conflict. In 1850 the synod of Thurles had prohibited Catholics from attending interdenominational universities, known as Queen's Colleges. Cullen returned from Rome with the charge of establishing a university modeled on Louvain. Newman accepted the invitation to become its president, but the institution was always in trouble. There were many reasons. The government was unwilling to accredit the institution, and its degrees were therefore not recognized. The Irish Catholic middle class, which was ready to send its sons to this university, was numerically too small, and Newman's hope to erect in Dublin a Catholic university for all of Great Britain and Ireland was unrealistic. Some of the bishops denied the new university their active support, and MacHale was soon its bitter enemy. This aspect was particularly grave, as the finances of the university depended on church collections. With respect to practical matters, Newman could deal solely with Cullen, but the temperaments of the two men were too different.[9] After Newman's departure in 1858 the Catholic University was constantly in difficulties. The government still refused to grant it a constitution, even though in 1879 it installed the Royal University of Ireland as a supervisory agency which examined the students of the Catholic University together with those of all other colleges for the granting of degrees.

The frailty of the Catholic University and the concentration of seminary training in Maynooth led to a strictly clerical orientation of the Catholic professors in Ireland. Two of the Maynooth theologians deserve mention. They were Patrick Murray, whose De ecclesia Christi (3 vols. [Dublin 1860–66]) revealed the ultramontane orientation of the college, and George Crolly, who, in his De iustitia et iure (3 vols. [Dublin 1870–77]), was the first one to discuss this topic within the context of British law. Cullen's nephew, Patrick F. Moran, the future archbishop of Sydney, was the first person to utilize the papal archives in his numerous publications. Together with Cullen he was responsible for the founding of the monthly Irish Ecclesiastical Record (1864).

Experience taught Cullen that it was impossible for a priest or bishop in the Ireland of the nineteenth century not to become involved in politics. But the involvement of the clergy in politics had a particularly sad consequence. The Protestants concluded that an independent Ireland would be ruled by the Catholic clergy and that "Home Rule" would in fact mean "Rome Rule." After 1860, the Orange Order, started in 1795 as an instrument of Protestant domination, was revitalized.

The break between the Irish Catholics and the Protestant Liberals over the question of university education in 1873 led to the fall of Gladstone's government. After six years of political instability, a number of bad harvests at the end of the decade once again raised the problem of the tenant farmers. Charles Stewart Parnell, a Protestant, acted as the leader of a strong parliamentary group which demanded agrarian reform and a limited degree of autonomy known as Home Rule. He gained the support of the revolutionary leaders and of the Catholic hierarchy, especially of Archbishop Walsh of Dublin and Archbishop Croke of Cashel. Gladstone, returned to office in 1880, was sympathetic, but the English conservatives, including some prominent

---

[9] The failure of the university has often erroneously been ascribed to this last factor alone. Cullen and Newman had managed to cooperate, even if only with difficulty. "We were different," Newman wrote to C. W. Russell, the president of Maynooth, on 17 November 1878 after Cullen's death, "but I was always attached to him with love and gratitude, and because of his work regarded him very highly." Cullen also esteemed Newman and defended his orthodoxy when Newman was suspected by Rome (see F. McGrath, Newman's University: Idea and Reality [Dublin 1951], 503–4).

Catholics, depicted the Irish movement in Rome as revolutionary. Papal intervention and condemnation made life more difficult, but the movement held together until 1889, when Parnell was named a corespondent in a divorce suit. The bishops declared that he could no longer act as spokesman, and the consequent split led to a further period of political instability. When it was overcome, it was recognized that the involvement of the clergy in politics, peculiar to the 19th century, had also passed.

The United States

During the second third of the nineteenth century, the Catholic Church in the United States was able to record some significant progress. After 1870 it was not only numerically the largest English-speaking Catholic group in the world, but it was also during this time that American Catholicism acquired its peculiar characteristics.

Originally consisting of former English and French settlers, and former Spanish ones in the southern states, the Catholic community of the United States gradually assumed different characteristics with the immigration of Irish Catholics. The great famine between 1845 and 1847 in Ireland speeded up this movement, and additional German immigrants journeyed to the United States in the wake of the 1848–49 revolutions. This dual movement, which coincided with the rapid economic development of the country, continued during the two subsequent decades. The majority of the Irish were Catholics, and so were many Germans.[10] Although many of them, and especially their children, isolated in a Protestant environment, left the church of their fathers,[11] the immigration, together with the natural increase, resulted in a growth of the Catholic population which exceeded all expectations. According to Shaughnessy's findings, resting on a critical examination of the available data, there were in the United States in 1840 approximately 663,000 Catholics, i.e., 4 percent of the total population. Ten years later, they had increased by one million people, of whom 700,000 were immigrants from fourteen different countries; in 1860, there were 3,103,000 and in 1870 there were 4,504,000 Catholics, corresponding respectively to 7 percent, 10 percent, and 11 percent of the total population.

But the distribution of the Catholics was quite different from region to region. While around 1870 one out of nine Americans was Catholic, the ratio in the southern states, which the immigrants avoided because of their black population, was only one in twenty-five or less. The immigration of Catholics benefited chiefly the states of the North, such as Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota. The Germans, settling chiefly in the triangle between Cincinnati, Milwaukee, and Saint Louis, generally settled in rural areas, while the Irish, too poor for agrarian colonization,[12] and dependent on immediate employment as workers or domestics, congregated mostly in the port and industrial cities of the North. Inasmuch as the Irish were by far the largest group, American Catholicism for a long time had an urban, even proletarian, character.

---

[10] The number of Catholic immigrants during the years from 1820 to 1870 has been estimated at 1,683,791 Irish and 606,791 Germans.

[11] The significance of these departures during the second half of the century used to be overestimated, as the precise calculations by G. Shaughnessy, op. cit. prove.

The steady stream of immigrants from Ireland led to a rekindling of the nativist campaign which had been declining in the 1840s, and under the new name of Know-Nothingism anticlerical violence started again. It reached its apogee between 1854 and 1855 and only came to an end with the Civil War.[13]

The rapid increase of the Catholic population, together with the westward movement and the addition of Oregon, Idaho, Texas, New Mexico, and California, presented the ecclesiastical authorities with difficult problems of organization.

In the open areas of the Far West a new beginning had to be made, and in 1846 the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith founded a new church province with Oregon City as its capital upon the instigation of the adventurous vicar apostolic Monsignor Blanchet.

Even in the former Mexican provinces a new beginning needed to be made, for the Church had had to suffer grievously in these seemingly Catholic areas as a consequence of Freemason-inspired government action against the regular clergy and from a corrupt clergy. Through the establishment of the dioceses of Galveston for Texas (1847), Santa Fe (1850) for New Mexico, Monterey-Los Angeles (1850) and San Francisco (1853) for California, the situation was mastered. This was facilitated by the freedom of religion which prevailed in the United States and which permitted the Franciscans to resume their missions to the Indians.

---

[12] There were some attempts to help them with settling, but the Irish did not like living in the countryside because of its isolation.

[13] One of the most spectacular episodes was the campaign of demonstrations directed at Monsignor Bedini, whom Pius IX had sent to the United States for the purpose of examining the possibility of establishing an apostolic delegation and who after a short stay was forced to flee. To xenophobia and antipapism was added in his case the rejection of the Italian immigrants because of the temporal power of the Pope (see J. F. Connelly, The Visit of Archbishop G. Bedini to the United States [Rome 1960] and R. Sylvain, A. Gavazzi II [Quebec 1962], 426–40.

In the largely rural areas of the Midwest and the South, in which the majority of the population lived dispersed in the country, the situation for a long time was similar to that of the missionary countries, as the few priests could travel through the vast areas only at long intervals. But with the active support of bishops like J. B. Purcell, from 1833 to 1883 archbishop of Cincinnati and, outside of the dioceses of the East Coast, the preeminent American prelate of his time, new dioceses were established with the growing cities as centers. In spite of the sparse financial means and the lack of priests (at the beginning hardly more than ten), gradually there were established Chicago, Milwaukee, and Little Rock in 1843; Cleveland in 1847; Saint Paul and Savannah in 1850; Springfield, Covington, and Alexandria in 1853; Marquette and Fort Wayne in 1857; and Green Bay, La Crosse, and Columbus in 1868.

In the states of the Northeast in which the majority of the immigrants was concentrated, the delicate question of trusteeism was only solved in the 1860s. His energy and his influence on the public enabled G. Hughes, from 1842 to 1866 bishop, then archbishop of New York, to obtain in 1860 a law for the state of New York which provided the Church with the desired degree of freedom and simultaneously maintained a sufficient degree of lay control over the property of the Church. Gradually the other states also adopted this law. But the main difficulty was posed for the Catholic authorities by the ever increasing stream of immigrants. The priests, although industrious and agile, could no longer do all of their work, and the great number of languages spoken by their flock confused matters totally. What is more, the poverty of the faithful, who earned their daily bread as workers or domestics, in spite of a high degree of altruism did not permit them to do more than supply a portion of the financial needs of the Church.

Fortunately, the American bishops, of whom two thirds came from Europe,[14] excelled with their sense of the practical and their enterprising spirit, and Europe responded generously to their appeals. Irish priests arrived in great numbers and placed themselves in the service of their emigrated brethren. In 1857, at the request of Monsignor Spalding, a college was established at Louvain for the purpose of training European seminarians who volunteered for the apostolate in the United

---

[14] Of the thirty-two bishops who attended the council of Baltimore in 1852, only nine were born in the United States; eight were of Irish, eight of French, two of Belgian, two of Canadian, one of Austrian, one of Spanish, and one of Savoyard extraction. Of the forty-five bishops attending the council of 1866, fourteen were born in the United States, eleven in Ireland, one in Belgium, one in Austria, one in Germany, and one in Savoy. Almost all metropolitan sees were in Irish hands, which in addition to other disadvantages to be mentioned later had the advantage of providing the American episcopate with a large degree of homogeneity in this difficult transition period.

States. By way of these additions and the slowly growing number of native priests,[15] the active number of clergy rose from about 700 at the time of the accession of Pius IX to 1320 in 1852, to 2,770 in 1866, and in 1875 reached 6,000. A good number of new parishes were founded, but the Irish character of the Church in the United States, and especially the tendency of the Irish priests to treat their flocks as minors and to leave only little initiative to laymen in religious matters, was strengthened by this development.

At the same time that the clergy was growing, the continuous arrival of regular clergy (both men and women) from France, Belgium, and Austria, and the financial assistance of French, German, and Austrian missionary societies made possible the building of Catholic schools, the creation of charitable institutions for the reception of the immigrants in the ports, and the organization of parish missions according to the method which had proved itself in Europe (the Austrian Jesuit Xavier Weninger after 1848 preached more than eight hundred sermons in such parish missions).

The Civil War, in which the southern states rose against the Union between 1861 and 1865, tested the mettle of the young American Church. The Church had never taken an unequivocal stand in the controversy over slavery. In the South, the ecclesiastical authorities were not completely opposed to slavery as long as it was humane, and even in the North, where the attitude of the Catholic clergy was virtually the same as that of the Protestant ministers, many Catholics were irritated by the alliance between the abolitionists and the nativists. The ideals as well as the practical consideration, touched by resignation, of America's most representative Catholic theologian of the time, P. Kenrick, which he presented in his Theologia Moralis,[16] are characteristic of the official attitude of the hierarchy. It left the faithful with the complete freedom of decision, and itself was completely engrossed in maintaining the political neutrality of the Church in temporal affairs, a tradition reaching back to Carroll.[17] The outbreak of the war, kindled less by slavery than by the concern to preserve national traditions, made the situation easier for the Catholics. Almost throughout, they followed the leaders of their respective states, and Catholics fought in both armies. The absence of a clear position among the Catholics, in a question whose moral relevance was evident, engendered fresh attacks by the Yankees against the Roman Church. Yet its standing was enhanced by the charitable activity in which priests and cloistered women engaged in the Confederate states as well as in the Union states. It was furthermore aided by the fact that the Catholic Church was the only one among the various religious communities which managed to maintain its unity, even though its faithful and occasionally its pastors[18]—although on their own authority—declared themselves unequivocally for one camp or the other.

---

[15] In 1854 there were already thirty-four diocesan seminaries, but in 1860 only 15 percent of the active priests were born in the United States. In 1859, Pius IX opened the American College in Rome, so as to provide a number of young Americans with a higher theological education (see R. McNamara, The American College in Rome [Rochester 1956]).

[16] 1841. Last edition (Baltimore 1861), I, 166. See J. D. Brokhage, Father P. Kenrick's Opinion on Slavery (Washington 1955).

[17] As an example, see the pastoral letter of May 1840 following the Fourth Provincial Council of Baltimore (in P. Guilday, The National Pastorals, 142–43) and the observations by J. T. Ellis, op. cit., 68–75.

After the end of the war, the Catholics began immediately to heal the material and moral wounds. In this effort they were led by such bishops as Monsignor Verot, the vicar apostolic of Florida and one of the originators of the period of reconstruction in the South; not even his infantile behavior at the Vatican Council could overshadow the remarkable achievement of these chaotic times. There was also Monsignor Spalding, between 1864 and 1872 archbishop of Baltimore. He was a typical American, who combined the talents of the man of science, the ability to administer, advocacy of the Church, and concern for the nation.[19]

One of the first actions of the Church after the end of the war was the convocation of a plenary council.[20] It was held in October 1866 in Baltimore. Although it was able only partially to solve the difficulties confronting the Church in the United States during the last third of the nineteenth century, it at least strengthened the idea of a collegiate leadership of the Church. This was a concept rarely encountered in Europe at the time, but it became one of the characteristics of the American episcopate. In addition to many practical regulations, Spalding suggested the writing of a textbook-like explanation of the council, which amounted to a departure from earlier councils. The intention was to present the great topics raised in the encyclical Quanta cura and the Syllabus in a positive form and to adapt them to the American mentality, especially with respect to the demands which the apostolate was making on the Church in a pluralistic society.[21]

---

[18] Thus, Bishop Hughes and Bishop Domenec in favor of President Lincoln and Bishop Lynch in favor of the Confederates.

[19] The biography by his nephew J. L. Spalding (1873) has not yet been replaced by a more recent one. See also A. A. Micek, The Apologetics of M.J. Spalding (Washington 1951).

[20] The first one took place in 1852 following the division of the Church province of Baltimore, which until then comprised the entire United States. It was replaced by five new provinces: in 1846 Oregon, in 1847 Saint Louis, in 1850 New York, Cincinnati, and New Orleans, and San Francisco in 1853.

Among the many council decrees, an entire chapter was devoted to the pastoral care of millions of blacks, whose sudden emancipation created great problems. The Protestant blacks suffered much less under the new situation, as their pastors belonged to their race. While in the South relations between black and white Catholics were cordial, the mutual embitterment carried separation of the races into the Church and resulted in a further decline of contacts. The blacks, constituting about 10 percent of the total population of the United States, were effectively lost to Catholicism in spite of the care which members of foreign orders lavished on them. Outstanding among them were the Fathers of Saint Joseph of Mill Hill, whom the future cardinal Vaughan had sent from England in 1871 at the behest of the Pope.[22]

Another difficult problem with which the council of 1866 had to grapple was the membership of Catholics in secret societies. In addition to the Irish societies connected with the Fenian movement, other groups with philanthropic aims grew considerably. Although these groups, unlike Freemasons in Europe, did not have any revolutionary or anti-Christian objectives, their indifferentism posed a real threat. The bishops could not agree on a united stand and the decree of the council of Baltimore which attempted to formulate binding regulations was not very suitable in practice. This was so in part because it occasioned constant inquiries in Rome, where no clear understanding of the American situation existed.

Most of the council's attention, however, was devoted to the problem of education. Since the constitution guaranteed religious freedom, the secretary of education, Horace Mann, at first attempted to include nondenominational religious instruction in the curriculum of the public schools. But in practice this plan encountered obstacles, and public instruction quickly developed in an almost exclusively laicistic direction. This convinced the Catholics that, following the Irish example, they had to organize their own schools, in spite of the heavy burden involved. The motto of Archbishop Hughes of "school before Church" was gradually accepted by most of the other bishops. The plenary council of 1866 referred to a decree of the provincial council of Cincinnati of 1858 and declared that the establishment of parish schools was a serious moral duty of parish pastors. Urgent appeals were directed to Catholic families to keep their children from attending public schools as much as possible. After 1870 some militant laymen, like the journalist J. McMaster—a second Louis Veuillot in the United States—and Miss Edes, who believed that some bishops were slack in implementing their demands, carried the matter to Rome. In November 1876 the American episcopate was informed by Rome that it must follow the same strict directives which then were valid in England and Ireland.

---

[21] See the interesting article by J. Hennesey, "The Baltimore Council of 1866, an American Syllabus," RACHS 77 (1966), 1–18.

[22] It should be noted that almost all Indian missions were the work of foreigners, after 1830 especially of the Austrian priest A. F. Baraga and after 1838 of the Belgian Jesuit P. Desmet.

The emphasis with which the organization of Catholic schools was pursued was only one, albeit a fundamental, aspect of a more general policy, the objective of which was to keep the faithful in strictly closed communities, to avoid the use of Protestant institutions as much as possible, and to keep Catholics on the periphery of normal American society. Many priests and bishops, especially Monsignor Hughes, whose personal prestige among the Irish contributed to winning them to his side in opposition to the native American Catholics, thought that the faith of the immigrants, who in the majority were very simple people and in the past had been tied to the Church by environment and local traditions, was not capable of resisting the influence of a Protestant or indifferent environment. The inherited hostility of the Irish toward the Anglo-Saxons and the awareness of being a socially despised proletariat, an awareness that was constantly being nourished by the repeated attacks of the nativist movement, as well as the mistrust of the traditionalist German farmers of the materialistic character of the new American civilization, finally drove the Catholics into denominational ghettos. The enterprising spirit of the Irish coupled with the organizational talent of the Germans[23] resulted in the creation of a number of organizations, the listing of which in 1867 in the National Catholic Almanac covered nine pages of small print: charitable organizations, hospitals, newspapers and journals, and societies of all kinds. Their growth received a further boost by the arrival after 1870 of numerous nuns whom the Kulturkampf had driven out of Germany.

Their encapsulation compelled the Catholics to develop a degree of activity that had no equal in the European Churches; an activity which simultaneously strengthened the vitality of their faith. Beneficial for the moment, this separation in the long run produced serious problems. For one thing, it held the vast majority of the Catholics at a very low cultural level, as at this time their lack of money and people did not yet permit them to establish a system of higher education.[24] According to T. McAvoy it also delayed the upward mobility of the Irish immigrants by a whole generation. This low cultural and social level of the Catholic minority also explained its relatively weak ability to influence the society around it. As Comte de Meaux after a voyage to the United States noted, "the fear of sinking to a lower class kept many a prominent American from the Church of the Irish and domestics, in a country in which social and racial differences play a much greater role than is customarily believed in Europe."

---

[23] In 1855 they created a central organization, the German Roman Catholic Central Union, suggested by the Pius Association.

As most of them came from countries in which for centuries they were looked upon as second-class citizens, the immigrants had a natural tendency not to proselytize. But the desire for a less passive attitude grew among the converts of American origin who also were influenced by the Oxford movement. One of the first to become engaged in this fashion was Orestes Brownson.[25] He was a genuine American, upset by the Irish predominance in the Church, often eccentric and obstinate, yet one of the guiding spirits of American Catholicism in the nineteenth century. He was the founder and from 1844 until 1875 the editor of Brownson's Quarterly, a nonconformist and lively journal. In 1859, another enterprising convert, Isaac Hecker,[26] together with some former Redemptorists who objected to the European mentality of their superiors, founded the congregation of the Paulists, whose chief objective was the proselytization of Protestants. But men like Brownson and Hecker were for a long time only exceptions.

It is part of the same development that the Catholics and above all the clergy in the United States did not participate in the solution of the great social problems. Reference to this fact was already made in connection with slavery. The same is true for the movements directed against alcoholism and the attempts to gain greater social justice for the workers. At first sight this particular failure appears most astonishing in view of the connection of American Catholicism with the lower social classes. But it must not be forgotten that the social programs were generally imported from Europe by anticlerical revolutionaries, whose radical proclivities seemed to threaten the Church.

---

[24] There were a number of attempts, especially by Jesuits, to establish Catholic colleges, but most of them survived only a few years. Also characteristic is the small interest shown by the bishops at the council of 1866 when Monsignor Spalding suggested the creation of a Catholic university.

[25] On Orestes Brownson (1803–76), see in addition to the biography by his son (3 vols. [Detroit 1898–1900]) the works by A. M. Schlesinger (Boston 1939) and T. Maynard (New York 1942), as well as T. McAvoy, RPol 24 (1962), 19–47. Edition: The Works of Orestes Brownson, 20 vols. (Detroit 1882–87).

[26] On Isaac Hecker (1819–88), see the biographies by W. Elliot (New York 1891) and J. McSorley, Father Hecker and his Friends (Saint Louis 1952). The book by V. F. Holden, The Yankee Paul, Isaac T. Hecker I (Milwaukee 1958) breaks off with the year 1853.

The isolation of the Catholic minority in the United States on the periphery of American public life provided it with peculiar characteristics for a long time to come. Still, there was a gradual development after the Civil War; it began in the Midwest and spread to the East Coast. It was favored by the fact that in such places as New York and Baltimore the Irishmen Hughes and Kenrick were replaced in 1864 by the American-born McCloskey and Spalding. Simultaneously it became evident that the young American Church, which had so successfully applied the well-known formula of a free Church in a free state beyond all ideology, was beginning to assume a place of its own in the universal picture. The first time this happened was at the Vatican Council. When in 1875 McCloskey was elevated to cardinal, it was spectacular proof that the New World had at last outgrown the missionary phase.

Canada

The years after the Act of Union in 1840 were fruitful for Catholicism. The liberal inclinations of Governor Lord Elgin, embodied in the law of 1851, ended the official predominance of the Anglican Church, especially as the high birth rate of the French Canadians and the immigration of Irishmen into the Great Lakes area temporarily resulted in the numerical superiority of Catholics (650,000 vs. 550,000 in 1840). In the subsequent period, immigration favored the Catholics, but the absolute number of Catholics also continued to rise noticeably. The census of 1851 registered more than one million, and by 1881 there were 1,600,000, approximately 40 percent of the total population of 4,300,000. The numerical progression was reflected in the establishment of additional dioceses: four under Gregory XVI and five under Pius IX.[27] The Church province of Quebec, founded in 1844 after lengthy negotiations,[28] was gradually dismantled and three other dioceses took its place: in 1862 Halifax for the Maritime Provinces, in 1870 Toronto, and in 1871 Saint-Boniface in the West. Despite the premature attempt to establish a hierarchy on the Pacific Coast, which at the time of the death of Pius IX was inhabited by only a few thousand Catholics, and despite the missionary work of pioneers like Monsignor Provencher and Monsignor Taché, whom the Oblates of Immaculate Mary assisted in Manitoba, the essential strength of Canadian Catholicism remained concentrated in the area of the Saint Lawrence. But even there they were unevenly distributed. At the time of the formation of the Canadian confederation in 1867, which on the whole was well received by the Catholics,[29] they constituted 86 percent of the population in the province of Quebec, consisting of descendants of French settlers and fifty thousand Irish; they constituted 16 percent in Ontario, five-sixths of whom were English-speaking and economically weak; they were 24 percent of the population in Nova Scotia, chiefly of Scottish descent; and they constituted 33 percent of New Brunswick, largely as descendants of the French-speaking Acadians.

---

[27] At the same period in Newfoundland, which only joined the Canadian confederation a century later, the number of Catholics rose from fifteen thousand at the beginning of the century to sixty-four thousand in 1874; in 1847, 1856, and 1870, three new dioceses were established on the island (see M. F. Howley, Ecclesiastical History of New Foundland [Boston 1888]).

[28] The London government did not agree; additionally, the very ponderous bishop of Quebec, Monsignor Signay, who feared the responsibility of the metropolitans, sabotaged the plan as well as he could (see L. Lemieux, op. cit., 432–518).

In the province of Quebec the development started at the end of the 1820s by Monsignor Lartigue,[30] the first bishop of Montreal (1821–40), continued. The young clerics, influenced by the theocratic direction of the French ultramontane school of the restoration period and its subliminal social thought, turned the nationalistic reaction, which lost its initial liberal ties, to their advantage. They became the propelling force of a clerically oriented society with focus on the rural population. In the decade from 1840 to 1850, the Church slowly and gradually grew to be the strongest institution in French Canada, largely as a result of the numerical and qualitative growth of the clergy. In contrast to the United States, the native recruitment of clergy in Canada was high even before the middle of the century, and between 1840 and 1880 the ratio of 1700 Catholics per priest decreased to 520. Coupled with rising standards of training in the seminaries, priestly exercises were reintroduced in 1840, and a short time afterwards periodical meetings for the purpose of studying theological questions were begun. The bishops did good work in establishing uniform regulations for the work of the priests, and the Canadian clergy, which at one time had been extremely independent, during the second half of the century became highly disciplined.

This change in the attitude of the clergy, and especially its "Romanization," were hastened by the arrival of many French members of religious orders, both male and female,[31] during the 1840s. They were invited by Monsignor Bourget, the enterprising, authoritarian bishop of Montreal (1840–76) and the outstanding ecclesiastical personality in Canada during the nineteenth century; for more than a generation he guided the religious fortunes of the province of Quebec in a strictly clerical sense. The enthusiastic ultramontanism and the reactionary political concepts of the regular clergy from France consolidated tendencies already present in Quebec. They fueled the embryonic religious-political struggles and led to difficulties with the native clergy. Their influence on the spiritual development was considerable; they were largely responsible for the acceptance of new forms of piety. They turned against the moralistic rigorism of the old priests; the establishment of new classical colleges contributed to the training of future clergy; and they promoted the founding and spreading of conventual orders like the Gray Sisters of Ottawa and the Daughters of Charity of Montreal,[32] who later spread to all of North America and attested to the vitality of the Canadian Church.

---

[29] The support of the Catholics in favor of the confederation met a certain opposition by the French-Canadians and the Irish; but the majority of the bishops regarded the plan as a smaller evil, and those who were opposed, like Monsignor Bourget, were realistic enough not to oppose an unavoidable development (see W. Ullman, Canadian Historical Review 44 [1963], 213–34, and J. K. Farrell in CHR 55 [1969], 7–25.

[30] See F. Ouellet, Histoire économique et sociale du Québec, 1760–1850 (Montreal 1966), 373, 476–77, 589–90.

Within the entire Church, the province of Quebec constituted the unique case of a society which in the midst of the nineteenth century was formed by Catholic principles. In their desire to preserve their cultural heritage within an English-speaking and Protestant majority, the French-Canadians spontaneously accepted the influence of the Church in all areas of private, social, and political life. This became clear with the interference of the clergy in elections,[33] inspired by the fear of the radicalism of many liberals, and even Rome felt constrained to urge the bishops to exercise greater restraint. But this situation, in which the Church with a minimum of official privileges exercised an almost unlimited moral authority, also had its disadvantages. It very soon resulted in a clericalism which systematically prevented any efforts by laymen. Characteristic of this condition was the opposition of the hierarchy to the Institut Canadien, a series of public libraries organized by some young, liberal Catholics, and to the development of teacher associations.[34] This attitude encouraged the development of a strictly conformist Catholic civilization, in spite of the founding by the first provincial council (1851) of a Catholic university in Quebec which, in a province in which Louis Veuillot was regarded as an uncontested oracle, became one of the few centers of a moderate Catholic liberalism.

---

[31] In 1841, the Oblates of Mary Immaculate (who became very active in the Saint Lawrence area as well as in northern Canada and western Canada), in 1843 the Jesuits (who in 1880 numbered 130 members, more than 100 of them natives); in 1847 the Clercs de Saint-Viateur and the Fathers of the Holy Cross, who grew better in Canada than in France. Among the conventuals were the nuns of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, and many others.

[32] See M. A. Blanchard, L'Institut de la Providence, 6 vols. (Montreal 1925–40).

[33] A few examples are in C. Lindsey, Rome in Canda. The Ultramontane Struggle for Supremacy over the Civil Authority (Toronto 1877) and in J. Willison, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal Party I (Toronto 1926).

In the Maritime Provinces, P. C. Lefebvre was especially active; he placed himself in the service of the social improvement of the inhabitants of Nova Scotia. The brief struggle over education (1871–74) between the Catholics and the Protestant majority of New Brunswick is also noteworthy.

In the province of Ontario, where the Catholics constituted a minority, the bishops were confronted with two problems at the middle of the century. One of them was the necessity to integrate the stream of immigrants, especially in the countryside, and the difficulty of priests and nuns, imported from France and Quebec for that purpose, in adapting themselves to an environment so totally different from their native soil. The other great problem was the question of Catholic schools. The Catholic campaign for the improvement of the status of the schools was intensified after the passing of legislation in 1850 under the leadership of the Toronto Catholic Institute, but the bishops themselves disagreed on how much to demand.[35] The most active among them was the bishop of Toronto, Monsignor Charbonnel, who had recently arrived from France and whose sympathies in the discussions of the Falloux Law were more in keeping with the intransigence of Louis Veuillot than with the tempered realism of Dupanloup and Montalembert. Protracted negotiations with the government and Superintendent Ryerson[36] ultimately resulted in insufficient though noticeable improvements (in 1853 with the Taché Bill and in 1862 with the Scott Bill). In this instance as well as in the matter of Church property (clergy reserve) a solution was reached which combined the limited denominational protectionism desired by the Church with the American ideal of the complete neutrality of the state in religious affairs.

The appointment of an apostolic delegate in 1877 acknowledged the growing importance of Canadian Catholicism. Despite many problems which it had in common with the United States, such as immigration and borders, the mixing of races and languages, and secularization, Canadian Catholicism came to have its own peculiar characteristics. The factor chiefly responsible for this separate development was the French element, which was determined to survive in an Anglo-Saxon world.

---

[34] See A. Labarrère-Paulé, Les instituteurs laïques au Canada français, 1836–1900 (Quebec 1963).

[35] See P. Hurtubize, "Monseigneur de Charbonnel et Monseigneur Guigues, La lutte en faveur des écoles séparées," Revue de l'Université d'Ottawa 33 (1963), 38–61.

[36] His enemies accused him of systematic hostility to the Catholics; but he pointed to the low standards of the rural Catholic schools.

Australia

Although more modest than in America, the progress of Catholicism in Australia within a single generation resulted in the growth of a new Church with half a million faithful (25 percent of the total population).

Initially a penal colony, Australia gradually also attracted free immigrants; the Irish were especially strongly represented in both groups. After the turn of the century the government permitted the dispatch of clerics, who naturally also were Irishmen. But after the Emancipation Act of 1829, the government insisted that the chief representatives of the new Church be Englishmen. Benedictines, in the majority from Downside Priory, assumed this function. John Bede Polding, the first vicar apostolic, appointed in 1834 and archbishop of Sydney after 1842, was an energetic man and full of missionary zeal.[37] It was his intention to train the future clergy in a monastic environment in order to impress the Anglicans with its sense of liturgy and good education and the faithful with its detachment from the goods of the world. But the growth of the population made the realization of his dream impossible. At the time of his appointment in Sydney, 90 percent of the forty thousand Australian Catholics resided in New South Wales, but the increasing Irish immigration to other areas of Australia and the gold rush in 1851 in the area of Melbourne demanded an increase in the number of parishes and dioceses.[38] These were by necessity primarily staffed with Irish priests, and even the majority of the additional bishops were of Irish descent. These, however, followed pastoral principles which were quite different from those of the Benedictines, inasmuch as they emphasized education and an increase in the number of elementary schools. Frequent tensions among the bishops; conflicts between the bishops and their active and independent-minded priests; misunderstandings between the English Benedictines and the Irish clergy, which often placed its patriotic feelings above obedience to superiors; and the opposition of some liberal laymen desirous of a more democratic organization of the Church; all of these resulted in frequent disturbances of the Australian [37] The establishment of the hierarchy in Australia, which was the first in the British Empire, caused a violent reaction on the part of the Anglicans of the colony; thanks to the tactful handling of the matter by Monsignor Polding, calm quickly returned.

---

[38] Six between 1842 and 1848 and five additional ones subsequently; a second Church province was finally established in Melbourne in 1874.

Church during the second third of the century.[39] But these troubles must not be permitted to overshadow the missionary efforts by all clergy, an effort which found a visible reward in the growth of religious activity. Nor should the devotion be forgotten of some lay people like Caroline Chisholm, whose charitable work for the immigrants (1838–57) was admirable.

As in many other countries, the problem of education assumed a central role in Australia after 1865. The increased withholding of state subsidies for parochial schools, which led to the closing of many Protestant schools, hardly affected the growth of the Catholic elementary schools, which bishops and priests regarded as one of the most important foundations of pastoral care.[40]

---

[39] And even later: Intrigues resulted in a petition to Rome to withdraw the nomination of the Benedictine R. W. Vaughan, who in 1873 was named Polding's coadjutor.

[40] In New Zealand, the organization of the Catholic Church was started much later. Although two dioceses were established in 1848 and entrusted to the Marists, there were only a few thousand Catholics of European descent; the uprising of the Maoris in 1859 put an end to all missionary activity for a decade. Only in 1887 was the Catholic hierarchy reorganized upon the suggestion of the plenary synod of Australia, which had met two years earlier (the archbishopric of Wellington with three suffragan dioceses). The number of white Catholics was hardly higher than one hundred thousand by the turn of the century (see A. Landes in RHM 6 [1929], 8–36, 220–59).

South Africa, as far as Catholics were concerned, remained a missionary area until the end of the century. When an apostolic vicariate was established there in 1837, there were only seven hundred Catholics who were organized in a system similar to that of trusteeism in the United States; it posed great difficulties for Monsignor Griffith (1837–62). There were about one thousand Catholics when the vicariate, in keeping with the political division, was divided into two vicariates (Englishmen in the West and Boers in the East; the Boers granted full religious freedom to the Catholics only after 1870) (see W. E. Brown, The Catholic Church in South Africa [New York 1960]).

CHAPTER 10

The Easing of Tensions in the Iberian World

Spain

Spain lost much of its significance for the Holy See when its former American colonies declared their independence. Even so, it remained one of the three great Catholic powers of Europe. In fact, until the accession of Pius IX Spain was of greater concern to Rome than the France of Louis-Philippe or the Josephinist Austria of Metternich.

The crisis began in 1833 upon the death of King Ferdinand VII. He had annulled the Salic law and assured the throne for his daughter

Isabella. But the "apostolic faction," afraid that the regency of María Cristina would return the liberals to power, supported the claims of Don Carlos, who was known for his reactionary political and religious views and also had the support of the regionalists of the northern provinces. The resulting dynastic war lasted until 1839, openly supported by most of the clergy of Navarre, León, and the Basque country. The war intensified the contrast between the liberals and the intransigent Catholics because Gregory refused to acknowledge Isabella. Partly out of a spontaneous sympathy for the traditionalist ideology represented by the Carlists, and partially under the pressure from Austria and Russia, Gregory openly took the side of Don Carlos.

Gregory was also motivated to do so by the anticlerical policy of the new government, even though during the first months of his regency the moderate Minister Martínez de la Rosa tried not to break with Rome and, without diverging from canonic forms, attempted to adjust the statute concerning the Spanish Church. This statute still conformed to the concordat of 1753 and corresponded neither to the ideas nor to the political realities of the present. But it was soon removed by the radicals. The change began with widespread outbreaks of violence, the burning of monasteries, the murder of regular clergy in Madrid, Saragossa, Murcia, and Barcelona, and violent acts aimed at the clergy in other cities. Beginning in 1835, the new minister, Mendizábal, proclaimed a number of anticlerical laws. The first, the confiscation of Church property, chiefly grew out of economic considerations and was an attempt to deal with the growing deficit in the state's budget. But all of the others had their origin in an ideology which combined the dreams of the Alumbrados of the eighteenth century and of the liberals of the nineteenth century. The laws effected the dissolution of all monasteries except those devoted to education and the care of the sick, the unconditional dissolution of the large orders,[1] the confiscation of the property of the parishes and chapters, and the abolition of the tithe, which constituted the chief source of income for the clergy (approximately 400 million reales). The state, now expected to assume the tasks hitherto performed by the Church, failed to live up to its public welfare obligations. The government passed punitive legislation against the "abuse" of pulpit and confessional, and expelled with military force the prelates accused of opposition to the government. In no time at all the most important episcopal sees such as Toledo, Valencia, Burgos, and Granada were vacant. For the first time, the Protestants received permission to proselytize. Finally, a plan was conceived for a general reform of the Church according to the example of the French Civil Constitution of the Clergy of 1790.

---

[1] Between 1830 and 1835, the number of regular clergy declined from 61,723 to 52,627: 22,342 nuns and 30,285 monks (in 1898 convents and monasteries), among them 11,232 Franciscans, 3,202 Carmelites, 3,118 Dominicans, 2,829 Capuchins, but only 363 Jesuits. There were sixty Benedictine monasteries and fifty-three Cistercian monasteries.

The opposition of María Cristina resulted in three years of calm (1837–39) and an attempt to put the finances of the Church on a new footing. But eventually María Cristina was forced to flee the country, and under the regency of General Espartero (1840–43) anticlerical policy came to the fore again. Espartero not only refused to pay the clergy the salaries to which it had agreed in return for the confiscations, but also on his own authority established new parishes and without consulting the Holy See appointed administrators for forty-seven of the vacant sixty-two episcopal sees. His Catholic opponents, among them preeminently the Catalan canon Jaime Balmes,[2] based their opposition to his policies on Espartero's own principles of liberalism. There was no doubt that the radicalism of this religious policy began to worry a good number of moderates in a country in which the Catholic faith was still deeply rooted even among the bourgeoisie. The career of Donoso Cortés[3] was characteristic of this attitude.

After ten years of an uninterrupted degeneration of the old Spanish Church regimen, a relaxation of tensions set in with the return of the moderates. It lasted for a whole decade and began with the maturity of Queen Isabella, who had warm feelings for the Church. In 1844 the laws providing for the state's supervision of ecclesiastical activities were repealed. A short time later the expelled bishops returned and the court of the Rota was reinstated. The sale of Church property[4] continued for a while, but was fully stopped during 1845. While the government was revising its policies, some sensible bishops like P. P. Romo, the new archbishop of Seville, began to recognize that a regime willing to allow constitutional freedoms would permit the Church to have a degree of independence which would more than compensate for the loss of certain privileges. They began to draft a pastoral program which better corresponded to the new mentality and whose objective was freedom of education. This attempt was facilitated by the open atmosphere prevailing in Rome during the first months of the pontificate of Pius IX. After it failed, the Spanish Church limited itself to regain as fully as possible the restoration of the position earlier achieved in 1814 and 1825. But it was an erroneous expectation, as the change of thought among the middle class, especially among the university students, this time was much more profound.

---

[2] Jaime Balmes (1810–48), a powerful apologist, champion of Neo-Thomism, who nevertheless tried to maintain contact with modern philosophy, politically controversial and social activist, was the dominating intellectual figure of the Spanish clergy during the second third of the nineteenth century; nonetheless, his influence was limited during his lifetime (see I. Casanovas, Balmes, su vida sus obras y su tiempo, 2 vols. [Barcelona 1942] and LThK I, 1211–12).

[3] See E. Schramm, Donoso Cortés. Leben und Werk eines spanischen Antiliberalen (Hamburg 1935) and DHGE XIV, 668–71.

[4] While the sale of monastic property had begun in 1835, the land belonging to the secular clergy was not sold until 1842. All told, between 1835 and 1844, 76,734 pieces of property of the regular clergy were sold for 2,762,202,415 reales and 69,539 pieces of property of the secular clergy were sold for 774,983,086 reales. The tremendous transfer of property was very advantageous for the liberal aristocracy and the middle class, but, even more than during the French Revolution, it had grave social consequences, as on the whole it aggravated the situation of the peasants.

In the meantime, negotiations with Rome had been started with a view toward restoring the relationship interrupted in 1835 and toward a new arrangement of ecclesiastical affairs. The most difficult point was the statute for the financing of the Spanish clergy, as it involved not only financial questions but fiscal ones as well. Additionally, the negotiations were handicapped by the mistrust of the Holy See toward a government which the papacy considered as too liberal and by some regalistic demands on the part of the Spanish government. A draft providing for some reforms was initialed in April 1845.[5] Among them were the reopening of a few monasteries and the return to the secular clergy of unsold Church property. But the Holy See did not want to acknowledge the sale of Church property officially until the question of paying salaries to the clergy had been answered satisfactorily by the parliament. But, faced with the demand of the liberals to have the sales officially accepted immediately, the Spanish government refused to ratify the treaty. The government was also disappointed in not seeing included in the treaty several clauses, included in the concordat of 1753, which granted the state a number of concessions, particularly in the matter of the placet.

Yet both sides were interested in finding a solution, and the negotiations were resumed. After being interrupted by the death of Gregory XVI, they were continued in 1847 on a new basis and with a willingness on both sides to compromise. After extremely frank exchanges of views, the delicate question of salaries for the clergy was settled by the law of April 1849.[6] Eventually the negotiations produced the concordat of 16 March 1851.[7] It was a partial success for the Holy See, because the events of 1848 produced a shift of the moderates to the right.[8]

---

[5] Text in Mercati I, 796–99.

[6] Text in J. Pérez Alhama, La Iglesia y el Estado español, 269–70.

[7] Text in Mercati I, 770–96.

[8] The intervention of Spanish, Austrian, French, and Neapolitan troops in 1849 for the purpose of restoring the temporal power of the Pope was significant.

The agreement, in spite of some concessions to the spirit of the times, indeed confirmed Spain's Catholic nature. It also differed from the concordat of 1753 in removing the interference by the state in purely ecclesiastical matters and in granting the Church a large degree of autonomy. It thus was the "most liberal" of all Spanish concordats. It should also be noted that the loss of the majority of Church lands was a liberating experience for the Church and that after fifteen years of troubles the clergy felt closer to the Holy See than before. At the same time, the excesses of the liberals convinced the clergy that a guarantee of religion and social order could only be expected from the conservatives. This conviction moved the Church closer to the parties of the right, on whom the fate of the concordat seemed to depend. This was demonstrated clearly in 1854 when Espartero returned to power and immediately repealed the concordat with accompanying transgressions against Church property and religious orders. The debates of the new parliamentary assembly were the opportunity "for the first real discussion of the relationship of Church and state in the history of Spain" (Kiernan). But in the fall of 1856 the government returned to the hands of the moderates under the leadership of Narváez. Until the revolution of 1868, the Church was permitted to live in relative peace, sanctioned by an agreement with the Holy See.[9]

The concordat granted the Church a decisive position in the state. It made possible a limited restoration of the Church, facilitated by the protection of Queen Isabella II. She was a narrow-minded bigot, who was advised by Antonio-Maria Claret,[10] her overly zealous father confessor. External reconstruction expressed itself in a high number of applicants for the seminaries, on whose reorganization the episcopate spent a large degree of effort. It was also shown by the founding of new active convents, especially in Catalonia, devoted to education and charity. But the underpinnings were provided by the genuine Christian sentiment among the masses. Unfortunately, the blossoming of the Church was only external. The clergy was still very numerous proportionally; despite a reduction of 20 percent since the time of Ferdinand VII, there was still one priest for every 380 people. Moreover, the clergy all too often was satisfied with a mere religion of rite and routine and frequently confused its apostolate with inflexibility. It maintained its claim to the moral leadership of the nation without justifying it with an adequate education, and by relying on an outdated Scholasticism which lacked any originality. The attempts by Balmes and Donoso Cortés to revive traditional apologetics were ignored.

---

[9] On 25 August 1859; Text in Mercati I, 920–29. Supplementary agreement concerning religious foundations, ibid., 18–24.

[10] On A. M. Claret (1807–70), founder of two missionary congregations, extremely active archbishop of Santiago de Cuba from 1850 to 1857, father confessor of the Queen from 1857 to 1868, see C. Fernández, Antonio-Maria Claret, 2 vols. (Madrid 1942) and J. M. Viñas, ed., Escritos autobiográficos y espirituales (Madrid 1959). Also, C. Fernández, El confesor de Isabel II y sus actividades en Madrid (Madrid 1964).

While during the preceding generation many anticlericals had remained believing Christians, after 1860 the number of intellectuals whose faith was shaken increased. Romanticism was introduced in Spain only belatedly after 1833 by the exiles who returned from France, at a time when its chief proponents were already alienated from the Church. It opened the way to free thought and under the influence of post-Hegelian philosophies found its Spanish expression in "Krausism." Many of the intellectuals were discouraged by a Catholicism which, under the leadership of the Neo-Catholics of Nocedal, the spiritual heirs of the Carlists, and their paper Pensiamento español, was fanatically antimodern. Their noisy conduct, joyfully greeted by Pius IX, produced nothing but a stronger anti-clericalism among the educated middle class.

Portugal

The religious situation in Portugal during the pontificate of Gregory XVI developed parallel to that of Spain, just as had been the case during the restoration period. Portugal also had two pretenders: Don Miguel on one hand, and Don Pedro and his daughter Maria da Gloria on the other. The dynastic conflict was made graver by the ideological struggle between the absolutists, supported by clergy and Pope, and the constitutionalists, supported by the Freemasons. After the victory of Don Pedro in 1832, a number of anticlerical steps were taken: expulsion of the nuncio; establishment of a commission for the reform of the clergy, which in addition to sensible suggestions like a reduction of the overly large number of dioceses came up with projects of Gallican and Jansenist origin which were at direct variance with Roman ideas; suppression of the Jesuits, who had only just returned in 1829; and the closing of all monasteries, including those in the overseas possessions (in Spain, the liberals at least allowed the missions to continue). Even graver was the fact that Don Pedro refused to acknowledge bishops who between 1826 and 1832 had been appointed by his rival Don Miguel, while on their part the majority of the bishops refused to cooperate with the liberal government. Many episcopal sees were soon declared vacant, and the government proceeded to noncanonical elections of chapter vicars. These came in conflict with the legitimate Church authorities, and priests and faithful who refused to recognize them were subject to persecution. A virtually schismatic condition existed for several years.

But, as in Spain, the political developments produced a relaxation of tension, starting in 1835. Even so, the negotiations with Rome, skillfully conducted by Monsignor Capaccini since 1842, made only slow progress. An agreement was reached only in October 1848 after the death of Gregory XVI; it dealt primarily with the question of the seminaries and the ecclesiastical jurisdiction in law.[11] In 1857, the agreement was supplemented with a convention on the right of patronage by the Portuguese King with respect to the missions in India and China.[12] Seminaries were reformed, a matter of dire necessity in light of the low standards of training of the clergy, whose conduct and pastoral negligence the nuncios had frequently criticized in their reports. In spite of the obstacles put up by the Freemasons, the orders, including the Jesuits, gradually regained a foothold in the country after 1858. Even more than in Spain, the common people remained faithful to the traditions of Catholicism. But the rationalistic orientation of the educated middle class became more prominent, and the indifference of the Portuguese Catholics to the attacks by the antireligious press stood in uncomfortable contrast to the Spanish endeavors to create a Catholic press during the second third of the nineteenth century.

The Spanish American Republics

The dozen republics of former Spanish America were far from bringing much joy to the Holy See during the middle of the nineteenth century. While most of their constitutions continued to acknowledge Catholicism as the official state religion, the governments were unwilling to give up the tradition of a strict supervision of the Church and insisted that the Holy See recognize their right of patronage over the Church. At the same time they tried in the name of the new liberal ideology to reduce the influence of the clergy on the population, to do away with the clergy's legal privileges, and to incorporate the Church's considerable land holdings in the public economy. This attempt led to repeated conflicts and occasionally, as in Colombia and Mexico, to a rupture.

In some cases the conflicts were caused by the insistence of the Church on rejecting the state tutelage, which was incompatible with the new ultramontane ideas. But in most cases they resulted from a reactionary attitude of the clergy, which obstinately fought rearguard actions in defense of increasingly outmoded positions. Simultaneously, with the exception of Chile, the clergy, whose condition had changed radically, was no longer up to its tasks. There was a great lack of priests, especially in the rural areas.[13] It grew worse with the break with Spain, especially as the immigrants, in contrast to the United States, were almost never accompanied by priests from their native homelands. In addition, there was a lowering of morality, a lack of discipline, and the total loss of a pastoral dynamic, leading to the total abandonment of the Indian missions within fifty years. The religious orders, which had remained after the secularization at the beginning of the century, were in full decline. Thus, even with the assistance of foreign confreres, they were able to compensate the losses in the parish clergy only with limited success, the more so as they were constantly harassed and even expelled by the governments.

---

[11] Text in J. Ferreira Borges de Castro, Colecçao dos tratados . . . VII (Lisbon 1856seqq.), 221f.

[12] Text in Mercati I, 844–52. It dealt with the termination of the so-called Goan schism.

But after the deep crisis which had shaken these Christian communities during the wars of independence, a new beginning dawned by the middle of the century. It started with the pontificate of Gregory XVI. At first, the long-vacant episcopal sees were filled gradually. This was the prerequisite for establishing better ecclesiastical discipline. In South America, the dioceses of the colonial period were augmented by six additional ones, their number having become inadequate as a consequence of immigration from Europe and the steady increase in the population.[14] Apostolic visitors with extensive authorization were sent to restore discipline in the orders. The Jesuits settled again in some of the republics (in 1836 in Argentina, in 1842 in New Granada, and in 1843 in Chile).

Restoration proceeded slowly but steadily. Pius IX, who had a vivid interest in these countries ever since his trip to Latin America, supported the initiatives. Additional dioceses made possible closer contact between priests and their flocks; Church provinces were reorganized in order to adjust them to the new political borders; attempts were made to regain control over the local clergy through the appointment of delegates who tried to ameliorate the crassest abuses, although only with limited success; regular clergy from Europe were encouraged to open schools, and in spite of obstacles put up by the governments their number increased gradually, even though their influence was limited to the propertied people. In Rome, the Collegio Pio latino-americano was established in 1858, with the aim of training an elite clergy obedient to the Holy See.

---

[13] One example: In Mexico, the total number of priests in 1810 was 7,341 (4,229 secular and 3,112 regular clergy), but in 1850 it was only 3,275 (2,084 secular and 1,191 regular priests), while the population grew from 6 to 7.5 million.

[14] Twenty-four (without Brazil) in the south of the Gulf of Mexico in 1815, at a time when of the 15 million Spanish-Americans only a third lived south of Panama. While the population of Mexico and Central America until 1850 only increased by 30 percent (13 million), the population of South America grew by 250 percent, to 12.5 million, who resided in an area encompassing 5.8 million square miles.

To be sure, almost the entire pontificate of Pius IX passed before official diplomatic relations between Rome and the most important South American republics could be established; prior to 1877, there were only a few delegates apostolic. But between 1852 and 1862 the Holy See succeeded in negotiating seven concordats or conventions.[15] Some of them remained in effect only temporarily, but at least they brought about an improvement in the relations between the Church and the governments. This was usually the case both after the conservatives returned to power in the course of the second third of the century and after the subsequent triumph of the liberals during the final decades of the century.

This was especially true for Central America, where the dictator of Guatemala, General R. Carrera (1839–65), repealed the anticlerical laws introduced after 1829 by the liberal President Marazán. He restored the ecclesiastical privileges and the control of the clergy over the schools and the press, returned the land of the orders, and forced the smaller neighboring states to conclude concordats with the Holy See which were advantageous for the Church. This was also true, even though to a lesser degree, for Chile. There, Archbishop R. V. Valdivieso (1847–78), a diligent pastor, inflexible defender of the rights of the Church, and bitter antiliberal, complained unceasingly about the regalism of the government and the relief granted to the Protestants. But the Church received considerable compensation payments for the abolition of the tithe (1853), and during the twenty-five years that D. Portales was minister of education the influence of the Catholic Church in the schools was fostered, because Portales saw in it the best guarantee for public order. He also promoted the immigration of active orders from Europe, such as the Jesuits and the Ladies of the Sacred Heart.

In Venezuela the Church had to accept the loss of its own legal jurisdiction and of the tithe and the decision of the government to establish two new dioceses without consultation with Rome. But the conservative oligarchy which governed almost without interruption from 1830 to 1864 favored the clergy, culminating in the concordat of 1862. Bolivia almost concluded a concordat in 1851.[16] In view of the small influence of the Church in public life, the government was friendlier than in many other countries, but refused to ratify the treaty when Rome insisted on "granting" the government the right of patronage over the Church, while the government demanded this recognition as a matter of right. Relations nevertheless remained cordial, because Rome tolerated the exercise of the national patronage de facto, without recognizing it officially.

---

[15] With Guatemala and Costa Rica in 1852 (Text in Mercati I, 800–821); with Honduras and Nicaragua in 1861 (Mercati I, 936–59); with San Salvador, Venezuela, and Ecuador in 1862 (Mercati I, 960–99). Negotiations for a concordat were also started with Bolivia (1851), Peru (1853), and Argentina (1855 and 1857), but were not concluded chiefly due to the demand concerning patronage. After half a century of tension and difficulties, a concordat was negotiated with the black republic of Haiti in 1860 (Mercati I, 929–36); Haiti's Church was reorganized by French missionaries (see A. Caron, Notes sur l'histoire religieuse d'Haiti de la Révolution au concordat, 1789–1860 (Port-au-Prince 1933).

[16] Text in Mercati I, 3–14.

In Peru the moderate liberal President R. Castilla was able to effect a compromise solution with the assistance of the conciliatory Archbishops F. X. de Luna Pizarro (1845–55) and J. S. Goyeneche (1859–72), in spite of the protests of a group of priests connected with the conservative party who tried to impose their reactionary views on the government. It was not possible to save the legal jurisdiction of the Church, the tithe, and the control of the Church over education, but the Church retained the majority of its property. Chiefly, however, the Church enjoyed an independence from the state which went far beyond that in any other South American state. Even in Argentina the end of the "golden age of the clergy" came with the departure of dictator Rosas in 1852. There, the clerics had adjusted to a pronounced regalism, but it was favorable to them.[17] Still, the Church enjoyed another ten years of peace, because the constitution of 1853 contained several articles favoring the Church.

The Church registered a spectacular success in the years after 1860 in Ecuador. President García Moreno, a fiery but authoritarian Catholic,[18] admired by the ultramontanes of the world, between 1861 and 1875 attempted to mold his country into a model Christian state. Legislation was fashioned along the lines of the encyclicals of Pius IX and especially of the Syllabus. For the implementation of his ideal the president to a large degree relied on European orders, in which he saw the guarantee for regeneration.

This policy clearly illuminates one of the principal weaknesses of Catholicism in Latin America throughout the nineteenth century. Social life, at least in those areas in which the Church had firm roots under the Old Regime,[19] was inherently Christian. But these Christian traditions were not capable of making necessary internal changes. Local Catholicism, with few exceptions, like those of Bartolomé Herrera in Peru[20] for the clergy and of José Manuel Estrada, "the Argentinian Louis Veuillot," for the laity, was passive and without vitality or originality culturally, socially, and apostolically. The reason was the absence of a middle class in these countries, the social structure of which was hardly changed by the political revolutions. It is chiefly to be found in the fact that the Church until the end of the Old Regime had retained a colonial structure too dependent on Spain and had become sterile and incapable of thought or action. Additionally, there was a very individualistic mentality, which under the influence of Freemasonry neglected organized ecclesiastical life in order to find salvation in a pietistic attitude toward faith.

---

[17] Many details concerning the relations between Rosas and the Church are found in the book of the anticlerical J. Ingenieros, Evolución de las ideas argentinas: Obras completas XVI, (Buenos Aires 1947), 99–142.

[18] Concerning the very controversial person of Gabriel Garcia Moreno (1821–75), see, in addition to R. Pattee, op. cit., P. H. Smith in HAHR 45 (1965), 1–24.

[19] Especially Mexico, Guatemala, Colombia, Peru, and Ecuador. But in the interior of Venezuela and Bolivia the institutional presence of the Church was almost completely absent, and it was very modest on the Rio de la Plata and in Chile.

Brazil

The Empire of Brazil was the largest and most populated state in South America, with a size of 3.3 million square miles and 5.5 million inhabitants in 1830, who grew to more than ten million by the end of Pius IX's pontificate. Under the regency and long reign of Pedro II (1831–88), the Church lived in relative peace, even though the government, which, following the example of Pombal, desired to govern the Church by protecting it, periodically created tensions. For example, in 1834 it supported the attempts of the political priest D. A. Feijo, who strove for a legalization of priest marriages with the argument that celibacy of the clergy de facto did not exist in Brazil and that this fact favored public immorality to a high degree. In 1844 the government appointed the archbishop of the capital contrary to canon usage. The measures against the old orders, "victims of internal abuses which without radical reforms inevitably would lead to their dissolution" (Y. de la Brière), were intensified in 1855. On the other hand, however, new active congregations were founded,[21] and the European congregations which devoted themselves to education and charity were freely accepted. From the 1860s on, these congregations were able to conduct parish missions of several weeks duration, an undertaking very much needed, considering the profound religious ignorance of the people.

---

[20] See O. Barrenechea, Bartolomé Herrera, 1808–64 (Buenos Aires 1947). The collection Escritos y discursos, 2 vols. (Lima 1929–30) gives insight into the thinking of this most highly qualified representative of the conservative clergy in Peru during the nineteenth century.

[21] See, for example, the biography of the founder of the congregation of N. -D. d'Amparo, devoted to the care of orphans (1871), O Padre Siqueira, sua vida e sua obra (Petropolis 1957).

The regalistic mentality of the government was approved by the clergy until about 1860, proof of which was the distribution of the handbooks by Monsignor M. de Araujo. But not everything was perfect. Freemasonry gained a considerable influence, even touching the religious confraternities. Another inheritance of the eighteenth century was the growth of rationalism and positivism among the educated and the deplorable situation of the clergy. The clergy was not only weak numerically; in 1872, there were fewer than one thousand priests. They were chiefly concentrated in the coastal cities, while in the interior of the country perhaps twenty parishes, covering thousands of square miles, were administered by a single priest and many faithful did not see a priest for ten years or longer. In addition, the morality of the clergy often left much to be desired, and their attitude also gave cause for alarm. Until 1850, many priests were influenced by the ideas of Rousseau and the encyclopedists, and even if a portion of them turned away from Freemasonry on account of its hostility to the Holy See, by 1870 approximately more than half of the clergy still belonged to its adherents. Some of the bishops, of whom there were only eleven, tried to strengthen the seminaries, and gradually the Catholic lay leaders became better educated also. But on the whole the period of the Empire was a time of stagnation behind a facade of peace and quiet. In fact, more to the truth, it was a period of decay for Catholicism.

CHAPTER 11

The Catholic Church in the Orthodox World

Unionist Prospects in the East

In the middle of the nineteenth century, two phenomena drew attention to the Eastern Churches. One was the development of the Eastern Question; the expected disintegration of the Ottoman Empire presaged profound political and religious changes. The other one was the clear recognition of the role which Russia's Pan-Slavic policy would play in connection with the budding nationalism of eastern Europe. Toward the end of the pontificate of Gregory XVI, a group led by Princess Volkonskaya, a wealthy convert residing in Rome since 1825, took up the question of the return of the separated Eastern Churches to Rome.[1] Among the members of the group were Monsignor Corboli-Bussi, Augustin Theiner, Monsignor Luquet, a former French missionary,[2] several consultants of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, a number of Uniates, and the founders of the Polish Resurrectionists. Under the presidency of the prefect of the Propaganda, the group in 1847 suggested to Pius IX that he address a solemn appeal to the separated brethren in the East. The Pope combined this plan with his own intention to send an apostolic visitor who was to inform himself of the prevailing conditions in the East. In January 1848 he directed the encyclical In suprema Petri sede[3] to the Eastern Christians. He informed the Uniates of the impending arrival of the apostolic visitor, who was well-known among the Catholic Armenians. He praised the customary advantages of the Catholic faith and invited the separated Uniates to join the Roman Church "as no conceivable reason could prevent their return to the true Church." The Uniates saw this document as a provocation. In May 1848 four partriarchs and twenty-nine archbishops wrote a negative reply in which they condemned Latin innovations, the pretensions of the Pope, and the proselytism of the Latin missionaries.[4] [1] See C. Korolevsky in Unitas 2 (1949–50), 189–90.

---

This failure did not discourage those, however, who regarded the upper clergy of the Orthodox Churches as no longer representing the true feelings of the people, who were in turmoil as a result of changes. At first they looked toward Russia, where they believed they saw a tentative opening for a rapprochement in the reforms of Alexander II and in the growing interest in Roman Catholicism among some noblemen who were searching for an effective antirevolutionary ideology. With the covert and overt assistance of this nobility, the writings of Joseph de Maistre enjoyed renewed popularity in Russia for a number of years and occasioned a series of foundations after the Crimean War (1854–56). Under the patronage of the bishops of Münster and Paderborn, Baron von Haxthausen in 1857 founded the Saint Peter's Association in Germany, prayer groups for the conversion of Russia, and entered into correspondence with Metropolitan Philaret of Moscow. In Italy, the convert P. Schuvarov inspired Father Tondini to action on behalf of the cause of Christian unity, and Tondini founded a similar prayer organization.

---

[2] On his ideas, which were in advance of the time, see R. Roussel, Un précurseur: Monseigneur Luquet (Langres 1960), 83–89.

[3] Acta Pii IX I, 78–91. See A. Tamborra, "Pio IX, la lettera agli orientali del 1848 e il mondo ortodosso," RStRis 56 (1959), 347–67.

[4] Mansi XL, 377–418. See T. Popescu, Enciclica Patriarhilor ortodosci dela 1848 (Bucharest 1935) and A. Tamborra, op. cit., 357–66. The Russian Church did not join in this protest, but A. Stourdza published another vehement book against Rome: Le double parallèle ou l'Église en présence de la papauté (Athens 1849).

But it was especially in the Austrian Empire and France that a vivid interest was awakened in the return of the Eastern Christians to Rome (the problem of union was always approached in this way, going counter to any ideas of ecumenism). In Austria an attempt was made to draw the Orthodox believers in the border areas away from Russian influence and to orient them toward Rome; Franz Joseph and his advisers in this instance were motivated by both genuine religious concerns and reasons of state. Such attempts were also aided by some Slavic clerics in the Empire. Monsignor A. M. Slomšek, the bishop of Lavant, in 1851 in Slovenia founded the Brotherhood of Saints Cyril and Methodius, which quickly grew in Moravia under the leadership of Father Sušil and also among the Ukrainians of Hungary and Galicia.

In France, the death of Madame Swetchine in 1857 led to the dissolution of her circle, but her work was continued even more systematically with the aid of the general of the Jesuits, Father J. Pierling, and her relative, Father I. Gagarin.[5] In his book La Russie, sera-t-elle catholique? (1856), which was translated into several other languages, Gagarin recommended a reconciliation which was not to end in the absorption of the Russian Church by the Roman Church; he thought that diplomatic negotiations between the Tsar and the Pope could bring about such a union. He was more realistic when, in 1856, being aware of the need for a fundamentally academic approach, he founded Études de théologie, de philosophie et d'histoire with the aid of his fellow countrymen Father J. Martinov and P. Balabin. The journal was designed to make the Orthodox understand Catholicism and Catholics to understand the Orthodox religion better. In the same climate of unionist ideas, but from a strongly apologetic point of view, Hergenröther wrote his books on Photius during the same period.[6]

After 1860, the expectations with respect to Russia gradually disappeared. They were replaced by a new interest in the potential return to the Roman Church of the Christian communities of the Ottoman Empire. Such expectations were raised as a result of French intervention in Syria, and the model thought of were the Uniate communities. Public opinion was especially enthused by this question in France,[7] where interest in the Christian East had grown for the past two decades. The issue had been kept alive by the speeches of men like Monsignor Dupanloup, by publications like the bimonthly journal La Terre Sainte et les Églises orientales, founded in 1864 by C. R. Girard, and by the Oeuvres des Écoles d'Orient, founded in 1855 and given strong leadership by Lavigerie.[8] Finally, in 1862, Father d'Alzon, at the request of the vicar apostolic at Constantinople, Paolo Brunoni, and of Pius IX, engaged his Assumptionists under the leadership of Father Galabert in the unionist apostolate in the East. After a difficult beginning they played an important role for the next seventy-five years.

---

[5] Shortly after his conversion he wrote a memorandum in 1845 on "Das Wirken der Gesellschaft Jesu im Blick auf die Bekehrung des Orients und vor allem Rußlands" (printed in SPM 2 [1955], 205–28). In it he suggested the establishment of a school for Jesuits of the Eastern Rite for the apostolate in Russia; however, the general at the time, Philipp Roothaan, had little interest in this project.

[6] The three volumes of his Photius, published between 1867 and 1869, were begun in 1855 and indicated by his Mystagogia of 1857. See the praising review by Döllinger in J. Friedrich, Ignaz von Döllinger III, 444.

Rome could not remain indifferent to this interest in the East which agitated the Catholic world of the West, especially as the efforts of the Russians and chiefly the Protestant missions aided by the British were cause for concern. For several years, the rather simplistic efforts of J. G. Pitzipios, a Greek who thrived on intrigue,[9] were aided by Rome. His voluminous L'Église orientale was published by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in 1855. Much more serious were the efforts of Cardinal Reisach, who became interested in the Slavic problem by way of his contacts with Austria. He acquainted the Pope with the necessity of having available in Rome a number of specialists for the East. Following his suggestion, the Benedictine Pitra was ordered to undertake a study trip to Russia (1859–60), during which he was also to gather material for a broad documentation of the sources of Orthodox canon law.[10] In 1862 Pius IX decided to divide the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith into two sections, one of which was to concern itself with the affairs of the Churches of the Eastern Rite. Each cardinal belonging to the new section was assigned to a certain rite and asked to acquire competency in his area, and some of the best experts on the East were employed as consultants. There was no doubt that Pius IX and the leaders of the Propaganda genuinely desired to respect the different liturgical usages of the Eastern Churches, in contrast to many Western missionaries who were bent on forcing the Eastern Catholics into loyalty to Rome by making them replace their traditions with Latin customs, or in contrast to men like Father d'Alzon, who were convinced that the advance of European ideas necessarily would be followed by the disappearances of the Eastern rites.

---

[7] Especially in France, but not exclusively: in Austria, the Association of the Immaculate Conception of Mary for the Support of the Catholics in the Turkish Empire, founded in 1857 for the mission in the Sudan, turned increasingly to the support of the Catholic Churches of the Eastern Rite.

[8] H. de Lacombe, Note sur l'œuvre d'Orient (Paris 1906) and de Montclos, 143–55.

[9] See A. Tamborra in Balkan Studies 10 (1969), 51–68.

[10] See A. Battandier, Le cardinal Pitra (Paris 1893), 351–440; F. Cabrol, Histoire du cardinal Pitra (Paris 1893), 220–40.

Rome also tried to reestablish the influence of the Curia over the life of these Churches and gradually to gain entry for the principles of post-Tridentine Catholicism into the canon law of the Eastern Churches. But the optimistic expectations of a mass return of the separated Eastern Churches to the Church of Rome were not realized. In fact, the extreme centralization policy of Cardinal Barnabo by 1870 resulted in serious crises in the Uniate communities, crises which were intensified by the Vatican Council. Only in southeastern Europe and the Near East was Catholicism able to register some rather superficial progress, while its position in Russia once again deteriorated.

The Russian Empire

Contrary to the expectations which Gregory XVI at the beginning of his pontificate attached to the condemnation of the Polish rebellion, Tsar Nicholas I did not change his policy toward the Catholic Church; in fact, its condition behind "a curtain of silence" (de Bertier) grew worse. The Section for Religion at Saint Petersburg openly promoted the conversion of three Uniate dioceses of the Empire (1839) to the Russian Orthodox Church. Measures limiting the freedom of action of the Latin Church and its contacts with Rome in Poland and in the Russian Empire intensified from year to year. It is not to say too much that the Catholic Church legally was so integrated in the Russian state that it did not differ at all from any other state religion. While papal diplomacy in 1840 took up contacts with Polish conservatives in exile, through whom pressure was to be exerted on Russia, Gregory XVI's violent dislike of any revolutionary enterprise[11] quickly regained the upper hand, and Rome returned to the usual method of secret negotiations through diplomatic channels.

In return for new concessions by Rome in 1841, Russia's envoy made some vague promises. In fact, however, nothing changed. The ukase of 25 December 1841, which secularized all property of the Churches in the western provinces and reduced still further the authorized number of regular clergy, only confirmed the failure of this method. Catholics in Russia, Austria, and western Europe could not understand the long silence of the Holy See. Incited by B. Kopitar, the leader of Austro-Slavism, Augustin Theiner and the Jesuit Secchi emphatically implored the Pope. All questioned cardinals regarded a public protest as unavoidable. At this point, Gregory XVI again asked the Austrian Emperor and Metternich to mediate, only to learn that they were interested in a prolongation of the ecclesiastical abuses in the western provinces of neighboring and hostile Russia. This attempt having failed, the Pope in July 1842 published an address[12] in which he complained to the world about the repressive measures applied to Polish and Russian Catholics and about the disloyal conduct of the Tsar. The appeal, accompanied by a formal exposé of the Secretariat of State, received great attention, as everyone knew that the Pope would have preferred to protect the Tsar for political reasons.

---

[11] "The Pope had to condemn your revolution," Gregory XVI told the envoy of Prince Czartoryski on 7 May 1841, "and if necessary he will, with regret, condemn it again" (quoted in RStRis 51, [1964], 474).

Angry over the unexpected outburst, the Tsar, as many people had feared, began to intensify the measures against seminaries and orders. But upon the advice of Chancellor and Secretary of State Nesselrode, he started a policy of détente after a few months. He had two reasons. One was that at the very moment when Russia, in the eyes of a "revolutionary" Europe, tried to appear as a country in which, under the paternal authority of the Tsar, religion and order prevailed without compulsion, such an appeal to the world did not fit the Tsar's policy. He also feared that Austria would exploit the situation and would present itself to Rome as the only Christian great power. The recall of the Russian envoy from Rome (1843), his replacement by the moderate Butenev, and contacts made in 1844 through the mediation of the nuncios at Vienna and Munich paved the way for a personal encounter between Nicholas I and Gregory XVI. They met in December 1845, and Gregory XVI submitted to the Tsar an agenda which he had personally prepared.

Negotiations were started in November 1846 in Rome, after Nesselrode had made the necessary preparations first in Rome in talks with Monsignor Corboli-Bussi and Cardinal Lambruschini and then in Saint Petersburg with a special ministerial committee for Catholic affairs. Gregory XVI had died in the meantime, but Pius IX insisted that former Secretary of State Lambruschini, who was well versed in the problems, should continue to represent the Holy See. On the Russian side, negotiations were conducted by Bludov, former minister of the interior and justice, who was assisted by Butenev. The plenipotentiaries faced a difficult task; after all, they had to find solutions for the reconciliation of two powers with incompatible principles. Rome desired a total revision of Russian legislation, designed to return freedom to the Catholic Church. Saint Petersburg desired an improvement of its relations with Rome for the purpose of pacifying Polish agitation and winning the opinion of Europe for Russia. Russia was prepared to make some concessions, but was unyielding in the question of strict control over the Churches by the state. After twenty conferences (19 November 1846 to 1 March 1847), agreement was reached on some points, including the question of appointment of bishops. But the representatives of the Tsar again refused to discuss the suppression of the Uniate Church in the Ukraine. They insisted on demands unacceptable to Rome, among them those concerning mixed marriages and contacts of the bishops with Rome.

---

[12] Acta Gregorii XVI III, 224; see also Allocuzione . . . , 3–4; the exposé of the secretariat of state, ibid., 5–19.

An impasse was reached, and both the Tsar and Lambruschini were willing to break off the negotiations. But the more conciliatory Nesselrode implored the delegates to resume their talks after a certain interval. At the same time the same opinion was voiced in Rome by a commission of cardinals headed by Pius IX. Considering that the Catholic Church in Russia was facing an extreme emergency situation, the opportunity for an ever so limited improvement should not be allowed to pass. Consequently, negotiations were resumed on 15 June and by 3 August 1847 led to a settlement. It listed all points on which the two parties had agreed, as well as those on which agreement had not been reached and which were reserved for future discussions.[13] A completely satisfying concordat was still a long way off, but at least a clear break was made with the policy of unilateral decisions, followed by the Tsars since the beginning of the eighteenth century. The agreement, which Nicholas I in the absence of a better one ultimately signed, could be viewed as a success by the Holy See.

Yet the particular conditions made normalization difficult, the more so as after initial proofs of good will the administrative chicaneries increased as soon as the fears raised by the revolutions of 1848–49 dissipated. Even graver was the government's tactic of appointing to higher offices prelates who for reasons of cowardice or ambition were willing to do the government's bidding. Finally, in the 1860s, after the Crimean War, slavophile influences replaced the party friendly toward Rome, and a campaign for the conversion of Latin Catholics to the

---

[13] Text in S. Olszamowska, op. cit., 790–802; attached documents, ibid., 779–807. The bull set the new diocesan areas in the Russian Empire by applying the Convention according to which the diocesan borders coincided with those of the provinces and a new diocese of Cherson for the south of Russia was created, where many Catholics of German extraction lived; it was published on 3 July 1848 (Acta Pii IX. I, 134–49). The agreement also regulated the condition of the Uniate Armenians, especially those living in the Caucasus (see Ammann, 517–18 and M. Tamarti, L'Église géorgienne [Rome 1910]).

Orthodox Church was begun.[14] There was no doubt that in the eyes of many Russians the western provinces of the Empire were seen as foreign bodies as long as Catholicism, which was called the "Polish faith," continued to exist. Even the insufficient attempts to adhere to the concordat were justification for the convinced Orthodox Russians to emphasize all those points which gave them reason for their opposition to "Romanism." This attitude produced a number of controversies among the intellectuals[15] until the end of the century. They are reflected in Dostoevski's Idiot (1868), where Prince Myshkin evaluates Catholicism as worse than atheism.

As for Poland, the tsarist government understood that it could not eliminate Latin Catholicism, but was nevertheless determined to control all ecclesiastical life as much as possible. It kept episcopal sees vacant and tried to limit the contacts between bishops and Rome to a minimum. It forbade the bishops to convoke their priests in synods and to make public appeals in pastoral letters to the faithful. It intervened in the running of seminaries, which were badly off in any case owing to insufficient funds, and limited the number of postulants admitted to orders. At the beginning of 1862 the government created a committee for religion which strictly separated Catholics, Orthodox, Protestants, and Jews and, ignoring canon law and the Convention of 1847, deprived ordinaries of a majority of their jurisdiction.

It was not so much a matter of persecution of a denomination as one of regalistic practices. These had been a matter of course during the Old Regime in all of Europe, but in view of the developments in the Catholic world, for which the Austrian concordat of 1855 was a benchmark, appeared anachronistic and offensive. Thus, it was not surprising that priests and regular clergy, who had expected a democratic government to free the Church from its fetters, increasingly made common cause with the leftist opposition, which in addition to propagating social reforms knew how to exploit the Polish nationalism of the lower clergy. In spite of the reserved attitude of the Holy See and the episcopate, these patriotic priests with their revolutionary agitation discredited the Catholic Church and strengthened the distrust of the Russian officials and encouraged them to take stronger action against the Church. Yet, in spite of the growing discontent, the resistance of the Catholic people was not strong enough. The mass of the rural population did not comprehend the extent of the violations of canon law brought about by governmental decrees. Most important, however, was the absence of any foundation on which a movement analogous to the Irish struggle for the emancipation of Catholics or to the resistance of the German Catholics to the Kulturkampf after 1870 could have developed. In this police state there were no political platforms, no newspapers, nor any other means by which information could have been disseminated. Additionally, many episcopal sees were either vacant or occupied by incompetent men who were willing to accept a mutilated canon law to the extent that their ecclesiastical training was determined by Josephinism and Febronianism. Finally, a number of the upper clergy, often of aristocratic origin, partially for reason of social conservatism, partially for reason of hostility to the Germans, regarded collaboration with Russia as the lesser evil.

---

[14] Boudou II, 347–98.

[15] Some details in Winter, Rußland II, 274–78.

The Holy See, very well informed of the difficulties of the Church in Poland by emigrants[16] and its numerous contacts in the Hapsburg Empire, repeatedly protested to the Russian embassy at Rome against the violations of the 1847 agreement. At the same time, the Holy See tried to establish a nunciature at Saint Petersburg, in the expectation that it would facilitate the solution of many local problems and the supervision of the efforts of the Polish clergy, which the Holy See frequently regarded as unfortunate. The more liberal attitude of the new Tsar, Alexander II, seemed to justify such hopes during the initial period of his rule, and, in fact, negotiations had reached a promising state by 1862. But the Polish rebellion of 1863–64 once again put everything in question and thereafter relations between Rome and Saint Petersburg grew chillier.

The reaction by the Russian government to the assistance provided the rebels by the clergy was very strong[17] More than four hundred clerics, including several bishops, were deported to Siberia. Of 197 monasteries, 114 were closed; because the regular clergy was strongly allied with the rebels, bans of processions and pilgrimages multiplied, as did police surveillance of sermons and the confessional. Between 1866 and 1869, three dioceses were dissolved without the consent of Rome and were attached to neighboring dioceses.

---

[16] In addition to the very active political role of the Polish emigrants during the second third of the nineteenth century, some efforts of a religious nature are notable, for example the founding of the Congregation of the Resurrectionists in 1836 in Paris, which set as its task the Christianization of socialist radicalism. Pius IX entrusted the Bulgarian mission to the Resurrectionists, who also became active among the Polish immigrants of the United States and Canada. They also originated the founding of the Polish College at Rome (1866) (see L. Long, The Resurrectionists [Chicago 1947] and W. Kwiatkowski, O. Piotr Semenenco, C.R. [Vienna 1952]).

[17] See, for example, K. Gadacz, "Capucins déportés pour leur participation à l'insurrection en 1863," Miscellanea Melchor de Pobladura II (Rome 1964), 455–82. On the national and religious agreement, see R. Bender in Roczniki Humanistyczne 7 (Lublin 1960), 257–88. Outside of the Church, Polish nationalism was born in Freemasonry, but it developed chiefly among the upper classes, from which, until the end of the nineteenth century, the majority of the clergy emerged. The clergy in turn increasingly influenced the rural population, which until then had shown little interest in national affairs.

Pius IX harbored as little sympathy for revolutionaries as Gregory XVI; but the brutality of the Russian reprisals against the Church angered him. On 24 April 1864 he lodged a strong protest. A complete rupture of diplomatic relations was delayed by Austrian mediation, but when the situation continued to deteriorate, the Pope again complained in a speech on 29 October 1866. It had been drafted by a commission of cardinals and was accompanied by rich documentation for the press.[18] On 4 December the Russian government replied by revoking the concordat. In May 1867 it decreed that in the future all contacts of the bishops, including the Polish ones, with Rome were to be subject to official control by the Roman Catholic College at Saint Petersburg. The majority of the bishops was willing to comply with the new regulation, but the Pope described it as incompatible with the divine constitution of the Church.[19] In 1869 the administrator of Mogilev, Monsignor Staniewski, was excommunicated because he failed to take account of this condemnation. The Russian government in turn forbade the bishops of Russia and Poland to attend the Vatican Council. After the council, attempts were made by several factions to start a movement in favor of establishing a separate Slavic Catholic Church with a Latin rite, modeled after the Old Catholics. The project was utopian and the Russian government paid hardly any heed to it. On the other hand, it effectively assisted the campaign of some Ukrainian priests led by Michael Popiel. Blinded by the prestige of the Orthodox Church and their own anti-Polish sentiments, they tried to attach to the Russian Orthodox Church the only Uniate Church, that of Chelm, still existing in Poland.[20]

The matter was started in 1865 by a legitimate effort, but which, given the circumstances, was nothing more than a threadbare ruse. Initially, the Ruthenian rite was cleansed of all the Latinisms which had crept in since the Council of Zamosc. It was hoped that the removal of anything which provided the Uniates with a structure of their own would facilitate their conversion to Orthodoxy. The reforms were carried out without consideration of Roman objections. When the soil had been prepared, Popiel, whom the government had entrusted with the administration of the diocese, did not hesitate to call on the police in order to break the resistance of some Catholics loyal to Rome. After a petition campaign which was supported by two-thirds of the clergy, he announced at the beginning of 1875 the "reunion of the Uniate Greeks with the Holy Orthodox Eastern Church, the Church of our forefathers."

---

[18] Text: L'Esposizione documentata, 303–6.

[19] Encyclical Levate of October 17, 1867: Acta Pii IX IV, 371–78.

[20] Details in Boudou II, 105–14, 263–74, 399–447.

The Russian government, which since 1870 seemed to be interested in improving relations with Rome, from which it expected a pacifying influence on Poland, made a gesture of good will. It announced its willingness to reform the Roman Catholic College at Saint Petersburg in a way acceptable to the Holy See. But renewed attempts in 1877 to introduce the Russian language into the religion, as well as the discovery by the British during the Russo-Turkish war of police measures against the Uniates who refused to bend to the dictates of the "robber synod of Chelm," occasioned another Roman protest.[21] It led to the final break between the two parties.

On balance, however, the situation was not as negative for Poland as it might seem. While the rationalistic influence of the Enlightenment was long in evidence among the educated people, the upper levels of society, who recognized the pacifying influence of the Church in relation to revolutionary social demands, experienced a development very similar to that which France had undergone a few decades earlier. This change of atmosphere, even though it was tied to certain interests, promoted a profound religious awakening. It was strengthened by the new wave of spirituality then coursing through all of Europe.

A more significant indication of the rejuvenation of the vitality of Catholicism was the development of the religious orders. Many among them bore unmistakable signs of decadence, which fully justified the measures taken by the Russian government. There were too many monasteries with too few people, and there was a lack of novice-masters. Violations of seclusion regulations and the vow of poverty and the admittance of candidates who had no real vocation and merely wished to escape military service were very frequent. On the other hand, the Capuchins, especially in Warsaw, performed extremely valuable work in the areas of piety—particularly as it concerned the Virgin Mary—charity, and social work. After the middle of the century, there were also numerous new foundings of women's congregations, as for example those of the Felicians[22] in 1856. The movement continued even after the setbacks of 1864. The Capuchin Honorat Kominski (1829–1916), for example, founded about twenty secret Tertian congregations which, in order to avoid a ban by the government, wore civilian clothes while teaching and devoting themselves to the social apostolate among the workers.[23]

---

[21] Memorandum by Cardinal Simeoni of 26 July 1877 on "the greatest injustices under which the Catholic Church suffers in Russia and Poland," and encyclical to the nuncios of 20 October 1877 (Text in L'Univers, 20 January 1878).

[22] DHGE XVI, 855–59; CollFr 37 (1967), 343–65.

The Slavs in Austria-Hungary

As a country of nationalities on the borders of the Slavic world, the Hapsburg Empire was a place of encounter and also conflict between Eastern and Western Christendom. In 1870, the Empire comprised 24 million Latin Catholics, 3.5 million Protestants, 4 million Catholics of the Eastern rite, and 3 million Orthodox. The last two enjoyed freedom of religion and of organization, but both the government and the Catholic hierarchy hoped that they would return to Rome.

In Croatia, where the Orthodox comprised 30 percent of the population and were in close contact with their brethren still under Turkish domination, unionist efforts were embodied by Monsignor J. G. Stroßmayer, Bishop of Diakovar from 1849 to 1905. A conscientious prelate and ardent patriot, he had gradually become the moral leader of the Croatian opposition to the Magyar oligarchy. Instead of becoming involved in fruitless political battles, he preferred to advance the Slavic cause on the cultural level. He employed a majority of his high income to subsidize journals and publications on Slavic literature, history, and folklore and to give his country two important institutions, an academy (1867) and a university (1874). His contributions earned him an incomparable popularity among all Slavs of the south, Orthodox and Catholic alike. He intended to use his popularity to gain his second objective, the unification of the Churches. As far as he was concerned, this union was the prerequisite for the adoption of Western culture by the Slavs without risk. In order to facilitate an approach, he favored the Roman liturgy in Old Slavic and at the Vatican Council suggested a policy of decentralization of the Church. But his irenic way of approaching the problem of unifying the divided Christians met a favorable echo in Rome only during the pontificate of Leo XIII.

At the other end of the Empire, the growth of Pan-Slavism and the resultant tension between Austria and Russia had repercussions on the Ruthenian Church of Galicia. Its leader, Monsignor Lewicki, after 1813 archbishop of Lvov, was created cardinal in 1856; this dignity had not been awarded to a prelate of the Eastern rite since the sixteenth century. The clergy, cognizant since 1848 of the humiliating condition which Poland had imposed on the Ruthenian people, increasingly devoted itself to the political struggle in the name of Ukrainian nationalism. Some saw in it a means to regroup all Uniates on both sides of the border for a more effective resistance to the attractions of Russian Orthodoxy, but others, especially among the young, began to view Orthodox Russia as the protector of the Slavs. With the secret support of tsarist agents they viewed with sympathy the efforts of Michael Popiel in the diocese of Chelm, because after the concordat of 1855, which was binding for all Catholics of the Empire, the tendency to adjust Eastern ecclesiastical regulations to Latin canon law was intensified under pressure from the Vienna government.

---

[23] K. Gorski in Roczniki teologiczno-kanoniczne 11 (1964), 5–50.

In this atmosphere, the century-old controversies between the clerics of both rites could not but become aggravated,[24] but the resistance of the Ruthenian clergy to the Latin pressures of Poland served to tighten the connection between Church and people. With the consent of the nuncio, the Galician bishops worked out a sensible plan for an agreement, which was presented to the Holy See in 1853. Regrettably, Rome did not make an immediate decision, and soon the situation worsened again when both sides accused one another of proselytism, especially in connection with mixed marriages. Only in 1863, under the impact of the Polish revolution, was an agreement finally reached.[25]

The Ruthenian dioceses of Podcarpathia, living in complete peace until the middle of the century, now also began to feel the effects of nationalistic agitation. For it was at this time that an effort was started in liturgy to substitute Hungarian for those Magyars who no longer understood Old Slavic.[26] The government in Budapest, interested in weakening the influence of Slavism in its territory, supported these efforts, while the Russophile propaganda was encouraging the awakening of Slavic consciousness and obtained a number of conversions to the Orthodox religion.

The Uniate Rumanians of Transylvania had to thank the hostility to the Orthodox Serbs for many conversions. Upon the suggestion of the bishop of Grosswardein, Monsignor Erdeli (1843–62), two new dioceses were established together with an autonomous province with its capital at Fogaras.[27] The reorganization of this Church was undertaken in close cooperation between Rome and the Rumanian Uniate hierarchy. In 1858, the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith directed three instructions concerning marriage law to the hierarchy, asking for urgent reforms.[28] A Roman delegation headed by the Vienna nuncio went to Transylvania in order to examine the situation which had become doubtful in light of the right of the Emperor, acknowledged in the concordat of 1855, to intervene in various matters, including the election of bishops. After conferences between Monsignor De Luca and the Rumanian bishops it was decided to hold a provincial council. After some delay, but well prepared by the new Metropolitan Ioan Vancea (1868–92), an extremely active prelate with Roman training, and Monsignor J. Papp-Szilaggi, the author of one of the few handbooks on Eastern canon law of the sixteenth century,[29] the council met in Blaj in May of 1872. Its decrees[30] were well considered and complete. In addition to this juridical rejuvenation, the clergy continued its efforts in the pastoral and cultural areas by becoming the ardent defender of the Rumanian language and national idea in the face of Magyar domination.

---

[24] Some examples in Winter, Byzanz, 162–64.

[25] ColLac II, 561–66.

[26] C. Korolevský, Liturgie en langue vivante (Paris 1955), 44–46.

[27] Bull of 26 November 1853 (Mansi XLII, 619–26; see also 638–40).

[28] Mansi XLII, 645–708.

Progress of Catholicism in Southeastern Europe and the Levant

In 1860 it looked for a moment as though a new Uniate Church were to be established in Bulgaria. Faced with the consistent refusal of the Phanariot to allow the Bulgarians to have their own bishops as a first step to their cultural and political emancipation, the Polish Committee in Paris began to suggest that the Bulgarians could expect their religious emancipation only from the Pope; they propagated the union with Rome under the condition that Old Slavic be retained as the liturgical language. Pius IX was well disposed toward the suggestion; after he had personally consecrated the aged Hegumenos, J. Sokolski, as archbishop of the Uniate Bulgarians in April 1861, a conversion movement was started in which politics played as much of a role as did religion. But the intervention of Russia, which desired the emancipation of Bulgaria for Russia's benefit, and the tactlessness of the apostolic delegate, Monsignor Brunoni,[31] soon nipped the movement in the bud. After the mysterious disappearance of Sokolski only a small flock was left, entrusted by Pius IX to the Assumptionists of Father d'Alzon and to the Polish [29] Published in Latin: Enchiridion juris Ecclesiae orientalis catholicae (Grosswardein 1862).

---

[30] Mansi XLII, 463–710. The Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, which forbade any mention of the Councils of Photius, of the Nomokanones, and of the Byzantine canonists, finally gave its approval in 1881. The Roman authorities had already been dissatisfied with the positions of the diocesan synod of Blaj in 1868, a synod which pointed to the collegial structure of the Church and which assigned a significant role in the Church to the laity (see de Clercq II, 632–34).

[31] This story, writes C. Dumont, "makes clear the degree to which some persons in the Latin Church at that time failed to understand anything which legitimized the loyalty of our Eastern brethren to their own traditions" (I. Sofranov, op. cit., X).

Resurrectionists. When a new Bulgarian bishop was finally appointed four years later, the opportunity had passed.

During the events in Bulgaria, the conversion in 1861 of Archbishop Meletios in Greece raised hopes which were just as false, as the Greeks remained unshakeably true to their national religion. When as a consequence of the growing number of Catholics in Athens and Piraeus Pius IX in 1875 established an archbishopric in Athens, it was as a diocese with Latin rite, whose followers, overwhelmingly of Western descent, were viewed as an alien element by the Greeks.

In all areas which for centuries had been under Ottoman domination, Catholicism of the Latin rite made progress during the second third of the nineteenth century; today, this progress seems very questionable to us, but in its own time it was very significant.

In Rumania, autonomy grew until the establishment of an independent monarchy in 1866. In the same way the activity of the regular clergy in Moldavia increased in spite of the occasionally justified criticism leveled against it, and within a period of fifty years increased the number of faithful from forty-eight thousand to seventy-five thousand. In the liberal atmosphere prevailing in 1859 during the reorganization of the Polish status of the principalities, the Catholics were granted civil and political equality. In 1864 the government, which wished to end the Austrian protectorate over the Catholics, even planned a concordat with the Holy See. But sensitivitiy on the part of the Orthodox did not permit the replacement of the apostolic visitor by the establishment of a diocese at Jassy before 1884. In the preceding year an archbishopric had been established in Bucharest,[32] after the number of Catholics in Wallachia, insignificant until the middle of the century, had grown tenfold within a few decades. The reorganization of the Catholic Church in the new kingdom was facilitated by the benevolence of King Carol.

But this progress on the level of institutions should not lead to false conclusions. The spiritual tension between the national Orthodox Church and the Catholic minority continued. The majority of the Latin clergy were foreigners and the mission of the Conventuals in Moldavia was accused of being a tool of Magyarization. In fact, there were people who, with reference to the Hungarian descent of a part of the Catholic population, for a long time tried to entrust the mission to Hungarian members of the order and to withdraw it from the authority of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in order to place it directly under the ecclesiastical administration of Hungary. The government of the new kingdom in its striving for national independence insisted on the training of a native clergy, a demand which as early as 1842 had been acknowledged as justified by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. The Conventuals, however, jealous of their privileges, thwarted the opening of a seminary until 1866 by claiming to have financial difficulties. For some time in this area, in which the priests because of their low numbers were not able to minister regularly to the faithful, who lived dispersed in many villages, a native organization had grown, the lay didascales. These were not only catechists and sacristans, but they also conducted Sunday prayer services, conducted funerals, and took the place of missionaries in civil matters. But as most of them were former seminarians from Transylvania and partisans of the Hungarian cause, the efforts to train the Rumanian didascales was persistently thwarted by the Hungarian Conventuals. It was accomplished only in the final years of the century.

---

[32] See DHGE X, 1011–12.

In Bosnia, which until 1878 belonged to the Ottoman Empire, the long conflict between Vicar Apostolic Barišić and the Croatian Franciscans, who defended the South Slavic idea against Austria's influence, was solved in 1847 by dividing the country into the two vicariates of Bosnia (one hundred twenty-five thousand faithful) and Herzegovina (thirty-five thousand faithful.)[33] In the expectation of the establishment of a regular hierarchy, which was erected between 1878 and 1881, an increase in the number of monasteries was allowed; in 1878 there were ten, instead of the four of thirty years earlier. However, the Catholics in these areas remained isolated and had only a small share in the improvement of the legal position of the Christians in the Ottoman Empire as a result of the decrees of 1839 and 1856.

At Constantinople and the ports of the Levant, the Catholic presence as well as the activity of Protestant missions was no longer concealed. In 1839, the new sultan, Abdul Mejid, following the advice of his liberal grand vizier, published the Hatti Sherif of Gulhané, which promised to all, regardless of religion or sect, complete safety of their lives, their honor, and their property. He wanted the Western powers to feel obligated and to assure himself of the loyalty of the Christians. The application of this regulation often was only theoretical, especially in the Balkan countries. But a first step toward emancipation had been taken, of particular benefit to the Uniate communities.

The Crimean War and the resultant Hatti-Humayun of 1856 produced another noticeable improvement in the legal position of the Christians, which improved even further after the Syria expedition of 1860. The holding of the regional Council of Smyrna in 1869, which brought together the Latin episcopate of Greece and the Greek islands, the vicar apostolic of Constantinople, and the archbishop, would have been unthinkable twenty years earlier.[34] Nevertheless, the steady growth of the missions founded by religious congregations, most of which were of French origin, was surprising.[35] In close contact with the French consuls, who under the Third Republic were even more concerned with limiting Italian influence in the Near East than under the Second Empire, the activity of the Lazarists, of the Christian Brothers, of the Sisters of Charity, and of the Sisters of Saint Joseph increased; they were joined by the Assumptionists, the Ladies of the Sacred Heart, the Sisters of Notre Dame of Zion, and many other congregations. The Jesuits of Beirut were especially active. In an attempt to protect the educated classes from the Protestant influence, they founded a modern publishing company which published Arab translations of Western religious tracts; they also established a large Catholic newspaper, the Al-Bashir (1871), and finally a modern college which in 1881 became the University of Saint Joseph.

---

[33] See I. Kecmanovic, Barisiceva afera (Sarajevo 1957).

Incidentally, no matter how great the zeal of its members may have been, these missions contributed much more to the spread of French culture than of Christianity. And if their spiritual and intellectual abilities, coupled with the prestige of the West, enabled these institutions to take hold in the Eastern communities, it must still be admitted that the Latin Catholics of the Near East, whose numbers increased very satisfactorily, were for the most part foreigners. They came primarily from Malta and Italy, and as they grew in numbers they were increasingly regarded as alien intruders. But at the time their progress was greeted in Rome with joy, and the Holy See tended to see in their growth the future of Catholicism in the East. In order to coordinate the multifaceted missionary work and to assure Rome of control over the organization of the various Catholic communities in the Ottoman Empire, the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith put its hope in the work of the apostolic delegates. It also continued to send out visitors who supervised the implementation of reforms and reported back to Rome. The most active representative of the Roman and Latin presence in the East was Monsignor Giuseppe Valerga,[36] after 1847 Latin patriarch of Jerusalem and after 1858 apostolic delegate to Syria; he bent all of his efforts toward a policy of centralization which the Holy See practiced with respect to the Uniate patriarchates.[37]

---

[34] ColLac VI, 565–91.

[35] See a concrete example of this growth by leaps and bounds of missionary congregations between 1840 and 1890 in the article "Alexandrie" in DHGE II, 364–65.

[36] On Giuseppe Valerga (1813–72), see the unedited dissertation of S. Manna (Pont. Istituto Orientale in Rome, 1969). Also, de Montclos, 533–34; Hajjar, 279–81.

The Eastern Patriarchates

In the course of the third quarter of the nineteenth century two developments characterized the Uniate Churches. There was a quantitative growth and with it a continuation of institutional consolidation, but there was also the threat of new schisms as a result of Rome's intensified policy of centralization. This policy of the pontificate of Pius IX expressed itself in the interference of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in the elections of patriarchs and bishops, in the alteration of decisions of the local synods, and in the introduction of reforms in traditional institutions. It also showed itself in the activity of the apostolic delegates in favor of an accommodation of Eastern ecclesiastical regulations to those of the Latin West.

This could be noted particularly in the Armenian Church. Numerous conversions, especially in Constantinople, raised the total number of the faithful in Turkey to about one hundred twenty thousand by 1870. Allowing for this progress, Pius IX in 1850 had created six new dioceses in northern Asia Minor and subordinated them to the primate archbishop of Constantinople. This archbishop, Monsignor Hassun, with enterprising energy and with the assistance of the Jesuits and other Western missionaries as well as the Armenian Congregation of Antonites, who were experiencing an incomparable growth, increased the number of churches and schools several times over. In order to crown this progress with a uniform canon discipline[38] and a further improvement in the relations between Turkey and Rome, the Holy See after the death of the patriarch of Cilicia decided in 1866 to fuse the two supra-episcopal jurisdictions by the election of Monsignor Hassun as patriarch. But this very step, which seen from the Roman point of view would promote the cohesion of the Armenian Church, in fact caused a great crisis. The reason was that the document which reorganized the Armenian patriarchate, the famous bull Reversurus, also and fundamentally altered the Eastern laws with respect to the privileges of the patriarch and the method of election of the bishops. The upper crust of the laity after 1850 repeatedly had complained about the virtual abolition of its right of participation; now it protested again, supported by clergy and bishops who also accused the patriarch of despotism in the leading of his Church and too much subservience to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. The opposition became stronger at the council which the patriarch convoked at Constantinople from July to November 1869. While Hassun was attending the Vatican Council, a dissident movement was formed under the leadership of the superior of the Antonites, Monsignor Kasandschan. After the opposition declared Hassun deposed, it obtained recognition by the Turkish government as the true Armenian Church, and took over a number of churches and schools. The schism lasted for ten years, until Leo XIII in 1880 replaced Hassun, who had been created a Curia cardinal, with the more flexible Monsignor Azarian.

---

[37] He was also concerned with the return of a number of consecrated places in Palestine, which the Turks assigned to the Orthodox in the course of the eighteenth century. As is well known, the harsh discussions concerning the holy places were one of the reasons for the Crimean War, but de facto the status quo was maintained until the end of the nineteenth century (see B. Collin, Les lieux saints (Paris 1948); A. Popov, La question des lieux saints de Jérusalem dans la correspondance diplomatique russe, 2 vols. [St. Petersburg 1910–11]).

[38] A first step in this sense was attempted in 1851 by the patriarch of Cilicia, but the council convened by him for this purpose unified only the churches under his jurisdiction. The council's decrees (Mansi XL, 783–890), which strongly resembled those of the Maronite Council of 1736, were clumsily worded and thus not recognized by Rome.

The Chaldean Church was fortunate in being led between 1847 and 1878 by Joseph Audo, an energetic and dynamic person, even though he was an only moderately educated patriarch. After 1856 it also had the assistance of the French Dominicans of Mossul. At the Council of Rabban Hurmuz[39] in 1853 the Church for the first time codified its canon discipline in a Latin form under the influence of the apostolic delegate, the Jesuit Planchet. Within a period of twenty-five years it grew from forty thousand members to sixty thousand, but was shaken after 1860 by the increasingly fierce conflict between Audo and the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. Rome objected to the patriarch extending his jurisdiction to the Chaldeans of Malabar, who since the seventeenth century had been under Latin sovereignty.[40] After a preliminary settlement of the question in 1863 and the recall of the apostolic delegate, who had exceeded his instructions, the struggle was renewed when the applicability of the bull Reversurus was extended to the Chaldeans by the constitution Cum ecclesiastica disciplina[41] of 31 August 1869. Furthermore, the resentment caused by the Vatican Council was still smoldering. The Chaldean episcopate split into two groups, and in 1876 the aged and ill-advised Audo was about to break with Rome. But the loyalty of the old patriarch to Catholicism and a gesture of peace by Pius IX were able to prevent this catastrophe at the last moment.

---

[39] J. Vosté, op. cit., 35–76.

[40] For details, see C. Korolevsky in DHGE V, 326–35, 343–49.

[41] De Martinis, Ius pont. VI/2, 32–35.

The Syrian Church did not have to go through such a crisis, even though a tense atmosphere lasted throughout the pontificate of Pius IX. The founding of the patriarchate by Antonius Samhiri (1854–66), which was occasioned by the Council of Sarfeh in 1853,[42] was accompanied by some disagreements and some new efforts. It laid the basis for the future of the Syrian Church, whose center was transferred from Aleppo to Mardin upon the request of Rome. But the succeeding patriarch, Philipp Arqus (1866–74), was hesitant and assumed a very vague and waiting stance in view of the uncertainties caused by the bull Reversurus and the Vatican Council.

The patriarch of the Melchites, Mazlum, heatedly opposed Roman interference with the rights of the patriarch. After the deaths of Gregory XVI and Cardinal Litta, who had personally known and trusted the patriarch, violent clashes took place, especially as the authoritarian and power-hungry Mazlum caused some of his opponents within his own Church to ally themselves with the Western partisans of a systematic Latinization. The Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith succeeded in having Clement Bahut (1856–64) chosen as Mazlum's successor. Bahut was very loyal to Rome, where he had studied, but he was more of an ascetic than a man of action. His ineptitude created a schism in his Church, but fortunately it was of short duration. It was caused by a question of seemingly secondary importance, but it once again illuminated the policy of adaptation to the Latin discipline which was pursued by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. In 1836 and 1837, the Syrian and the Chaldean Church had adopted the Gregorian calendar in order to disavow the schismatics. Upon the request of the Propaganda, Bahut decreed the same step in 1857, but met strong opposition. The metropolitan of Beirut, Riachi, angry at Rome because he had not been chosen as patriarch, exploited the unrest and with the assistance of the Russian Orthodox mission formed his own community.

Fortunately, the massacres of 1860, in which the Druses were responsible for almost as many cruelties among the Melchites as among the Maronites, put an end to the squabbles. Everything was put right again by Bahut's conciliatory successor, the eminent Gregory Yussef (1864–97). One of his greatest concerns was the improvement in the education of the local clergy, which was still inadequate in spite of Mazlum's efforts. Through the establishment of native schools, designed as a counterweight to the education provided by the Protestants, he tried to counter the annoyance caused by the schools maintained by certain Latin missionaries for the Churches of the Eastern rite. But he did not convene a council, in spite of the advantages which would have accrued to his reorganization, because he would have required the help of Rome and did not wish to ask for it. There was no doubt that Yussef, although he was a former student of the college of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith at Rome, was convinced by the bull Reversurus and the undifferentiated program of the neo-ultramontanes at the Vatican Council that Rome desired the destruction of the traditional privileges of the patriarchs. The reorganization of the Melchite Church had been started by the Council of Jerusalem, but its decrees had not been ratified by the Holy See during the time of the sharp conflict with Mazlum.

---

[42] Which, complemented by the Council of Aleppo (1866), attempted to achieve a certain uniformity in canonical and liturgical discipline, which until then was rather vague; but it did not produce final results (Texts in de Clercq II, 1037–72, 1072–93).

The Maronite Church suffered heavily from the revolt of the Lebanese peasants against the feudal domination of the sheiks and the Druse massacres in 1845 and 1860.[43] But the decline of the civilian leadership ultimately turned the patriarchate into the most important political power of the country. For half a century it was guided by Paul Masad (1854–1890), who combined great leadership qualities with considerable erudition. He opened his pontificate in 1856 with a national council[44] at Bkerke under the chairmanship of the apostolic delegate; the council was attended by the superiors of the three Maronite orders, which at this time comprised about eighteen hundred members and eight hundred priests. The long-standing and close connection with France, the strong protector of Lebanon, prepared the ground for a good understanding with the Latin missionaries. The disagreements caused by the bull Reversurus and by the definitions of the Vatican Council only slightly disrupted the Maronite Church, whose connection with the Holy See went much further back in history than that of the other Uniates.[45] Regrettably, little is known to this day about the inner life, the pastoral work of the clergy, the religious life of the faithful, and the development of the monastic customs of this vital Church, as well as of the other Uniate Churches. It is hoped that research in the archives of the Church by native historians will soon throw more light on these topics.

---

[43] Concerning their actual nature, see de Montclos, 144–54.

[44] Text in de Clercq II, 1093–1135. Its files, like those of most other Eastern councils of the time, were not acknowledged by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith; it was increasingly obsessed with the idea of a fundamental reordering of Eastern discipline and its accommodation to Latin canon law.

[45] The patriarch did not hesitate to point out to Pius IX in polite but unmistakable form that these steps contradicted the solemn promises of Benedict XIV.

SECTION TWO

The Missions between 1840 and 1870

CHAPTER 12

The Strengthening of the Gregorian Restoration

The long pontificate of Pius IX, seen from the missionary point of view, was essentially a continuation of the reforms of Gregory XVI, but also an amplification. The actual work was done by Alessandro Barnabo (1801–74). Serving the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith since 1831, Pius IX in 1847 made him its secretary and chose him as its cardinal prefect in 1856. He had a strong sense of duty and was a conscientious administrator, but not even his contemporaries, let alone posterity, knew much about his many accomplishments.[1] Schmidlin mentions that Pius IX was responsible for the creation of thirty-three vicariates, fifteen prefectures, and three delegates for missions to the pagans, numbers which indicate the degree of Barnabo's intensive missionary activity.[2] Barnabo not only prepared all new foundings to the point of papal briefs and appointments, but also took care that missionary personnel were increased accordingly. Even the separation of the Eastern missions from the missions to the pagans, an act of importance for the future within the jurisdiction of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, can be traced back to Barnabo's preparations and suggestions.[3]

While during the first half of the nineteenth century new missionary institutes were established chiefly in France, it was Italy which became very much engaged in this area of activity during the second half of the nineteenth century. Until the twentieth century, all of the Italian foundations were rooted in the renewal and intensification of the religious life of the closing eighteenth and beginning nineteenth centuries, carefully nurtured through generations of outstanding priests and bishops.[4] This explains the fact that all new religious foundations, created and carried by the secular clergy, had an apostolic-missionary character. Some of the institutions, owing to the Italian revolutions, could become active only after a long period of preparation. So, for example, the Milan mission seminary was founded in 1850 by Monsignor Ramazotti, named bishop of Pavia in 1849. This seminary in organization and spirit was a duplicate of the Paris mission seminary and retained its exclusively missionary nature.[5]

---

[1] It is characteristic that there is no biography of this man who headed the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith for so many years. His selfless nature and his devotion to the dissemination of the faith can be seen in the modest obituary of 2 March 1874 in the archives of the Congregation (S. Cong. Cardinali, Segretarii . . ., vol. 3, 1850–92, 253–55; see DHGE VI, 858).

[2] Schmidlin, PG II, 226.

[3] In 1862, the Congregatio de Propaganda Fide pro negotiis ritus Orientalis was established with its own administration and its own secretary. At first still a part of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, it eventually became an independent body (JP VI/1, 381–86). Barnabo's obituary assigned responsibility for this change to him.

The foundations by Giovanni Don Bosco (1815–88) of the Oratory and in 1859 of the Society of Saint Francis de Sales (Salesians) were primarily directed to local religious and social needs, but the apostolic spirit soon carried members beyond the borders of Italy to all continents, where they took over individual missions and also worked successfully as educators and journalists.[6] Another institute, created solely for Africa, was that which Daniel Comboni founded in 1866 in northern Italy. It was the Mission Institute for Africa (Nigricia, as he called it), which later was transferred to Verona and in 1885 renamed the Society of the Sons of the Sacred Heart. The impetus for it came from the Sudan mission established in 1846 in central Africa and maintained largely by Austrian secular priests. Monsignor Comboni's interest was to provide it with a stable foundation.[7] In Rome in 1867, the papal seminary of Saints Peter and Paul was established; its members, active in China, were later combined with the Milan mission seminary.[8]

---

[4] A typical example are the Amicizie, religious secret societies which were modeled on the secret political and antireligious associations in Italy (C. Bona, I.M.C., Le Amicizie. Società segreta e rinascita religiosa (1770 a 1830), [Turin 1962]). The soul of these societies and this rejuvenation was the Swiss convert and ex-Jesuit N. J. A. von Dießbach (1732–98) (ibid., 1–230 [documents, 471–528]). The members of these secret religious societies of the eighteenth century became the initial promoters of the Italian missionary movement in the 19th century (C. Bona I.M.C., La Rinascita missionaria in Italia dalle "Amicizie" all'opera per la Propagazione della Fede [Turin 1964]).

[5] G. B. Tragella, Le Missioni Estere di Milano I (Milan 1950), 1–89.

[6] Heimbucher II, 392–99; E. Cervia, Annali della Società Salesiana 1841–1888 (Turin 1941); Pietro Stella, Don Bosco nella storia della religiosità cattolica, 2 vols. (Zurich 1968–69); see F. Desramaut, RHE 65 (1970), 926–33.

[7] H. Wohnhaas, Bischof Daniel Comboni, Apostolischer Vikar von Zentralafrika (Ellwangen 1937); Streit XVI, 714–18; Comboniani. Numero speciale di Nigrizia. Dic. 1962 (Verona).

[8] Other institutions of similar structure were created at Parma in 1895 (Xaveriani) and at Turin in 1901 (Missionari della Consolata) (G. B. Tragella, Italia Missionaria [Rome 1939]).

In France also new mission institutions came into being. Father Jules Chevalier in Issoudun established the Association of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, which devoted itself chiefly to the mission in the South Seas.[9] In 1856 some clerics at Lyon joined the former Paris missionary and bishop in India, Melchior de Marion Brésillac (1813–59), to form the Society for the African Mission for the conversion of the blacks. In 1858, the vicariate of Sierra Leone was entrusted to them, but within a year the bishop and his associates died of fever. Leadership at Lyon was assumed by the youthful Augustin Planque (1826–1907), who led the society through obstacles and sacrifices to a stable existence.[10] The Holy Ghost Fathers and the Lyon missionaries were able to send missionaries only to the coastal areas of East and West Africa, as they lacked the personnel for missions in the interior. The farseeing and energetic Cardinal Lavigerie (1825–92) became their apostle. In 1868 he established the Society of the White Fathers, organized their first caravans to the interior of the continent, and fostered the work of the missionaries with his practical and prudent directives.[11] In 1860 Pius IX confirmed the Society of Saint Francis de Sales (Salesians of Annecy), founded in 1833 at Annecy, which in 1845 had begun to send missions to Central Africa.[12]

The founding of two other important missionary societies took place at about the same time: the Belgian missionaries of Scheut and the English missionaries of Mill Hill. In 1862, a number of Belgian secular priests offered themselves to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith for work in the missions. With them Theophile Verbist founded the Congregation of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (at Scheut/Brussels) and selected Mongolia for its work; he died there in 1868.[13] The English Society of Saint Joseph (Missionaries of Mill Hill/London), founded in 1866 by the future Cardinal Herbert Vaughan, concentrated on the mission to the blacks in the United States. In 1892 it became an autonomous organization in America, but also extended its work to British colonies.[14]

---

[9] G. Goyau, La France missionaire II, 393–458.

[10] Ibid. II, 255–302; F. F. Guilcher, Un apôtre d'Afrique au XIX^{e} siècle, Augustin Planque 1826–1907. Premier Supérieur Général de la Société des Missions de Lyon (Lyon 1928).

[11] G. Goyau, op. cit. II, 303–63; J. Perraudin, Lavigerie, ses principes missionaires (Fribourg 1941); X. de Montclos, Lavigerie, le Saint Siège et l'Église de l'avènement de Pie IX à l'avènement de Léon XIII (Paris 1965).

[12] G. Goyau, op. cit. II, 390–91.

[13] V. Rondelez, C.I.C.M. Scheut, Congrégation missionnaire. Ses origines—ses débuts (Brussels 1960); J. Fleckner, S.V.D., "Hundert Jahre Missionare von Scheut," NZM 18 (1962), 220–22.

[14] Heimbucher II, 621–23; H. Brugger, Der erste Josefs-Missionar und sein Werk (Brixen 1941; concerning Cardinal Vaughan and the development of the society).

Beginning in the middle of the nineteenth century, after freedom of religion and proselytization were guaranteed in a large number of Asian states, the emphasis of the missions was placed on education and charity. For this reason it was natural to involve the Christian Brothers, especially the followers of Saint Jean-Baptiste de la Salle, in the Asian missions. In 1859 they began to work in India and gradually extended their activity to other countries as well.[15]

The imposing number of new missionary institutions in this period could create the impression that the missions had enough personnel; comparisons with earlier periods show clearly, though, that these efforts were far from those of the Spanish and Portuguese during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.[16] Other mission areas were worked only feebly or not at all. For this reason it was significant that earlier orders, whose apostolic impulses had grown feeble, renewed their missionary spirit.[17] The activity of the Holy Ghost Fathers is a case in point. By opening apostolic schools, establishing a Portuguese province, and resuming missionary work in Angola, the Portuguese missions developed a fresh impetus.[18]

The Weakening of the Portuguese Patronage and the Reorganization of the Asian Missions

IN THE BRITISH SPHERE OF INFLUENCE

After the long period of struggle over the reorganization of ecclesiastical matters, especially in India, it could have been assumed that all seeds of discontent had been removed. Exactly the opposite occurred. The contrast between the patronage missionaries and the missionaries of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith grew increasingly intense. Even if the Goan unrest did not cause a schism in terms of canon law—obedience to the Pope was never in question—legal uncertainties constituted a heavy burden, especially in those areas where the interests of the two authorities clashed. A conciliatory step was taken by Portugal in 1849 when it recalled da Silva Torres, the archbishop of Goa. After arrival at Lisbon, he directed a letter of apology to Pius IX, who read it in open consistory and sent a friendly reply.[19] During the vacancy of the see, the bishop of Macao, Jeronimo da Matta, exercised episcopal functions in the areas assigned to the vicars apostolic of Ceylon and Bombay, triggering a protest from them. The struggle between adherents of the patronage and adherents of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith reached its climax with the siege of the church of Upper Mahim, in which the vicar apostolic of Bombay, Anastasius Hartmann, remained confined for weeks. In a letter of 12 April 1853 he informed the vicars apostolic of India of the events, and after receipt of their replies he sent a letter of protest in all of their names to the Holy See.[20] [15] G. Rigault, Histoire générale de l'Institut des Frères des Écoles Chrétiennes VIII: L'Institut en Europe et dans les pays de Missions (Paris 1951).

---

[16] For Spain, see L. de Aspurz, O.F.M.Cap., "Magnitud del esfuerzo misionero de España," MH III (1946), 99–173; for Portugal, J. Wicki, S.J., Liste der Jesuiten-Indienfahrer 1541–1758. Aufsätze zur portugiesischen Kulturgeschichte VII (Münster 1967), 252–450.

[17] The first reorganization of the Capuchin mission was conducted by Bishop A. Hartmann (W. Bühlmann, O.F.M.Cap. Pionier der Einheit. Bischof Anastasius Hartmann [Paderborn 1966], 200–210).

[18] A. Brasio, C.S.Sp., Spiritana Monumenta Historica I. Angola 2 (Pittsburgh-Louvain 1968). The Holy Ghost Fathers have been active in Portugal since 1869.

During the conflict the British authorities observed strict neutrality in keeping with their principle of not becoming involved in religious matters in India. Finally, though, they gave in to the pressures of the Goanese and denied Bishop Hartmann the church of Upper Mahim.[21] From Rome, the bishop had received only a temporizing reply which left him no option but to draw the consequences. "Inasmuch as they found support not even in Rome, the vicars apostolic could do nothing but resign."[22] In 1856 Bishop Hartmann returned to Europe. His willingness to turn over the vicariate of Bombay to the Jesuits and to devote himself to the organization of the Capuchin mission in the newly created position of a mission procurator allows the conclusion that this journey was the logical end result of the principles which he himself had enunciated in 1853. Was Bishop Hartmann the sacrificial victim for the complete reconciliation with Portugal? Based on the documents, the question can be answered neither in the negative nor in the affirmative. But certain indicators point in the direction of the affirmative, among them the quoted sentence from the letter of the bishop to Pius IX. He spoke from his heart, as in the hour of his greatest need he had not even received an answer to his many letters and cries for help.[23]

---

[19] The various documents are in Streit VIII, 168ff. Archbishop da Silva Torres became suffragan of Braga. Anastasius Hartmann issued the papal address and his letters in Latin with English translation and explanations (Monumenta Anastasiana I [Lucerne 1939], 678–700).

[20] The most comprehensive collection of sources for this and the subsequent years is the Monumenta Anastasiana II (Lucerne 1940), 3–1054. It also contains the text of the encyclical, 149–51.

[21] Ibid., 197–205.

[22] "Sed vicarii apostolici jure canonico sese defendere nequeunt, quum proinde neque in Roma assistentiam inveniant, aliud haut remanet, quam ut resignent" (Letter of 11 February 1853 to Pius IX), ibid., 32.

The concordat of 21 February 1857 with Portugal settled the confusion in India, albeit in favor of Portugal's patronage. The efforts of Gregory XVI, the regulation by Multa praeclare (1838), and Bishop Hartmann's warnings were to no avail.[24] The Portuguese bishoprics of Cochin, Mylapur, and Malacca (in addition to the archbishopric of Goa) were restored, and the jurisdiction of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith was recognized only for China and individual parts of Malacca. In fact, Portugal obtained the concession of establishing additional patronage bishoprics in India.[25]

In spite of the one-sided emphasis of the rights of patronage, the concordat of 1857 did not have any deleterious results for the Indian mission, in part because of the discretion exercised by the vicars apostolic, who tolerated the Goan communities in their dioceses and treated them generously according to their needs, in part because of the lack of Portuguese priests who might have ministered to the already established Christian communities and might also have won additional believers. Furthermore, with the experience of a century behind them, the British would not have liked to see an increased activity of the Portuguese; they placed no obstacles in the way of native Goan priests.

In close connection with the work of Bishop Hartmann and his secretary, future Bishop and Cardinal Ignatius Persico (1823–95), occurred an event which guided the Indian Church for many decades: a papal visitation. On 1 June 1858 the two Capuchin bishops directed a memorandum to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith concerning the deficiencies of the Indian mission and the means of removing them.[26] In order to counter the lack of unity among the vicars apostolic and the missionaries of the Propaganda, they suggested a papal visitation. In August of the same year Pius IX appointed the vicar apostolic of Pondicherry from the Paris mission seminary, Clement

---

[23] This situation was not changed by the brief of 9 May 1853 and Hartmann's appointment as vicar apostolic of Bombay or by his appointment in 1856 as assistant to the papal throne. The most recent biographer of Bishop Hartmann, W. Bühlmann, O.F.M.Cap. (Pionier der Einheit [Paderborn 1966], 121f.), believes that Hartmann became a victim of the struggle and differences between the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith and the Secretariat of State (Antonelli).

[24] The memorandum of 10 October 1856 concerning this question is in Monumenta Anastasiana III (Lucerne 1952), 668–87.

[25] T. Gentrup, S.V.D.,Jus Missionarium I (Steyl 1925), 211f. The brief judgment of the legal historian is: "Tota res in favorem Portugalliae fuit ad statum pristinum reducta" (ibid., 212). Concerning the various text editions of the concordat, see Streit VIII, 226–28.

[26] Monumenta Anastasiana IV (Lucerne 1946), 151–55.

Bonnand (1796–1861), as his visitor.[27] He was charged with examining the deficiencies as well as determining the means of removing them in the areas subject to the Propaganda, all to be included in a detailed report of his own writing. He started upon his task with courage and optimism, but was not able to finish it because he died of cholera at Benares in March 1861.[28] The vicar apostolic of Mysore, Monsignor Étienne Charbonneaux, carried the visit to its conclusion.

This visit of inspection was necessary not only in order to bring about greater harmony and cooperation among the visitors apostolic of various nationalities and orders, but also to instill renewed courage to persevere in the representatives of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, who after the victory of the Portuguese in the concordat of 1857 felt deserted and betrayed.[29] Within the Portuguese bishoprics there were at the time of the visitation the following dioceses under the direction of the Propaganda: in the west, Bombay and Poona under German Jesuits, whom Bishop Hartmann had invited in 1853, in the north the vast areas of the vicariates of Agra and Patna under Italian Capuchins, in the center Hyderabad and Visakhapatnam, the former under the new Milan mission seminary, the latter under the direction of the Oblates of Saint Francis de Sales of Annecy. In the south, the old Jesuit mission of Madura was revived; the Italian Jesuits worked in Mangalore. The Carmelites continued to minister to the two vicariates of Verapoly and Quilon, the Paris missionaries to Pondicherry, Mysore, and Coimbatore; there were also the earlier established vicariates of Madras, which later was taken over by Don Bosco's Salesians, and Calcutta under the Jesuits, who in 1856 were joined by the Holy Cross Fathers and in 1866 by the Milan missionaries in eastern Bengal. The suggestions of the visitors (establishment of a hierarchy and apostolic delegation) were implemented only after the pontificate of Pius IX.

Another point to which the visitors drew emphatic attention was the absence of a native clergy in the areas under the ministration of the [27] JP VI/1, 292–93. Concerning the visitation, see J. Waigand, Missiones Indiarum Orientalium S.C.P.F. concreditae, juxta visitationem apostolicam 1859–62 (Budapest 1940); A. Launay, Histoire des Missions de l'Inde II (Paris 1898), 356–427 (Visite Apostolique par Monseigneur Bonnand, Fin de son Épiscopat 1858–61).

---

[28] He was journeying to Patna, where A. Hartmann was working as vicar apostolic for the second time since 1860 (Monumenta Anastasiana IV [Lucerne 1946], 615).

[29] The assertion that Pius IX did not ratify the concordat of 1857 (Delacroix III, 212) out of consideration for the vicars apostolic does not agree with the bull of appointment of the new archbishop of Goa, J. C. d'Amorim Pessoa, and the accompanying letter of 22 March 1861, in which the concordat is not only cited as a fundamental agreement, but which gave the archbishop jurisdiction for six years over all areas which after the conclusion of the concordat were subject to the vicars apostolic (JP VI/1, 326–29).

Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith.[30] Aside from Pondicherry, where since the synod of 1844 the training of a native clergy was being undertaken with vigor and which at the time of the visitation numbered fifty Indian priests, seven vicariates had no native clergy, and the others only a few, most of them in the ranks of their own orders. Monsignor Bonnand in his visitation report deplored this fact with the words: Monachi monachos gignunt.[31] While this or that area doubtlessly still had to battle initial obstacles and for this reason could not yet engage in the training of a native clergy, the Propaganda acknowledged the justification of the reproof. On 8 September 1869,[32] in extensive instructions to the mission bishops, it reminded them not only of its own directives of 1845, but also demanded the formation of a capable native diocesan clergy.[33]

The lack of an Indian clergy had to be the more detrimental as the numerically strong Goan clergy theologically and ascetically held views which closely corresponded to those of the European missionaries. This was due chiefly to the excellent theological seminary at Rachol on the Salsette peninsula.[34] Its origins were the local Jesuit College of earlier times. After the expulsion of the Jesuits from India in 1759 by Pombal, Rachol became the central education institution for the clergy of Portuguese India. In spite of many a change in directors and occasional closings—depending on the political situation in Portugal—the seminary turned out a numerous and well-educated clergy. It was particularly the Archbishops da Silva Torres and d'Amorim Pessoa who introduced a better education. D'Amorim Pessoa reorganized the courses into a systematic three-year curriculum, wrote theological syllabi, and gave the seminary a library with seventy-three hundred volumes.[35]

The external difficulties of the Indian mission included the relationship to the colonial power. The English East India Company had absolutely no interest whatever in missionary activity. It required a direct order from London before the work of Anglican missionaries in 1833 and of non-British Protestant mission societies in 1834 was permitted. The Catholic Church, which had been active in the country for centuries, did not seem to exist at all. The unceasing efforts of the Capuchin Bishop Hartmann showed how difficult it was to obtain limited just treatment of the Catholics in India—there never was any talk of equality. In addition to personal representations in India, especially in Bombay, Hartmann in 1853 sent the English Jesuit G. Strickland and his secretary Ignatius Persico to Rome and London for the settlement of mission problems. Through oral and written efforts they obtained an official statement from the government in 1856 in the form of "Notes on the position of Roman Catholics in India."[36] In 1857 Hartmann journeyed to London and with his brochure Remarks on the Resolution of the Government of India upon the Catholic Affairs in India commented on the government's declarations.[37] Clearly and objectively he dealt with the question of the position of the Catholic bishops, the military chaplains and garrison priests, churches, schools, hospitals, and the unjust treatment of Catholic orphans. His efforts and those of other bishops were crowned with a minimum of success for the rest of the century.[38]

---

[30] C. Merces de Melo, S.J. The Recruitment and Formation of the Native Clergy in India (Lisbon 1955), 255–305; F. Coutinho, Le régime paroissial des diocèses du rite latin de l'Inde (Louvain 1958), 217–20; J. Humbert, S.J., Catholic Bombay, her Priests and their Training, 2 vols. (Bombay 1964; the 2nd volume deals with the priests between 1800 and 1928); E. Zeitler, S.V.D., "Die Genesis der heutigen Priesterbildung in Indien," In Verbo Tuo (Festschrift), (St. Augustin 1963), 321–53.

[31] F. Coutinho, op. cit., 219.

[32] CPF II, 21–28.

[33] Ibid., 21f.

[34] Merces de Melo, op. cit., 181–205.

[35] Ibid., 190.

When in the course of reorganization in 1834 the vicariate apostolic of Ceylon was set up, there were only sixteen priests, Goan Oratorians, for two hundred fifty thousand Catholics. The first bishops came from their ranks, but the initial fervor of the Goan priests declined. As a result of English pressure—Ceylon was English after 1796—augmented by pressure from the Catholics of Colombo, Rome was compelled to appoint a European as suffragan bishop. Considerately, an Oratorian, Orazio Bettachini (1810–56), was selected. Soon the Pope gave him jurisdiction over the northern part of Ceylon, the vicariate of Jaffna, established in 1847. In that same year he succeeded in gaining the cooperation of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate.[39]

After Bettachini had finally been named vicar apostolic of Jaffna (1849), Rome appointed the Italian Silvestrin Giuseppe Bravi (1813–62) as suffragan bishop of Colombo. The Oblates worked principally in Jaffna, the remaining Oratorians of Goa principally in Colombo.[40] In spite of all machinations, the native vicars apostolic remained loyal to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith; but intrigues and messengers from Goa so poisoned the atmosphere that ultimately there was only one solution: the replacement of the decreasing number of Goan priests with European missionaries.[41] In 1857 Bravi was named vicar apostolic, and in 1863 his fellow-Silvestrin Hilarion Sillani succeeded him.

---

[36] The text can be found in Monumenta Anastasiana II (Lucerne 1940), 238–53.

[37] Op. cit. III, (1942), 724–58.

[38] Thanks to his efforts, the monthly salary of the military chaplains was raised from 100 to 150 rupees, and a few decades later to 200–250, while in Hartmann's time the salary of a Protestant military chaplain or pastor was already 500–800 rupees (F. Coutinho, Le régime paroissial, 271–73).

[39] J. Rommerskirchen, O.M.I., Die Oblatenmission auf der Insel Ceylon im 19. Jahrhundert, 1847 bis 1893 (Hünfeld 1931).

[40] S. Semeria (1811–68), the first superior of the Oblates, in 1856 became suffragan bishop and in 1857 vicar apostolic of Jaffna. He was particularly interested in training a native clergy (N. Kowalsky, O.M.I., "Monsignor Semeria [Apostolischer Vikar von Jaffna 1857–68] zur Pflege des einheimischen Klerus," NZM VII (1951), 273–81).

One reason for the decline of the once flourishing mission of the native priests was the inability of the Goans to adapt to new conditions. While the Catholics with increasing urgency asked for English schools and English education, their priests obstinately clung to the Portuguese language and culture. At the same time the Catholics faced the task of becoming better acquainted with the Sinhalese and Tamil cultures of the country. Credit is due principally to the Oblates, especially E. C. Bonjean (1823–93), who at first was vicar apostolic of Jaffna (1868–83) and then archbishop of Colombo, that this education was provided and fostered.[42]

In the Kingdom of Burma, which gradually fell to England in the course of the nineteenth century, Italian Barnabites were active from 1722 to 1832. Because of lack of personnel and means, they transferred the mission to the Oblates of Mary of Turin, who, for the same reasons, were forced to abandon the mission in 1856.[43] The Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith immediately assigned the vast territory to the Paris mission seminary and appointed A. T. Bigandet (1813–94) as vicar apostolic.[44] He excelled not only as organizer of the Burmese Church, but as a scholar highly esteemed by King and people he also wrote a number of important books on linguistics and religion.[45] The division of the area into three dioceses,[46] earlier decided upon by the Propaganda in 1863, was implemented by him.[47] The Paris missionaries in northern and southern Burma were joined by the Milan missionaries in eastern Burma, where they were active among the Karens.[48]

---

[41] B. Barcatta Silv, O.S.B., "Lo Scisma del Padroado nel Ceylon fino al 1853," NZM V (1949), 241–57, VI (1950), 15–34. Additionally, in the course of the dissolution of orders by Portugal in 1834, the Oratory at Goa was also closed.

[42] J. Rommerskirchen, O.M.I., Die Oblatenmission auf der Insel Ceylon (Hünfeld 1931), 96–228. The papal visitation of Bishop Bonnand in 1860 was decisive for the progress of the northern area of Ceylon (N. Kowalsky, O.M.I., "Die Oblatenmission von Jaffna (Ceylon) zur Zeit der Apostolischen Visitation im Jahre 1860," ZMR 40 [1956], 209–13).

[43] This period is described by L. Gallo, La Storia del Cristianesimo nell'Impero Birmano (Milan 1862).

[44] A Launay, Mémorial II, 50–54.

[45] The good relations between court and people were mirrored by the briefs of Pius IX to the King in 1857 (JP VI/1, 273) and 1858 (JP VI/1, 287). P. Anatriello, P.I.M.E., calls the bishop the "principe dei classici cattolici sul Buddismo Birmano" ("I Cattolici ed il Buddismo Birmano," NZM, XXII [1066], 265).

[46] G. B. Tragella, P.I.M.E., Le Missioni Estere di Milano II (Milan 1959), 11–13.

After 1828, the Malay peninsula constituted a part of the British Empire. The bishopric of Malacca, established in 1558, did not have a bishop throughout the entire century. The activity of the patronage priests was limited to the Portuguese parishes in Malacca and Singapore.[49] The missionaries of the Paris mission seminary devoted themselves chiefly to the Chinese and Indian immigrants. The focus of their work in the vicariate, which was established in 1841, was the expansion of the seminary at Pulo-Penang. The vicar apostolic generally resided in a neighboring parish. The unique arrangement of the parallelity of a patronage bishopric and a vicar apostolic in Malacca continued in existence.

The Kingdom of Siam (Thailand) owed its independence during the nineteenth century to the fact that the two colonial neighbors England and France were unwilling to either share domination over the Thais or to leave it to only one of them. Catholic missionaries had been active in the area since the sixteenth century. Although they were not able to register noticeable successes, the tolerance of ruler and people allowed them to develop the country into an important missionary base. This was true especially for Vicar Apostolic Jean Baptiste Pallegoix (1802–62), an expert on Siamese language and culture, who established close ties to the Siamese court.[50] For fifteen years, Pallegoix maintained friendly relations with the abbot of a Buddhist monastery, who later ruled in Bangkok as King Mongkut (1851–68). His toleration and benevolence continued, with the result that the Catholic mission, almost at the point of extinction because of wars and lack of missionaries, revived again. Mongkut himself directed a friendly letter to Pius IX in March 1861; in October, Pius IX replied in the same vein, praising the tolerant attitude of the monarch toward Christianity.[51] Yet with all of his gestures of goodwill to Christianity, Catholic and Protestant alike, the King remained a convinced Buddhist and used his newly won knowledge of Christianity for a thorough reform of Siamese and Hinayana Buddhism.[52]

---

[47] JP VI/1, 442–43 (first establishment of the vicariates in 1866, which was not implemented), also VI/2, 93–94 (division of the country in 1870 into two vicariates and one prefecture).

[48] G. B. Tragella, op. cit., 371–400 ("La Missione della Birmania Orientale sotto il prefetto Biffi, 1868–81").

[49] M. Teixeira, Macau e a sua Diocese V: Efemérides religiosas de Malaca, VI: "A Missão portuguesa de Malaca" (Lisbon 1963). Until 1868, Portugal appointed regents for bishoprics. M. Teixeira, The Portuguese Missions in Malacca and Singapore (1511–1959) III: "Singapore" (Lisbon 1963). Jurisdictionally, Singapore at first was part of Goa, was placed under the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in 1884, and in 1886–87 became part of the diocese of Macao.

[50] A. Launay, Mémorial II, 482–85.

The strengthening of the Catholic Church in Siam, begun by Bishop Pallegoix, has lasted to the present. Even if conversions among the Buddhist inhabitants of the country remained rare, an increasing number of Catholic communities were established among Chinese and Vietnamese immigrants, from whom a native clergy was recruited.

IN THE FRENCH SPHERE OF INFLUENCE

After the death of Emperor Minh Mang in 1841, the Tonkin Church enjoyed peace under his successor Thieu-Tri (1841–47). The indefatigable vicar apostolic of West Tonkin, Monsignor Pierre Retord (1803–58), used this period to reassemble the dispersed and frightened Christians.[53] But a new, even bloodier persecution afflicted the Church under Tu Duc (1847–82). Thousands of Christians had to pay for their faith with their lives, among them about fifty priests and five bishops. The first decree of persecution (1848) was directed against the European priests, the second decree (1851) against the Vietnamese priests, and the third one (1855) against all Christians. In order not to endanger their flocks directly, the missionaries had to live in the mountains and forests, where Bishop Retord, exhausted by flight and deprivation, died in 1858.

French intervention took place during this difficult period. After an initial failure, the French consul de Montigny asked Monsignor Pellerin, the vicar apostolic of North Cochin China (1813–62), who had fled to Hong Kong, to seek an audience with Napoleon III in order to obtain help for missionaries and Christians.[54] Because in 1857 a Spanish Dominican bishop, Monsignor Diaz, was executed, the two powers intervened together. In 1858, the port of Da Nang in Tonkin was taken, and in 1859 Saigon was occupied by French troops. This action was the first step in the gradual occupation of all of Indochina by the French, culminating with the seizure of Hanoi in 1873. Although religious freedom was embodied in all treaties following each individual phase of the wars of conquest, the Church had to suffer its greatest loss of blood after the "pacification," especially in what is today Vietnam. It is not to be denied that missionaries caused the French intervention and that the suppressed and threatened Christians desired and expected it.[55] But it is also clear that most of the missionaries and Christians did not die because of these political events and wars, but because of their faith.[56] How little involved the missionaries in the interior of the country were with the political conflict was impressively demonstrated with the trial and subsequent beheading of Théophane Vénard (1829–61) in February 1861. It was confirmed by the letters which he wrote while kept in the bamboo cage in which he was confined until his execution.[57]

---

[51] JP VI/1, 349–50. The brief was accompanied by gifts and a portrait of the Pope. An earlier brief of thanks by the Pope is dated 20 December 1852 (JP VI/1, 153–54).

[52] G. Lanczkowski, "Das sogenannte Religionsgespräch des Königs Mongkut," Saeculum 17 (1966), 119–30; see G. Höltker in NZM XXII (1966), 300.

[53] A. Launay, Mémorial II, 550–53; A. Launay, Monsignor Retord et le Tonkin catholique (Lyon 1919).

[54] A. Launay , Mémorial II, 497–99.

In spite of the almost incessant persecution, Christianity made progress. The number of missionary dioceses was doubled during this period and so was the number of native clergymen. The clergy had been taught at Pulo-Penang, which was known by the name of Seminarium martyrium. As soon as the south of Indochina was calm, the Christian Brothers began their work in Saigon; in 1861, the first Carmelite house was established there. Other houses at Hanoi, Hué, Phat Diem, and Thanh Hoa followed. The seventeenth century form of the lay apostolate, the Domus Dei existing in some areas, proved their worth during the persecutions.[58]

The development of the Church in China took place on two levels: on the political/ecclesiastical, and the missionary/religious one. The concordat of 1857 with Portugal dissolved the hitherto Portuguese dioceses of Peking and Nanking, with only Macao remaining under Portuguese patronage. The replacement of the patronage missionaries by representatives of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith occurred without stir and without injury to the areas concerned.[59] Nanking was replaced by the vicariate apostolic of Kiangnan and transferred to French Jesuits, Peking was given to French Lazarists.[60] The Chinese provinces of Kwangtung and Kwangsi belonged to Macao; missionaries of the Paris seminary had been at work in them since the eighteenth century. Only in 1858 was this area also split from the mother diocese.[61] From then on, the entire China mission was directed by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith.

---

[55] E. Do Duc Hanh, La place du catholicisme dans les relations entre la France et le Viet-Nam de 1851 à 1870, 2 vols. (Leiden 1969).

[56] This fact was emphasized in the historical expert opinions in the course of the last beatifications (1951). B. Biermann, O.P., De Martyribus tempore Tu-Duc Regis in Missionibus Ordinis Praedicatorum tunkinensibus profide occisis (Rome 1937); O. Maas, O.F.M., "Die Christenverfolgung in Tongking unter König Tu Duc in den Jahren 1856–1862," ZMR 29 (1939), 142–53.

[57] Streit XI, 177–81, and T. Vénard, Käfigbriefe. Bekenntnisse vor seiner Hinrichtung in Hanoi in Tonking 2.2.1861. (translated into German by W. Stadler [Freiburg 1953]); on the martyrs beatified in 1951, especially the Dominicans, see B. Biermann, O.P., Im Feuerofen. Glaubenszeugen unserer Zeit. Die Martyrer von Tongking (Cologne 1951).

[58] Delacroix III, 239–44.

[59] J. Beckmann, Die katholische Missionsmethode in China in neuester Zeit, 1842–1912 (Immensee 1931), 26f.

This development resulted in the virtual end of the Portuguese right of patronage in China. But the Treaty of Whampoa (1844) started a new political association, which, especially during the second half of the century, was to be unhappy: French patronage.[62] The contractually agreed freedom of religion was at first valid only for the five so-called treaty ports. Other military action (especially in response to the rebellion of Taiping)[63] led to the treaty of Tientsin (1858) and the peace treaty of Peking (1860). They extended religious freedom to the entire country and to all missionaries who carried a French document of protection. The Chinese were granted the freedom to accept and exercise the Christian faith. The weakness of these treaties and other agreements was, of course, that they were not concluded on the basis of equality but were imposed on the Chinese.[64] All disagreements and persecutions in the course of the century were, in the final analysis, only expressions of hate directed at foreigners and not at Christianity, which was hardly known.

This fact becomes evident from a study of Chinese sources.[65] The increasing number of "missionary incidents" after 1860 may occasionally have been caused by tactlessness, lack of comprehension, and pushy missionaries, but the real cause was the class of Confucian-trained gentry, mandarins, and large landowners. Ever since the seventeenth century they made common front against foreigners and Christianity and intensified their hostility during the nineteenth century.[66] By means of falsehoods and lies they tried to incite the ignorant masses against the strangers and the followers of foreign religions.[67] Violent incidents led to negotiations with the foreign powers which lasted for years. The hate of foreigners and Christians reached its first high point with the bloodbath of Tientsin on 21 June 1870, in which the French consul, other Europeans, a European and a Chinese Lazarist, and ten Sisters of Mercy were killed.[68]

---

[60] J. de Moidrey, La Hiérarchie catholique en Chine, en Corée et au Japon (Shanghai 1914), 97, 140.

[61] Ibid., 107.

[62] L. Wei Tsing-sing, La politique missionnaire de la France en Chine, 1842–1856 (Paris 1960); J. Beckmann, op. cit., 14–23.

[63] LTHK IX, 1277, with literature. The Catholic missions had to suffer doubly from the social-religious movement of the fanatics, first from the killings and arson by the revolutionaries from Canton to Shanghai, then also, outside of the areas concerned, by the newly created mistrust, because the Christians were placed on the same level as the revolutionaries.

[64] T. Grentrup, S.V.D., Die Missionsfreiheit nach den Bestimmungen des geltenden Völkerrechts (Berlin 1928), 64.

[65] P. A. Cohen, China and Christianity. The Missionary Movement and the Growth of Chinese Antiforeignism, 1860–1870 (Cambridge, Mass. 1963).

Such setbacks did not prevent the missions from expanding far into the interior of the country. Externally this was evident in the increase of the vicariates apostolic: in 1846, North Kiangsi, Kweichow, and Tibet; in 1856 North Tscheli, West Tscheli, Southeast Tscheli (these three areas were formed from the former diocese of Peking), Kiangnan (for Nanking), East Szechwan, South Hunan, and the apostolic prefecture of Kwangtung; in 1860, South Szechwan. In 1870, the vicariate of Hupei was divided into three vicariates. From Fukien, the Spanish Dominicans in 1859 resumed the mission on the island of Formosa, interrupted since the seventeenth century. Those orders already present in China strengthened their ranks, among them the Franciscans, Dominicans, Paris missionaries, Lazarists, and Jesuits, In 1858, the missionaries of the Milan mission seminary began their work in Hong Kong and in 1869 in the province of Honan; the Belgian missionaries of Scheut after 1865 laid the foundation for new Christian communities in the vast provinces of Kansu and Mongolia.[69]

In its instructions of 1845 concerning the education and training of native clergy, the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith had emphasized the importance of regular meetings of the superiors of orders at local synods for the preservation of ecclesiastical unity and discipline.[70] This general admonition was followed in June 1848 by an encyclical to the bishops of China and neighboring countries to gather for a synod at Hong Kong.[71] In spite of additional reminders such a synod did not take place, primarily because to most of the bishops the conditions in the country for such a gathering were not favorable and the journeys too dangerous, but also because most of them did not see the need for such a meeting. Behind the scenes, the old protectionist power (Portugal) and the new one (France), insisted on their right to participate.

---

[66] For the year 1860 alone, the archives of the Foreign Office (Tshungli Yamen) contain 8000 pages on "missionary incidents," for the years 1860–1909 there are 910 volumes (it is the largest section of the archives of the Foreign Office) (P. A. Cohen, op. cit., 346).

[67] P. A. Cohen, op. cit., 77–99 (Gentry Opposition to Christianity).

[68] Ibid., 229–61. He concluded: "Each side operated on premises that it believed to be universally valid, and both were caught up in a clash of cultures over which neither had much control" (261). On missionary concerns, see J. Beckmann, Missionsmethode, XIVf.

[69] The decrees for the establishment of new vicariates are in JP VI/1 and VI/2.

[70] CPF I, 545.

[71] G. B. Tragella, P.I.M.E., "Il mancato Concilio di Hongkong 1950," Missionswissenschaftliche Studien (Festschrift J. Dindinger) (Aachen 1951), 347–60. The meetings of six bishops in Shanghai and of the superiors of the Lazarist mission in Ningpo were a substitute (J. Beckmann, Missionsmethode 10).

In the meantime, Rome tried to prepare for an eventual synod. Pius IX appointed Monsignor L. C. Spelta, O.F.M., the vicar apostolic of Hupei, as apostolic visitor.[72] Unfortunately, he was forced to terminate his inspection and died in 1862 at Wuchang. A stronger impression than this visit was made in Europe by the journey of two Lazarists, E. Huc and Joseph Gabet, through Mongolia to Tibet (1844–46).[73] After his return to Europe in 1848, Gabet directed a voluminous memorandum to Pius IX in which in plain language he told him the truth about China and the means whereby its conversion could be hastened. In essence, these consisted of drawing concrete consequences from the instructions of 1845 by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith.[74] When Father Gabet submitted his report, he could look back upon ten years of missionary experience; as the founder of the Catholic mission to Mongolia he had worked in Mongolia since 1837.[75]

In 1848 the first European sisters arrived in China. Their work in schools, hospitals, and orphan homes was the reflection of a profound change in missionary methods. Ever since persecutions had begun, especially during the past 150 years, the European missionaries had confined themselves to spreading the faith unobtrusively among moderate numbers of people. The pastoral care of families and women was left to Chinese girls. Beginning with the second half of the nineteenth century, the educational, social, and charitable institutions recruited members for the Christian faith indirectly. But it was precisely the (actually very beneficial) activity of European women which the Chinese regarded as alien and which they rejected. It is understandable, therefore, that the Chinese memorandum of 13 February 1871, which the government addressed to the foreign powers after the events of Tientsin, demanded more respect for Chinese sensibilities from the Europeans in general and the removal of the sisters in particular.[76] The demand was decisively rejected by foreign powers and missionaries alike.[77] The expansion of the missionary work was continued as before and characterized the Chinese mission until recently. In retrospect, the rejection of Father Gabet's recommendations by the mission superiors and the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith was fatal.

---

[72] JP VI/1, 308f. Pius IX also sent a letter to the Emperor of China in which he commended Monsignor Spelta and the Catholics of the Empire to the benevolence of the Emperor and referred to the beneficial doctrines of Catholicism for his Empire. It is not likely that the letter ever reached the addressee.

[73] E. Huc, Souvenirs d'un voyage dans la Tartarie, le Thibet et la Chine pendant les années 1844, 1845, 1846 (Paris 1950). See Streit XII, 230–38 listing individual editions and translations. The French sinologist Paul Pelliot writes about the occasional doubts concerning the genuineness of the report in "Le voyage de MM. Gabet et Huc à Lhasa," T'oung Pao 24 (Leiden 1926), 133–78. According to him, the report is genuine in its essentials. But it was also edited by E. Huc for a broad public, and as a consequence the actual leader of the exploration, J. Gabet, was pushed to the background.

[74] Coup d'oeil sur l'état des Missions de Chine présenté au Saint Père le Pape Pie IX (Poissy 1848); Streit XII, 204–8. Monsignor Verrolles, vicar apostolic of Manchuria, protested the brochure, which in 1850 was condemned by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. Gabet had the gift of seeing the situation in a way which was only acknowledged a hundred years later (see G. B. Tragella, "Le vicende di un opusculo sul clero indigeno e dul suo autore," in J. Beckmann, Der einheimische Klerus in Geschichte und Gegenwart [Festschrift L. Kilger] [Beckenried 1950], 189–202; N. Kowalsky, "Das 'verlorene' Manuskript zu Gabets Denkschrift über den einheimischen Klerus," NZM XIV (1958), 96–103.

[75] H. Verhaeren, C.M., "Un catéchisme mongol du lazariste Joseph Gabet?," NZM XXIII (1967), 150–51.

Korea was established as a vicariate apostolic separate from Peking in 1831. The remoteness of the country and the long access journey meant that it was not until 1836 that the first European missionary, Pierre Philibert Maubant (1803–39), arrived. The vicar apostolic of Korea, Bishop Barth. Bruguière, had died in Mongolia in 1835 on the way to Korea. In 1837, Father Jaques Honoré Chastan (1803–39) reached Korea, soon followed by the second vicar apostolic, Laurent Joseph Marius Imbert (1796–1839). All three died a martyr's death after the bishop had been arrested and the two missionaries voluntarily had turned themselves in to the authorities in order to protect their communities from harassment.[78] During the next bloody persecution in 1846 the first Korean priest, Andreas Kim, became a victim. After finishing his theological studies at Macao, he had gone to Korea in 1845, accompanied by his bishop, J. Ferréol (1808–53), and a missionary. When new persecutions broke out in 1866, during which two bishops, seven missionaries, and about eight thousand Christians were slain, the young Korean Church numbered about twenty-five thousand members. It was to be ten years before the country would receive other missionaries and pastors.[79] [76] Streit XII, 455, listing the various editions of this memorandum.

---

[77] Streit XII, 455f.: Reply by the Western powers. From the side of the missionaries, there was Le Memorandum Chinois ou violation du Traité de Peking. Par un missionnaire (F. Genevois, Rome 1872); Ibid., 476f.

[78] A. Choi, L'Érection du premier vicariat apostolique et les origines du Catholicisme en Corée (Beckenried 1961), 76–87.

[79] Delacroix III, 281.

Attempts to reestablish missions in Japan failed until the American admiral Matthew Perry opened the country in 1854.[80] In 1858 France obtained the concession from Japan to allow freedom of religion for foreigners in port cities and in Tokyo. Father Girard (1821–1867) became the first priest and interpreter of the French Society of Paris Missionaries to settle in the capital. For foreign Catholics, small churches were established at other places as well, but attendance was forbidden to the Japanese.[81]

Nagasaki allowed the presence of foreigners again in 1862, and the Paris missionaries built a small church. It was here that Father T. Petitjean in 1865 discovered surviving Christians, of whom about twenty-five thousand acknowledged themselves to the missionaries.[82] Such an event could not be concealed from the Japanese authorities in spite of all precautions on the part of the missionaries. Anti-Christian legislation was still in force and was strengthened in 1869 by an imperial edict. Another wave of persecutions swept over the newly organized Christian communities, culminating in mass deportations and exile to distant parts of the country. Only pressure by the European powers effected a gradual diminution of the persecutions.[83]

The discovery of the Old Christians produced internal difficulties, especially with respect to language. The faithful of Nagasaki still used prayers, hymns, catechisms, and religious literature in Spanish and Portuguese terminology. The muddled situation did not improve when Monsignor Petitjean, vicar apostolic of Japan after 1866, reissued old books from the Jesuit printing press. By about this time, Chinese terminology had become accepted in central and northern Japan, while the traditional Spanish-Portuguese terminology survived in southern Japan until the death of Bishop Petitjean.[84] The problem was attenuated in

---

[80] J. Jennes, C.I.C.M., A History of the Catholic Church in Japan, 1549–1873 (Tokyo 1959); J. Van Hecken, C.I.C.M., Un siècle de Vie Catholique au Japon 1859–1959 (Tokyo 1960); J. Beckmann, Die katholischen Missionen in Japan und ihre Auseinandersetzung mit den japanischen Religionen. Priester und Mission (Aachen 1960), 337–74.

[81] Van Hecken, op. cit., 11–13.

[82] Ibid., 14–16. A large number of the Old Christians did not trust the new times. As late as 1954 there were about thirty thousand secret Christians in the west of the island of Kyushu. In its essential parts they had adhered to the Catholic faith, but exercised their religious life only clandestinely (J. Van Hecken, C.I.C.M., "Les Crypto-chrétiens au Japon au XX^e^ siècle," NZM XI, [1955], 69–70).

[83] If Japan was slow and hesitant in dismantling anti-Christian legislation, the reason was that the new state had to have time to organize the national religion of Shintoism, to consolidate it among the people, and thereby to erect a strong dam against the rise of Christianity (K. M. Panikkar, Asien und die Herrschaft des Westens [Zurich 1955], 392f.).

[84] J. Laures, S.J., "Das kirchliche Sprachproblem in der neuerstandenen Japanmission," Monumenta Nipponica III (Tokyo 1940), 630–36.

1876 by the division of Japan into two vicariates, North Japan and South Japan.

Philippines, Indonesia, Oceania, Africa

Although relatively autonomous and possessing their own religious administration, the Philippines until the nineteenth century were nothing more than an extension of Spanish-America to the Far East. Given this close association, the ideas of the French Revolution and of the American Independence movement could not but affect the islands. The first stirrings of political independence failed, in part because the dominant Spanish upper class was too weak to assume a leading role, in part because the Friars, especially the Augustinian Eremites, who since the end of the sixteenth century had carried the chief missionary and pastoral burden on the islands, maintained their strong position. Together with Franciscans and Dominicans they formed the most reliable pillar of Spanish rule. It was a paradox of history that Spain itself, expecially after the revolution and the dissolution of all orders in 1835, began to weaken its own position in the country through the positive support of Freemasonry. The association of Philippinos with lodge brothers of the United States in the neighboring Asiatic countries, who were to serve only as allies in the struggle against the Church, produced in the islands new sources of unrest, fostered the movement for independence, and ultimately, much to the surprise and disappointment of all parties concerned, brought about the American occupation of the country.[85]

Until the middle of the nineteenth century, the ranks of the Spanish missionaries could be filled with Spaniards, but after 1855 there were difficulties with recruitment. Queen Isabella II granted the reopening of the mission seminaries for the Philippines and the readmission of the Jesuits, whose first members arrived at Manila in 1859.[86] They performed their work primarily on the islands of Yolo and Mindanao, where the majority of the population was Muslim. In addition to the already mentioned political paradox, there was also an ecclesiastical-religious paradox with ominous consequences. The orders had done good work in training a native clergy, whose numbers had grown to impressive proportions by the nineteenth century. Unfortunately, they left this native clergy in subordinate positions, without raising its social or economic standing. Thus they forced this educated class into the ranks of the malcontents and rebels.[87]

---

[85] A critical comprehensive treatment of recent Philippine Church history is unfortunately lacking, but a wealth of source material has been sorted and is cited by Streit IX (1937) in a volume of almost one thousand pages.

[86] J. A. Otto, S.J., Philipp Roothaan, 493.

A mission to Indonesia became possible only after 1807 when Louis Napoleon granted freedom of religion to Holland.[88] But even after the establishment of the vicariate apostolic of Batavia in 1842, missionary work remained limited to the pastoral care of white Catholics. The colonial legislation of 1854 made any expansion of such work dependent on specific permission by the government. Only gradually, step by step, did Catholics achieve their missionary right to exist. This was generally in response to particular events, such as in Borneo, where an apostolic prefecture was created in the northern part in 1857, and after 1860 in Flores.[89] In 1859 Portugal, in a peace treaty with Holland, ceded this island and others, but managed to insert a clause guaranteeing the care over native Christians. One of the outstanding missionaries of the early period was the Jesuit Le Cocq d'Armandville; the first Jesuits arrived in Batavia in 1859.[90] Further progress was made only during the subsequent mission period. The part of Timor remaining with Portugal and a few other small islands, raised to the bishopric of Dili in 1940, were administered by the diocese of Macao until recently.

The missions of Oceania continued to attract hosts of missionaries after the middle of the nineteenth century in spite of tremendous difficulties, such as immense distances, tropical diseases, and political and denominational contrasts.[91] With most of them, genuine religious motives determined their preference for the Pacific islands, but some of them were no doubt also influenced by romantic adventurism and the image of paradisiac conditions.[92] Missionary romanticism imbued the

---

[87] C. A. Majul, "Anticlericalism during the Reform Movement and the Philippine Revolution," in G. H. Anderson, Studies in Philippine Church History (Ithaca 1969), 152–71.

[88] A. Mulders, De Missie in tropisch Nederland ('s-Hertogenbosch 1940); A. Mulders in Delacroix III, 378–80. This suppression of the Catholic missions was tied to the Dutch colonial method of the time, about which the Indian historian K. M. Panikkar judges harshly: "The Dutch were the only one among the European nations in the East who lowered a whole population to the level of plantation coolies and who acknowledged for it neither a legal nor a moral obligation" (Asien und die Herrschaft des Westens [Zurich 1955], 103).

[89] Concerning the attempts of the Milan missionaries to gain a foothold in Borneo, see G. B. Tragella Le Missioni Estere I, 189–91.

[90] J. A. Otto, S.J., Philip Roothaan, 34.

[91] Streit XXI, C. R. H. Taylor, A Pacific Bibliography, 2nd ed. (Oxford 1965); see also the regular "Bibliographie de l'Océanie," Journal de la Société des Océanistes I (Paris 1945seqq.). On the whole matter, see also Journal de la Société des Océanistes. Numéro spécial sur les missions du Pacifique XXV (1969).

[92] J. Meier, M.S.C., "Primitive Völker und 'Paradies'-Zustand mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der früheren Verhältnisse beim Oststamm der Gazelle-Halbinsel im Bismarck-Archipel (Neu-Pommern)," Anthropos 2 (Vienna 1907), 374–86. The missionary utopias of the South Seas mission still need to be examined.

Society of Oceania; it existed from 1844 to 1854 for the support of the missions in Polynesia and trade with it. Even Pius IX and a number of other bishops joined it. But neither missions nor trade benefited from it, and the society was dissolved.[93] Polynesia remained the missionary field for the Picpus missionaries. Spreading out from Hawaii, they gained footholds on the Marquesas, Tahiti, and the Cook Islands, where independent vicariates were gradually erected. Subsequently, the missions gained world-wide attention through the heroic work of Father Damian de Veuster (1840–89), who, active in Hawaii since 1863, after 1873 worked among the lepers on Molokai.[94] Easter Island, where B. Eyraud began missionary work in 1864,[95] was also part of Polynesia.

When in 1836 the vicariate of Central Oceania, comprising all of Melanesia and Micronesia, was established and handed to the care of the Marist Fathers, ignorance of geographical realities allowed people to believe that enough had been done. But missionaries on the spot quickly realized that by themselves they would never be able to take care of such an immense area. Operating from the Solomon Islands, the Marist Fathers tried to deny Protestant missionaries access to New Guinea; but the deadly climate put an end to their efforts. Therefore their superior, Father J. U. Colin, welcomed the offer of the Milan missionaries to continue this work. The first group left Milan in 1852. But the young Italian missionaries also had to pay tribute to the tropical climate, and when in 1855 Father G. Mazzuconi was murdered by the natives, they left the unhealthy mission and retreated to Sydney to recover. The mission was not resumed,[96] and twenty-five years passed before fresh help arrived.

From their center in New Zealand, where they were trying to convert the Maoris, the Marist Fathers expanded their efforts to other, northern island complexes, especially to the Solomons,[97] to Tonga, Samoa, Fiji, New Caledonia, and the New Hebrides. Gradually, independent dioceses were established in this area. The vast distances and new languages promoted local printeries, especially by the Marist Fathers.[98]

---

[93] P. O. Reilly, S.M., "La Société des Océanie," RHM VII (Paris 1930), 227–62. Additional literature in Streit XXI, 130–32.

[94] Streit XXI, 225–42.

[95] S. Engler, O.F.M.Cap., Primer siglo cristiano de la Isla de Pascua 1864–1964 (Villarrica 1964).

[96] G. B. Tragella, Le Missioni Estere I, 125–71.

[97] Hugh M. Laracy, Catholic Missions in the Solomon Islands, 1845–1966 (Auckland 1969), diss., Canberra.

[98] P. O. Reilly, S.M. Imprints of the Fiji Catholic Mission, 1864–1959 (London-Suva 1958); P. O. Reilly, S.M., "Premiers traveaux des presses de la mission catholique à Wallis, 1845–1849," Journal de la Société des Océanistes XIX (Paris 1963), 119–28. Earlier works by the same author in Streit XXI, XIII/XIV, 653–55.

The Marist Fathers never reached Micronesia, which had been assigned to them as missionary area as part of the vicariate of Central Oceania. These islands, especially the Mariana Islands, where Christianity survived even after the expulsion of the Jesuits, ecclesiastically belonged to the diocese of Cebu in the Philippines (1814–98). Their Christian communities were tended by the Augustinian Recollects.[99]

At this time, the Benedictines began their missionary work among the Australian aborigines. In 1859 the area became an apostolic prefecture, and later became an Abbatia nullius. The method employed by the Benedictines was the same as the one used by them in missionizing Germanic tribes during the Middle Ages.[100]

Although Africa was geographically closer to the European mission centers and thus could be reached much more easily than the Pacific islands, missionary settlements in the dark continent were established only slowly, under great sacrifices, and with only moderate success. The vicariate of Central Africa, established in 1846, had a stirring and sorrowful history.[101] Its establishment was suggested by A. Casolani, canon in Malta, who became its first vicar apostolic. He accepted the appointment on the condition that Jesuits accompany him as missionaries.[102] But to General Roothaan the enterprise appeared as rather romantic and vague, and he detached only two Jesuits for an initial exploration. When Bishop Casolani resigned from his post, the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith appointed Father Ryllo as provicar, whom the bishop together with two other secular priests accompanied as a simple missionary.[103] By 1861, the new mission had cost the lives of forty missionaries. Only Daniel Comboni (1830–81), vicar apostolic of Central Africa after 1877, was able to create better conditions for his missionaries by moving his headquarters from Khartoum to Cairo. But the rising of the Mahdi in 1882 destroyed the entire mission.[104]

---

[99] C. Lopinot, O.F.M.Cap., "Zur Missionsgeschichte der Marianen und Karolinen," NZM XV (1959), 305–8.

[100] R. Salvado, O.S.B., Memorias históricas sobre la Australia y la Misión de Nueva Nursia (Madrid 1946). This Spanish edition of the original (Naples 1852) contains a good historical introduction to the Benedictine missionary work in New Nursia.

[101] E. Schmid, M.F.S.C., "L'erezione del Vicariato Apostolico dell'Africa Centrale," ED XXII (1969), 99–127, XXIII (1970), 87–110; M. B. Storme, C.I.C.M., "Origine du Vicariat Apostolique de l'Afrique Centrale," NZM VIII (1952), 105–18.

[102] M. B. Storme, C.I.C.M., "La renonciation de Monseigneur Casolani, Vicaire Apostolique de l'Afrique Centrale," NZM IX (1953), 290–305.

[103] J. A. Otto, S.J., Philipp Roothaan, 237–48. Father Ryllo, S.J., died in 1848 and his successor, the secular priest J. Knoblecher, in 1858.

[104] S. Santandrea, F.S.C.J., Bibliografia di Studi Africani della Missione dell'Africa Centrale (Verona 1948).

Thanks to the loyalty of the missionaries of Verona, the flourishing Sudan mission emerged from the vicariate apostolic of Central Africa. In 1868 the new apostolic prefecture of Sahara and Sudan was created and subordinated to the archbishop of Algiers, Charles Lavigerie, as apostolic delegate. It can hardly be assumed that Rome, when making out the decree, which is not contained in any official collection of documents of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, seriously thought of converting the Sudan. But the man to whom the seemingly impossible task was entrusted conceived of a daring plan to achieve this objective with the aid of the White Fathers, whom he had founded. First attempts to penetrate to Central Africa from the Kabylia mission in Algeria failed. Only after much more careful preparations did the White Fathers make their way from the East African coast to the area of the great lakes.[105]

The areas which they had to cross in the east in order to reach their central African mission areas were under the jurisdiction of the Holy Ghost Fathers, who in 1863 worked in Zanzibar and after 1868 at Bagamoyo on the mainland. After the death of their founder, Franz Maria Libermann, Father Ignaz Schwendimann filled the office of superior general from 1852 until 1881. Under his leadership the young society was strengthened and took a firm foothold on the African mainland. In addition to their initial areas in western Africa (Senegal, Senegambia, Gabon), they were given the vicariate apostolic of Sierra Leone in 1864.[106] In 1849 the plan emerged to minister to the vacated Portuguese mission areas,[107] but it was not until 1866 that the first Spiritans arrived in the Portuguese Congo and in Angola. In the Congo, they found traces of the Italian Capuchins who had worked there earlier.[108] To the normal difficulties in tropical Africa was added the severe opposition of Portugal; only the tireless activity of Father Charles Duparquet (1830–88), residing after 1866 in Angola, effected the settlement of the Spiritans in Portugal and the establishment of a Portuguese province, thereby removing any obstacles.[109]

With the arrival of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate in Natal in 1852, the areas of South Africa saw their first missionaries; until this time the area's secular priests had been able to minister to the white settlers only.

---

[105] Streit XVII, 757–71.

[106] A. Engel, C.S.Sp., Die Missionsmethode der Missionare vom Heiligen Geist auf dem afrikanischen Festland (Knechtsteden 1932).

[107] Spiritana Monumenta Historica. I. Angola 1. Par António Brásio, C.S.Sp. (Pittsburgh and Louvain 1961), 30ff.

[108] Op. cit., 514–25.

[109] Volumes 2 and 3 of the Spiritana Monumenta Historica contain information on the work of C. Duparquet and the establishment of a Portuguese settlement and province.

In 1862 the Oblates made their way to Basutoland, which hitherto had been closed to Catholic missionaries, and eventually built up a flourishing mission. During subsequent decades they also became active in other areas of Africa.[110]

With the Jesuits active on the island of Réunion and the islands around Madagascar, they sought ways and means to penetrate the interior of the large island itself. But the political and denominational contrast (England/France) as well as the difficulties posed by France and the long-established colonial seminary in Paris were so strong that initial attempts failed. Only in 1861 did the Jesuits settle firmly at Tananarive and begin the establishment of the Church in Madagascar.[111]

It is perhaps astonishing that in a survey of missionary activity during the middle of the nineteenth century Africa occupies such a modest place. Of course, the difficulties to be overcome were great, but certainly not greater than in the Far East, the South Pacific islands, or in China and India. If the missions of the East were treated better, the reasons for this lie deeper. The optimistic missionary reports of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries had surrounded the missions of the Far East with an attractive halo. The advanced cultures of these peoples, known particularly through the researches and reports of the missionaries, were valued as much as the tolerant character of the inhabitants. Unimaginable utopias exercised a great allure for the islands of the Pacific. Africa lacked such attractions. The great explorations of European investigators started only in the middle of the past century and were only cautiously exploited by Protestant and Catholic missionary circles.[112] The languages and cultures of Africa, aside from the west coast and Portuguese colonies, were largely unknown. Finally, the burden of earlier times still rested on the shoulders of the black race. The African was largely regarded as a slave in Europe and the New World, and this was also the view of the Church. The descriptions of slave hunters and traders remained alive, at least subconsciously.[113] To be sure, slavery was condemned and an attempt was made to lighten the lot of the blacks; but the continent exerted only minimal political and missionary appeal, a circumstance which explains the slow penetration of Africa.

---

[110] T. Ortolan, O.M.I., Cent ans d'Apostolat dans les deux Hémisphères. II: En dehors de l'Europe, 1841–1861 (Paris 1914).

[111] J. A. Otto, S.J., Philipp Roothaan, 211–37; A. Boudou, S.J., Les Jésuites à Madagascar au XIXᵉ siècle, 2 vols. (Paris 1952).

[112] T. Ohm, O.S.B., Wichtige Daten der Missionsgeschichte (Münster 1961), 193–95, listing dates of discoveries and missionization.

[113] Urs Bitterli, Die Entdeckung des schwarzen Afrikaners. Versuch einer Geistesgeschichte der europäisch-afrikanischen Beziehungen an der Guinea-Küste im 17. und 18. Jahrhundert (Zurich 1970).

CHAPTER 13

The First Vatican Council and the Missions

The first Vatican Council from 1869 to 1870 was a mirrored reflection of the laborious missionary effort during the nineteenth century. In contrast to the Council of Trent, missionary countries were represented, even though the presence of missionary bishops was controversial. As it was, their principal concerns were not dealt with at all, in part because of the early termination of the council and in part because of the lacking preparation and knowledge of the council participants.

Pius IX solemnly announced the impending council on 26 June 1867 in a public consistory, and a year later, on 29 June 1868, the bull Aeterni Patris invited the participants from throughout the world. Between these two events the decision was made to include the vicars apostolic, i.e., the missionary bishops. In its session of 17 May 1868 the preparatory central commission agreed that it would be proper to invite titular bishops to the council in keeping with the words "patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops" in the draft of the bull.[1] But the commission did not address the legality of participation.[2] This fact proved to be a hindrance for the position of the vicars apostolic at the council. Their position was inhibited by the polemics preceding and accompanying the council, denying the vicars apostolic the right to participate and mentioning their lack of education and manners.[3] From the words of some missionary bishops we know that they became aware of their second-class standing only at the council itself. Monsignor E. J. Verrolles (1805–78), the senior missionary bishop in China, who had administered the Christian communities in Manchuria since 1833 and had to undergo one of the most fatiguing journeys in order to reach the council, was furious when he learned upon arrival in Rome that French newspapers in particular disputed the right of vicars apostolic to participate in the council.[4] His fellow-brother from the Paris seminary, Monsignor Louis Faurie (1824–71), vicar apostolic in Kweichow since 1860, remarked sarcastically that some liberal papers seemed to think that "as barefoot ignoramuses and papal valets" they had been included among the worthy council fathers.[5] But the bad "missionary climate" at Rome was even more painful for the mission representatives than the journalistic sniping. The idea of forming preparatory commissions had first been raised in 1865. Cardinal Bizzarri, the chairman of the central commission, primarily moved to engage members of the Roman Curia, as they were most conversant with the problems to be treated and with the traditions of the Apostolic See. Additional theologians and canonists could then be made members as necessary. As a result of the chaotic conditions in Italy, it was not until 1867 that five preparatory commissions were formed and approved by Pius IX.[6] [1] T. Granderath, Geschichte I, 93. Consequently, the text of the bull of appointment was printed in JP VI/2, 16–19.

---

[2] Granderath, op. cit., 93–97; Grentrup in ZMR 6 (1916), 30–32. Neither author dares to deal with the legal aspects. Granderath merely emphasizes that it would be unfair "to exclude from the Council the titular bishops of the mission countries which do not yet have an ordered hierarchy, who administer their dioceses like regular diocesan bishops, and on whose shoulders rest the largest of burdens."

[3] An examination of the importance of the actual pagan missions in the ultramontane-liberal polemics still needs to be written. A short synopsis is in Delacroix III, 81f. (L. Wei Tsing-sing, "Le I^{er} concile du Vatican et les problèmes missionnaires en Chine," RHE 57 [1962], 500–525).

In this context, the Commission for the Eastern Church and Missions is of primary interest.[7] The chairman of the commission was the prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, Cardinal Barnabo (1801–74). It consisted of seventeen members: eleven Italians, three Germans, and one Englishman, Russian, and Oriental each. Upon the urging of the cardinal, the commission, which initially comprised only members of the Curia, specifically of the Propaganda, was expanded with three men who had practical experience. These were Monsignor Giuseppe Valerga (1813–72), since 1847 the first Latin patriarch of Jerusalem; his brother, the Carmelite Leonardo di S. Giuseppe Valerga (1821–1903), at that time apostolic prefect of the Carmelite mission in Syria; and the Franciscan Paolo Brunoni (1807–75), after 1853 vicar apostolic of Aleppo and since 1858 vicar apostolic of Constantinople. Both the men of the Curia and those with practical experience counted among them outstanding Eastern experts such as the German Benedictine abbot D. B. Haneberg (1816–76) and the Russian Jesuit J. Martinov (1821–94).

For the mission bishops arriving at Rome it was disappointing and paralyzing to learn that there was not a single expert or representative of the actual pagan missions on the commission. Moreover, in the very first session Cardinal Barnabo announced that the primary task of the commission was the application of the disciplinary rules of the Council of Trent to the conditions of the Eastern Churches. Aside from a few laudable exceptions, what was meant by this was a far-reaching Latinization of the Eastern Churches.[8] "Mission" meant for most of the members of the commission, aside from a few laudable exceptions, nothing more than the Near Eastern mission. This narrow interpretation resulted from the fact that the older missionary nations like Spain and Portugal were not at all represented on the preparatory commission, while the bishops of the Portuguese and Spanish patronage, respectively their American successor states, regarded themselves as belonging to the European residential bishops, i.e., to the bishops first class, and not to the barely tolerated vicars apostolic.[9] Only in January 1870 were two missionary bishops of the Paris mission seminary, Monsignor E. L. Charbonneaux, vicar apostolic of Mysore, and Father J. M. Laouënan, vicar apostolic of Pondicherry, appointed to membership on the commission. Both of them were renowned linguists and historians and had made names for themselves as associates of Visitor Monsignor Bonnand and continued his work.[10]

---

[4] A. Launay, Monseigneur Verrolles et la Mission de Mandchourie (Paris 1895), 397.

[5] A. Launay, Histoire des Missions de Chine. Mission de Kouy-tcheou II (Paris 1908), 596.

[6] R. Aubert, "La composition des commissions préparatoires du premier concile du Vatican," Reformata reformanda (Festschrift Jedin), (Münster 1965), 447–82; Granderath, op. cit. I, 62–82.

[7] The following observations rest primarily on R. Aubert, op. cit., 473–77.

The principal task of the commission was the drafting of a schema to be presented to the council fathers. Cardinal Barnabo had written to Near Eastern and Austrian bishops as early as February and March 1868 and asked them for ideas and suggestions.[11] Of the replies, that of the Hungarian Bishop Roscovany demanded a thorough and effective promotion of the propagation of faith and a higher level of piety in the Christian countries.[12] Other demands or suggestions reached the commission during the council. Among the home Churches, only France submitted a valuable postulate pointing to the future (signed by thirteen participants). On 23 January 1870, 110 members asked for a solemn recommendation by the council of the Association for the Propagation of the Faith. Thirty-five vicars apostolic voiced a similar concern for the Childhood of Jesus Association, and two postulates, one signed by thirteen, the other signed by sixty-one participants, were in favor of supporting the Association for the Support of Schools in the Near East.[13]

---

[8] J. Hajjar, "L'Épiscopat catholique oriental et le I^er^ Concile du Vatican (d'après la correspondance diplomatique française)," RHE 65 (1970), 423–55, 737–88; J. Hajjar, Les chrêtiens uniates du Proche-Orient (Paris 1962); L. Lopetegui, El Concilio Vaticano Primero y la Unión de los Orientales (Berritz 1961).

[9] C. J. Beirne, "Latin American Bishops of the First Vatican Council," The Americas 25 (Washington 1968–69), 265–88. The conversion and pastoral care of the Indians, interrupted since the expulsion of the Jesuits and other orders from almost all Latin American countries, was no problem for the Latin American bishops, as little as the Indian and Negro missions were for the bishops of North America.

[10] A. Launay, Mémorial de la Société des Missions Étrangères II (Paris 1916), 119–21 (on Charbonneaux), 363–66 (on Laouënan), with bibliographies of their works.

[11] Ting Pong Lee, op. cit., 106. Similar letters to actual mission bishops are not known to me.

[12] Grentrup, op. cit., 32. Suggestions by Bishop Dupanloup and Cardinal Pecci (Leo XIII) point in the same direction.

By November 1869 a first draft of a mission schema was ready; it contained only one lengthy chapter on missionaries, their qualities, their education, and individual facets of their activity.[14] It was judged inadequate by the commission and in December 1869 replaced by a second draft with four chapters.[15] This schema also was rejected. Only the third draft of 26 June 1870 was accepted for distribution to those council fathers still at Rome.[16] Following an introductory letter from Pius IX, there were three chapters: 1. On Bishops and Vicars Apostolic, 2. On Missionaries, 3. On the Means of Spreading the Faith. Appended to the text were the Adnotationes ad Schema Decreti de Apostolicis Missionibus.[17]

The contents of the schema were probably the brainchild of the Latin patriarch of Jerusalem, Giuseppe Valerga. It ran to forty-four folio pages on the Uniate Churches of the Eastern rite and to thirty-five pages on the missionaries of the Roman-Latin rite in the countries of the Near East.[18] The reliance on one of the outstanding representatives of the Latin mission in the Near East and the objective of the commission as earlier defined by Cardinal Barnabo make clear why the schema was concerned principally with the mission to the Near East. Still, the intervention of the representatives of missions to the pagans succeeded in changing many passages in such a way that they applied to all messengers of the faith. Yet other long passages, concerning only the Church and pastoral and missionary care among the peoples of the Near East, remained intact.[19] That the second chapter "On the Apostolic Missionaries" conformed precisely to the initial intention, i.e., the implementation of Tridentine rules, was clearly shown by the Adnotationes, which contain no fewer than nine concrete references to the Tridentine Council.[20]

---

[13] Grentrup, op. cit., 35–37; Ting Pong Lee, op. cit., 105–9. The number of signatures was not significant. According to the listing in Granderath (op. cit. I, 463–509), the number of cardinals, patriarchs, bishops, vicars apostolic, etc. who were obliged to participate in the council was 990.

[14] On the history of the schemata, cf. Ting Pong Lee, op. cit., 111–15. The author found two manuscript volumes with twenty opinions by the consultants of the mission commission (Conc. Vat. Acta. Commissio pro Orientalibus) and one volume of the Conc. Vat. Comm. Orient. Studia praevia, op. cit., 111–21, in the library of the Lateran University, Rome.

[15] List of contents of the two schemata in Ting Pong Lee, op. cit., 112–13.

[16] The text of the third schema was printed by Mansi, 53, and ColLac VII. I am quoting from the original imprint as distributed to the council fathers in 1870 (photocopy).

[17] Schema, Text 1–20, Adnotationes 21–32.

[18] Ting Pong Lee, 114. According to him, not only essential portions of the schema, but actual phrasings were taken from these expert opinions.

[19] Note the careful delineation of the jurisdictions of bishops (of the Eastern rite) and vicars apostolic (of the Latin rite) which, aside from the Near East, had no significance (Schema 9–10, Adnotationes 30–31).

This one-sided orientation toward the Near Eastern missions was further indicated by the writers listed in the Adnotationes. Writings concerning pagan missions were conspicuous by their absence. To be sure, the Carmelite Thomas a Jesu, whose mission theories drew upon the provincial of the Jesuits in Peru, José de Acosta, S.J.,[21] was mentioned twice for the purpose of cementing claims of papal and episcopal jurisdiction.[22] However, no instruction from the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith was adduced, neither the fundamental one of 1659 nor the equally recognized handbook on missionary method, Monita ad Missionarios (1669). Two specifically cited chief witnesses of the schema were the canonists and experts on the canon law of the Eastern rite Churches: Angelo Maria Verricelli and his Tractatus de Apostolicis Missionibus[23] and the Franciscan Carolus Franciscus a Breno and his Manuale Missionarium Orientalium.[24]

Aside from the deficient treatment of the pagan missions and their problems, the centralistic orientation of the schema encountered opposition. It was less a question of papal infallibility, to which all representatives of the missions agreed, than of the concentration of jurisdiction and administration of the missions in the hands of the bishops and vicars apostolic, which implied the virtual exclusion of the orders. After the mission schema had been distributed toward the end of June 1870, twenty-seven council fathers submitted extensive observations. Almost all of them opposed the intended exclusion of the superiors of orders; this view was not only held by the generals such as the general of the Society of Jesus, Petrus Beckx, but also by representatives of the home episcopate of the secular clergy.[25] Behind the tendency toward centralization, no matter how carefully and cautiously it was formulated, was concealed a noticeable rejection of the missionizing orders, especially of the Jesuits. After all, most of the members of the commission belonged to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, and Monsignor Giuseppe Valerga, the Latin patriarch of Jerusalem, the most influential representative of the orders (O.F.M.), virtually spoke for the prefect of the Propaganda, Cardinal Barnabo.[26] For a specialist of missionary history, their aversion was clearly indicated by the positive evaluation of the disastrous actions of Bishop Juan de Palafox y Mendoza of Puebla in Mexico against the missionary orders.[27] Additionally, a mission directory was to promote uniformity of missions in all mission areas; its precise constitution was left to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith.[28] This suggestion also was made by Monsignor Valerga, who in his verdict acknowledged that while the Monita ad Missionarios contained valuable admonitions, it was incomplete and lacked the necessary authority.[29]

---

[20] While the text in the schema (10–17) is general, the Adnotationes 26–30 clearly refer to the clergy of the Near East, for in the real mission countries, including the patronage countries, the regulation of the Council of Trent had been in effect for centuries. They were also being followed for the education and training, and the conduct and work of the clergy.

[21] P. Charles, "Les sources de De Procuranda salute omnium Gentium," Scientia Missionum Ancilla (Festschrift Mulders), (Nijmegen 1953), 31–63.

[22] Schema 24, 28.

[23] Venice, 1656.—That this book, according to the title of missionary character, was designed primarily to serve the Near Eastern missions, becomes clear from the appendix which examines the validity of the ordinations of bishops and priests in the Near Eastern Churches. (Streit I, 233).

[24] Venice, 1726. Streit I, 379–80.

[25] A. M. Hoffman, "Die Vollmachten der Missionsbischöfe über Ordensmissionare auf dem Vatikanischen Konzil," NZM 12 (1956), 267–75. Hoffman used the expert opinions which were published by Mansi in volume 53.

Faced with this atmosphere, which was not exactly favorable to the pagan missions, the missionary bishops resorted to a kind of self-help in regional bishops' conferences.[30] The Indian and Chinese bishops met separately. The eighteen vicars apostolic of India directed a petition to the Pope requesting him to do away with the Portuguese right of patronage, in which they saw the greatest obstacle to the conversion of India. But Pius IX did not think that he could accede to their request.[31] The gathering of the Chinese bishops developed into a kind of synod. The soul of these meetings, which from 22 December 1869 onward took place once a week and then twice a week, was the vicar apostolic of Kweichow, Monsignor Louis Faurie, who also acted as the secretary of the gatherings.[32] The basis of their discussions were seventy-two questions submitted to the bishops by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. In addition, the participants were chiefly concerned with the relationship of the Chinese missions to the French government, respectively to the French protectorate. Some of the non-French bishops absented themselves from the sessions dealing with a letter of gratitude to Napoleon III.[33] There was no doubt that all of the French missionaries recognized the protection by their government, whose effective strengthening was repeatedly mentioned in the sessions on the letter to Napoleon. The letter was sent on 10 March 1870.[34]

---

[26] R. Aubert, "La composition des commissions préparatoires du premier concile du Vatican," Reformata reformanda (Münster 1965), 473–77.

[27] Schema 25, where only the steps taken against the Jesuits are emphasized. The arguments by the canonist A. M. Verricelli, employed by him in his book of 1656 for the defense of the bishop of Mexico, were refuted by his very contemporaries, especially by the learned Jesuit Diego de Avendaño.

[28] Schema 20; P. Wanko, op. cit., 35–37.

[29] Ting Pong Lee, op. cit., 134–36.

[30] Pius IX specifically authorized such group meetings of the bishops (R. Aubert, Le Pontificat, 323).

[31] Delacroix III, 84. Even though he traces the instruction of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith of 8 September 1869 to the activity of the council participants from India, the indication can not be correct chronologically, as the Indian bishops had not yet arrived in Rome at that time. The document is a consequence of the papal visitation by Bishop E. Bonnand.

[32] A. Launay, Histoire des Missions de Chine. Kouy-Tcheou II (Paris 1908), 598–612 (Launay published the draft of the protocol from the archives of the Paris Mission Seminary); I. Ting Pong Lee, De congressu praesulum Missionum sinensium Concilio Vat-

The questions of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith dealt with by the bishops of China concerned the establishment of an apostolic delegation or nunciature, to which the bishops reacted skeptically and negatively, as they were jealous of their independence; the division of the Chinese mission into five regions, specifically with respect to the holding of regional synods; the appointment of a council for the vicars apostolic and of another council for mission estates and the regular clergy in missions; the Chinese clergy, its education and training, which should be of a kind allowing them to administer a mission or become bishops;[35] liturgical questions; feast and fast days;[36] the significance and spread of Christian literature and schools; and the administration of the sacraments.[37] icano durante. Commentarium pro Religiosis et Missionariis 29 (Rome 1948), 104–11 (according to the protocol in the archives of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, vol. 242, 1874); L. Wei Tsing-sing, "Le Ier concile du Vatican et les problèmes missionnaires en Chine," RHE 57 (1962), 500–523, based on Launay, supplemented with documents of the Foreign Office in Paris.

---

[33] Wei Tsing-sing, op. cit., 513. Wei deals almost exclusively with the political side of the meetings, while Ting Pong Lee emphasizes the missionary and pastoral aspects.

[34] Unfortunately, Launay, op. cit., 607, published only a fragment of this letter. We do not know who signed this petition of thanks. The author was Monsignor A. Languillat, S.J., the vicar apostolic of Kiangnan.

[35] On the whole, the bishops reacted positively to this question, but were also in favor of proceeding slowly and cautiously. (A. Launay, op. cit., 602–3).

[36] The bishops preferred Chinese as the liturgical language, but were willing to leave the decision to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. (Ting Pong Lee, op. cit., 108).

[37] With respect to the administration of baptism, the discontinuation of the baptismal ceremony according to the Roman rite and its distribution over the entire period of the catechumenate was rejected, but it was required that all questions should be put in the Chinese language (Ting Pong Lee, op. cit., 109). —This decision was a compromise, for the missionaries of the Paris Mission Seminary, most recently Monsignor Faurie, in the eighteenth century had introduced the division of the baptismal ceremony in their dioceses. But in 1866 this practice was expressly forbidden by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith (J. Beckmann, "Taufvorbereitung und Taufliturgie in den Missionen vom 16. Jahrhundert bis zur Gegenwart," NZM 15 [1959], 20–21).

On 14 July 1870 a final session of all Chinese bishops was called, the only one which was chaired by the cardinal prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. Thirteen problems were discussed; some of them had been discussed earlier, others were new, like the problem of opium and the use of Chinese hymns in liturgical and paraliturgical celebrations.[38] All decisions of the Chinese bishops were to be submitted to the council fathers for final disposition. Considering the second-class standing of the missionary bishops, it is not astonishing that not one of them played an eminent role at the Vatican Council.[39]

The weakness of the missionary climate of the council as a whole was shown by the single postulate on the African missions.[40] It was short and impressive, carried a brief rationale, and demanded effective steps on the part of the council for the conversion of the blacks, especially in central Africa. The author was Daniel Comboni, the founder of the Missionaries of Verona, missionary, and future vicar apostolic of central Africa. It is dated 24 June 1870 and was signed by seventy council fathers. These signatures, especially in the context of what was said above, present a clear picture of the lack of interest in missions. Although Comboni rushed from man to man like a beggar, appealing for the conversion of Africa, he only met large-scale incomprehension. He was best received by the representatives of the Near Eastern Churches; together with the missionary bishops of the Near East, they provided thirty-one signatures.[41] Of the residing bishops, twenty-five signed.[42] Even of the actual mission bishops only fifteen signed their names: six from India and nine from Far Eastern countries.

Given the lack of interest in missions among the council fathers and the almost systematic displacement of the pagan missions to the margin of the council, no profound reflections on the missions were produced. Nevertheless, the Vatican Council acted as a stimulant and guide for mission theory during the subsequent period.[43] Among the votes and postulates, especially of the French and Chinese bishops, there were programmatic suggestions, some of which were put into action under the more relaxed pontificate of Leo XIII, while others had to wait for the twentieth century and the Second Vatican Council. In their submission to the council, the French bishops considered deliberations on the dissemination of the faith as one of the primary, most significant and important matters with which the council ought to deal. At the same time, they anticipated their great responsibility for the missions. So that they could perform their tasks better, they asked for regular reports from the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith concerning the status and problems of the pagan missions.[44]

---

[38] Ting Pong Lee, op. cit., 109–11.

[39] L. Wei Tsing-sing, op. cit., 508.

[40] P. Chiocchetta, "Il Postulatum pro Nigris Africae Centralis al Concilio Vaticano I e i suoi precedenti storici e ideologici," ED 13 (1960), 408–47 (text of the Postulatum, 409–11, signatures, 412–14).

[41] The absence of the signature of Monsignor Lavigerie, the bishop of Algiers, was particularly noticeable.

[42] Of these, six were North Americans, two were Brazilians, one was German, and the others were Italian. P. Chiocchetta (op. cit., 415ff.) somewhat artificially attempts to raise the significance of the individual signatures by drawing attention to their signers. But neither this positive evaluation nor the reference to the fact that the Sudan mission and Comboni's efforts were later promoted by Rome are a sufficient reason for his optimistic presentation. Comboni, who participated in the council as theologian for the bishop of Verona, was a "voice in the wilderness."

---

[43] P. Wanko, op. cit., 16–23.

[44] J. Moreau, L'Épiscopat français et les missions à l'heure du Ier Concile du Vatican: Missions de l'Église (Paris 1962), 8–13; see also R. Aubert, Vaticanum I (Mainz 1965), 295.

SECTION THREE

Light and Shadows of Catholic Vitality

CHAPTER 14

Regular and Secular Clergy

Orders and Congregations

The pontificate of Pius IX saw a new and decisive phase in the internal reorganization of the old orders and an expansion of the new congregations. To be sure, the orders were hard hit by secularization measures in southeastern Europe, Poland, and Latin America, but in western Europe and in North America there was a continuing quantitative and qualitative growth. The orders constituted an essential factor in the flourishing of religious organizations and the intensification of spiritual life.

Pius IX himself was not a member of an order, but like his predecessors Pius VII and Gregory XVI concerned with the restoration of discipline. The consolidation during the first half of the century enabled him, with the assistance of Monsignor Bizzarri, the energetic and competent secretary of the Congregatio Episcoporum et Regularium, to raise his aspirations. Immediately after his election he established a commission of cardinals in September 1846 and charged it with restoring the life of the orders in those countries in which they had suffered as a consequence of disorder. In the next year he created the Congregatio super statu regularium, with the specific function of supervising the reforms.[1] Two decrees of 25 January 1848 strengthened the precautionary measures taken to prevent the admission of unworthy candidates to the novitiate.[2] An encyclical of 1851 tightened the requirements of communal life and of poverty (although prudently retaining the toleration of the peculium). The enclyclical Neminem latet[3] of 19 March 1857 extended a requirement to all monastic orders which heretofore was only applied to the

---

[1] Collectanea in usum Secretariae S. Congr. Episcoporum et Regularium (Rome 1863), 867–68, and Acta Pii IX I, 46–54.

[2] Collectanea . . . , 882–902.

[3] Collectanea . . . , 904–6. Twenty-four explanations by the congregation Super statu regularium from 1857 to 1882 supplemented the new rules (see also Acta Pii IX III, 417–20).

Jesuits: the obligation to precede the solemn profession of vows with temporary vows. In order better to counter the loosening of morals and customs which had crept in during the preceding centuries, Pius IX did not limit himself to encouraging centralization within the orders and to emphasizing more strongly their dependence on the Roman congregations; in several cases he did not hesitate to appoint their superiors himself. In 1850, for example, he designated the reformer Don Casaretto as abbot of Subiaco and assisted him during the following year in Casaretto's efforts to reorganize in a new province those monasteries which were desirous of returning to a stricter observance of the Benedictine rules.[4] In 1852 it was the Pope's admonition which induced the monastery of Monte Cassino, where discipline had become very lax, to reintroduce seclusion and communal life and to regroup the novitiates.

During his refuge at Gaeta Pius IX had noted the deplorable conditions prevailing among the Redemptorists in the Kingdom of Naples, where their generalate was located, in contrast to the progress of the congregation north of the Alps.[5] For this reason he decided in 1853 to move their headquarters to Rome and to appoint their general, a function which normally would have been exercised by the chapter general of the order.

In order to remove the decadent features which had begun to characterize the Dominicans, he decided in 1850 to abolish the election of the master general. Much to the dismay of the Italian members, he named Father Jandel, one of Lacordaire's early associates, as head of the order. Jandel remained master general until 1872 and finished the movement of restoration. Characteristically, his efforts were guided by the initial concepts of the order, which the historical research of the eighteenth century had brought to light again. Thus, the closings to which the order had been subjected since the French Revolution and which in some countries continued beyond 1870[6] at least had the advantage of completely clearing the slate of the most recent past. The fact that the provinces of the order had to be restored from new houses facilitated the return to the original guidelines. This was not as simple as it sounds, as Jandel, who tended to cling to traditional forms, came in opposition to Lacordaire, who had a better feeling for the necessity of accommodation to the requirements of modern times.

---

[4] A few years later, in 1867, this province was raised to an independent congregation, the Congregatio cassiniana primitivae observantiae, which, like the modern orders, was divided into four provinces: Italy, Anglo-Belgium, France, and Spain (see I. Di Brizio, L'Italia benedettina [Rome 1929], 103–44).

[5] Despite some vicissitudes in Austria in 1850 (see E. Zettl in Spicilegium historicum Congr. SS. Redemptoris 6 [1958], 353–404; E. Hosp in ibid. 7 [1959], 260–354).

[6] Between 1844 and 1876, the number of Dominicans in Italy decreased from 1602 to 830, in Russia and Poland from 709 to 65, and in Latin America from 626 to 315. In spite of a regular increase in western Europe, especially France, the total number in 1876 was only 3,341 compared to 4,562 in 1844.

Pius IX also repeatedly (1856, 1862, 1869) intervened in the designation of the general of the Franciscan order; in 1856 it resumed the long interrupted practice of chapters general and revised its statutes. Gradually the order reestablished itself in the various countries of western and central Europe. But the order also suffered new and serious losses in consequence of the secularization in the Latin countries. At the chapter of 1856, ninety provinces were represented, but in 1882 only thirty were still in existence, and the number of members during this quarter of a century decreased from twenty-five thousand to fifteen thousand.

Even though the reform attempts instigated or encouraged by Pius IX produced good results fairly rapidly in the centralized orders, the same efforts met resistance from the abbeys, especially in central Europe, which had remained largely independent. The great canonical visitation conducted by Cardinals Schwarzenberg and Scitowsky in the Habsburg Empire between 1852 and 1859 had no noticeable results.[7] Yet the Premonstratensians gradually revived and in 1869 held their first chapter general since the French Revolution. Former Cistercian abbeys were reopened and regrouped in new congregations. The Belgian congregation was established in 1846, the Austro-Hungarian congregation in 1859,[8] and that of Sénanque in southern France in 1867. The young branch of the Benedictines, planted by Dom Guéranger at Solesmes, also began to bear fruit. While progress in France was slow and difficult and really came into its own only during the following pontificate, the brothers Wolter, who in 1863 founded the German abbey at Beuron,[9] completed their training at Solesmes. As early as 1872, Beuron founded a branch monastery at Maredsous in Belgium, and additional foundings were made in Austria-Hungary during the Kulturkampf.

The example of Beuron demonstrates that it did not always require the initiative of the Holy See to revive old orders and congregations. Some of them, in fact, made remarkable progress on their own. This was the case, for example, with the Christian Brothers, who under the prudent leadership of their general superior Philippe (1838–74) increased their membership from twenty three hundred to more than ten thousand. While most of their members were recruited in France, they succeeded in establishing themselves all over the world. The same was true of the Passionists, who under the generalate of Antonio di San Giacomo (1839–62), known as the "Second Founder," tripled the number of their members and provinces and concentrated on missionary work (Rumania, Brazil, and Australia).

---

[7] C. Wolfsgruber in SM 32 (1911), 304–29, 477–502, 665–92, 33 (1912), 109–30.

[8] N. Konrad, Die Entstehung der österreichisch-ungarischen Zisterzienserkongregation, 1849–69 (Rome 1967).

[9] See Beuron 1863–1963 (Beuron 1963), to be corrected in several points according to P. Wenzel, Der Freundeskreis um Anton Günther und die Gründung Beurons (Essen 1965).

In particular, the Society of Jesus demonstrated its vitality. The first years of the pontificate of Pius IX were rather difficult for the order. On one hand the Jesuits had to meet general attacks on them in most of the European countries, and on the other they received only lukewarm support from the Pope. He was irritated by the covert resistance of many Jesuits to his concessions to the liberal cause. But the aftereffects of 1848 brought the Pope closer to the Jesuits again, especially after Father Roothaan, with whom the Pope did not get along too well, was replaced in 1853 by Father Beckx.[10] For more than thirty years he led the society with prudence and intuition and saw to it that the Jesuits refrained from any polemics and avoided involvement in politics. The frequency with which his intervention was required indicated, however, that not all Jesuits agreed with him on this issue. Although the Jesuits suffered from fourteen cases of expulsions and confiscations during a thirty-year period in all Catholic countries of Europe, with the single exception of Belgium, and especially in Latin America,[11] the society increased its membership from 4,540 in 1848 to 10,030 in 1878. The influence of the Jesuits steadily increased. On the level of the regional Churches they were effective in missions to the parishes and through other organizations; their colleges and sermons and their contacts with the upper classes were invaluable. On the level of the universal Church, the Gregorian University and the journal La Civiltà cattolica gave them an important voice. They also were involved in the Roman congregations, in which neither the secular nor the regular clergy had men as competent as the Jesuits. And finally there was the growing confidence of Pius IX, who after his earlier bias against them recognized the value of the discipline of their training and their devotion to the Holy See.

---

[10] On Petrus Beckx (1795–1887), Belgian, see K. Schoeters, op. cit., who confirms that in contrast to the frequent assertions during his lifetime, Beckx was basically a moderate.

[11] The systematic mistrust by the liberal bourgeoisie of the Jesuits is not sufficient to explain everything. Much is due to the ineptitude of the Jesuits themselves, who had difficulty, especially in the Latin countries, in adapting themselves to modern thinking (see, for example, J. Kennedy, Catholicism, Nationalism, and Democracy in Argentina [Notre Dame 1958], 61).

In comparison to the Jesuits, the new congregations and institutes attracted much less attention. Between 1862 and 1865, seventy-four new congregations and institutes received papal approbation, compared to forty-two such approvals between 1850 and 1860. Aside from the fact that many of them were destined to have a glorious future—the Salesians founded in Turin in 1857 by Don Bosco come to mind—the global significance of their capillary effectiveness in all areas of the apostolate must not be underrated. They were active in education, especially that of girls; the care of the sick; social work, which became increasingly specialized for orphans, old people, domestics, young working girls, prisoners, the blind, the deaf; catechetical instruction; publishing; and missions. The development, going hand in hand with the growth of the congregations founded during the first half of the century, was universal. There were the congregations of priests who followed the versatile guidelines of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in pursuing their many activities; the confraternity institutes, which were well attended at a time when admission to the high schools, which alone paved the way toward the priesthood, was still a privilege; and countless women's organizations, many of which placed themselves under the protection of the Virgin Mary (Daughters of the Heart of Mary, Daughters of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, Daughters of Mary Immaculate, Little Sisters of the Assumption, Oblate Sisters of the Assumption, and Praying Sisters of the Assumption).

Rome did its best to channel these forces and to limit the increase of tiny congregations, which occasionally created the impression of ecclesiastical anarchy. On the other hand, of course, they served the interests of many priests and of many women willing to place their energy in the service of charity, especially as they could do justice to the various needs on the local level. The Congregatio Episcoporum et Regularium continued to encourage especially those congregations which under a superior general could group together a number of communities whose activities were not confined to one diocese or even one country. But it also had to take account of the differences in languages and customs or of the objection that this necessitated excessively long journeys for the members of these congregations. Additionally, there was the fact that many countries objected to seeing their religious institutions under the control of foreigners. Monsignor Bizzarri knew how extraordinarily varied intentions and local customs were and was smart enough to avoid prescribing a uniform constitution. At least until 1860 he left it up to each congregation to draft its own statutes and limited himself to examining them and making occasional suggestions for change. In 1862 he then published a Methodus quae a S. Congregatione Episcoporum et Regularium servatur in approbandis novis institutis votorum simplicium.[12] It did not yet have the force of law, but was an attempt to lay down some common norms. Gradually and under the pressure of events a new rule for members of institutes emerged. It was codified only much later, as the Vatican Council, which was supposed to pass on it, did not have enough time to deal with the eighteen decrees prepared for the purpose.

While Rome proved itself flexible, many congregations considered it their obligation to come up with the regulation of minutiae. They were generally religiously inspired, but it was easy to place rules ahead of the gospel; it was a consequence of the general tendency of the spirituality of the time, which, devoid of solid doctrinal foundations, resorted to mere recipes. The education of women, as it was understood at that time, intensified such tendencies. Nevertheless, many people who were inspired by the Christian faith willingly accepted such completely superfluous restrictions in order to be able to devote themselves to the many needs of the daily life of the church. They constituted an impressive testament to the high-minded convictions of an age which in so many other respects was bourgeois and materialistic.

The Diocesan Clergy and Pastoral Work

Even though we have a number of biographies of priests, sociological studies of the middle level of clergy in the countries of the nineteenth century are still rare. Yet it is possible to arrive at some common denominators. Without a doubt there were substantial differences between a French village priest, the vicar in an industrial area of the Rhineland or Belgium, the owner of a benefice in Austria-Hungary, a Spanish dean, a Sicilian priest, and an immigrant pastor in the United States. Somehow, from the various national traditions and the different life styles, there emerged over the years the classical type of Catholic pastor. The worldly priest playing the role of an intellectual in the salons of Paris, the scholar whose benefice afforded him enough leisure to pursue his studies, the rural parish priest with loose morals only distinguishable by his habit from the mass of his flock, all of them became, especially in western Europe, exceptional cases after 1850. The distinct rise in the spiritual standards of the clergy was one of the most characteristic aspects of Church history in the course of the pontificate of Pius IX. This development was dear to the heart of the Pontiff and he constantly returned to it in his encyclicals, speeches, and especially in his private correspondence.

---

[12] Collectanea in usum Secretariae S. Congr. Episcoporum et Regularium, 828–66; see F. Callahan, The Centralization of Government in Pontifical Institutes of Women (Rome 1948), 43–68.

This development of the clergy was the result of education received in the seminaries. Most candidates for the priesthood now had to undergo such an education and training, often starting in childhood. This was, of course, a hothouse atmosphere, rather deficient in intellectual content (only a part of the German and Austrian clergy still attended the regular universities), even though the clergy was imbued with high spiritual and pastoral ideals. The ideal had been formulated by Saint Sulpice, which directly or indirectly served as model for all of Europe and America. The clergy's development was also the product of the systematic efforts of many bishops with high standards of office. While there was only one Manning to write a book like The Eternal Priesthood, many others in their revised diocesan statutes or at the provincial synods prescribed a variety of pious exercises, recommended weekly confession, the holding of periodical retreats and possibly monthly recollections.[13] These episcopal objectives corresponded to the spontaneous efforts of a growing number of priests who gathered in associations, better to promote their aims. Some of them soon acquired international renown, such as the Apostolic Union of Secular Priests, founded in 1862 by V. Lebeurier, a member of the Orléans cathedral chapter, and the Associatio perseverantiae sacerdotalis, founded in 1868 at Vienna by R. Koller.[14] At the same time, the influence of the regular clergy over the secular priests grew. The two branches of the clergy cooperated better and the secular priests relied on the publications of the orders for their spiritual guidance. Thus the regular clergy tended to intensify the tendency among the diocesan priests to an otherworldliness inculcated in them by the seminaries, even at the risk of losing touch with the people among whom they exercised their apostolate.

This was the obverse of the medal. It was less pronounced in the German-speaking countries than in the Latin countries in which the wearing of the soutane became a habit.[15] Thus, the question is legitimate whether ecclesiastical policy, followed by a large part of the Church with the more or less express encouragement of Pius IX, was not in fact ambivalent. Undeniably positive results, especially the raising of the spiritual quality of the clergy and a better understanding of the eminent dignity of the priestly function, were balanced by negative consequences. Father Martina was justified in asking whether the emphasis on clericalism resulting from this policy was not one of the causes of anticlericalism and the secularization of everyday life.[16] Daniel-Rops, a historian without any revolutionary proclivities, asked the pointed question: "Did the reaction to the excessive freedom of the period of crisis and the concern with discipline encourage the priests to live in a compartmentalized world, a world without windows on the real life of the people?" During the long years of training, except for Germany and Austria frequently starting at the age of thirteen, the teachers inculcated in the future priest the conviction that he had to become a man of prayer and live a withdrawn life of sacrifice. They taught him to celebrate the Mass correctly and to salve the pangs of conscience of his flock. It was therefore not surprising that priests frequently confined their activities to sacramental gestures and excluded themselves from everything that was not directly subject to their authority and might lead to abuses. When the priest kept away from popular festivals, he was not sufficiently aware that his distinction between what he considered to be good or bad was possibly nothing more than the difference between differing levels of culture, between the "bourgeois" and urban culture of the pastor and the culture of the broad masses of the people.[17]

---

[13] DSAM IV, 1937–40. The thirty-six bishops consulted in 1865 with respect to the program of the Vatican Council were unanimously in favor of requiring the clergy to conduct retreats every two or at the most every three years.

[14] F. Beringer, Die Ablässe II (Paderborn 1921), 367–69.

[15] R. Rouquette, "Une centenaire, la soutane," Études 314 (1962), 32–48.

But these aspects should not be generalized too much. Without a doubt, many priests in the villages and small towns everywhere confirmed the famous definition of Taine: "Loyal sentry duty in a guardhouse, obeying the watchword, and standing a lonely and monotonous guard." Their activity essentially consisted of celebrating the Mass—during the week only for a few women—of preaching the Sunday sermon, explaining the catechism to children, listening to confessions, and administering the last rites to the dying. But these conditions varied from country to country. A village priest in central or southern Italy was much more closely involved, occasionally much too much, in the daily lives of his flock than a French priest. In England and Ireland, the priests in the workers' quarters were not merely the spiritual fathers of their communities, but also acted as worldly advisers and occasionally were the leaders for their demands from the authorities. Even in those countries in which the restriction of the clergy to its purely ecclesiastical functions was most pronounced, there increasingly emerged, especially in the large city, an asceticism of action. It moved the clergy to engage in forms of the apostolate designed for conquest. Founders of religious congregations such as Father d'Alzon and Don Bosco clearly pushed their associates in this direction; but such thinking was not limited to the regular clergy. Dupanloup in his rural diocese encouraged his priests not to be content with waiting for the faithful in their churches, but to make home visits in order to arouse the indifferent; he tried to stimulate them to greater efforts through the introduction of social inquiries, of which he was a pioneer,[18] even though not the only one. Although the focus of priestly work continued to be the parish, a new type of priest in addition to pastors and vicars came into being: the leader of socio-religious organizations. This was by no means the beginning of the specialized apostolate of the twentieth century, but many priests began to suit the method of the apostolate to the various groups to which they ministered, such as craftsmen, the sick, women, and children. The phenomenon became so much common property that experiences were written up in such books as Méthode de direction des œuvres de jeunesse (1858) by Abbé Timon-David. The development was particularly strong in Germany, where after 1848 many different associations began to expand. While the proportion of laymen in them was rather high, many priests were very interested in them because they recognized them as a suitable means of the apostolate, in keeping with the requirements of modern times.

---

[16] RRosm 62 (1968), 409.

[17] D. Julia and W. Frijhoff in Concilium 5 (1969), 560. In contrast to widely accepted opinion, the clergy was recruited primarily from the small towns. During the further course of the century, the share of the rural areas increased, but the young clerics were thoroughly influenced with respect to culture by their long stays at seminaries.

These efforts to reach the faithful more effectively unfortunately all too often suffered from a great deficiency. They were more oriented toward defense than to proselytization and urged the "good people" to withdraw unto themselves and to do nothing to shorten the gap between them and the bad Christians and the faithless. The latter were regarded as people without loyalty and faith, with whom any attempt at conversion would be fruitless.[19] The same threat of confining Catholicism in a kind of intellectual ghetto, with its consequences for the apostolate, was also evident in the considerable efforts to develop a Catholic school system. The problem of education had already been raised during the pontificate of Gregory XVI, but the more education became common property, the more the clergy viewed education in a positively Catholic spirit as a necessity justifying any sacrifice. While in the German-speaking countries a solution acceptable to the Catholics was reached, the disappearance of Christian content in the public schools in many Latin countries, or their Protestant character in the Anglo-Saxon countries, caused the ecclesiastical authorites (at different rates in different countries) to establish a network of free Catholic schools. This was done parallel to the public school system and often in competition with it. In Great Britain, the system of parochial schools was generally confined to the elementary level of the parishes, but also comprised high schools, as in France, and even a Catholic university, as in Belgium. These efforts, repeatedly encouraged by the Holy See, had undeniably positive results, in spite of the dangers already mentioned. C. Marcilhacy has pointed to the concordance between the establishment of parochial instruction and the growth of religious practice and noted that cause and effect became intertwined. "The Christian areas most readily accepted the religious teachers and they in turn strengthened the influence of religion on the population."[20] [18] Details in C. Marcilhacy, Le diocèse d'Orléans sous l'épiscopat de Monseigneur Dupanloup (Paris 1962).

---

[19] Note the fitting observations in W. Ward, W.G. Ward and the Catholic Revival (London 1912), 121–23.

The conscientious zeal with which many priests devoted themselves to the three-fold tasks of parish, organization, and education was unfortunately devoid of the pastoral imagination necessary to rethink classical methods, allowing for the changes which civilization was undergoing. The lack of initiative was particularly worrisome in light of the problems posed by the growth of the large cities. While at the beginning of the nineteenth century there were only 20 cities with more than one hundred thousand inhabitants, they numbered 149 at the end of the century, among them 19 cities with more than half a million inhabitants each. Together they housed 47 million people in contrast to only 5 million in 1801. Although ever larger numbers of people moved from rural to urban areas and were cooped up in them, new parishes were established only slowly and belatedly.

Of course, the situation was not the same everywhere. In Great Britain and the United States, where Catholicism as a consequence of Irish immigration had an essentially urban character, serious work was accomplished. But in France, Italy, Belgium, and Catalonia the considerable increase in the number of only nominal Catholics was not seen as a sufficient reason for the division of a parish. During the final years of the century evidently only distances and transportation difficulties were considered, and rural areas were assigned a clear preference in pastoral organization. Inasmuch as the ecclesiastical authorites were chiefly concerned with what were regarded as the irreducible needs of the rural population, from which the seminaries obtained a large number of their students, they raised the number of pastors in the growing urban parishes only meagerly. Needless to say, this neglect made personal contact between the priest and his flock increasingly difficult. Finally, looking at the continuing urban de-Christianization, which eventually could no longer be ignored, only very few leaders of the Church recognized that an increase in the number of churches or in the personnel of the parishes was much less important than the discovery and application of new methods of the apostolate, which alone would make it possible to reestablish effective contact between the rootless masses of the proletariat and the Church.

---

[20] C. Marcilhacy, op. cit., 312.

Even though the clergy was very derelict in this respect, it at least quickly placed the periodical press in the service of the apostolate. During the second quarter of the century the clergy had encouraged the publication of periodicals for the educated class and had actively participated in such enterprises. Now a new, more popular type of publication was developed, the church newspaper, which indicated the hours of services in the various parishes of a district and listed the Catholic associations. This kind of publication had been in existence in Germany since the 1840s, including Catholic weeklies of general interest.[21] They appeared in France after 1850 and especially after 1862 (fifty-seven Semaines religieuses in twenty years).[22] In Belgium, the first religious weekly appeared in 1866 at Tournai and six others were added during the subsequent fifteen years. During the same time period there also appeared the first journals designed specifically for the clergy, such as the Theologisch-praktische Quartalschrift in 1848 in Austria, the Mélanges théologiques (concerned chiefly with practical questions of canon law) in 1847 in Belgium,[23] and the Irish Ecclesiastical Record in 1865. All of these initiatives bore witness to a rather active clergy increasingly cognizant of its responsibility.

---

[21] R. Pesch, Die kirchlich-politische Presse der Katholiken in der Rheinprovinz vor 1848 (Mainz 1966); R. Pesch, "Das Süddeutsche Katholische Kirchenblatt 1841/45, ein 'klassisches' Beispiel für die Übergangssituation der katholischen Kirchenblattpresse vor 1848 in Deutschland," FreibDiözArch 86 (1966), 466–89.

[22] E. Poulat, Les "Semaines religieuses". Approche historique et bibliographique (Paris 1958); A. Boyer-Mas, Centenaire de la "Semaine religieuse de Carcassone". Un siècle de vie diocésaine de l'Église 1868/1968 (Carcassone 1968).

[23] The Mélanges théologiques in 1869 became the Nouvelle revue théologique (see NRTh 56 [1929], 785–99).

CHAPTER 15

The Growth of Piety

The second third of the nineteenth century was accompanied by a profound and lasting change in piety, especially north of the Alps. Turning away from the strict and rather cold piety preached in Germany by Sailer and his people, in England by the former students of the seminary of Ushaw, in France by the products of Saint Sulpice, and in Italy by the spiritual heirs of the Jansenists of the Synod of Pistoia, within a decade or two there emerged a religiosity which was more sentimental and less rigoristic. It emphasized a more frequent reception of the sacraments and a greater exercise of external forms of piety. From now on piety was increasingly directed to the compassionate Christ pointing to his heart "which loves man," to Jesus, "the prisoner of love in the tabernacle," to Mary, among the more intuitive aspects of Notre-Dame de Lourdes, and to a number of popular saints like Saint Anthony and Saint Joseph, whom Pius IX in 1870 proclaimed as the patron of the Church. Pilgrimages, which had lost much of their importance in the eighteenth century, gained appeal again. In Germany, pilgrimages were made to Mariazell and Altötting; in Switzerland, to Einsiedeln; in France, to Chartres, Vézelay, La Sainte Baume, Rocamadour, La Salette, Lourdes, and Ars; in Spain, to Compostela, Montserrat, and Our Lady of Pilar; in Italy, to Assisi, Loreto, and Monte Gargano.

Several factors contributed to the change, beginning with the romantic enthusiasm for everything that was reminiscent of the Middle Ages: veneration of Mary, adoration of saints, veneration of reliquaries, processions, pilgrimages, and other public displays of faith. But a large role was also played by considered actions, such as the influence of Pius IX, who strongly promoted the new love of indulgences and who multiplied the opportunities for jubilee indulgences;[1] the influence of Roman-educated priests like the English Oratorian Frederick William Faber (1814–63) and the French prelate Gaston de Ségur (1820–81), who in many popular publications told the world why they were so delighted with expressions of popular piety in Italy; the influence of those who disseminated the works of Saint Alphonsus Maria de Liguori, which were suffused with confidence in divine providence, love for the Virgin Mary and the Eucharist; but chiefly the influence of the Jesuits with their optimistic and anti-Jansenist theology, whose impact was multiplied by the fact that they had become the chief preachers at retreats for secular and regular clergy.[2] It was partially owing to the Jesuits that piety became increasingly individualistic during the nineteenth century. But they also contributed much to the spread of the Sacred Heart of [1] Jubilee indulgences were announced not only on the occasion of the Holy Years of 1850 and 1875, but also at the time of the elevation of Pius IX to the chair of Saint Peter (1846), at the time of the pronouncement of the Immaculate Conception (1854), after the journey of the Pope through the Papal State (1857), on the tenth anniversary of the definition of Immaculate Conception (1864), on the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination as a priest (1869), and on the twenty-fifth anniversary of his pontificate (1871).

---

[2] One example: In France, Pierre Chaignon (1791–1883) conducted more than three hundred retreats for priests. Chaignon also wrote a Nouveau cours de méditations sacerdotales (1857) in five volumes (see DSAM II, 438–39).

Jesus veneration, to the introduction of closed retreats, and to silent prayer according to the Ignatian method as interpreted by Father Roothaan.[3]

The new orientation of piety, branded by the adherents of the old customs as one of the main sins of ultramontanism,[4] naturally also had its drawbacks: it was frequently insipid and infantile, as many simplistic church hymns[5] and a whole range of devotional literature demonstrate; good intentions did not exclude mediocrity and bad taste. It allowed too much room for miracles, prophecies, reports of stigmatizations, and the so-called revelations of Anna Katharina Emmerick.[6] At the very time when German historians, with the tools of modern methodology, were in the process of rewriting Church history on the strict basis of authentic documents, devotional literature was written by authors who virtually had no such standards. According to the principle that any type of tradition must be accepted as long as it promotes piety, they became fervent defenders of the most improbable tales of saints, which the Bollandists and the Maurists had swept away a century earlier. The zeal with which piety was promoted narrowed even further the horizon of believers who had lost contact with Bible and liturgy. On the other hand it must be acknowledged that this development, no matter how inept, was the healthy reaction of Christian sentiment to an attenuated Christianity bordering on deism, which in the preceding century had gained many converts. Confessions on a regular basis and admonition to take Communion more frequently once again drew attention to the essentially sacramental character of Catholic life. The orientation of the new piety to the Christmas crib,[7] to the cross, to the heart of Jesus, and to the Eucharist once again placed into the limelight the central reality of Christianity: Christ as the true God and true human being, the incarnation of divine love, who is asking each person to love him.

---

[3] J. de Guibert, op. cit., 464–67.

[4] An especially aggressive example: E. Michaud, L'esprit et la lettre de la piété (Paris 1869). "This is the blemish of contemporary Phariseeism in the area of piety," he wrote to Döllinger (ZSKG 58 [1964], 313).

[5] C. Rozier, Histoire de 10 cnatiques (Paris 1966).

[6] They were first published by the poet Clemens Brentano, then by the Redemptorist K. E. Schmöger (3 vols. [Regensburg 1858–60]); immediately translated into several foreign languages, they were a great success. Concerning the question of to what extent Brentano interpolated the notes which he took at the bedside of the stigmatist with older writings (by Martin von Cochem, for example) and with his own imagination, historians are of divided mind. More recent historians are less strict than W. Hümpfner (See DHGE XV, 432–33).

[7] Concerning the veneration of the Childhood of Jesus in the 19th century, see DSAM IV 679–80.

Eucharistic piety as yet had no feeling for liturgical life as a community-embracing aspect; instead, Communion was seen as the wellspring of special grace and the real presence as the object of veneration. The reaction to the Jansenist strictures on Communion became increasingly pronounced after the middle of the century. In France, Monsignor de Ségur became the fervent and tireless herald of frequent Communion. His book La très sainte communion (1860), in which he advised the faithful to take Communion at least once a week and, if possible, every day or every second day, created a storm of indignation among the old clergy. But the book saw a printing of 180,000 copies in France, was translated into German, English, Spanish, Portuguese, and Flemish, and hailed in a papal brief (29 September 1860). The encouragement for such dissemination came chiefly from Italy. In his Il convito del divino amore (1868), Frassinetti defended frequent Communion in the name of Christian antiquity, and Don Bosco declared himself in favor of early Communion, which had been fashionable in southern Italy for a long time. In 1851 the Council Congregation corrected a chapter of the provincial synod of Rouen, which had forbidden children under thirteen to be admitted to Communion. In 1866 Cardinal Antonelli, in a letter to the French bishops, sharply condemned the custom of delaying First Communion until a later, precisely prescribed age.

Also from Italy came the various forms of venerating the sacrament of the altar. They became very popular during the second half of the nineteenth century and were adopted as their very own concern by a number of congregations founded during this period. The "Perpetual Adoration" officially recommended by Pius IX in 1851 was propagated in England by the two converts Faber and Dalgairns, was introduced in Canada by Monsignor Bourget, and was accepted in the United States in the decade between 1850 and 1860. In France, where it was already being employed in two dioceses at the time that Pius IX ascended the throne of Saint Peter, it was adopted by twenty dioceses between 1849 and 1860 and by another thirty-seven dioceses during the subsequent fifteen years. The Roman custom of nocturnal veneration was introduced in Germany by the Carmelite Hermann Cohen, a Jewish convert, famous preacher, and talented composer of several stirring hymns in honor of the Eucharist. In 1848 he introduced this custom in France with the assistance of Abbé de La Bouillerie; thirty years later the custom had been adopted by twenty dioceses and flourished particularly in northern France, thanks to the efforts of Philibert Vrau.

In the case of the veneration of the Sacrament of the Altar, emphasis for a long time had been placed on the atonement for the humiliation inflicted on Jesus Christ. In France, this concept received a new interpretation: Atonement should be made no longer merely for the lapses of individual sinners, but for the attitude of the authorities, who were surrendering society to laicism. Engendered by this view, there emerged, also in France, toward the end of the pontificate of Pius IX, the idea of holding international Eucharistic Congresses. The reason behind the idea was two-fold. The apathetic masses were to be brought closer to the Eucharistic Presence by the drama of grandiose rallies, and make Catholics, intimidated by anticlerical policies, aware of their numbers and their strength. The idea was inspired by the pious lay Christian E. Tamisier, who was encouraged by Monsignor de Ségur and two bishops from neighboring countries, Monsignor Mermillod (Fribourg, Switzerland) and Monsignor Doutreloux (Liège, Belgium). The original thought was to exploit the new interest in pilgrimages for the staging of special pilgrimages of atonement to the major sites which had been honored by a Eucharistic miracle. Various experiments were conducted on the local level between 1874 and 1877 and, publicized by sermons and pamphlets, gradually acquainted Catholics with this new type of mass demonstration. E. Tamisier then conceived the idea of combining the rallies with scholarly conferences in order to fashion them into genuine congresses with an international reputation. This idea was first put into practice at Avignon in 1876 and at Lille in 1881.

The devotion to the Sacrament of the Altar emphasized an especially important aspect of nineteenth century piety: It was more attracted to a union with the suffering Christ than to the glorious mysteries of the Easter message. In the spreading devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus several facets of this form of piety were addressed: deep sympathy with the pain of the pitiable victim of Golgotha, as the Middle Ages had felt it; compensation for the betrayal and the grave insults of sinners in the spirit of love and atonement, in keeping with the message of Marguerite Marie Alacoque; and, finally, the apostolic desire to complete what was missing in the suffering of Christ by assuming, as Christ's successors, the sins of humanity and their consequences. All in all a rather paradoxical aspect of this bourgeois, individualistic, and positivist century. This atoning and apostolic longing unfortunately had a weak theological foundation, which took too little account of the Corpus Christi mysticism and was too sentimental; in France, furthermore, it also had political implications.[8] The parish missions of the restoration period had spread the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, until then limited to a few elitist circles, to the parishes. The founding of Sacred Heart of Jesus associations, frequently encouraged by the bishops, often constituted the regular end or continuation of a parish mission. Many of the religious congregations founded during this period also emphasized the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus.[9] But it was the pontificate of Pius IX which earned the nineteenth century the name of the "Century of the Sacred Heart," suggested by Monsignor d'Hulst. Actively promoted by the Jesuits, the Sacred Heart of Jesus devotion was eagerly taken up by the faithful. To them, the realistic mysticism of this veneration appeared as the best means to protest against the rationalistic and pleasure-seeking trends of their time. After 1870, a new element was added in France: the tendency to combine the atoning veneration of the Heart of Jesus with thinking of the "Prisoner in the Vatican" and with the recollection of national defeat. This dual aspect provided the grandiose demonstrations of Paray-le-Monial and, after 1876, of Montmartre, where the church of Sacré-Cœur in the first year of its existence witnessed the presence of three cardinals, twenty-six bishops, and 140,760 pilgrims, with a peculiar and frequently unpleasant coloration.[10] [8] The legitimists, whose influence in Catholic life was very great, did not forget that during his imprisonment Louis XIV had promised to dedicate France to the Sacred Heart and that the people from the Vendée went into battle with this divine emblem sewn to their chests. The papal Zouaves put it on their flag. But on the whole, the purely Christian zeal in connection with this veneration, which was growing more popular, won out over the monarchistic tendencies.

---

Even if the impulse driving the masses to a veneration of the Sacred Heart of Jesus was emotional, a few theologians, following the example of Perrone, began to find a place for the idea of the Sacred Heart of Jesus piety in the doctrine of the "Word which had become man" and tried rather ineptly to define the theological basis for the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. Pius IX encouraged the movement. In 1856 he agreed to the wish of many French bishops and expanded the Sacred Heart of Jesus feast to the entire Church; in 1864 he beatified Marguerite Marie Alacoque.

The message of this mystic also contained a social element. Having long remained in the background, it was emphasized by ultramontane circles after the middle of the century. They tried to convince the entire world to acknowledge the absolute sovereignty of the Sacred Heart of [9] See E. Bergh, "La vie religieuse au service du Sacré-Cœur," Cor Jesu II, 457–498. Two congregations specifically dedicated to the Sacred Heart were founded in 1800; they were the Congregatio Sacrorum Cordium Jesu et Mariae (Picpus Association) and Madeleine Barat's Society of Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. Between 1815 and 1846 there were: one congregation of priests, one congregation of brothers and fifteen congregations of sisters in France; two congregations of sisters and one of priests in Italy; and two congregations of sisters in Belgium. Under Pius IX, however, there were three congregations of priests and nine of sisters in France; one congregation of priests and ten of sisters in Italy; three congregations of sisters each in Belgium, Spain, and the United States; and one congregation of sisters each in Germany, Lebanon, and Australia. The first foundings in Austria and Latin America date from the pontificate of Leo XIII.

---

[10] See Lecanuet I, 208–11, 378–80.

Jesus and the obligation to strive for its social domination. In this context the musician Verboitte composed the famous motet: "Christus vincit, Christus regnat, Christus imperat." Two French Jesuits, F. -X. Gautrelets and H. Ramière, started the apostolate of prayer. They started an association whose members once a month prayed for a special and joint concern. The particular project was announced each month with the approval of the Pope and explained in the Sacred Heart Messenger (since 1861), a publication which twenty-five years later was issued in sixteen national editions and was duplicated in many other countries. The movement of the Consecration of the Sacred Heart was guided by the same considerations, although theocratic sympathies also played a role. After the consecration of individuals, families, and orders, states were also solemnly consecrated (Belgium in 1869, Ecuador and France in 1873), and the consecration of the entire world to the Sacred Heart of Jesus was also demanded. In 1875, Father Ramière accordingly handed the Pope a petition signed by 525 bishops. But Pius IX decided not to act hastily and merely asked the Congregation of Rites to send Father Ramière a dedication formula, approved by the Pope, and to encourage him to have it read publicly on 16 June 1875, the bicentennial of the appearance of Christ to the blessed Marguerite Marie Alocoque. The response which the proclamation received throughout the world was one of the most solemn events ever experienced by the Catholic world.

The rise in the devotion to Mary happened somewhat later than the Sacred Heart devotion. In Spain, the very strong current, sustained for two centuries, had grown feeble toward the end of the eighteenth century and was only revived in the twentieth century. In Italy, the few publications dealing with the matter were very weak from the theological point of view. In France, the Marian revival during the restoration period had remained superficial and without theological force, in spite of some pious initiatives like that of Pauline Jaricot's "Living Rosary." Then, within a quarter of a century, a complete turnabout occurred. It started with a number of appearances by the Virgin Mary.[11] In 1830 she appeared to Catherine Labouré,[12] signaling the beginning of the Épopée de la medaille miraculeuse; in 1836, also in Paris, she appeared to the pastor of Notre-Dame des Victoires, an appearance which resulted in the establishment of an archconfraternity which grew rapidly and within forty years numbered eight hundred thousand members;[13] in 1846 she appeared to two children at La Salette in Savoy;[14] and Bernadette Soubirous saw her at Lourdes in 1858.[15] Marian congregations sprang up in all countries and May prayers became very popular after the 1830s.[16] The discovery of Grignion de Montfort's manuscript on the Traité de la vraie dévotion à la Sainte Vièrge, the first publication of which took place in 1843, provided the cult of Mary with another impulse. The final impetus was the solemn definition of the Immaculate Conception in 1854, the product of a number of petitions.[17]

---

[11] It is remarkable that the nineteenth century saw the appearance of the Virgin Mary alone, without Christ.

[12] L. Misermont, La blessée Catherine Labouré et la Médaille miraculeuse (Paris 1933); W. Durrer, Siegeszug der Wunderbaren Medaille (Freiburg i. Br. 1947); M. Pélissier, Le secret de la Reine (Paris 1957).

The intensity of the piety connected with Mary in the nineteenth century was also demonstrated by the names which religious congregations adopted when they were founded in this period. Between 1802 and 1898, not a single year passed that did not witness the founding of one or more congregations devoted to the Virgin Mary, with especially numerous foundings in the decades 1830–40 and 1850–60.[18] But there were dark sides to the cult of Mary as well. The forms assumed by the Marian rejuvenation were extremely uneven, sometimes infantile, and sometimes of such a nature that the Holy Office was compelled to take action. Mariological writings were of sad mediocrity.[19] Only a few theologians came up with valuable contributions, among them Passaglia and Malou on the occasion of the definition of Immaculate Conception, and Newman and Scheeben somewhat later. But theirs were isolated accomplishments and received little attention at the time.

---

[13] L. Blond, "L'abbé du Friche des Genettes" (unpubl. diss. [Paris 1960]); C. Savart, "Pour une sociologie de la ferveur religieuse, l'archiconfrérie de Notre-Dame des Victoires," RHE 59 (1964), 824–44.

[14] See E. W. Roetheli, La Salette (Olten 1945); La Bassette, Le fait de La Salette (Paris 1955); Pour servir à l'histoire réelle de La Salette. Documents I (Paris 1963); R. Laurentin in RSPhTh 48 (1964), 120–21.

[15] All earlier publications concerning Lourdes must be revised in light of the comprehensive documentation gathered by R. Laurentin in Lourdes. Documents authentiques, 7 vols. (Paris 1957–66); see also R. Laurentin, Lourdes. Histoire authentique des apparitions, 6 vols. (Paris 1961–64).

[16] In 1837, J. Beck published the first edition of Der Monat Mariae; by 1853 it had gone into its 5th edition.

[17] The petitions for the new dogma began in 1840 (fifty-one French prelates). The appeals resumed with the elevation of Pius IX in the face of resistance by Jansenist circles and German departments of theology. In response to an important memorandum by Perrone, Pius IX in June 1848 established a commission. In 1849, all bishops were consulted, and 90 percent of them were in favor of the petitions. The preparation of the bull of definition was rather difficult, and the bishops present in Rome participated in the final formulation. The definition was proclaimed on 8 December 1854 and occasioned rallies in the entire Catholic world (concerning some obstacles, see Aubert, Pie IX, 279, n. 3). Sources and literature: Pareri dell'Episcopato cattolico, di capituli, di congregazioni, di università . . . etc., sulla definizione dogmatica dell'immacolato concepimento della B.V. Maria, 10 vols. (Rome 1851–54); V. Sardi, La solenne definizione del dogma dell'immacolato concepimento di Maria santissima, Atti e documenti (Rome 1905); DThC VII, 1189–1218; Giulio da Nembro, La definibilità dell'Immacolata Concezione negli scritti e nell'attività di Giovanni Perrone (Milan 1961); W. Kasper, Die Lehre von der Tradition in der Römischen Schule (Freiburg i. Br. 1962), 231–66; G. Frenaud: Virgo Immaculata. Acta Congressus 1954 II (Rome 1956), 337–86; J. Alfaro in Virgo Immaculata. Acta Congressus 1954 II (Rome 1956), 201–75; R. Aubert in EThL 31 (1955), 63–99; G. Russo in Asprenas 10 (1963), 59–93.

However, not only Mariological literature was generally mediocre. This was true as well for all of the spiritual literature of that time, especially in the Latin countries, where the tastelessness of the "art of Saint Sulpice" had its counterpart in the "ghastly pamphlets of piety," so aptly castigated by Ernest Hello. The best pieces that showed up in France prior to 1860 were the many reprints of works of the French school of the seventeenth century, moderately well adapted to the prevailing taste of the common people. The works of the Jesuit Jean Nicolas Grou, a disciple of Jean Joseph Surin, fell into the same category. After 1860, the situation gradually improved thanks to the efforts of Lacordaire, Gratry, Perreyve, and Monsignor de Ségur. De Ségur was inspired by Saint Francis de Sales, whom A. J. M. Hamon had brought back into favor. Of great significance was Monsignor Charles Gay,[20] whose great book De la vie et des vertus chrétiennes (1874), imbued with the spirituality of Saint Paul and Saint John, experienced an unexpected and encouraging success.

The situation was somewhat better in England and Germany. England produced some original works, generally written by converts whose Anglican background had given them a much more pronounced knowledge of the Bible and patristics than was the case with most Catholics on the continent. Newman, Manning,[21] Dalgairns, and Faber deserve mention. Faber's book especially, translated into various languages, spread in all of Europe and the Anglo-Saxon countries a spirituality which was inspired by the Italian school of Saint Liguori and the great Oratorians of the seventeenth century. In Germany, Görres's important book Die Christliche Mystik inspired a series of scholarly works on speculative mysticism. Scheeben's first books, Natur und Gnade (1861) and Die Herrlichkeiten der göttlichen Gnade (1863), were actuated by the Greek Fathers, with whom his teacher Johannes Franzelin had acquainted him. But these were publications which were hardly accessible to the broad public. Yet, Germany could take the credit for introducing liturgical piety to the large mass of the faithful.

---

[18] See E. Bergh in Maria III, 465–88. France is in the lead, followed by Belgium, Italy, and Spain. Record years were 1850 and 1854; the former saw sixteen new congregations devoted to the Virgin Mary, the latter, fourteen.

[19] This remark was made by R. Laurentin (Maria III, 19). It had earlier been made by an unquestionable witness: Louis Veuillot (Mélanges: 2nd ser., V [Paris 1860], 605–6); confirmation in J. Pintard, Bulletin de la Société française d'études mariales 17 (1960), 119–50.

[20] On Charles Gay (1815–92), see B. du Boisrouvray, Monseigneur Gay, 2 vols. (Tours 1922).

[21] He emphasized the working of the Holy Ghost in the leadership of the Church and in the sanctification of souls; The Temporal Mission of the Holy Ghost (1865); The Internal Mission of the Holy Ghost (1875).

The liturgical renewal took its rise from the French Benedictine Dom Guéranger. The treasures which he collected in the volumes of his Année liturgique[22] unfortunately remained restricted to a small elite in his country, probably because his perspective, as well as that of his contemporary in the field of architecture, Viollet-le-Duc, too strongly reflected the interests of an archeologist who was interested in the most complete restitution of the Middle Ages possible.[23] In the German-speaking countries, the liturgical question had been raised in the 1830s and 1840s from the pastoral point of view by men like A. A. Hnogek, whose Josephinist Christkatholische Liturgik (5 vols. [Prague 1835–42]) is still of interest even today, and Anton Graf and Johann Baptist Hirscher, whose attempts to have laymen admitted to the chalice and to use vernacular languages in the Mass met strong opposition. The return to liturgical piety occurred in Germany during the following generation in a form which closely corresponded to medieval tradition. In 1864, Maurus Wolter, one of the founders of Beuron Abbey, translated into German the famous Exercitia spiritualia by Saint Gertrude von Helfta, which were oriented toward annual and daily spiritual observations. In a long enthusiastic introduction, Wolter acquainted the German public with the movement started by Dom Guéranger in France and explained its principles. In the following year he published the small book Choral und Liturgie, quoting whole pages from the introduction to L'année liturgique, and devoting a large amount of space to a summary of Guéranger's principal thought concerning the incomparable wealth of the spiritual food involved in liturgy. His booklet had a great response among large segments of the population. Parallel to it, Wolter wrote a patristic commentary on the Psalms, Psallite sapienter (5 vols. [1871–

---

[22] The reprints indicate a stronger interest only after 1875. See C. Savart, "Vie spirituelle et liturgie au XIX^{e} siècle," MD 69 (1962), 67–77.

[23] The positive aspects of the liturgical impact of Dom Guéranger are treated in O. Rousseau, op. cit., 1–24, 45–65, and F. Cabrol in Liturgia (Paris 1930), 864–72; the negative aspects are dealt with by H. Leclercq, DACL IX, 1636, and L. Bouyer, La vie de la liturgie (Paris 1960), 23–29.

90]), for monks in order to induce them to bring their spiritual life in step with liturgical life. What appears to us as a matter of course was very necessary at that time, for the influence of Ignatian methods had so profoundly affected the spiritual atmosphere of most of the Benedictine monasteries that worship often completely lacked the liturgical spirit. Following the example of his teacher Maurus Wolter, Dom Gérard van Caloen, a monk at Maredsous, in 1871 published the first Missel des fidèles in Belgium.[24]

---

[24] O. Rousseau, "L'œuvre liturgique de Monseigneur Van Caloen," QLP 17 (Louvain 1932), 79–91; A. Haquin, Dom Lambert Beauduin et le renouveau liturgique (Gembloux 1970), 8–13.

CHAPTER 16

The Backwardness of Religious Studies and the Controversy about the "German Theologians"

In his famous lectures to a gathering of Catholic scholars at Munich in 1863, Döllinger stated that only Germany was "tending the two eyes of theology, history and philosophy, with conscientiousness and thoroughness." Comparing the two competing schools of thought, the "German" one and the "Roman" one, he asserted that the former was defending Catholicism with rifles, while the latter was still using bows and arrows. His allegation created consternation in many circles. Today, with the benefit of a century of perspective, it must be admitted that Döllinger was right. Even if the erudite historian exaggerated the theological decadence of the Latin countries slightly, it can not be denied that it was in a wretched condition. Although the efforts of the German scholars in teaching and research were not totally perfect, there is no doubt that the departments of religious studies in German universities were able to maintain and to enlarge the lead which they had gained during the first half of the century. Outside of Germany there were hardly any centers of Catholic scholarship which could measure up to the achievements of Protestants and rationalists.

Religious Studies Outside of Germany

All observers, including those most devoted to the Holy See, were unanimous in deploring the extraordinary nadir of scholarship in Rome under Pius IX, the absence of organized libraries, and the lack of interest on the part of the papal leadership in teaching and research.[1] Yet, as paradoxical as it may sound, it was in Rome that the most serious work outside of Germany was conducted. This was in part due to foreigners working in Rome. One of them was the French Benedictine Pitra, who published patristic editions (philologically not entirely free of errors), and numerous important works on Eastern canon law and Byzantine hymnology. Another was the German Oratorian Augustin Theiner,[2] prefect of the Vatican Archives, a somewhat sloppy and restless spirit, who published several editions of sources which have been useful to this day. But there were not only foreigners. An associate of Cardinal Mai, the Barnabite Vercellone (1814–69), published some valuable Biblical textual criticisms. Christian archeology was Rome's very own science. It had awakened to new life under the pontificate of Gregory XVI, encouraged by this far-seeing Pope, Canon Settele, and the Jesuit Giuseppe Marchi. After the reorganization of the Museum Kircherianum, Marchi somewhat clumsily had begun the scientific exploration of the catacombs, which had been totally neglected since the seventeenth century. Pius IX sanctioned the new beginning with the creation of the Commissione di archeologia sacra in 1852. Marchi's work was continued by Father F. Tongiorgi, until 1886 professor at the Roman College, but Marchi's preferred student was Giovanni Battista De Rossi.[3] Even though after Fausti's evaluation he can no longer be regarded as the originator of Christian archeology, De Rossi was responsible for its strict scientific methodology, and he defined the rules of Christian epigraphy to such an extent that he became its virtual originator. After he had published the Inscriptiones christianae Urbis Romae (1857) and founded the Bollettino di archeologia cristiana in 1863, De Rossi wrote the comprehensive Roma Sotteranea cristiana. It revived the whole history of the Roman Church from its beginnings, dealing with its doctrine, its hierarchy, its liturgy, and its art. According to Cardinal Pie it was a new locus theologicus, but with exemplary scholarly scrupulousness De Rossi refused to exaggerate the meaning of facts for apostolic purposes. His treatment was the best possible one at that time, and H. I. Marrou said: "The great Mommsen acknowledged his work by refusing to include the Christian inscriptions of Rome in the program of the Corpus inscriptionum latinarum. It was the greatest honor that an Italian, Roman, and Catholic scholar could be accorded."[4]

---

[1] Some quotes are listed in Aubert, Pie IX, 184–85. In a letter of 25 February 1861 Ventura stated: "Everything of a scholarly nature emanating from Rome is wretched and proves that Rome has not the slightest understanding of the great questions of our time."

[2] On Augustin Theiner (1804–74), see H. Jedin in ArSKG 11 (1953), 247–50; see also the biography of his brother Anton by H. Hoffmann in ArSKG 9 (1951), 74–143, 10 (1952), 226–78, 11 (1953), 169–209, 12 (1954), 199–232, 13 (1955), 228–67.

[3] On Giovanni Battista De Rossi (1822–94), see LThK IX, 58–59 and H. Leclercq in DACL XV, 18–100.

There was also the Roman College. If its teaching was more akin to that of high schools than that of German universities,[5] and if the majority of the faculty was not known for its excellence, dogmatic theology at least was brilliantly represented. Passaglia,[6] Perrone's best-known student and, according to W. Kasper, one of the most brilliant theologians of the nineteenth century, taught at the college from 1844 to 1858. His theology rested on an infinite knowledge of the Greek Fathers, and was also influenced by Petau, Thomassin, and J. A. Möhler. He made up for his unfamiliarity with German by having his young colleague Clemens Schrader keep him informed of the important studies appearing in German.[7] Subsequently, Schrader largely followed the doctrines and methods of his older confraternity brother, albeit more scholastically and rigorously. When Schrader was appointed professor at Vienna (1857) and Passaglia was forced to leave Rome because of his involvement in the Italian cause, their work at the Collegium Romanum was carried on by the Austrian Johannes Baptist Franzelin.[8] He worked out a theology less striking than Passaglia's, but one that was more elegant and exact. It was based on criticism of the texts, monuments, and facts, utilizing the latest archeological discoveries, and employing his thorough knowledge of Eastern languages and the products of the German historical school. The solid and original works of these three teachers gave large room to positive theology and to speculation; their speculative theology was more concerned with an organic synthesis of the facts of faith based on the Bible than with a philosophical exploration of the truths of revelation.

Compared to their work, the Instructions synodales sur les erreurs du temps présent by Monsignor Pie,[9] long regarded as one of the masterworks of French theology in the nineteenth century, made a pitiful impression. Fighting against the naturalism of the time by presenting the supernatural aspects of Christ's passion and salvation, Pie's instructions were long on beautiful rhetoric and short on scholarly spirit. They were written in order to oppose writers like Cousin, who as yet had little influence on the younger generation. Although imbued with great powers of persuasion, they are a testament to the tremendous weakness of Catholic thought in France under the Second Empire. The theologians were still using the oratorical methods of romanticism, while the thinkers of this period were increasingly influenced by the results of the positive sciences and the detailed analyses of historical criticism. Characteristic in this context is the weakness of the refutation of Ernest Renan's basically rather superficial Vie de Jésus (1863).

---

[4] Aspetti della cultura cattolica nell'età di Leone XIII (Rome 1961), 81.

[5] Interesting details in the memoirs of Franz Hettinger, who studied there from 1841 to 1845: Aus Welt und Kirche I (Freiburg i. Br. 1911), chap. 1.

[6] On Carlo Passaglia (1812–87), see LThK VIII, 133. C. G. Arévalo drew attention to the significance of his book De Ecclesia Christi, in which he emerges as a precursor of the doctrine of the Mystical Body.

[7] Concerning Clemens Schrader (1820–75), see LThK IX, 482; DThC XIV, 1576–79; F. van der Horst, Das Schema über die Kirche auf dem I. Vatikanischen Konzil (Paderborn 1963), 52–56, 153–60.

[8] On Johannes Baptist Franzelin (1816–86), see LThK IV, 272–73, and G. Bonavenia, Raccolta di memorie intorno alla vita dell'Em. card. Franzelin (Rome 1877).

[9] Concerning his theological work, see Hocedez II, 265–67 and passim.

In the field of Church history, the inferiority of Catholics during the pontificate of Pius IX, with the exception of Germany, was most clearly visible. In Spain, the tradition of Flórez and Villanueva was interrupted for almost a hundred years. Italy also, aside from Christian archeology, lagged behind the eighteenth century. Even respectable scholars like C. Cantù and L. Tosti did not progress beyond the old concepts of historia magistra vitae with its emphasis on presentation at the price of critical content. True, there were in France two or three good books on positive theology. This does not include Freppel's studies of the Church Fathers, which were nothing more than eloquent popularizations, but refers to the Histoire du dogme catholique pendant les trois premiers siècles (1852) by Ginoulhiac and the two volumes of Monsignor Maret's Du concile général (1869), which displayed a good knowledge of Christian antiquity and some critical faculties. But Maret, like Bossuet, whom he followed without being too dependent on him, did not have sufficient talent for a genuine scholar and tended more toward synthesis than toward analysis.[10]

A good number of clerics used their free time for scholarly activity; most of them confined themselves to local researches and historiography, and as a consequence of their faculty training they rarely produced anything that exceeded the mediocre. More serious was the fact that the idea of apostolicity of the French Church, which had been discredited by the scholars of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, was taken up again in 1835 by the Sulpician Faillon, was again taught in the seminaries, found entrance in the history books, was supported by many bishops, and seemed to triumph with the appearance in 1877 of Les Églises du monde romaine by the Benedictine Chamard.[11] At the same time, the lack of associates forced the monks of Solesmes to discontinue the publication of Gallia christiana. This backwardness in the scholarly field was not even balanced by acceptable works of synthesis. The Histoire générale de l'Église depuis la création jusqu'à nous jours by Abbé Darras (1825–78) in forty-four volumes, enjoying great popularity in seminaries and parish houses with the blessing of L'Univers, revealed a total ignorance of the most elementary principles of the historical method.[12]

---

[10] R. Thysman in RHE 52 (1957), 401–65.

[11] A. Houtin, La controverse de l'apostolicité des Églises de France au XIX^e^ siècle (Laval 1900).

The situation was somewhat better in Belgium. The university of Louvain continued to produce respectable studies in the areas of Eastern studies, patrology,[13] and historical evaluations of canon law. The Bollandists, after having been restored in 1837, published six volumes of the Acta sanctorum between 1845 and 1867 and included Slavic sources and Celtic hagiography in their fields of endeavor. Their inspiration, however, the tireless V. de Buck, remained a gifted improvisor; only after his death in 1876 was the work of the group placed on a firm foundation by his successor, Charles de Smedt.[14]

In philosophy, the "other eye" of theology, the situation was more complex. The systems which in their struggle against rationalism denigrated the powers of reasoning to an excessive degree lost a part of their prestige after the condemnation of Lamennais and the difficulties experienced by Bautin. But many Catholics saw the interventions of the Holy See merely as warnings against excesses, and traditionalism continued to exist in attenuated form until the Vatican Council. This was the case especially in Italy and France, where traditionalism was represented by A. Bonnetty and the brilliant Italian polemicist Ventura,[15] whom the events of 1848 had forced to take refuge in France. In his Annales de philosophie chrétienne, Bonnetty continued to pursue his intention of proving the continued existence of original revelation. He sharply criticized the fateful influence of Aristotelian rationalism on the "hardly Christian" language of scholastic theology. Ventura conceded that the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, and the foundations of morality, once they are established, can also be proved by reason, but in contrast to the "Semi-Pelagians of Philosophy" argued the necessity of revelation for their primary knowledge and the importance of God-given language for the thorough study of these concepts. Traditionalism continued to be successful in spite of the criticism advanced by the defenders of the rights of reason from among the Jesuits[16] and the Sulpicians and in spite of a very hesitant renewed intervention of Rome.[17] Its success stemmed not only from the continuing fascination exercised by Lamennais upon his followers, but also from the agreement of the traditionalist system with an ultramontane attitude and the authoritarian inclinations of many Catholics after 1848. It was from this perspective that the attempts of the French ontologists derived their meaning, even though in contrast to Rosmini's system theirs found only limited acceptance. It started with a group of intelligent priests,[18] who recognized the danger posed by the growth of an authoritarian principle in philosophy for the future of Catholicism in a society determined to have intellectual autonomy. Dissatisfied with both the idealistic German systems and a positivism which closed its eyes to metaphysical problems, they attempted to restore intellectualism in a Platonic and Augustinian tradition. But the general of the Jesuits in 1850 put a quick end to the success of the ontological doctrines at the training center at Vals.[19] While the attacks against Rosmini twice, in 1854 and 1876, ended with a preliminary acquittal,[20] the Neo-Scholastic opposition in 1861 succeeded in obtaining from the Holy Office the condemnation of seven characteristic theses of French ontologism[21] and, somewhat later, of the writings of professor Ubaghs.[22] Ubaghs was the chief representative of ontologism coupled with traditionalism, which had become the dominating doctrine in the departments of theology and philosophy at the University of Louvain.

---

[12] DHGE XIV, 89–91.

[13] See EThL 9 (1932), 663–70, 678–80, 689–92. Concerning Henri Feye (1820–94), professor of canon law from 1850 until 1885, who supervised several doctoral theses which attracted the attention of the academic world, see DHGE XVI, 1359–60, and Schulte III, 295.

[14] P. Peeters, Figures bollandiennes contemporaines (Brussels 1948), 11–26.

[15] L. Foucher, op. cit., 238–49.

---

[16] P. M. A. Chastel, S.J. (1804–61), was particularly fierce and received the approval of Liberatore and Passaglia and of the Magister Sacri Palatii for his book De la valeur de la raison humaine (1854) (see L. Foucher, op. cit., 250–52, and Sommervogel II, 1089–91).

[17] Bonnetty was asked in 1855 to agree to four theses (see ASS III, 224), the first three of which were determined by those which Bautain had signed twenty years earlier. The fourth thesis acknowledged the value of Scholastic philosophy.

[18] The most important among them were Baudry and Branchereau at Saint Sulpice and Maret and Hugonin at the Sorbonne; the system was accorded great sympathy by the Jesuits of Vals, several Sulpician seminaries, and, thanks to Ami de la religion and Correspondant, by the educated public (see L. Foucher, op. cit., 176–95).

[19] Burnichon III, 140–61.

[20] H. Reusch, Der Index II (Bonn 1885), 1142–44; also Aubert-Martina, 812–19.

[21] See ASS III, 204–6. On the discussions following these interventions, see DThC XII, 1047–55, and J. Kleutgen, L'ontologismo e le sette tesi censurate dalla S. Inquisizione (Rome 1867).

[22] See ASS III, 206–24. On the beginnings of Ubaghs' case, see above, chap. 3, n. 34. The question was raised again in 1858 by the bishops of Liège and Bruges, former students at the Gregoriana; they wished to counteract Cardinal Sterckx, whom they accused of not taking account of the views of the other bishops in the matter of supervising the orthodox direction of the Catholic university. They assured themselves of the

The reaction to traditionalism and ontologism was a result of the renascence of Scholasticism. It was promoted by the conservative wing of romanticism, which was captured by the ideas and institutions of the Middle Ages. Prior to 1870, many adherents of a return to Scholasticism were not yet genuine Neo-Thomists. Rather they were eclectics, desirous of a return to the philosophy of the Middle Ages, who wanted to rethink this philosophy, in the light of Suarez in Spain, and in the light of Cartesianism in France and Italy. Gradually the number of people desiring a return to a genuine Thomism increased. In Germany, this was the case from the 1850s onward; in Spain, there was the circle led by the Dominican Gonzalez, who founded the journal La ciencia cristiana in 1873; in France, there was Abbé Hulst's circle; in Belgium, there was the group led by the Dominican Lepidi, professor and regent of the research department at the training center at Louvain. The main impact occurred in Italy. While the Roman College remained a citadel of Suarezianism until the election of Leo XIII, the Jesuits of the Civiltà cattolica became fervent propagandists of Thomism, especially Father Liberatore. The two chief centers of Thomism were the Collegio Alberoni at Piacenza and the Jesuit Collegio Massimo and the Liceo arcivescovile at Naples. In 1846, G. Sanseverino[23] established the Accademia tomista there and published the journal Scienza e fede; after his death in 1865, S. Talamo filled his place. There were also other centers, at Bologna for example, where the Jesuit Cornoldi published the journal La Scienza italiana. He was particularly interested in the harmony of science and faith. In Perugia, Cardinal Pecci, assisted by his brother, a Jesuit, and some Dominicans, founded the Accademia San Tommaso, where he pursued his program of reforming ecclesiastical studies.

From the quantitative point of view, it must be noted that the Catholic authors of the third quarter of the nineteenth century devoted their best efforts to apologetics. For after the revival of religiosity and of sympathy for the medieval Church, characteristics of the generation of romantics, the intellectual world, beginning with the middle of the support of P. Perrone and the Civiltà cattolica. The Pope was persuaded to transfer the examination of the case from the Congregation of the Index to the Holy Office because Cardinal D'Andrea, the prefect of the Index, was an opponent of the Jesuits and too favorably disposed toward the people at Louvain. Interventions by Cardinal Sterckx, who wanted to save the reputation of the university, delayed a decision by several years. But in 1864 the Holy Office declared the corrections made by Ubaghs as insufficient and in 1886 condemned his books for good, referring to the condemnation of the seven ontological theses in 1861.

---

[23] His Philosophia christiana cum antiqua et nova comparata (7 vols. [Naples 1862–72]), finished by his student N. Signoriello, is a remarkable work of clarity, depth, and historical information.

century, experienced a quick and different type of development. The historical claims of Christianity and the traditional authority of the Bible were questioned in the name of historical criticism and as a result of the discoveries of paleontology and Near Eastern archeology. The problem of the transcendence of Christianity was immediately raised by the comparative history of religions, and soon the foundations of theism and the idea of religion were attacked by Feuerbach and the liberal Hegelians. Materialistic explanations of the universe were widely disseminated in Germany by men like Ludwig Büchner, Karl Vogt, and Ernst Haeckel. Spencer continued the traditions of English empiricism and propagated the Darwinian evolutionary interpretation of the world, which theologians rejected categorically.[24] In the France of the Second Empire, Auguste Comte's thoughts combined with English agnosticism and German materialism and were exported under the name of "positivism."

Under these circumstances it was not surprising that apologetics increased in significance in the course of the nineteenth century. The study of dogma, hitherto regarded as the essential task of theologians, began to appear to most Catholic thinkers as less urgent than the defense of religion and the foundations of Christianity. Even when they studied theology, they did so from an apologetic perspective. The speculations of Hermes and Günther, formally belonging to the field of dogmatics, were in reality guided by the aim of making dogma acceptable for people who had been won by modern philosophy. The scholarly studies at Tübingen and Munich as well were more directed toward a defense of the great Christian and Catholic theses against rationalistic and Protestant criticism than they were concerned with the origins of the Bible of the Fathers.

To be sure, apologetic works continued to be written and testified to the apostolic zeal of their authors; but most of them suffered from a total lack of adaptation. Elegantly in Germany, more superficially elsewhere, they incessantly repeated the same classical arguments. In view of the intellectual atmosphere of the time, they no longer had any impact; people were no longer receptive to them. It is sad to note the paucity of Catholic studies prior to the final twenty years of the century which competently treated the principal problem of adapting the Christian faith to the new science-based thinking. A first step was taken in 1875 by the Jesuit Carbonelle with the founding of the Scientific Society of Brussels, which drew together Catholic scientists from various countries. Two years later, the Revue des questions scientifiques was established as the organ of the society.

---

[24] The first intervention by the ecclesiastical magisterial office concerning the theory of evolution was the declaration of the Cologne provincial synod of 1860. It stated that the view that the human body had emerged from an earlier natural state was clearly at variance with Holy Scripture and the faith.

Among the apologists who endeavored to understand the views of those whom they wished to convince was G. Bonomelli, whose Il giovane studente (3 vols. [1871–74]) was one of the best books of this type at the time.[25] In Belgium, the Redemptorist Victor Dechamps[26] developed the so-called Méthode de la providence, which between 1857 and 1874 he presented in a number of books and vigorously defended against sharp criticism. In France, there were Father Félix and Alphonse Gratry. Between 1853 and 1869, the Jesuit Félix preached the conference sermons at Notre-Dame in Paris[27] and in them developed an apologetics which took account of contemporary realities. He analyzed the trends of the time with astuteness, especially the enthusiasm with which progress was regarded. He tried to show that Christianity, far from hindering any legitimate striving of humankind, was actually the only way for it to achieve what it was blindly seeking. Gratry[28] tried in vain to realize an idea by Lamennais to gather a number of priests in a kind of atelier apologétique by reestablishing the Oratoire de France[29] in 1852. In many of his publications he anticipated the path taken during the next generation by Ollé-Laprune and Blondel. According to L. Foucher, Gratry's was the best and most comprehensive attempt at a Catholic philosophy in France during the 19th century, but Antonin Gilbert Sertillanges judged that he formulated too much like a writer and thought too much like a poet to be numbered among the great philosophers.

One man surpassed all others by the power and force of his genius and his ability to look into the future: John Henry Newman.[30] Even more than Möhler he paved the way for the acceptance of new demands and fresh values of human reason in the service of faith. In his Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine (1845) he emphasized the value and the need for historical thought; in his Grammar of Assent (1870) he wrote of the value of the spontaneous power of reason, based on a convergence of judgments and practical life experience; he demanded a "Dialectic of Conscience" and the psychological preparation of people for the acceptance of faith justified by reason. In his essay On Consulting the Faithful in Matters of Doctrine (1859), the Letter to the Duke of Norfolk (1875), and two volumes of the Via Media (1877) he brought out the importance of the meaning of Holy Scripture and the Christian Fathers for the Christian mystery as the basis of all religious knowledge. Unfortunately, there was no one at the time to follow him on the paths whose importance for the future Newman anticipated. Moreover, his employment of the essay made his studies less accessible to professional theologians. Lastly, there were the suspicions which were cast on his orthodoxy. They were one of the most unpleasant aspects of the intellectual policy of the Roman Curia under Pius IX and persisted until the elevation of Leo XIII.

---

[25] C. Bello, G. Bonomelli (Brescia 1961), 52–55.

[26] On Victor Dechamps (1810–83), one of the most famous Belgian preachers, who in 1867 became archbishop of Mechelen, see M. Becqué, Le cardinal Dechamps (2 vols. [Louvain 1956]) and L'apologétique du cardinal Dechamps (Paris and Louvain 1949). The core of his thought was presented in the Entretiens sur la démonstration catholique de la révélation chrétienne (1857).

[27] P. Fernessolle, Les conférenciers de Notre-Dame II (Paris 1936), 59–136.

[28] On Alphonse Gratry (1805–72), see A. Chauvin, Vie du Père Gratry (Paris 1911) and L. Fouché, op. cit., 197–236.

[29] See in addition to the biography of Gratry (136–90: "L'idéal," "La réalité"), A. Perraud, L'oratoire de France au XVII^e et au XIX^e siècle (Paris 1866) and G. de Valroger, Le Père de Valroger (Paris 1911). He managed to gather a few young people around him, but Abbé Pététot, in charge of the organization, in spite of Gratry's protests preferred to emphasize high school instruction.

[30] On John Henry Newman (1801–90), who in 1845 converted to Catholicism, see volume VII in this series, p. 406. On his theological concepts: R. A. Dibble, John Henry Newman. The Concept of Infallible Doctrinal Authority (Washington 1955); J. Stern, Bible

Scholastics and Germanics vs. the "German Theologians"

One of the major achievements of the Tübingen School was that Catholic dogma was rethought with pronounced attention given to the historical dimension, the discovery of which was a main characteristic of the intellectual life of the nineteenth century. What counted from now on was not merely critical scholarship or chronology, but a sense of becoming and the awareness that events, institutions, and doctrines are what they really are only when they are placed in the context of time and when their historical development is taken into consideration. Following the example of Drey and Möhler, theologians increasingly discussed the consequences of seeing Christian events and Christian revelation in the context of history. This did not mean that speculative considerations disappeared, not even among those who remained tied to Scholastic tradition. This was shown by the enthusiasm displayed for Günther's ideas as well as by the teachings of Kuhn at Tübingen. Still, as the century advanced, theological sciences became more concerned with historical theology and became more interested in the vitality of dogma than its metaphysics. The redirection to a less speculative theology than had been pursued during the first half of the nineteenth century was hastened by apologetic interests. While Protestant historians developed a critical method which enabled them to question many traditional attitudes toward the origins of Christianity and the Middle Ages, some university departments, especially at Tübingen, developed a radical exegesis and a Hegelian interpretation of the history of dogma, originated by Ferdinand Christian Baur. In close contact with their opponents at the universities, Catholic theologians grasped quickly that it was essential to enter the arena on which the battle was fought, to fight them with the same weapons employed by them, i.e., with facts, texts, and documents, and to revise positions incompatible with the facts.

---

et tradition chez Newman. Aux origines de la théorie du développement (Paris 1967); B. D. Dupuy, Textes newmaniens. VII. Lettre au Duc de Norfolk (Bruges and Paris 1970); L. Bouyer, L'Église de Dieu (Paris 1970), 135–52.

In the field of exegesis, the following people were active: August Bisping,[31] whose Exegetisches Handbuch zum Neuen Testament (9 vols. [1854–76]) remained for long the only complete commentary from the Catholic point of view, even if it lacked originality; the Munich professors for Old and New Testament studies, Daniel-Bonifaz Haneberg[32] and Franz Xaver Reithmayr;[33] and Peter Johann Schegg,[34] who wrote a Leben Jesu (2 vols. [1874–75]). There were also two rather lackluster treatments of biblical theology, P. Scholz's Handbuch der Theologie des Alten Bundes (2 vols. [1861–62]), and J. Lutterbeck's Die neutestamentlichen Lehrbegriffe (2 vols. [1852]). These publications were rounded out by some essays written with the intention of reconciling the reports of Genesis with modern scientific discoveries.[35] Among them were Bibel und Natur (1860, 1870) by Franz Heinrich Reusch, and Die biblische Schöpfungsgeschichte (1867, 1872) by Johann Baptist Baltzer. However, seen as a whole, the achievements of Catholics, even though not insignificant, remained far behind those of the Protestants.

In the area of the history of dogma and Church history, on the other hand, good work was done. This was the case at Tübingen, where Karl Joseph Hefele[36] worked on studies ranging from the apostolic Fathers to Cardinal Ximenes and wrote his monumental Conciliengeschichte (7 vols. [1855–74]). Also at Tübingen there was a group of young scholars who wrote for the Theologisches Quartalschrift and employed the new critical methods in order to delineate the stages of progress in Christian thought. Another center of activity was Munich, thanks to the great influence of Ignaz Döllinger, the uncontested leader of the German Catholic historical school.

---

[31] On August Bisping (1811–84), professor at Münster, see DHGE IX, 10–11.

[32] Concerning Daniel Bonifaz Haneberg (1816–76), see 100 Jahre St. Bonifaz in München (Munich 1960), 29–36, 61f.

[33] On Franz Xaver Reithmayr (1809–72), see LThK VIII, 1155.

[34] On Peter Johann Schegg (1815–85), see LThK IX, 379f.

[35] DThC VI, 2340–46.

[36] On Karl Joseph Hefele (1809–93), professor of Church history and patrology from 1840 until 1869, when he was appointed bishop of Rottenburg, see A. Hagen, Gestalten aus dem schwäbischen Katholizismus II (Stuttgart 1950), 7–58.

In the course of the events of 1848, Döllinger emerged as one of the most important Catholic leaders both with respect to politics and religion. But he was disappointed by the trends of the Catholic movement under the leadership of the men from Mainz and the growing influence of the Jesuits in the Church. He withdrew from public life and devoted himself to scholarly work, always from an apologetic point of view. Hippolytus und Callistus (1853), a masterful example of historical criticism receiving the acclaim of all German scholars, was designed to shore up the Catholic conscience in the face of objections to the papacy which Protestants like Christian Karl von Bunsen believed to have found in the recently discovered Philosophoumena. Similarly, Heidentum und Judentum. Vorhalle zur Geschichte des Christentums (1857), the first scholarly Catholic attempt to present the origins of Christianity within their historical context. He wanted to demonstrate that, historically speaking, no development of Greek or Jewish origin could explain the rise of Christianity. His Christentum und Kirche in der Zeit der Grundlegung (1860), a book with a genuine religious flair, contained a number of passages concerning the papacy which were clearly directed against Protestants.[37] Even more than through his publications, Döllinger's influence, whose tremendous extent it is difficult to understand today, was spread by his lectures and was carried by his students to many professorships at universities in Germany, Austria, and Switzerland. In his personal contacts, the richness of his thought, the clarity of his views, and the simple demeanor of the man captured his discussion partners, and his correspondence touched upon the scholarly works written in German, English, and French.

Döllinger, Hefele, Kuhn, Günther, and most of their colleagues and students who were in close contact with the academic world were primarily animated by the desire to liberate Catholic intellectuals from the inferiority complex which the flowering of Protestant and rationalistic scholarship had given them. They expected to accomplish their aim by suggesting to them to compete with the same weapons and to give them the feeling of complete intellectual freedom, aside from the relatively few questions of dogma. They hoped to win a degree of influence for the Church in the world of the mind which corresponded to the influence which the Church was in the process of gaining through public political action.

---

[37] The 2nd edition (1868) was revised in a direction less favorable to the papacy.

But a part of the German clergy, among them Bishop Ketteler of Mainz and his advisers Lenning, Heinrich, and Moufang, saw matters differently. They had in mind the mass of the Catholics, the peasants, the craftsmen, and tradesmen, whose Christian beliefs, consolidated by a pious and active clergy, was to find expression in a mighty movement of well-disciplined associations. These were to subordinate themselves to the Holy See, able to carry out the decisions of the hierarchy down to the lowest levels of society. The supporters of this movement were more interested in having good priests than educated ones, and therefore were very much opposed to the German system, which forced young clerics to study in the departments of theology attached to public universities. They wanted to replace this system with the system of diocesan seminaries used in France and Italy, the same system which Ketteler had reintroduced in his diocese. Beyond this, many of them wished to withdraw young laymen from the atmosphere of public universities, where the vast majority of the faculty were Protestant.[38] They called for the creation of a Catholic university[39] which for the German Catholics was to play the same role as the University of Louvain in Belgium.[40] These plans were supported by all people and publications associated with Bishop Ketteler. Headed by Döllinger, Ketteler and his supporters were opposed by all other German Catholics who realized that the faith needed clergy completely conversant with the latest knowledge. They also recognized the danger of educating young Catholics in complete isolation, as it would deny them access to all of the scholarly tools which only the universities could provide. They feared the cutoff of Catholics from the intellectual life of their time, if the point of view of Ketteler should prevail. Döllinger's fear was the greater as his opponents openly demanded a return to Scholasticism, failed to comprehend the urgency of the problems raised by historical criticism, and believed that speculative thought in Germany had reached a dead-end street with Kant's philosophy.

---

[38] Prussia in 1864, with a population of 7 million Catholics and 10 million Protestants, had only 55 Catholic professors among its 556 university professors.

[39] The idea of a Catholic university was raised in 1848 and assumed tangible form by 1861. But several obstacles and, after 1870, the Kulturkampf led to an abandonment of the plan (see G. Richter, Der Plan zur Errichtung einer katholischen Universität in Fulda [Fulda 1922]).

[40] A similar aim was pursued at this time in other countries as well. In Great Britain, the Irish bishops with the support of Wiseman founded a Catholic university at Dublin in 1851, but the enterprise failed after a few years in spite of Newman's efforts (see F. McGrath, Newman's University, Idea and Reality [London 1951] and A. Gwynn in Newman-Studien III [Nuremberg 1957], 99–110); Manning attempted to found a Catholic college at Kensington, but it also existed only for a few years (see E. Purcell, Life of Cardinal Manning, I, 495–505). In France the Catholics succeeded, especially due to the efforts of Monsignor Dupanloup, in obtaining permission through the law of 12 July 1875 for the establishment of free universities. They immediately founded five universities at Paris, Lille, Angers, Lyon, and Toulouse (see Lecanuet I, 251–68, 501–10, and A. Baudrillart, Vie de Monseigneur d'Hulst I [Paris 1912], 277–382).

A return to Scholasticism was the major concern of the Mainz journal Der Katholik, which was edited by professors appointed by Ketteler in 1849 when he reopened the Mainz seminary. The pioneers of German Neo-Scholasticism were the dogmatist Johann Baptist Heinrich[41] and the philosopher Paul Leopold Haffner.[42] At Bonn, the movement was supported by the young belligerent layman Franz Jakob Clemens.[43] At Munich, the Historisch-politische Blätter, Archbishop Reisach, a former student at the German College in Rome, and Vicar General Windischmann were behind the movement. Windischmann had long pointed to the dangers of Güntherianism. In Austria Neo-Scholasticism was encouraged by Cardinal Rauscher, who in 1857 appointed the Jesuit Schrader and the Dominican Guidi to positions at the University of Vienna. After 1857 Neo-Scholasticism had an active center in the department of theology at the University of Innsbruck, which was directed by the Jesuits. It was in fact the Jesuits who everywhere became the most ardent supporters of the Neo-Scholastic restoration, assisted by the success of Kleutgen's books Die Theologie der Vorzeit vertheidigt (5 vols. [1853–70]) and Die Philosophie der Vorzeit vertheidigt (2 vols. [1860–63]).[44] In an original and thorough fashion, Kleutgen rethought the doctrines of Saint Thomas, but he also tackled problems which Thomas had not foreseen, and occasionally was guided by Suarez as well. He demonstrated that Thomas's traditional doctrines could be applied to new problems and how they fit into other great philosophical systems. It was his great achievement that he cleared away antiquated methods which made them unacceptable to modern minds.

The fact that many people favored this Scholastic orientation is in part explained by the real weaknesses of theological instruction at the universities, as for example in the rationalistic and historicistic approach of some professors, but especially in the neglect of the leadership role, which in theology must be assigned to the magisterial office of the Church guided by the Holy Spirit. In the subsequent generation, Matthias Joseph Scheeben showed that Neo-Scholasticism was not only of defensive utility in the fight against the excesses of the "German theologians", but also produced works of real spiritual and religious value. Karl Werner's books proved that adherence to Scholasticism did not have to exclude solid historical scholarship.[45] Yet it must be conceded that most of the products of Neo-Scholasticism remained on a rather low level. Even when they attempted to integrate historical knowledge—which almost always was only secondhand—with the speculative treatises of classical authors, they failed to integrate them truly and to evaluate them historically and theologically. The retreat to the bastion of a timeless valid system cost theology its actuality and representation in the modern world. L. Scheffczyk was totally correct when he wrote: "There is no possible doubt that in comparison with the youthful freshness, the variety, and the enthusiasm of theological thought in the time of Johann Sebastian Drey and Anton Günther, the products of Neo-Scholasticism are cautious, uniform, and sober; a coldly didactic method of interpreting eternal truths replaced original and subjective thought; speculation designed to create unity and an organic overview was replaced with objective detail studies, and a universal openness to all currents of the spirit gave way to defense and polemicism."

---

[41] Johann Baptist Heinrich (1816–91). His Dogmatische Theologie (6 vols. [Mainz 1873seqq.] indicates the dual purpose of making theology kerygmatic and of supplementing scholastic presentations with a serious study of Holy Scripture and the Fathers.

[42] On Paul Leopold Haffner (1829–99), see L. Lenhart in Jahrbuch für das Bistum Mainz 8 (1958–60), 11–117.

[43] On Franz Jakob Clemens (1815–62), active member of the Catholic Association, see Der Katholik 42 (1862), I, 257–80 and LThK II, 1230.

[44] On Joseph Kleutgen (1811–83), a German Jesuit residing in Rome, see F. Lakner in ZKTh 57 (1933), 161–214 and LThK VI, 340. Even if his books were largely ignored by the academic world, they nonetheless found a great echo among Catholics. His impact was strengthened by the translation of Philosophie der Vorzeit into Italian and French.

This last aspect was particularly regrettable, as the opposition to university theology came in part from men who were not merely worried by the occasional excesses of "German scholarship," but were indifferent or hostile to scholarship in general. This was, of course, not true of all of them. Some harbored genuine admiration for scholarship, as long as it was orthodox; but many former students of the Collegium Romanum, called "Germanics" because they had resided in the Collegium Germanicum when they were in Rome, failed to make use of the perspectives which the teaching of Passaglia and Franzelin had made available to them. They refused to acknowledge that the advances of historical methods required new attitudes in many different areas. Even less did the survivors of the fideistic and traditionalist currents, influential in Archbishop Geissel's circle, favor the aim of the "German theologians" of confronting Christian thought with the great Neo-Kantian philosophical systems. They refused to undertake a serious review of the texts which modern historical criticism required. These texts were usually adduced by the Catholics for the defense of their traditionalist positions, but were too often confused by them with ecclesiastical tradition itself.

---

[45] On Karl Werner (1821–88), see LThK X, 1056, He was professor of moral theology and exegesis at Sankt Pölten and Vienna and was known chiefly as a historian of medieval thought.

More serious was the fact that many defenders of Neo-Scholasticism, irritated by the contempt in which the academic world held them, tried to strengthen their arguments and objections by an appeal to the supreme foreign ecclesiastical authority. The notes which they increasingly sent to Rome were not always generated by the desire for truth but stemmed from personal intrigues and rivalries. In 1854, unjustified accusations on the part of the Mainz circle forced one of the best Church historians, Schwartz, to resign from his chair at Würzburg. The first great success of the scholastic reactionaries was the condemnation of Güntherianism in 1857. The Neo-Scholastics were supported by the nuncio at Munich in their increasingly bitter attacks, and in the Roman Curia they found allies in Cardinal Reisach and Kleutgen. As consultant to the Congregation of the Index, Kleutgen was particularly influential.

Günther's condemnation encouraged the ultramontanes to attack those theologians and philosophers who insisted on continuing their studies without taking account of ecclesiastical directives. F. J. Clemens's De sententia scholasticorum philosophiam esse theologiae ancillam (1856) became the manifesto of this faction. When Kuhn asserted the right of philosophy to be independent, Clemens was assisted by Der Katholik, which kept a close eye on doctrinaire currents.[46] The front of the universities was breached in 1854 with the appointment of Heinrich Denzinger, a former student at the Gregoriana, to the chair of dogmatics at Würzburg.[47] He was soon joined by two other "Romans": by the Church historian Joseph Hergenröther[48] and the apologist Franz Hettinger.[49] All three of them worked in the spirit of total subjection to ecclesiastical authority. Denzinger's collection of ecclesiastical decisions, Enchiridion Symbolorum et Definitionum (1854), reminded the [46] G. B. Guzzetti, op. cit., 79–86.

---

[47] On Heinrich Denzinger (1819–83), see the memoirs of his brother in Der Katholik 63 (1883), I, 428–44, 523–38, 638–49, and NDB III, 604.

[48] On Joseph Hergenröther (1824–90), see S. Merkle, Aus der Vergangenheit der Universität Würzburg (Berlin 1932), 186–214, and LThK V, 245–46. He was not very good in the classroom but a worthy scholar who complemented his Roman studies with doctoral work at Munich under Döllinger. His 3 volumes on Photius established him as a scholar. His Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte (3 vols. [1876–80]) was "generally admired because of his sovereign mastery of the material, even if the apologetic direction and the dependence on other treatments of Church history were criticized" (Bigelmair).

[49] On Franz Hettinger (1819–90), a well-balanced personality of universal erudition, acuity of mind, and great writing ability, see A. Chroust, ed., Lebensläufe aus Franken II (Munich 1921), 202–15. His Apologie des Christentums (2 vols. [1863–67]) deservedly remained a classic for more than sixty years.

German theologians of the importance of the decisions of the magisterial office, including those which were not infallible.

Numerous German professors in the name of academic freedom refused to bow to the authority of the Church, unless it was a question of defined dogma. Their attitude created consternation in Rome, where academic concerns were of little interest and the struggle against liberalism was in full swing. In this connection, many works were placed on the Index after 1857.[50] In 1862, Pius IX directed a letter to the archbishop of Munich in which he discussed the errors of the Munich professor Jakob Frohschammer[51] and lamented that Frohschammer was not the only one who demanded "a freedom to write and to teach with which the Church hitherto had been unacquainted."[52] Separated by the geographical distance, Rome's distrust of German academics increased and eventually encompassed even Germany's leading professors, including Döllinger.

For several years, the eminent historian had been the subject of accusations.[53] He, in turn, was offended by Rome's centralizing tendencies, which coincided with the aggressive behavior of the Neo-Scholastics. The most zealous among the ultramontanes suspiciously watched this theologian, who used such un-Roman methods, tended to think that serious ecclesiastical studies were only conducted at the German universities, and considered the growing influence of the former students of the Collegium Romanum in Germany's ecclesiastical life as a victory of obscurantism. For the time being, however, at least until his two lectures which he gave in 1861 at Munich, the ecclesiastical authorities respected his stance. The two lectures had essentially a pastoral goal. Convinced of the impending decline of the Papal State, he wanted to calm the Catholics with the assertion that by no means would such a decline constitute a decline of the papacy as such, no matter what the Protestants were saying. But he did not confine himself to the presentation of positive views concerning the importance of papal primacy and the recognition of the attempts by Pius IX to bring about improvements in the Papal State. He explained the hostility toward the secular power of the papacy with the obvious deficiencies of the archaic and clerical papal government. Many observers interpreted Döllinger's remarks as open support for Cavour and some seized this opportunity to take action against him. They organized a protest campaign and tried to discredit the scholar in the eyes of the Catholic people, who were still devoted to the Pope in spite of his shortcomings. Dismayed, Döllinger tried to correct the situation, but was not successful in eradicating the initial negative impression. Subsequently, criticism of his theological positions became more overt, the critics being secure in the knowledge of having the ear of all those who placed the defense of the privileges of the papacy at the top of their objectives.

---

[50] F. H. Reusch, Der Index (Bonn 1885), 1125–32. Compared to the indictments, the number of condemnations was relatively small and the caution of the Congregation of the Index was acknowledged by scholars who held little sympathy for the Scholastics, such as Flir (Briefe aus Rom 47) and Kuhn (ThQ 108 [1927], 215).

[51] On Jakob Frohschammer (1821–93), professor of philosophy, who after his indictment in 1857 defended positions held by liberal Protestants and subsequently became an Old Catholic, see LThK IV, 397; Hocedez II, 60–68; and J. Stracke, "Ecclesiae judicium de Jakob Frohschammer doctrina circa mysteria" (unpubl. diss., Rome 1934). His real attitude toward the freedom of Christian philosophers probably should be reexamined.

[52] Brief Gravissimas inter (11 December 1862) in Acta Pii IX, 548–56.

[53] Aubert, Pie IX, 203–4.

It annoyed Döllinger that his prestige among Catholics had been hurt and it displeased him that his academic work was questioned by absolutely incompetent people. Yet in spite of his growing hostility to the policies of the Curia, he remained a devoted son of the Church. But it bothered him that the German Catholic intellectuals were fighting one another instead of making common front against the increasingly radical attacks by secular academics. Thus, a reconciliation of the two Catholic groups was urgently necessary. For years the idea of a congress of German Catholic scholars had been in the air. Therefore Döllinger, Alzog, and Haneberg, ignoring the skepticism of the Tübingen group, the reserve of the Mainz circle, and the open hostility of the Jesuits, invited the Catholic scholars of Germany, Austria, and Switzerland to gather in Munich in September 1863.[54] In the meantime, unfortunately, the distrust of Döllinger had grown, primarily because of his book Die Papstfabeln des Mittelalters (1863). In it he revealed the legendary character of some of the traditions of the medieval papacy and used the weaknesses of Pope Liberius and Pope Honorius as arguments against the thesis of papal infallibility.

In his remarkable opening address on "The Past and Present of Theology,"[55] justifiably described by Goyau as a "Declaration of Rights" of theology, Döllinger described various methods of theology and demanded complete freedom of movement whenever faith was not directly affected. "For scholarship, such freedom is as essential as air is for the body," he said, and called for purely scholarly weapons in the struggle against theological error, instead of ecclesiastical censures. Just as among the Hebrews prophets and priestly hierarchy had existed side by side, there should be in the Catholic Church as well an extraordinary power in addition to regular authority. This, he asserted, is public opinion, the molding of which was a matter for theologians. Inasmuch as at the same time he spoke of the complete decline of theology in the Latin countries, he created the impression that he was demanding the actual intellectual leadership of the Church by the German theologians. The theologians from Mainz and Würzburg did not allow such assertions to pass without protest, but finally a vague compromise concerning the rights of authority and of liberty was formulated.

---

[54] On this congress, see Die Verhandlungen der Versammlung katholischer Gelehrter in München (Regensburg 1863). Also: J. Friedrich, Ignaz von Döllinger III, 270–354; K. Müller, Leben und Briefe von J. T. Laurent III (Trier 1889), XIII–XXVIII; H. Lang in HJ 71 (1952), 246–58; G. Martina in AHPont 6 (1968), 350–51, n. 39.

[55] Slightly weakened text in Verhandlungen . . . , 25–29.

Many participants returned home convinced that the chief objective of the congress of scholars, namely an understanding with the "Romans," had been effected. The first reaction of Pius IX, who had feared that the congress might degenerate into a declaration of war against the Roman congregations, also was rather favorable. But the reports of the nuncio and other opponents of Döllinger about the atmosphere at the congress, at which the students of Döllinger constituted a majority, and the text of Döllinger's addresses produced an immediate change in the attitude of the Pope. For a time, placing the proceedings of the congress on the Index was even considered. Ultimately, however, Pius IX only sent a brief[56] to the archbishop of Munich in which he denounced the attacks on Scholasticism and deplored that a gathering of theologians had taken place without explicit request from the hierarchy, "whose task it is to guide and supervise theology." He stated further that Catholic scholars were not only bound by solemn definitions, but actually were obligated to take into consideration the magisterial office, the decisions of the Roman congregations, and the common doctrines of theologians. His disapproval was supplemented a few months later by a regulation which made future gatherings of this kind virtually impossible.

Döllinger's attempt at conciliation had failed, and the tone of the polemics of the two camps immediately doubled in stridency. On one side were the men who were convinced that the chief task was to regain the respect of the educated Catholics for the Church by painstaking applications of the historical method and by a presentation of Catholic dogma convincing for modern philosophical attitudes. The Tübingen group also shared this dual ideal, but disapproved of the radicalism of the Munich group and assumed a more passive stance. The aggressive vanguard of the Munich group consisted of Döllinger's friends. Soon they had their own journal, the Theologisches Literaturblatt, founded in 1865 by the Bonn professor Franz Heinrich Reusch. On the other side was the "Roman" party, which thought that the chief task was to provide Catholics with a complete doctrinary system of unquestionable orthodoxy. Their main centers were the seminary at Mainz, the seminary at Cologne, where Scheeben taught dogmatics, the seminary at Eichstätt, where Albert Stöckl inaugurated philosophical instruction of not only a Scholastic but of a Thomist character, and the training center of the Jesuits, where Joseph Florian Riess in 1864 founded the Stimmen aus Maria Laach for the purpose of commenting on the Syllabus.

---

[56] Brief Tuas libenter (21 December 1863) in Acta Pii IX III, 636–45.

Only a few people succeeded in maintaining good relations with both sides. Even rarer were the men like Karl Werner, A. Schmidt, and Franz Xaver Dieringer, who attempted to mediate between the two parties. Tension increased from year to year and the smallest incident gave rise to sharp polemics which held no trace of disinterested scholarship or of the milk of human kindness.

Döllinger, constantly worried about the serious threat to the freedom of Catholic scholars, grew bitter when he noticed that his popularity was disappearing. It looked as though he himself were trying to justify the attacks of his opponents by announcing loudly his compromises with Protestant scholars and anticlerical administrators and by his malicious comments on everything that emanated from Rome. Some of his disciples, like Johann Nepomuk Huber, Johannes Friedrich, and Alois Pichler, the "young Munich School," as it was called, created consternation through their arrogance and their lack of Catholic sympathies.

The responsibility for these conditions was to be found on both sides. The intransigence and narrow-mindedness of many defenders of the Roman position contributed a great deal to worsening an already delicate situation. There were indeed moderate men among them, people like Joseph Hergenröther, Franz Hettinger, and Matthias Joseph Scheeben. But there were also men whose fanaticism had deplorable consequences. They included Kuhn in their attacks and thus carried suspicion to the Tübingen school. They prevented the Tübingen group from exercising the moderating influence of which it would have been capable. It did not suffer from the historicism and the rationalism of the Munich school and could have supplied what the Neo-Scholastics lacked in the way of Biblical and historical thought and a sense of mystery.

SECTION FOUR

The Altercation between Catholicism and Liberalism

The confrontation of liberal ideas with the traditional positions of the Church, which had started in the 18th century and continued to grow with the Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen in 1789, reached its peak under the pontificate of Pius IX. Shortly after the end of the idyll of 1848, the antagonism on both sides increased on the ideological and practical levels. The revival of the Roman Question could not but inflame the hostility further. Even though its true roots were found in the national enthusiasm of the Italians and partially also in the political ambitions of Piedmont, the sovereignty of the Pope was officially questioned in the name of the new freedoms—the right of peoples to self-determination and the liberal concept of the state. The two problems could very well have been kept separate, as proved by the attitude of the people led by Montalembert and Dupanloup; but in fact they were looked upon as intertwined.

CHAPTER 17

The Roman Question

From the Papal Restoration to the Italian War

The restoration of the authority of the Pope in the Papal State after the brief interlude of the Roman Republic had taken place in a clearly reactionary atmosphere. The new form of government, worked out by Cardinal Antonelli in a number of laws passed between 10 September and 24 November 1850 followed the principles of Cardinal Bernetti. The secretary of state subsequently regarded him as his mentor in political matters. He envisioned a number of reforms, but they consisted exclusively of improvements of existing institutions and produced no genuine changes in structure. In the failure of 1848 Antonelli saw final proof of the incompatibility of the maintenance of the temporal power of the Pope with even only a partial liberalization of the governmental system. For this reason he rejected all entreaties by the Paris and the Vienna governments at least to take the path of a moderate constitutional reform. Yet it must be acknowledged that Antonelli's government had its merits on the level of administrative accomplishments. De Rayneval,[1] French ambassador to Rome, mentioned that Antonelli started or inspired a number of steps which demonstrated great vitality and good will. This view was confirmed by the investigation of Dalla Torre,[2] even if he is too apologetic. Other foreign observers also noted with satisfaction that some of Antonelli's measures were far-sighted. But many of these endeavors were only partially realized and remained on the level of the enlightened despotism of the eighteenth century and were not able to prevent people's minds from being dominated by the two thoughts of a liberal growth of political institutions and the realization of Italian unity.

The first years were relatively calm. But after the Congress of Paris (1856) the problem of necessary reforms in the Papal State was pushed into the foreground of the concerns of the Italian public by the skillful propaganda organized by Cavour and supported by England. In spite of the misbehavior of the Austrian troops charged with maintaining order in the northern provinces, the common people, who could note a slight increase in their standard of living and appreciated the popular modesty of the Pope, actually were not terribly dissatisfied. The middle class, on the other hand, found it increasingly more difficult to endure a government which not only denied it any political responsibility but also filled all important positions with clerics, and whose legislation was still oriented to medieval canon law. This was clearly demonstrated to the West in 1858 with the unfortunate Mortara case.[3]

That was the situation in the summer of 1859 when the Italian war broke out. Several provinces revolted, encouraged by the Austrian defeat, and demanded to be annexed to the Kingdom of Piedmont, in which throughout the entire country all those people had placed their hopes who wished to see a unified Italy governed according to modern constitutional requirements. Assured of the support of Napoleon III, who for several reasons wanted to see the temporal power of the Pope maintained, albeit in a smaller, essentially only symbolic state,[4] the

---

[1] His report of 1856 was printed in Recueil des traités . . . concernant l-Autriche et l'Italie (Paris 1859); see A. M. Ghisalberti in ADRomana 75 (1952), 73–101.

[2] L'opera riformatrice e amministrativa di Pio IX fra il 1850 e il 1870 (Rome 1945); see also M. Roncetti, Bolletino della Deputazione di storia patria per l'Umbria 43 (1966), 139–74. An example on the local level: M. Pellegrini, Le condizioni economiche, sociali, culturali e politiche di Jesi dal 1849 al 1859 (Jesi 1957).

[3] On the case itself, see R. De Cesare, Roma e lo Stato del Papa I (Rome 1907), 278–94 and G. Masetti Zannini, RSTI 13 (1959), 239–79. On the reaction: G. Volli in Bolletino del Museo del Risorgimento 5 (Bologna 1960), 1085–1152; J. Altholz in Jewish Social Studies 23 (1961), 111–18 (for England); G. Braive in Ris 8 (1965), 49–82 (for Belgium); B. Korn, The American Reaction to the Mortara Case (Cincinnati 1957).

[4] As it was expressed in the pamphlet Le Pape et le Congrès, which Viscount de la Guéronnière wrote in December 1859 according to his instructions: "The city of Rome has this connotation . . . that the smaller the territory, the greater the ruler."

Piedmontese government tried to exploit the situation to the utmost. Victor Emmanuel demanded from Pius IX not only that he accept the situation in the Romagna, which spontaneously had placed itself under Piedmontese sovereignty, but he also asked him to turn over effective governmental powers in Umbria and the Marches, which were to remain under the nominal sovereignty of the Pope. But the Vatican refused any accommodation. On 19 January 1860[5] Pius IX in his encyclical Nullis certi verbis exposed to the eyes of the Catholic world "the sacrilegious attack on the sovereignty of the Roman Church" and demanded the "unlimited restitution" of the Romagna. After the Pope had been assured once more by Cardinal Antonelli that there was only one solution, i.e., "to restore what had been taken," he on 26 March placed under the ban the usurpers who had violated the laws of the Holy See.[6]

The Roman Question had now become acute. Even though it was more a problem for diplomacy than for the Church, it was nevertheless a heavy psychological burden for the remaining eighteen years of the pontificate of Pius IX. The opposition of the Vatican, which was more one by Antonelli than by Pius IX, to any compromise could do nothing but confirm the attitude of those who suspected the Church of being fundamentally opposed to the ideas of the modern world. It contributed its considerable share to the further reduction of papal prestige in non-Catholic and indifferent circles. Additionally, the Roman Question preoccupied the energies of the most dynamic Catholics in France and Italy with a political problem and for a whole generation distracted them from religious concerns. To be sure, the Roman Question contributed to tying all engaged Catholics even more closely to the Pope, and in this way it played an important role in the ultimate defeat of Gallican and Josephinist tendencies; but it did so in an atmosphere of passionate involvement, which on its part contributed to giving the ultramontanism of the time an emotional coloration which was rather objectionable from the doctrinal point of view.

From the Establishment of the Kingdom of Italy to the Occupation of Rome

While Antonelli, in the hope of saving what could be saved, cautiously engaged in diplomatic negotiations with the French government, his attempts were compromised by the Pope himself. The plan was hatched by Monsignor de Merode, a decided opponent of Napoleon who was destined to raise the ante in the ambiguous game which Napoleon III during the past months had played with the Holy See. For several months de Merode had tried to convince the Pope to give up the protection of the French troops and to raise his own army by recruiting volunteers from the entire Catholic world. Antonelli was too much the realist to approve of this plan. But Pius IX, deeply disappointed by Napoleon's unreliable policy, was not prepared in this time of crisis to heed the cautious secretary of state. He did not remove him, as was expected by many, from the general direction of affairs, but ordered his opponent Merode, together with the legitimist French general Lamoricière, to organize the new army.[7] But within a few months the campaign of Garibaldi and the fall of the Kingdom of Naples hastened events. Italian troops quickly occupied Umbria and the Marches after they had defeated the small army of Lamoricière at Castelfidardo. A short time later a national parliament proclaimed Victor Emmanuel King of Italy.

---

[5] Acta Pii IX III, 129–36.

[6] Ibid. III, 137–47.

The Papal State was now reduced to Rome and its environs (about seven hundred thousand inhabitants contrasted to the earlier 3 million), and there was little hope of ever regaining the lost provinces. The moment seemed to have come to bow before the inevitable and to seek a reasonable compromise. This was the opinion of the French government, but also of many Italian Catholics and even clerics. Cavour, who could count on active sympathy in the Curia, was eager to complete his work by offering Rome an agreement on the following basis: the Pope was to renounce voluntarily any temporal power, which in any case would soon be a matter of the past; Italy in turn would renounce the last remaining traces of regalistic influence on ecclesiastical life and replace earlier legislation by the concept of a free Church in a free state. But from the beginning the negotiations suffered from a lack of willingness on the part of Antonelli and in March 1861 ended in total failure.

The position of the Holy See was now determined for a long time to come: it consisted of total rejection. Antonelli, failing to recognize the degree to which political conditions and ideas had changed during the preceding ten years, was still hopeful of saving the Pope's temporal power. He expected to be able to do so through a repetition of the policy which had been successful at Gaeta, namely an appeal to the Catholic powers on the basis of legitimacy and the immutable right of the Pope to his state. But for this policy to be effective it was necessary to remain on the foundations of international law without causing the impression that the possibility of a compromise would be considered.

---

[7] See G. Carletti, L'esercito pontificio dal 1860 al 1870 (Viterbo 1904). On the regiment of papal Zouaves, see E. de Barral, Les zouaves pontificaux (Paris 1932) and Cerbeland-Salagnac, Les zouaves pontificaux (Paris 1963).

By assuming this strictly legalistic position one could gain time by placing the European governments in a difficult position. The secretary of state, secretly encouraging Neapolitan resistance, probably hoped, as did so many others at the time, that the young Italian state would quickly break apart again and present new possibilities.

For Pius IX the problem was of a totally different nature. In contrast to his secretary of state, he had preserved deep sympathies for the national aspirations of Italy. But for him the question was not one of the independence of Italy from Austria, but the enforced centralistic unification under the leadership of anticlerical Piedmont which led to the dissolution of the Papal State. Pius IX was not so much concerned with temporal power for its own sake as that he saw in it the indispensable guarantee of his spiritual independence, and the outraged reaction of Europe's ultramontane press confirmed him in the belief that this power was something for which he had to answer to the Catholics of the whole world and of which he could not dispose according to his private wishes. He confronted the realists, who tried to convince him that it would not be possible to avoid the necessity of negotiations for long, with a mystical confidence in providence. It was fed by the conviction that the political upheavals, which included him, were merely another episode in the great struggle between God and Satan, which, of course, could only end with the victory of the former.

The conflict between a liberal Italy and the Pope's temporal power was transformed in his eyes into a religious war in which resistance to what increasingly he liked to call "the revolution" was no longer a question of the balance of diplomatic, military, and political forces, but a question of prayer and trust in God. The almost mystical fervor with which some of the leaders of the Risorgimento conducted the struggle against the demands of the Church confirmed him in the conviction that all of this was preeminently a religious problem. In order to emphasize in solemn fashion the religious character of the Roman Question, he in May 1862 convoked a gathering of more than three hundred bishops.[8] In response to a papal allocution, in which Pius IX attacked the rationalism and materialism of the period and sharply criticized the Italian government, they agreed to an address which, while it did not condemn liberalism as unequivocally as the Pope had desired, described papal temporal power as an indispensable institution of providence for the well-being of the Church. It refrained, however, from raising temporal power to a dogma of faith.

---

[8] Concerning this assembly, see in addition to N. Wiseman, Rome and the Catholic Episcopate (London 1862) and CC 5. R. II (1862), 705–46; Aubert, Pie IX, 96–97, 248–49; J. Maurain, La politique ecclésiastique du Second Empire, 612–15; de Montclos, 184–87.

But neither the protests of the bishops nor the on the whole rather sparse recruitments of papal mercenaries could stop the unavoidable course of events. Nor could this be done by the protestations of the Catholic press, which only with difficulty could conceal[9] the indifference of the Catholic masses or the more or less open sympathies of a number of Italian faithful or even priests who were forced into a painful conflict of conscience between their patriotic strivings and the directives of the Church. The unexpected death of Cavour on 6 June 1861 and the fact that his successors lacked diplomatic skill, together with the hesitant policy of France, effected a brief delay of the decision. Napoleon III, forced to take account of Catholic agitation and hoping for the election of a Pope more willing to make concessions than the ailing Pius IX, did not wish to offend anyone. But finally, on 15 September 1864, he signed a convention with the government at Turin[10] in which it obligated itself to respect the remnants of the Papal State; the agreement included the possibility of the recall of the French garrison from Rome.

---

[9] With respect to the "conciliatory" movement, varying in temperament and orthodoxy, which with the support of Minister Ricasoli spread among a part of the Italian clergy after 1860, see the balanced and well-documented article by M. -L. Trebiliani in RStRis 43 (1956), 560–75 and the treatment by M. Themelly, "La riforma cattolica dell'Italia moderna prima del Sillabo," XIIe congrès international des Sciences historiques (Vienna 1965), I, 161–75.

The movement of patriotic priests, which was successful especially among those who had been involved in the events of 1848 as well as among the lower clergy in the south, centered on the ex-Jesuit Passaglia and his newspaper Il Mediatore (1862–66) in the north, and on L. Zaccaro in the south. A petition to the Pope in 1862 contained 8,943 signatures, including 767 of regular clergy; but in the following year, disavowed by the bishops, it experienced a noticeable decline. Concerning the attitude of the clergy to Italian unification and to the question of temporal power, which differed according to region, see M. Bertazzoli, "I conciliatoristi milanesi," SC 110 (1962), 307–30; C. Castiglioni in Memorie stor. della dioc. di Milano 9 (1962), 9–39; E. Passerin d'Entrèves, "Il clero lombardo dal 1848 al 1870," Il movimento unitario nelle regioni d'Italia (Bari 1962), 44–49; A. Pesenti in Bergomum 33 (1959), 45–67; A. Gambasin, Il clero padovano e la dominazione austriaca 1859–1866 (Rome 1967), 255–300; L. Briguglio, "Questione romana e clero veneto," Ateneo veneto 151 (1960), 49–61; C. Cannarozzi, "I frati minori di Toscana el il Risorgimento italiano," StudFr 52 (1955), 394–425, 54 (1957), 199–249; A. Berselli, "Aspetti e figure del movimento conciliatorista nelle ex-legazioni," AstIt 112 (1954), 84–108; F. Manzotti in RStRis 48 (1961), 271–93; M. Fanti, Strenna storica bolognese 10 (1960), 3–26; A. Cestaro, Rassegna di politica e di storia 9 (1963), 6–23; P. Sposato in Atti del 2º congresso stor. calabrese (Naples 1961), 368–405; F. Brancato, "Riflessi delle vicende del '59 sul clero siciliano," Bolletino del Museo del Risorgimento 5 (Bologna 1960), 365–85; F. Brancato, "La participazione del clero alla rivoluzione siciliana del 1860," La Sicilia verso l'unita d'Italia (Palermo 1960), 6–33; F. Brancato, La dittatura garibaldina nel Mezzogiorno (Trapani 1964), 41–45, 216–20.

[10] Text in Bastgen III, 350–51. See P. Pirri, op. cit. III/1, 1–56; R. Mori, La questione romana, 162–269.

The agreement, concluded without knowledge of the Pope, appeared as a hardly concealed disavowal, and the defeat of Austria at Königgrätz in 1866, which destroyed any remaining expectations from this side, caused ultimate despair for the defenders of temporal power. The French intervention at Mentana, 3–4 November 1867, which blocked an attempt by Garibaldi to seize Rome,[11] and the categorical declaration of Minister Romher[12] were a pleasant surprise, but the extremely reserved attitude of most of the European powers, including Austria, confirmed that the days of temporal power were numbered. Less than three years later the collapse of the French Empire at Sedan opened the way for the Italians to Rome; on 20 September 1870 they entered the city,[13] and a few days later they annexed it.

In spite of the advice of some hotheads, Pius IX obediently followed Antonelli's advice not to leave Rome. But his reactions to the new accomplished fact produced, as could have been predicted, fresh excommunications, diplomatic protests, an appeal to the Catholic and conservative powers,[14] and a repeated invocation of the immutable rights of the Holy See. Similarly, he refused to accept in the following year the law of 13 May 1871 "for the guarantee of the independence of the Pope and the free exercise of the spiritual authority of the Holy See," because the guarantee appeared to him as absolutely inadequate. In fact it must be noted that to contemporary liberals, even the moderate ones, the necessity of an unconditional renunciation of temporal power, no matter in what form, appeared as an absolutely untouchable "dogma," and a solution of the type of the Lateran treaties of 1929 would not have been acceptable to them. In order to do justice to the intransigence with which Pius IX repeatedly presented demands to the world which today seem immoderate to us, one must be aware of this lack of understanding on the part of official Italy for the concerns of the Holy See for independence in the exercise of its spiritual mission. But the senescent Pope was again and again buoyed in his hopes for a "miracle" by the illusionary thoughts of his entourage and the enthusiastic demonstrations of the growing numbers of pilgrims who cheered "the Prisoner of the Vatican." He was equally angered by the narrow-minded fanaticism of Italian religious policy. Increasingly he connected his demands for the spiritual freedom of the Holy See with growing radical criticism of liberal assumptions, which he untiringly castigated as the source of the misfortunes of the Church. Such an attitude could not but strengthen the belief of those who held that in its innermost core the Church was in solidarity with the governments which had been swept away by the progress of the centuries and that it was still striving for the general restoration of a theocratic regime. But it must be conceded that, although the undifferentiated declarations of Pius IX against governments which were based on modern freedoms contributed to alienating many minds from the Church during the third quarter of the nineteenth century, the practical attitude of most of the governments, which appealed to liberal principles, frequently justified the irritation of the Pope. They make more easily understandable the growing intransigence of his views.

---

[11] See Della Torre, L'anno di Mentana (Turin 1938); R. Di Nolli, Mentana (Rome 1966); R. Mori, Il tramonto, 207–307.

[12] "In the name of the French government we declare: Italy will not seize Rome. France will never tolerate such an affront against its honor and its Catholicity." Until then, the French government had consistently refused publicly to take on such a commitment; it was forced into it by the development of domestic policy which required the support of Catholicism on the parliamentary level.

[13] Literature in Mollat, 357–58. Concerning the hesitation of Pius IX with respect to resistance, see P. Pirri, op. cit III/1, 310–16.

[14] Among others Prussia, where it was hoped to exploit legitimist arguments. See P. Pirri, op. cit. III/1, 294–302, 317–24; A. Constable, Die Vorgeschichte des Kulturkampfes (Berlin 1956), 29–37.

CHAPTER 18

The Offensive of the Liberal Governments in the Non-German-Speaking Countries

The Secularization Policy in Italy

Until 1860 Italy was nothing more than a geographical expression; its religious-political condition as well as the religious life and the mentality of the clergy varied greatly among the different states.

In the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies the Church maintained its privileged position, and the reaction after 1848 only served to strengthen the tutelage of education by the Church. Yet, in spite of the cordial relations between the court at Naples and the Holy See, the regalistic attitude of the civil servants diminished only very gradually, especially as the local episcopate, in contrast to the bishops of the north, was quite content with this situation. Moreover, the anti-Roman traditions of the eighteenth century were still quite alive in many seminaries, and the very specific conditions under which priests were recruited in the south exemplified the lack of discipline and the lax morals of a still numerically strong clergy. Side by side with wealthy, almost empty monasteries there existed a clerical proletariat, consisting of parsons in small villages, priests without a clearly defined function, Capuchins and others. Many of these deserted their spiritual calling after the arrival of Garibaldi.

In Tuscany, on the other hand, the standards of the also numerically very strong clergy were clearly above the average; but its frequent attempts at reform often disregarded the boundaries of orthodoxy. Under pressure from the Grand Duke, who had shared exile with Pius IX in Naples and revered him, the government in 1851 reluctantly signed a concordat;[1] it put an end to the regalistic legislation which had come down from Pietro Leopoldo. But Rome's success was more theoretical than practical, for while the Tuscan bureaucracy had made concessions in principle, it regained a great portion of its earlier control over religious matters. For eight years both sides conducted an unreal and fruitless dialogue: Florence continued to deliberate from the perspective of the eighteenth century and Rome did so from the standpoint of the medieval Church. Characteristic in this connection were the attempts by the Vatican to prevent the emancipation plans of the Jews.[2] Symptomatic of the progress of ultramontanism was the fact that a few bishops, especially Cardinal Corsi, gradually began to resist the government.

In 1857 an agreement was reached with the Duke of Modena[3] which effected a limitation of the right of asylum by the Church and in return made concessions on mortmain, a problem which had become acute on account of the many monasteries on the peninsula.

In the Lombard-Venetian kingdom the dislike by many clerics of the Austrian government sprang from Italian national feelings and the hostility toward the Josephinist system. Subsequent to the concordat of 1855, the Church regained some of its freedom of movement. This development was noticeable especially in Venetia, where the clergy had little contact with the lay world, even though the examination by A. Gambasin of the diocese of Padua shows that the neoguelf movement had many adherents until 1862. In Lombardy, where the priests were better educated and less open to authoritarian arguments, many of them continued to sympathize even after 1848 with the national and liberal aspirations of the middle class, and after annexation to Italy they constituted a strong bloc of resistance to Roman directives.

In Piedmont—according to Doubet "the people which in Italy took

---

[1] Text in Mercati I, 767–69. Cf. A. Bettanini, Il concordato di Toscana (Milan 1933); R. Mori in AstIt 98 (1940), 41–82, 99 (1941), 131–46, to be complemented by G. Martina, Pio IX e Leopoldo II, 142–94.

[2] On the problem of the emancipation of the Jews in Italy during the middle of the nineteenth century, see G. Martina, Pio IX e Leopoldo II, 195–227 (the bibliography is very extensive, pp. 195–97).

[3] Text in Mercati I, 876–80. Cf. P. Forni in RSTI 8 (1954), 356–82.

Catholicism most seriously"—apostles like Don Bosco, Cafasso, and Murialdo[4] were only the most outstanding examples of a great number of pious and diligent priests who, thanks to their education in the Ecclesiastical Convent of Turin,[5] clearly surpassed all of the Italian clergy, including the Papal State. Charitable and apostolic works continued to flourish and often imitated French examples; the brilliant figure of Rosmini was surrounded by a veritable elite of intellectuals drawn from the laity and the clergy. But under pressure from a middle class increasingly hostile to ecclesiastical privileges, even though it was a more devout middle class than in France, the state was subjected to a policy of secularization against which the clergy, especially in Savoy, fought in vain. The initial steps taken by the moderate government of Massimo d'Azeglio, especially Siccardi's legislation (9 April 1850) which repealed the jurisdiction of the Church and noticeably restricted mortmain, were in no way extreme. Despite Rome's opposition in principle, which was based on the clauses of the concordat, a majority of the Catholic public approved of the legislation. The people were irritated by the clumsy obstinacy of the archbishop of Turin, Fransoni, and in any case were used to accepting papal directives with simultaneous emphasis of their own independence. But the atmosphere was poisoned by the inept conduct of the Turin government, the inflexibility of the Roman canonists, who had no feeling for the spiritual situation, and the Machiavellianism of Cardinal Antonelli, who thought it fitting to exploit the case of Fransoni (at first imprisoned and then expelled) for the benefit of his political design, but in the process neglected to take account of long-range religious concerns. The situation worsened when Cavour allied himself with the anticlerical left. The latter demanded civil marriage, began the secularization of education, and forced, over the hesitation of the King, the passage of the law of 22 May 1855, which dissolved a number of monasteries. While the Vatican broke off diplomatic relations and excommunicated the authors of the law, there also grew a Catholic opposition. Following the example of Montalembert in France, it attempted in part to gain strength on the parliamentary level, but principally was concerned with stirring up public opinion with the aid of newspapers organized along the lines of Louis Veuillot's L'Univers.[6]

---

[4] On Saint Giovanni Don Bosco (1815–88), see P. Stella, Don Bosco nella storia della religiosità cattolica, 2 vols. (Zurich 1968–69). On Saint Giuseppe Cafasso (1811–60), see J. Cottino, San Giuseppe Cafasso, il piccolo prete torinese (Turin 1947). On Saint Leonardo Murialdo (1828–1900), see A. Castellani, Il beato Leonardo Murialdo, 2 vols. (Rome 1966–68).

[5] Concerning this institution, founded in 1817 by Bruno Lanteri, see G. Usseglio in Salesianum 10 (1948), 453–502.

Cavour was reluctant to enlarge the struggle. He had supported the more regalistically than liberally inspired policies of the anticlerical left only in order to gain its parliamentary support for his Italian policy. He had no intention of limiting the activity of the clergy, provided that they confined themselves to purely religious work. His goal was a mutually agreed-upon separation of Church and state, with the Church having the freedom to regulate itself autonomously.[7] In Rome, where Pius IX had resumed the concordat policy of Pius VII and Consalvi, minds were not yet open to a solution of this nature. Without a doubt, however, a modus vivendi would eventually have emerged if the development of the Roman Question after 1859 had not irrevocably disposed the government of Turin against the Holy See.

In fact, from now on Piedmontese religious legislation was applied in all of Italy, and its quick application in the former papal provinces was the more painful to Rome as the reformist tendencies of Cavour's successor, Ricasoli, who belonged to the Tuscan group of Raffaele Lambruschini, produced the unfounded suspicion that he intended to Protestantize the country.[8] But there still existed possibilities for a rapprochement. On the Italian side many moderates, although forced to make concessions to the radicals, in all seriousness wished to find a basis for agreement with Rome. They desired it in part because of their religious convictions and emotional traditions, in part because they regarded the activity of the Church as a guarantee of social stability. On his part, Pius IX was of the opinion that a satisfactory regulation of Italy's ecclesiastical affairs was more important for the Church than the restitution of the provinces annexed in 1860. He was sensitive to the dangers which would accompany a permanent break: denial of approval of new bishops by the government and thus an annual increase in the number of vacant episcopal sees (in 1864 this was true for 108 out of [6] Especially L'Armonia della Religione colla Civiltà of Turin which was under the editorship of the priest G. Margotti (1823–87); in the field of dailies, it fought the same battle which Civiltà cattolica conducted in Rome (see B. Montale in RStRis 43 [1956], 474–84). One of the most important initiators of the Catholic press, especially of brochures, was Monsignor M. Moreno, from 1848 until 1878 bishop of Ivrea.

---

[7] The origins of Cavour's famous formula "A free Church in a free state" have been much debated. See F. Ruffini, Ultimi studi sul conte di Cavour (Bari 1936), 19–124 (the phrase was coined by Vinet); E. Passerin d'Entrèves in RStRis 41 (1954), 494–506 (it stems from Montalembert); U. Marcelli in RStRis 43 (1956), 449–55 (Jansenist influences).

[8] See S. Marchese, La riforma mancata, le idee religiose di B. Ricasoli (Milan 1961). Also: Bolletino storico pisano, 3rd ser. 30 (1961), 418–25; P. Gismondi, RStRis 24 (1937), 1071–1113, 1256–1301; F. Fonzi in Humanitas 6 (Brescia 1951), 65–83.

225); disturbance of seminaries and diocesan life in consequence of arrests of refractory priests; flooding of secondary and high schools with infidels and apostate priests;[9] and other actions. The mutual hostility of the anticlerical left in Florence, which had become the capital of the Kingdom, and of the bitter opponents of the new Italy in Rome, in the spring of 1865 brought about the failure of Vegezzi's mission. But the protracted hesitation of the government to apply the law of 7 July 1866, which dissolved religious corporations and confiscated ecclesiastical property,[10] demonstrated clearly that the bridges had not yet been burned. After Tonello's mission at the beginning of 1867[11] Rome harbored the justified expectation of a mutually acceptable agreement, especially as there grew in some Roman circles the willingness to reconcile. But the opposition of the radicals, who desired no separation on a friendly basis, but rather a throttling of the Church, which in their eyes constituted an obstacle on the way to progress, made a failure also of this renewed attempt. The second Ratazzi cabinet initiated a new period of a bitter anticlericalism. It produced the law of 15 August 1867, which was clearly Jacobin-oriented and whose consequences were to be a heavy burden on religious policy for years. This was especially the case after 1870 when sectarian elements forced the King and the government, in spite of their desire for a pacific development, to enforce this law with increased harshness, and thereby hurled fresh insults at Pope and clergy.[12]

It was in this tense atmosphere, in which liberalism appeared as the oppressor of Church and even of Christian values, that the Catholic press developed and the Italian Catholic Action had its beginning. Ever since the restoration there had existed a number of Catholic periodicals, but daily newspapers were published hardly at all. In 1860 there were only seven on the entire peninsula. Now, within five years, their number doubled, and by 1874 there were eighteen of them.[13] But while in other countries Catholic newspapers were generally under the guidance of laymen, in Italy the founders were almost invariably priests. In fact, frequently they were directly dependent on a bishopric, a characteristic which tended to strengthen their clerical orientation. This remained a peculiarity of the Italian press far into the twentieth century. The vast majority of those who shared the opinion of the Holy See about the new government withdrew resentfully and passively awaited the impending collapse of the Kingdom, which daily was prophesied by an increasingly aggressive press. A few irreconcilable laymen from Bologna, led by the lawyer Casoni, wanted to take action. Dusting off the slogan "neither cast a ballot nor allow yourself to be elected," which a few years earlier had been used in Piedmont to keep people from voting, they wanted to organize in all of Italy an extraconstitutional movement with the aim of first re-Catholicizing society and then of seizing political power. The idea gained ground only slowly. It was supported by the founders of the Society of Italian Catholic Youth, Count G. Acquaderni from Bologna and the young Roman M. Fani. Led by the Venetian G. B. Pagganuzzi, it was to lead in 1874 to the convening of the first Italian Catholic Congress, modeled after the German Catholic Conferences and the congresses of Mechelen. Confronted with a middle class which increasingly turned away from a Church which seemed to disapprove of modern trends, the militant wing of Italian Catholicism decided against compromises along the line of Catholic liberalism and in favor of a militant movement on the basis of the principles of the Syllabus, whose anathema against liberal society had reawakened the energies of the intransigents. They could count on the strong support of a new generation of clerics, faithful to Rome, which had taken the place of the numerous conciliatory priests who were the heirs of the neoguelf illusions of 1848.

---

[9] See G. Talamo, La Scuola dalla legge Casati alla inchiesta del 1864 (Milan 1964). According to the Casati Law of 13 November 1859, teachers were to be laicized, but it could hardly be implemented because of the low salaries for elementary teachers (by 1864 two-thirds of the teachers were still clerics); in the secondary school system, however, two thirds of the instructors were laymen within five years, and together with the personnel the spirit was also quickly laicized.

[10] See G. Jacquemyns in Revue belge de philologie et d'histoire 42 (1964), 442–94, 1257–91. The real property of the Church was estimated at 2 billion lire (more than 15 percent of all real property). It becomes increasingly clearer that the motives for the dissolution of religious corporations were more often financial requirements than ideological principles, and in many instances the religious were permitted covertly to buy back their monasteries. Still, the dissolutions led to the secularization of numerous regular clergy, whose numbers were reduced from 30,632 in 1861 to 9,163 in 1871 (despite the annexation of Rome).

[11] E. Del Vecchio in Studi Romani 16 (1968), 315–43.

[12] See P. Gismondi, Il nuovo giurisdizionalismo italiano VI/1 (Milan 1946).

This change of mind in the clergy in the 1860s was the result of systematic action on the part of the episcopate. With the support of the Holy See it throttled in sometimes despotic fashion the liberal tendencies and the strivings for a democratic reform of the Church which could frequently be observed among the priests of the 1848 generation.[14] Much absorbed by these attempts and numerous administrative difficulties which governmental policy imposed upon them and even though there often were agreements on the local level, the bishops—among whom were such able and open-minded men as Charvaz in Genoa, Arrigoni in Lucca, Pecci in Perugia, and Riario Sforza in Naples—were unable to deal with other tasks which by themselves would have been enough to absorb their energies. To be sure, the question of de-Christianization was not yet as acute as in France, but there were other problems: the disappointing condition of the old religious orders, which at least in the north was partially compensated for by the founding of some very dynamic new congregations such as the Salesians of Don Bosco and the African missionaries of Comboni; the backwardness of Italy in the number of female religious;[15] the unpleasant behavior of many priests, particularly noticed by foreigners, and the high number of apostates; the extremely inadequate education of the clergy (worse in the south), which to a large degree had not attended any seminaries at all; and the low standards of these seminaries. This was in part caused by the small size of some dioceses (the concept of interdiocesan seminaries, voiced since 1849, was only realized by Pius X); the frequently still very archaic forms of pastoral methods, which rested on an external control of religious practices and which left the Christian masses to their own devices when they were confronted with the secularization of public life and especially of schools, although there were a number of significant private initiatives, such as Ramazotti's in Milan, Fra di Bruno's in Turin, Frassinetti's and Alimonda's in Genoa, and Mazza's in Verona; and finally, with the exception of a few centers[16] which actually had been more active in the 1850s than they were in 1870, the recognizable lack of a Catholic culture of a genuine Italian and simultaneously truly Christian character. In this connection, the reaction of the Jesuits to the adherents of Rosmini, who were suspected of liberal sympathies, passed up an opportunity which would not soon present itself again.[17] The delay of the solution of these urgent problems in part doubtlessly resulted from the inadequate structure of the Italian Church, which, like many European countries at this time, had too few centers of pastoral reflection and remained split in too many small dioceses. But to a substantial degree it was also the indirect consequence of the long political-religious conflict which agitated Italy during the entire pontificate of Pius IX, a consequence which was much graver than the loss of obsolete privileges, on whose defense the ecclesiastical authorities vainly concentrated their best energies.

---

[13] On the Catholic press, see Aubert-Martina, 15–16, 832–38 biblio.

[14] See M. Bertazzoli, "I riformisti milanesi del 'Carrocio' 1863–64," SC 92 (1964), 123–53; A. Gambasin, Il clero padovano 1859–66 (Rome 1967), especially 25–36, 117–69; N. Cavaletti, L'abate G. a Prato (Trentino 1967); M. Themelly, "La riforma cattolica nell'Italia moderna prima del Sillabo," XII^e Congrès international des sciences historiques. Rapports I (Vienna 1965), 161–75.

---

[15] In contrast to all neighboring countries, they were far less numerous than male religious and in spite of a gradual increase they surpassed the males only at the beginning of the twentieth century. The increase resulted primarily from the founding of teaching orders in some of the dioceses of the north. In 1871 there were in the province of Genoa 1,324 sisters compared to 3,301 clerics; in the diocese of Turin there were 577 nuns compared to 827 priests.

[16] Naples, for example, where two very active reviews, La scienza e la fede (after 1841) and La Carità by P. Ludovico de Casoria (1865–73), appeared. On the Catholic circles of Naples during the nineteenth century, which retained the traditions of Vico and Gioberti, see P. López, E. Cenni e i cattolici napoletani dopo l'unità (Rome 1962) and F. Tessitore, Aspetti del pensiero neoguelfo napoletano dopo il Sessanta (Naples 1962).

Anticlericalism in Belgium and in the Netherlands

The Church of Belgium in the middle of the nineteenth century "through its strength and independence had become a model, a kind of ideal for the other European Churches" (Pouthas). The continuing growth of the secular and regular clergy[18] throughout the pontificate of Pius IX made possible the encouragement and development of all kinds of activities in addition to the ordinary and regular growth in the number of parishes and in Catholic education. Despite some differences between several bishops and the Jesuits, who in the view of some people had gained much too much influence, their cooperation was generally excellent. Charitable efforts, in continuation of the Vincent conferences, were made to ameliorate the suffering of the industrial workers and to influence the youth of the lower classes in the cities. Four hundred twenty-two such works were undertaken in 1863, more than half of them in Flemish and Walloon Flanders. Publishing companies and newspapers tried to make up for bad literature.[19] After 1850 there were also an increasing number of works of an edifying nature, thanks to the initiative of young ultramontane laymen who through the deepening of their own religious life and through publicly witnessing their faith intended to re-Christianize all social and cultural life.

---

[17] See, for example, the clear-sighted observations by P. Scoppola, Crisi modernista e rinnovamento cattolico in Italia (Bologna 1961), 20–42. Concerning the mistrust of the clerics vis-à-vis Manzoni's work, which was regarded as insufficiently conformistic, see, for example, R. Comandini, "Della varia fortuna dell'opera manzoniana in Romagna," Collana di Monografie (del Istituto tecnico di Rimini), ed. by R. Pian, 5 (1962), 5–60.

[18] The increase in the numbers of the diocesan clergy was slower than the increase of the population, but the annual number of deaths remained below that of ordinations. There were fewer than one thousand souls per parish priest. If one adds the priests engaged in teaching school, auxiliary pastors, and regular clergy, the ratio becomes a very good one. For example, in the diocese of Mechelen in 1862, to which the two cities of Brussels and Antwerp belonged, there were 2,200 priests for 1,100,000 inhabitants. The number of regular clergy had doubled in fifteen years from 4,791 in 1829; in 1866 it reached the figure of 18,196 and in 1880 25,326. More than one hundred sixty new houses were opened in the diocese of Mechelen between 1832 and 1867.

[19] After they had been devoted during the first half of the century to the Indian mission in America, attention was now turned to the East: Belgian Jesuits in 1855 settled in Bengal, and in 1862 a priest from Brussels, Théophil Verbist, founded the missionary congregation of Scheut, to which Mongolia was entrusted (see E. de Moreau-J. Masson, Les missions belges de 1804 jusqu'à nos jours (Brussels 1944).

But while the Catholics thought it the most natural thing in the world that under the protection of freedom the Church de facto, if not de jure, was able to exercise a growing influence in the country, the liberals soon became convinced that matters could not be allowed to proceed in this fashion. In order to return to what they justifiably considered the letter of the constitution, they held a congress in June 1846 at which they unequivocally presented their program: "actual independence" of the civil power from the Church and especially "the establishment of a comprehensive system of public education under the exclusive authority of the civil power . . . and rejection of the interference of priests on the basis of their jurisdiction in a school system organized by the civil power."[20]

The first indication of this new secularization policy was the law of 1 June 1850 dealing with secondary schools.[21] It was far less favorable for the Church than the law of 1842 dealing with elementary education. Without intending to exclude religion from education, the new law provided for public education totally independent from any ecclesiastical control. Many liberals, who in the future wanted to pay their respects to religion, had hoped to effect their policy of secularizing institutions through a friendly agreement with the Church. But the implacable attitude of most of the bishops, in spite of the willingness to compromise on the part of Cardinal Sterckx, to the new education legislation destroyed such illusions, and the attitude of Rome deepened the disappointment. Inasmuch as the liberals had lost the hope for a reasonable agreement with the Church and as before were determined to carry out their intention to secularize without the hierarchy or, if necessary, in opposition to it, they now increasingly chose the way of radicalization. In 1857 they succeeded in voting down the "Monastery Law" and with it the last attempt by the Catholics to amend the constitution in a direction favorable to them. Then, egged on by the Freemasons and supported by an electorate whose suspicions of the wealth of the orders and the "excesses of the clergy" they knew how to exploit, the liberals proceeded to restore the "independence of lay authority" in order "to protect society against a repetition of the abuses of an earlier age." The government of Rogier-Frère Orban, in office from 1857 to 1870, passed a number of laws which, supplemented by administrative decisions, dealt in secular fashion with the problems of charitable foundations, cemeteries, and church boards. In the eyes of the bishops these were nothing but falsifications of constitutional freedoms. Simultaneously the liberals, encouraged by such radical groups as the Education League, which was founded in 1864 in advance of a similar organization in France, intensified their efforts in the communities with a liberal majority for a "correction" of the law of 1842 through administrative decisions. Their purpose was to limit the rights which had been conceded to the clergy in the area of elementary education.

---

[20] Le congrès libéral de Belgique (Brussels 1846), especially ARTICLES 2 and 3.

[21] See W. Theuns, De organieke wet op het middelbaar onderwijs (Louvain 1959) and especially Simon, Sterckx I, 469–501; Simon, Réunions des évêques I, 102–13; Becqué I, 97–106; H. Fassbender in BIHBR 40 (1969), 469–520.

While liberalism thus was increasingly more determined and militant, the Catholics defended every foot of the religious bastions which they had succeeded in restoring or maintaining within the civil institutions. Their resistance was weakened, however, by lack of unity in their ranks and the diffusion of their efforts. Disregarding the exhortations of his colleagues, at first by Van Bommel and then also by the young militant bishops who had been appointed after 1850 and received their directives from Rome, Cardinal Sterckx refused to unify Catholics in a denominational political party, for fear of strengthening liberal suspicions even further. He preferred the individual activity of laymen on the parliamentary level and within the framework of ecclesiastical works. On the other hand, the sympathies of a part of the Catholic population for the intransigent attitude of Louis Veuillot, which admittedly was largely identical with that of the Pope, after twenty years of quiet had once again fanned the discussions between ultramontanes and Catholics loyal to the constitution. The debates grew more bitter by the year, because the ultramontanes went so far as to declare that Catholics loyal to the constitution were more dangerous and damaging to the Church than admitted anticlericals.

In the expectation of being able to unify all Catholic forces in practical matters, some laymen, led by E. Ducpétiaux,[22] in the years 1863, 1864, and 1867 organized large Catholic congresses, designed to coordinate the activity of ecclesiastical works which had grown without guidance, and to inspire a powerful movement of public opinion for the support of Catholic resistance on the parliamentary level. Encouraged by the aged cardinal and, in spite of the caution of the ultramontanes, effected through the spectacular intervention in 1863 of Montalembert, these congresses undeniably contributed to awakening Catholic energies. An attempt was made to make up for omissions in the area of the press[23] and to establish immediately—at least in the dioceses of Bruges, Ghent, and Tournai—a network of free schools directly under the authority of the clergy. They were intended to counter public instruction, whose ideological tendencies were, with a good deal of exaggeration, regarded as fundamentally incompatible with the Catholic faith. They also changed the status of the "Catholic Circles," chartered by the state, into political organizations and united them in a national federation. It produced the electoral victory of the Catholics in 1870 which kept them in power until 1878.

---

[22] On Édouard Ducpétiaux (1804–64), whose influence on the reorganization of the Catholic forces was decisive, see E. Rubbens, Édouard Ducpêtiaux, 2 vols. (Louvain 1922–34) and BnatBelg XXXII, 154–76.

This amounted only to a delay on the parliamentary and legislative levels, however, for the situation in the country had become increasingly worse since the beginning of the 1860s. As in all of western Europe, the gap between the masses of the workers and the Church had widened, indifferentism made progress in the rural settlements, which were strongly affected by Freemasonry, and religious practice was retrogressive in the large population centers. Much graver, however, was the fact that while a portion of the Catholic middle class was much more willing to testify to its faith, the new liberal generation after 1860 increasingly tended toward a militant anticlericalism. The reason for this was the conviction that there was an incompatibility not only between the Church and modern freedoms (this was underscored in 1864 by the Syllabus), but also between science and faith.[24] The young generation instead turned in part to a demythologized Protestantism, but more frequently to a scientific and a religious humanism—the first society of this kind, Free Thought, was founded in 1863—and also to a socialistic atheism. For these young liberal intellectuals it was no longer simply a matter of liberating the civil power from the grasp of the Church, but of "rescuing intelligence from the darkness of obscurantism." In order to achieve this goal, they called for public control of all Catholic activities.

In view of the development of liberalism in the direction of intolerance, the Catholics once more were split in two camps. While one group, as before, saw the only effective protection against the aims of the radicals in the constitutional freedoms, the others responded that this was nothing more than a fool's paradise in that the state was actually under the control of the enemies of the Church. This second group, led by Professor Périn (Louvain), who was being encouraged by Pius IX, started a campaign against the constitution and its "freedom to be destroyed."[25] It was only a minority, but a very vocal minority, which around 1875 made many people believe that at the moment that liberalism under the influence of the radicals would turn away from the compromise solution which was hailed in 1830, the Church also would turn away from it, but in the opposite direction, in order to regain at least partially the standing which it had enjoyed under the Old Regime. This, in turn, enraged the liberals and the moderates as well. Thus, the situation was extremely tense and the entire relationship between Church and state once again seemed to be in question.

---

[23] Reorganization of the Journal de Bruxelles (cf. M. Blampain, Le Journal de Bruxelles, histoire interne de 1863 à 1871 [Louvain 1965]) and the founding in 1865 of the Revue générale (cf. N. Piepers, op. cit., General Bibliography).

[24] The condemnation of the rationalistic instruction by two professors at the University of Ghent (1856) by the bishops contributed to deepening the gap.

In the Netherlands, the situation developed quite similarly, even though somewhat more slowly and although the position of the Catholics in the state was rather different. The parliamentary alliance between Catholics and liberals lasted until 1866; but more so than in Belgium the rapprochement was determined by tactical considerations rather than by a change of conscience. Soon wide differences of opinion surfaced, additionally strengthened by the general development of ideas during the third quarter of the century. On one side stood the intolerant behavior which a liberal anticlericalism adopted in all European countries and which in the Netherlands was enhanced by the continuation of an abiding hostility to the Pope. On the other side stood the increasingly reactionary orientation of the pontificate of Pius IX and the influence of the antiliberal polemics of Veuillot, which Cramer echoed in the Tijd by making it virtually obligatory for Catholics to divorce themselves from modern civilization. While a generation earlier Broere and Van Bommel had been responsible for some efforts at rethinking Catholicism with a view toward new ideas, the condemnation of Lamennais had interrupted this first attempt at intellectual modernity, and the excesses of the anticlerical polemics on the occasion of the publication of the Syllabus confirmed those in their views who insisted on the incompatibility of Catholic philosophy and the principles of 1789. The example of liberal Protestantism, which in the Netherlands assumed a peculiarly radical position, also confirmed many Dutch Catholics in their conviction that it was dangerous for the faith to have too much of an open mind for modern ideas. Together with such doctrinal factors the Dutch Catholics, who were strongly tied to the papacy, were offended by the sympathies of the liberal press for the machinations of Piedmont against the Holy See. It was the problem of education over which the final break occurred.

The Catholics did not have enough money to establish their own school system and therefore had to choose between those who wanted to preserve the Calvinist character of the public schools and the liberals who demanded the neutrality of public instruction. Preferring the latter to a Protestant parochial school and hoping that in the end it would be characterized by the Christian spirit, many Catholics, not without criticism by other members of their faith, supported the liberals. Together they passed the law of 13 August 1857, which in addition to some noticeable pedagogical innovations for the first time in Europe introduced absolute neutrality in education. But after a few years hard facts could not be denied: neutral education in reality had turned largely into a completely secular, even a religious type of instruction. Now the bishops, encouraged by the encyclical Quanta cura, at first at the Provincial Council in 1865 and then in a joint pastoral letter in July 1868, proclaimed the right of a Catholic child to be raised in a Catholic school. The right of the child had its complement in a corresponding obligation of the parents, and the bishops legally began to increase the number of free schools. In order to meet the tremendous expenditures which this policy necessitated, the parishes organized active school boards; the joint demand for public money for the free denominational schools brought Catholics and Protestants closer to one another. Such cooperation would have been unthinkable twenty years earlier, and even now it was undertaken by many Catholics only with the greatest reluctance. Now that the liberals had replaced the religious outlook of 1850 with a rationalistic and positivist attitude, the "common foundation" (A. Kuyper) of Calvinists and Roman Catholics was suddenly discovered; while it was not yet strong enough to form the basis of an ecumenical dialogue, it was sufficient for a "Christian coalition" to gain religious objectives. However, the goals were not achieved immediately. To the contrary: inasmuch as the elections of 1877 gave the liberals a strong majority, the radicals became eager to translate their ideas into reality and managed to pass a law which tightened the clauses of the law of 1857 and jeopardized free education.

---

[25] Concerning Charles Périn (1815–1905), see BnatBelg XXX, 665–71.

It was a severe defeat for the defenders of Christian schools and impressed upon the Catholics the necessity of having an organization of their own and of closing ranks in a political party. The idea was broached as early as 1877 by the Tijd, citing the German Center Party as an example; following the law of 1878, it was masterfully realized by the young priest Abbé Schaepman.

The Confused Situation in the Iberian Peninsula

In Spain as well as in Portugal the situation of the Church had improved since the unrest which it had experienced under the pontificate of Gregory XVI, but peace was only temporary and was constantly endangered. In Portugal there were repeated scandalous interferences by the government in ecclesiastical affairs. In 1864 the government forced a reduction in the number of parishes; in 1862, 1866, and 1869 there were new secularizations of ecclesiastical estates and the expulsion of foreign nuns (the case of the Daughters of Charity in 1861 created quite a disturbance); and after 1865 the Freemasons under the leadership of Count Paraty started a campaign in favor of civil marriage.

In Spain serious disturbances took place. The liberals refused to accept the predominance of the Church, which it had regained with the concordat, and their hostility was heightened when the clergy attempted to arrange itself with the increasingly reactionary Narvaez government. Between 1854 and 1856, when Espartero was in power, this hostility had known no bounds; but it was even worse after the revolution of 1868, when the Provisional Government quickly fell under the influence of the radicals; it meant the end of intellectual and political moderation. There was not only the immediate repeal of the concordat; much more serious was that as a result of acts of violence by the people against priests and regular clergy the growing gap between the proletariat of the large cities and the Church became visible. The evolution of a part of the liberal middle class from a simple political and economic anticlericalism to an antichristian rationalism clearly came to the fore in the debates on the new constitution of 1869. It subjected the Church to a number of legal restrictions, introduced civil marriage and a relative freedom of religion,[26] and contained measures directed against the orders, especially the Jesuits, and the Vincentian Conferences. Much more significant than these obstacles, however, was the spirit in which they were rooted. The highly solemn civil funeral in 1869 of Sanz del Río, who had introduced positivism to Spain, and that in 1874 of his friend F. de Castro, a priest in open rebellion against the Church and president of the central university, underscored the power which the new antireligious current had gained. It was actually strengthened by the obstinate reaction of the hierarchy to the anticlerical steps which followed one another after October 1868, as well as by the declaration of the infallibility of the Pope in 1870.

After the fall of the republic in 1874 Canovas del Castillo was interested in reinstituting the concordat, but considering the confusion it seemed impossible to him to return without adjustments to the conditions which had existed before 1868. Consequently, the constitution of 1876 included the principle of freedom of religion, despite the vehement protests of the clergy and of Pius IX. If one takes into consideration that the constitution, among other things, left the Church in control of education, even at the universities, religious freedom was only a minor concession to the liberals. Still, it was one more defeat for those who saw in the Syllabus the ideal of a Christian society, a defeat for which to a large degree the antiliberal Catholics were responsible. By insisting on placing their hopes in a chimeric Carlist restoration and by virtually isolating themselves from public life by their antidynastic opposition, which grew even more pronounced after 1870, the "traditionalist" Catholics had robbed the moderate conservatives of the support of a strong Catholic government party. Their cooperation would have enabled them better to resist the parties of the left and even to achieve objectives of their own. This was the solution suggested in 1848 by Balmes. Instead, they forced the Catholics who were actively engaged in the government to collaborate with the liberals, and unavoidably this led to agreements and concessions which were despised by these irreconcilables.

---

[26] It was granted only to foreigners. The Protestant English missionaries derived the greatest benefit from it, but their successes remained limited. By 1874 there were about two thousand five hundred adherents.

Regalistic Liberals and Freemasons in Latin America

The relative easing of tension, noticeable in many Latin American states by the middle of the nineteenth century, was not universal. Especially in two countries, Mexico and Colombia, in which the Church ever since colonial times held a particularly strong position, the liberals incessantly and successfully tried to break its power, a power which benefited the large landowners, who in turn relied on the army.

In Mexico, the most densely settled republic in Spanish America, where the conflict was aggravated by the racial hatred harbored by the Indians against the Spanish, V. Gómez Farias as early as the 1830s had attacked the orders and the privileges of the clergy and had secularized a part of its great wealth. The principal consequence was that the flourishing missions of the Franciscans in California were almost totally destroyed, but the economic and political power of the Church was hardly affected. After a conservative interlude, the success of the reform movement, which had grown since 1845 under the leadership of the Indian Benito Juárez, a convinced Freemason and anticlericalist, led to the resumption of an earlier policy. Its aim was to replace the corporate society, in which denominational groups and especially the orders occupied a privileged position, with a regime of individual rights. Its ultimate aim was to laicize the state, which in spite of earlier disputes was still subject to the Church.[27] The recalcitrance of the clergy, which on its own had been incapable of introducing unavoidable reforms and correcting the most flagrant abuses, could not have been more pronounced. Utilizing the tenuous pretext of the utopian character of the democratic program and its evident social failure in a preindustrial society, the clergy continued to place all of its hopes in the vain attempts by the conservative reaction. In its intransigence, encouraged by Nuncio Meglia and the new archbishop, P. A. Labastida (1863–91), it refused to support Emperor Maximilian (1864–67) when he wanted to maintain freedom of religion and the press and to ratify the nationalization of Church estates in the hope of winning the moderate liberals to his side. After his return to power, Juárez, aware of the slumbering strength of Catholic traditions in the common people, was sensible enough to enforce anticlerical legislation with moderation. But after his death in 1872, his successor, S. Lerdo de Tejada, wanted to strengthen them through incorporation in the constitution. Subsequently, civil marriage, laicized education on all levels, separation of Church and state, and the nationalization of Church lands, having been embodied in articles of the Mexican constitution, became sacrosanct. But considering the close ties which a majority of the population still had with Catholicism—provided that its demands were not excessive—and considering the generosity of the faithful, the reality was much less tragic than it appeared according to the law; but there was no question that the secular power of the Church finally had been broken.

---

[27] Concerning the spirit which inspired the reforms introduced by the laws of 1857, 1859, and 1860, in which the old regalistic traditions, the natural mistrust of Rome, and liberal individualism joined, while intending to respect the principles of Christianity, see the work by one of the most important ministers of Juárez, M. Ocampo, La religión, la Iglesia y el clero (new ed., Mexico 1965).

In Colombia also the situation, which, with the exception of the presidency of General Alcántara Herrán (1842–45), who invited the Jesuits to return, had not been good under Gregory XVI, became increasingly worse during the pontificate of Pius IX. After 1845 anticlerical steps followed in quick succession: abolition of the tithe and of canonical jurisdiction; expulsion of priests and bishops, especially Monsignor M. J. Mosquera (1834–53), the remarkable archbishop of Bogotá, if they attempted to resist this legislation;[28] separation of Church and state in 1843, the first decision of this kind in Latin America; nationalization of Church property; and the dissolution of all monasteries in 1861. These measures were accompanied by extensive restrictions on the activity of the clergy, in spite of the contradiction that was involved with respect to the official separation of Church and state. This genuine Kulturkampf lasted until 1880.

The other South American republics, with the exception of Bolivia and Peru, after 1870 also experienced a revival of militant anticlericalism and secularization policies. It was now no longer merely a matter of the nationalization of Church property, the abolition of canonical jurisdiction, or the control over the appointment of bishops and parish priests, but of the introduction of civil marriage, freedom of religion for the Protestants (whose numbers in some countries increased because of immigration), reduction of the influence of the Church on education, and total separation of Church and state. Just as in the preceding generation, the rationale of these policies was the attempt of the liberals, who almost everywhere had regained power, to reduce the political and social influence of the clergy. This was the result, in part, of the clergy's support of the conservative parties in the interest of defending the "established order" and its hierarchical and paternalistic concept of society. It was in part also caused by the introduction of two new elements which created hostility to the Church: the influence of the members of orders who had come from Europe and who advocated ultramontane ideas which conflicted with an increasingly sensitive nationalism, and the unmitigated claim by the Church to regulate the life of civil society as recently laid down by the Syllabus; also there was the progress of Comte's positivism, which in some instances changed the church-political conflict into a regular battle against the Christian faith, which a part of the educated middle class was beginning to reject. In Venezuela President Guzmán Blanco, a fanatic sectarian, in 1870 began the fight for laicized schools and attempted to create a national Church totally dependent on the state, in which the archbishop would be elected by the parliament and the parish priests by their parishes. In Guatemala the sentiment was not quite so radical, but here also there began after the fall of President Cerna (1871), the great protector of the Jesuits, a policy of laicization which reached its apogee in the constitution of 1879 and soon was imitated by the other republics of Central America (except for Costa Rica). Chile followed the same path under the presidency of Errazuriz (1871–76), as did Argentina after the success of the National Autonomist Party in 1874. It was centered on the landed gentry, which makes evident that the roots of South American anticlericalism were not only of a social nature; Ecuador after the assassination of Garciá Moreno in 1875 also took this direction.

---

[28] Personally moderate, but compromised by a largely reactionary clergy. With respect to him, cf. Antología del Il. Señor M.J. Mosquera y escritos sobre el (Bogotá 1954).

In Brazil, where the legal status of the Church hardly changed during the period of imperial government, i.e., until 1888, the hardening of the fronts between Freemasonic liberals and ultramontane Catholics was shown in an incident which, although limited in time and space, found an echo even in Europe. Influenced by the increasingly unequivocal positions taken by Pius IX, several bishops were worried about the toleration by the Emperor of Protestant missions, the acceptance of rationalistic doctrines from Germany by educated people, and the growing anti-Christian attitude of the Freemasons. In 1872 the Capuchin bishop of Olinda, Monsignor V. de Oliveira, who had been trained in France, and one of his brethren, Monsignor A. de Macedo Costa, bishop of Para, ordered their priests and the members of the parishes with threat of punishment to leave Freemasonic lodges. The government, however, arguing that the papal bulls against the Freemasons had never received the approval of the state, annulled the episcopal decisions. When the prelates denied the right of the civil authority to interfere in religious questions, they were imprisoned. The horrified Catholic world press celebrated the bishops as martyrs in the cause of ecclesiastical independence. The other bishops actually supported their colleagues only moderately, but this case was the starting point for a mobilization of public opinion which caused the most energetic Brazilian Catholics to call for the spiritual freedom of the Church in the face of abusive interference by the civil authority.

CHAPTER 19

Preliminary Phases of the Kulturkampf in Austria, Bavaria, Baden, and Switzerland

During the 1860s the conflict between liberalism and the Catholic Church in several German-speaking countries reached that ideological confrontation which Rudolf Virchow characterized as "Kulturkampf."[1] Consequently, liberalism, which had grown to be the predominant political power, began to implement one of its central concerns: the liberation of state and society from ecclesiastical tutelage. The chief opponent seemed to be Catholicism with its ultramontane coloration, highlighted by the dogma of Immaculate Conception and the Syllabus, which had been augmented by the dogma of papal infallibility. The contrast emerged particularly sharply in countries with mixed denominations. German and Swiss liberalism, having grown out of Protestantism and being especially doctrinal, considered a frontal attack necessary. In the process, the power of the state was often ruthlessly applied, in violation of liberal principles. To the ideological contrast there was frequently added an economical-social one: the liberal urban middle class confronted the lower middle class and rural populations, who had close ties to the Church and felt disadvantaged by the beginning industrialization.[2]

---

[1] In the programmatic speech in which Virchow, the famous pathologist and left-liberal politician, on 17 January 1873 in the Prussian House of Representatives expressed himself in favor of the bill concerning the education and employment of clerics. The speech is excerpted in Franz-Willing, Kulturkampf gestern und heute, 9f.—Concerning occasional earlier uses of the word "Kulturkampf," see ibid., 11f.

Both sides were responsible for aggravating the situation. Neither was prepared to recognize the autonomy of the other in its own area; liberal politicians and Church leaders attempted to define "the borderline between state and Church"[3] in such a way as to be most beneficial to each group.

Catholic states on the whole were content to acquire sovereignty over the borderline areas claimed by the Church, such as education and civil registries, and to retain the surviving parts of the system of state Churches. Non-Catholic politicians went much further; they wanted to replace the cooperation for which the Church had fought with a complete return to the earlier state Church, a move which they justified with the claim to the absolute legal authority of the modern state. Frequently these liberals, imbued by national ideologies, tried to substitute such national Church organizations for the supranational principle of Catholicism.

In Austria, the denominational laws of the year 1868 continued to undermine the concordat but did not affect the inner sphere of the Church. Emperor Franz Joseph endeavored to avoid a break with Rome,[4] yet could not prevent the extremely sharp condemnation of the laws by the Pope.[5] In Austria itself voices were raised in objection and not only by conservatives. The belligerent Bishop Franz Joseph Rudigier of Linz (1811–84)[6] became the focal point of a popular opposition movement. Such a development was new for Austria, but it found imitation in other states where the struggle against the liberals was being waged; the Catholic faction in the parliament at Vienna also grew stronger. Because he exhorted people to disregard the law, Rudigier was found guilty by a court in 1869, but was immediately pardoned by the Emperor; nevertheless, the brief imprisonment of the bishop had a jolting effect on the Catholic masses. Rudigier was supported by Bishop

---

[2] This aspect of the Kulturkampf, generally neglected in treatments of the period, is brought to light in the essay by L. Gall, even though he overemphasized it.

[3] This was the programmatic title of a Kulturkampf-promoting work by the liberal canon lawyer Emil Friedberg (Tübingen 1872).

[4] The Emperor tried in vain to convince the Pope of the necessity of a modification of the concordat. Franz Joseph to Pius IX on 16 February 1868; handwritten remarks by Pius IX, no date. Texts: Engel-Janosi, Politische Korrespondenz nos. 130, 130a; see also nos. 133, 134.

[5] Allocution of 22 June 1868. Text: Acta Pii IX IV, 407ff.

[6] Biography by K. Meindl (2 vols. [Linz 1891–92]); J. Lenzenweger in LThK IX, 85.

Johann Baptist Zwerger[7] (1824–93) of Seckau and Bishop Josef Fessler[8] (1813–72) of Sankt Pölten.

The Emperor continued to effect a moderate application of the laws, and his constant communication with Cardinal Rauscher also had a calming effect. Although polemics from both sides continued with unabated stridency and the liberals in 1869 succeeded in passing a national elementary school act which reduced the number of denominational schools, Emperor and cardinal working together prevented the outbreak of a real Kulturkampf. Rauscher's suffragan Johann Rudolf Kutschker[9] contributed greatly to his cardinal's policy of understanding. He was also in charge of Catholic ecclesiastical matters in the Ministry of Education, a dual position which can only be comprehended by looking at Josephinist traditions. In the question of appointment of bishops, agreement was generally also reached on candidates willing to compromise.

The constant objective of Chancellor Friedrich Ferdinand von Beust was revenge for Prussia's victory in 1866. For this purpose he needed both the support of the liberals and an alliance with antipapal Italy. Among other matters, the concordat was an obstacle to such goals, but all attempts to move the Curia to a voluntary renunciation of the treaty were in vain. In the summer of 1870 Beust finally used the dogma of papal infallibility as a pretext for disavowing the concordat and was supported in this move by the liberal minister of religion, Stremayr. After some hesitation, Emperor Franz Joseph on 30 July 1870 declared the concordat as no longer valid. He argued that as a consequence of the dogma the Roman partner had changed his character, that a contractual relationship was impossible with a partner who claimed to be infallible, and that it was the state's responsibility to counteract the dangerous consequences of the new dogma. This legally untenable step rested on a much too broad interpretation of the dogma, although it was plausible as a result of ultramontane declarations. It can be assumed that the Emperor resorted to it only because he was deeply disappointed by the results of the Vatican Council and the Curia's hardening attitude, both of which harmed ecclesiastical peace. His disappointment was deepened by the resigned attitude of the Austrian bishops when they returned from Rome.[10]

---

[7] Biography by F. von Oer (Graz 1897); J. Köck in LThK X, 1430.

[8] Biographies by A. Erdinger (Brixen 1874); M. Ramsauer (Würzburg 1875); F. Grass in LThK IV, 95; ÖBL I, 305.

[9] Johann Rudolf Kutschker (1810–81), 1857–76 ministerial councilor in the Ministry of Education, after 1862 simultaneously suffragan bishop and vicar general in Vienna, 1876 as successor of Rauscher archbishop of Vienna, 1877 cardinal (biography by A. Eitler [diss., Vienna 1956]); H. Erharter in LThK VI, 699.

The attempts of the liberals to intensify the struggle after Beust's resignation were only partially successful. They reached their legislative peak with the religious laws which were introduced in 1874 by the liberal ministry of Auersperg and accepted by the Emperor.[11] The passage of the laws was preceded by intense arguments in which the Pope intervened in the form of an encyclical to the Austrian bishops and a letter to the Emperor.[12] While Cardinal Schwarzenberg favored vocal protests, Rauscher and Kutschker negotiated quietly and succeeded in the striking of several unpalatable clauses.

The laws strengthened the state's supervision of the Churches and effected the equality of denominations, without, however, crossing the line established by the legislation of 1868. They left to the Catholic Church the position of a privileged public corporation and assured it of freedom of education and worship, the free exercise of its jurisdiction in the ecclesiastical sphere, and the free development of the orders and parochial school systems. The ecclesiastical part of the public schools was merely placed under state supervision. Thus, the Austrian laws were considerably milder than the Kulturkampf legislation in Baden and Prussia. Additionally, transgressions required neither prosecution by the state nor a "dismissal" of the offending cleric; at most, the offices of such clerics had to cease public activity.

Emperor Franz Joseph was convinced that these laws adequately protected the rights of the state and resisted all additional anticlerical legislation. A law in the spring of 1874 which established the state's right to dissolve monasteries was not sanctioned by him. The Curia also was willing to be flexible, not least thanks to the judicious reports of Nuncio Jacobini, who had been sent to Vienna in 1874. It was recognized that the Austrian laws struck a balance between state and Church and that despite a premature papal complaint conditions in Austria were not the same as in Germany. This did not mean that the ideological struggle between liberals and Catholics ceased; it continued and damaged not only the Church. The Catholic ability to resist, exemplified especially in the Christian-Socialist Party, founded in 1880, proved to be far stronger than opponents had assumed.

---

[10] In a letter of 25 August 1870 to his mother, Archduchess Sophie, Franz Joseph wrote (among other matters); "It is also my most fervent desire again to come to an agreement with the Church, but that is impossible with the current Pope. When one sees the embitterment and hopelessness with which our bishops returned from Rome . . . one can almost despair of the future of the Church if one is not firm in the faith and in the confidence that God will preserve the Church from further disaster" (Weinzierl-Fischer, op. cit., 117).

[11] Three laws were passed: one regulated the external legal relationships of the Catholic Church; the second dealt with the amount of contribution of the benefice property to the religious fund; and the third treated the recognition of religious corporations.

[12] Pius IX to Franz Joseph on 7 March 1874. Only in this letter did the Pope protest the termination of the concordat. Text: Engel-Janosi, Politische Korrespondenz no. 139.—In his reply (n.d. ibid., no. 140), the Emperor refuted the papal accusations and assured the Church of his continuing protection.

Prince Chlodwig of Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst (1819–1901),[13] after 1866 Bavarian minister president, was a Catholic, but just as antiultramontane as his brother, who resided in Rome as a Curia cardinal.[14] He clung tenaciously to the remainders of a state Church. It was his intention to transform Bavaria with the aid of an emphatic liberal domestic policy and to strengthen South German autonomy. Only when this proved to be unattainable was he willing to enter into a closer relationship with the North German Confederation. In 1868 the right of the Church to supervise schools, which had been conceded in 1852, was repealed and the entire elementary school system was taken over by the state; Jesuit missions were banned. 1869 also saw theological and political resistance to the dogma of infallibility emanating from Munich. Hohenlohe, extensively but one-sidedly informed of the Roman happenings by his brother and Döllinger, tried to persuade the other powers to take a collective stand against the planned definition. As was the case with other liberals, Hohenlohe feared that the dogma would not be confined to the theological sphere but would claim papal jurisdiction over princes and states in nonreligious questions as well. But because of the disinterest of most of the governments, Hohenlohe's initiative failed; Beust as well as Bismarck, who at that time still pursued a dilatory policy toward the Catholic Church, replied evasively.

---

[13] After 1870 Hohenlohe occupied high offices in the service of the German Empire, from 1894–1900 he was reich chancellor and Prussian minister president. (Clodwig zu Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst, Denkwürdigkeiten I–II, ed. by F. Curtius [Stuttgart and Leipzig 1907], III, ed. by K. A. von Müller [Berlin 1931]; O. Pfülf in StZ 72 [1907]; Kißling, Kulturkampf I, 423f., 427ff., II, 1f., 16–19, 22, 122, III, 162, 249; K. A. von Müller, Der dritte deutsche Reichskanzler . . . [Munich 1931]).

[14] Gustav Adolf Fürst zu Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst (1823–1896), after studies in Munich in communication with Döllinger, after 1846 in the Roman Academia dei Nobili. Initially favorite of Pius IX, 1857 titular archbishop, 1866 cardinal. The good relationship with the Pope was not lasting when Hohenlohe proved to be a violent opponent of the Jesuits and became a member of the opposition at the Vatican Council; after 1870 he was isolated in the Curia (F. X. Kraus, "Cardinal Hohenlohe," in F. X. Kraus, Essays 2 [Berlin 1901]; R. Lill, Vatikanische Akten zur Geschichte des deutschen Kulturkampfes. Leo XIII. I [1878–80] [Tübingen 1970], 7f.; G. Böing in LThK V, 431; H. Jedin, "Gustav Hohenlohe und Augustin Theiner," RQ 66 [1971]).

Opposition to Hohenlohe's Little German and anticlerical policy in 1869 led to the founding of the Patriotic People's Party under the leadership of Joseph Edmund Jörg. Its membership was almost exclusively Catholic, and on the first try it won the majority of the seats in Bavaria's parliament. Its rapid successes rested on the support given to it by the Catholic associations, a lesson which was applied shortly afterwards in the foundings of Catholic parties in Baden and Prussia. The Patriots, whose agitation very much contributed to making the liberal press equate Catholic with particularistic, in January 1870 achieved the fall of Hohenlohe. The government's course did not change, however, as the new administration, backed by King Ludwig II, was under the influence of the National Liberal minister of religion Baron Johann von Lutz (1826–90).[15] He resolutely continued Hohenlohe's religious policy and even intensified it after the publication of the dogma of papal infallibility. He protected the incipient movement of the Old Catholics, and on 9 August 1870 he decreed that the new dogma could not be announced from the pulpits; owing to the objections of the bishops, the decree could not be implemented. However, in 1871 Lutz introduced a bill in the Federal Council of the new German Empire which outlawed the misuse of the pulpit for political purposes; it became law on 10 December 1871. The Bavarian government also played a leading role in the passing of the second imperial law of the Kulturkampf, which allowed the dissolution of the Jesuit organization and the expulsion of Jesuits from Germany. Yet Lutz did not openly endorse the conflict in Prussia; he was satisfied with conducting a kind of creeping Kulturkampf. Its apogee was a royal edict of 20 November 1873 which annulled the edict of 6 April 1852 and restored the previous supervision of the state over the Churches. Considerable tension, especially in connection with the appointment of bishops, continued for a long period of time. But an open break was avoided, as both King and government honored the concordat. The government tolerated that Bavaria's bishops temporarily gave refuge to Prussian priests and students of theology to whom the May Laws had denied the exercise of office and the opportunity to study.

The majority of the bishops appointed by the King, under the leadership of Archbishop Gregor von Scherr of Munich-Freising, assumed a conciliatory stance. Only Archbishop Michael Deinlein of Bamberg (1800–1875) agreed to the veto right of the government. Bishop Ignatius von Senestréy of Regensburg (1818–1906), whose strictly ultramontane attitude was shared by Bishop Baron Franz von Leonrod of Eichstätt (1827–1905), remained an intransigent fighter against liberalism and the state Church.[16]

---

[15] F. von Rummel, Das Ministerium Lutz und seine Gegner (Munich 1935); W. Grasser, Johann Freiherr von Lutz. Eine politische Biographie (Misc. Bavarica Monacensia no. 1 [Munich 1967]).

Earlier and more completely than in any other German state, middle-class and Little German liberalism had assumed a dominant role in Baden. After 1860, the administrations of Lamey and Jolly, in cooperation with the liberal parliamentary majority, determined domestic policy and fashioned the relationship to the Churches. The law of 9 October 1860, which took the place of the concordat rejected by the Chamber, formed the foundation; still, the majority of the liberals was not satisfied with it and neither were many Catholics. In 1864 a struggle over education erupted. Especially among the active liberals in Baden there were eminent proponents of the principle of the absolute legal authority of the state, such as the jurists Bluntschli,[17] Friedberg,[18] and Jolly;[19] inasmuch as Jolly headed the government after 1866, they were able to implement their program. The religious legislation of Baden in the years 1868–76 transferred to the state many duties hitherto exercised by the Churches and subjected the Churches to a far-reaching system of state supervision. The laws of Baden influenced the Kulturkampf legislation of Prussia and other German states; conversely, the laws passed in Baden after 1871 followed the example of the legislation of Prussia and the German Empire.

From beginning to end, religious legislation in Baden[20] was characterized by the claim of the liberals to jurisdiction over education. The elementary school law of 8 March 1868 changed parochial schools into nondenominational schools and made the establishment of parochial schools dependent on a special law; eight years later, the education law of 16 September 1876 made nondenominational schools mandatory. On 21 December 1869 a civil marriage law was passed which, like the first of the two education laws, was more a legal consequence of the secularization of society than a belligerent measure. The same could not be said of the foundation law of 5 May 1870. It arbitrarily differentiated between secular Catholic foundation property (school and charitable foundations), which was transferred to the administration of the municipalities, and actual church property, the administration of which was merely placed under supervision by the state.

---

[16] Staber, Kirchengeschichte des Bistums Regensburg, 190–97; Festschrift zur 150. Wiederkehr des Geburtstages Senestréys, ed. by P. Mai (Regensburg 1968); P. Mai in Annuarium Historiae Conciliorum I (1969), 399–411.

[17] Johann Caspar Bluntschli (1808–81), 1833 professor of law in Zurich, 1848 in Munich, 1861 in Heidelberg, in 1864 cofounder of the Protestant Association (H. Fritzsche, Schweizer Juristen der letzten 100 Jahre [Zurich 1945]; H. Mitteis in HDB 2, 337f).

[18] Emil Friedberg (1837–1910), 1868 professor of law in Freiburg, 1869 in Leipzig (cf. n. 3 above, A. Erler in NDB 5, 443f.).

[19] Julius Jolly (1823–91), assistant professor of law in 1847 at Heidelberg, 1861 government councilor, 1862 ministerial councilor in the Baden Ministry of the Interior, 1866 its president, 1868–76 leading minister of state (biography by H. Baumgarten, L. Jolly [Tübingen 1897]; J. Heyderhoff, ZGObrh 86–87 [1934–35]).

[20] The texts of the laws are largely reproduced in Friedberg, Staat und katholische Kirche in Baden, supplements no. XXff., as well as in Stadelhofer, Abbau der Kulturkampfgesetzgebung in Baden, 394–403.

The most trenchant incursions in ecclesiastical life took place in 1872 and 1874. Regulations concerning the religious orders of 2 April 1872 forbade members of orders to teach school, and forbade any pastoral activity to members of orders which were not legally registered in Baden. The law of 15 June 1874 concerning Old Catholics was based on the fact that the anti-Roman traditions of a minority of Baden Catholics had led a number of clerics and laymen to join the protest movement. The members of the new community were assured of all rights which they had held as Catholics. Clerics turned Old Catholic were allowed to retain their benefices and income; Old Catholic communities were permitted to use Catholic churches and were granted a share of the community property, the extent of which was determined rather arbitrarily by the state authorities. The high point of Kulturkampf legislation occurred with the law of 19 February 1874 on the legal position of the Churches in the state. After an academic examination according to the law of 1860 had been ordered in 1867, admission to a clerical office was now made dependent on graduation from a secondary school and a three-year course of study at a German university, as well as on a discriminating public examination in the fields of philosophy, history, and German and classical literature (ARTICLE 1).[21] The Churches were permitted to retain only institutions for the theological-practical preparation of prospective clerics; hostels for theology and secondary school students, which the liberals accused of isolating the students from the national education of the German youth, were closed (ART. 2). For transgressions, ART. 3 decreed fines and imprisonment, in severe cases also withholding of salaries and removal from office; in addition, the attempt to influence elections by clerics was also made subject to fines.

Ecclesiastical opposition to this law was led by the aged Archbishop von Vicari, whose last years were also filled with a battle over the appointment of his cathedral dean, whom he also wanted to act as his suffragan bishop. In 1867 Lothar von Kübel (1823–81)[22] was named director of the hostel, and after Vicari's death in 1868 headed the archdiocese as chapter vicar for thirteen years. The election of the archbishop foundered on the rejection by the government of all but one of eight candidates nominated by the cathedral chapter. Kübel filed legal objections to all of the laws.[23] Together with a large majority of the clergy he also passively resisted them, a resistance which was not even broken by the law of 25 August 1876 which suspended all financial subventions by the state. Chapter vicar and clergy refused any cooperation in implementing the religious law of 1874; jailing of clerics, numerous vacancies, and growing pastoral emergency conditions were the result.

---

[21] ARTICLE I of the law closely followed the Prussian law concerning education and employment of clerics (11 May 1873).

Liberal anticlericalism in Baden also affected the political activation of Catholics. The Catholic People's Party, founded in 1869 by Jakob Lindau, sent five delegates to the Chamber and two years later raised this number to nine; its chief publication was the Badischer Beobachter, founded in 1863. In opposition to the oligarchical structure of the liberal system and in accordance with the democratic traditions of Baden, the party demanded not only religious freedom but also liberal and democratic basic rights which the liberal government had delayed, such as the universal, equal, and secret right to vote.

The irreconcilability of the opposing positions, the failure of many state regulations, and the renewed hardening of the fronts caused by the introduction of the obligatory nondenominational school, actually not desired by Jolly but forced upon him by the liberal majority in the Chamber, moved Grand Duke Friedrich I to be more reasonable. The administration of Turban-Stösser, installed in 1876, was charged with continuing established policies in most areas, but was also instructed to search for a modus vivendi in religious policy without surrendering the rights of the state.

Jolly's first religious law found a positive echo among the liberals outside of Baden. There was no change in the official religious policy of Prussia before 1871–72, but to the degree that Bismarck's alliance of 1866 with the liberals became firmer their anticlericalism also spread. When in the spring of 1869 Rome's intention to seek definition of papal infallibility at the impending council was made public, liberal declarations became angry and Protestant-conservative warnings added to the furor. As for the German Catholics themselves, the passionately discussed issue of infallibility divided them into two camps.

---

[22] Biographies by J. Schober (Freiburg 1911) and A. Schill in Badische Biographien IV, 230–41; W. Müller in LThK VI, 655.

[23] In this he was assisted by his office manager, the jurist Heinrich Maas (1826–95), who similarly had assisted Vicari.

It was in this tense atmosphere that the German bishops gathered at Fulda in September 1869.[24] Other urgent items on the agenda, such as Ketteler's social solutions, receded into the background behind the question of infallibility; the latter forced the episcopate into a one-sided and unnecessary fighting posture. But the conference at least discussed the events in Baden and declared its solidarity with Kübel.

As for the definition urged by Rome, the majority were disinclined to agree with it; of twenty bishops present or represented at Fulda, fourteen presented their views to Pius IX in vain. Their joint letter to the Pope was drafted by the recently appointed bishop of Rottenburg, Hefele, who together with Ketteler lectured on the issue of infallibility. Ketteler actually anticipated some postulates of the minority at the Vatican Council by demanding that the evidence of tradition in the definition meet scientific criteria and that the infallibility of the Pope be proved in connection with that of the Church. Hefele used historical arguments, denying a positive cause for the definition as well as its timeliness. If the dogma of infallibility were accepted, he said, it would make a reunification of the divided denominations much more difficult, would weaken the unity of German Catholicism, and would intensify the religious struggle in the political arena.[25] The waves of controversy which after the summer of 1870 broke over German Catholicism justified his views.

In Switzerland, the battle between liberalism and strict Church adherents and between the liberal minority and the ultramontane majority of the Catholics ever since the 1840s was marked by a Kulturkampf intensity which grew even more bitter in the decade before the Vatican Council.[26] The basic disagreement there also was the council itself and the issue of papal infallibility. The official announcement of the dogma was made more difficult in some cantons, in others it was forbidden altogether. On the other hand, the agitation against the council, which prepared the ground for the Old Catholics, was allowed to unfold unhindered, initially in the "Freethinking Catholic Associations" in which political motives often outweighed religious ones. The reason for this was that many Catholics, whom the Syllabus offended in the core of their thought and action and whom it completely alienated from an authoritarian Church, saw in the opposition to the dogma a welcome opportunity to move the Church in the direction of a democratic and national Church. Only in 1873 was a theologian, the former Lucerne professor of theology Edward Herzog (1841–1924, after 1875 bishop of the Christian Catholic Church of Switzerland),[27] enabled to assume the leadership of the protest movement. It was largely due to him that the movement excluded the radical elements and as the Christian Catholic Church followed the tradition of Wessenberg's reform program.

---

[24] Lill, Bischofskonferenzen, 80–95. Concerning Ketteler's Fulda paper on the question of infallibility, see also Freudenberger, Universität Würzburg und erstes vatikanisches Konzil, 166ff.

[25] The Catholic representatives of the Customs Parliament (between 1866 and 1870 the only all-German parliamentary body), among them Peter Reichensperger and Ludwig Windthorst, in a confidential advisory for the episcopate viewed the definition of papal infallibility as unnecessary and inopportune. Text: ColLac VII, 1185f.; cf. Granderath-Kirch I, 223–27.

[26] This had not only theological but also political reasons. For example, the Confederation did not stop the external jurisdiction of the bishops of Milan and Como over Ticino until 1859, when Lombardy, which until then had been Austrian, fell to Italy and there was reason to fear irredentist agitation.

Bishop Eugène Lachat of Basel (1819–86),[28] whose seminary was closed in the spring of 1870, in 1873 was "dismissed" and expelled from five of the seven cantons which comprised his bishopric because of his advocacy of the new dogma and the excommunication of Christ Catholic opponents; he withdrew to Lucerne. In the overwhelmingly Catholic Jura the Berne government expelled all pastors when they sided with Lachat. They were replaced with clerics loyal to the state, among them several foreigners, but were rejected by the parishes so that a schism was avoided. Pius IX acted very unwisely in 1873 when he appointed the suffragan Gaspard Mermillod as vicar apostolic of Geneva. He liked Mermillod because of his unquestioned ultramontanism, but his appointment partially anticipated the establishment of a bishopric, an action illegal under the constitution. Mermillod was immediately expelled by the Federal Council. To the papal condemnation of the injustices inflicted on the Church in the encyclical Etsi multa luctuosa (21 November 1873),[29] the Federal Council replied by completely severing diplomatic relations with the Vatican.[30]

The Kulturkampf was carried over into the new federal constitution[31] of 29 May 1874. The establishment of new dioceses was made dependent on permission by the Confederation. Confederation and cantons received summary authorization to preserve peace among the denominations and to take the requisite steps to prevent violations of the rights of citizens and state by ecclesiastical authorities (ART. 50). The events of 1870 had shown that even the publication of principles of faith and the excommunication of opponents were viewed as such violations. The Society of Jesus and all organizations "affiliated" with it were excluded from the entire territory of Switzerland and its members were forbidden to be active in church and school (ART. 51). The establishment of new monasteries and the restoration of closed ones was also declared impermissible (ART. 52). The maintenance of civil registries was turned over to the exclusive care of the government (ART. 53), canonical jurisdiction was declared abolished (ART. 58), and elementary education was placed exclusively in the hands of the state (ART. 27).

---

[27] Biography by W. Herzog (1935). See also F. Heiler, Evangelische Katholizität (1926), 9ff.; W. Küppers in RGB III, 287f.

[28] Biographies by E. Hornstein (Lucerne 1873), T. Scherer-Boccard (Würzburg 1873), and E. Folletête (Paris 1925); A. Chèvre in ZSKG 58 (1964); J. B. Villiger in LThK VI, 723.

[29] Acta Pii IX VI, 253–73.

[30] The nunciature in Switzerland was not reopened until 1920.

[31] Text: G. Franz, Staatsverfassungen (Munich 1964), 584–627.

Although the Kulturkampf politicians quickly had to acknowledge that the National Church-Old Catholic movement constituted no more than a minority, anti-Catholic legislation was dismantled only slowly; fundamental moves for a relaxation of tension in Switzerland were made only under the pontificate of Leo XIII.

CHAPTER 20

Internal Catholic Controversies in Connection with Liberalism

Catholicism and Liberalism after 1848

The crisis of 1848, which pointed out the degree to which the traditional order of society had been shaken, and the subsequent wave of reaction only intensified the great problem which had confronted Catholic thought for half a century. What was to be the attitude to the world which had emerged from the revolution and its advertised governmental form of freedom? Could one reconcile with it or did its nature require that it be rejected? Many Catholics were fascinated by the memory of the Christian Middle Ages, which a Catholic Romanticism had impressively displayed before their eyes in idealized fashion, were haunted by the thought of a recurrence of the unrest which once again had troubled Europe, and were profoundly disappointed by the failure of the attempts by Pius IX to guide liberal demands into acceptable channels through concessions. They were also troubled by the almost universal decline of religious practice, in which—as moralists and not as sociologists—they saw a consequence of the errors spread by an "evil press." Thus, they gradually became more and more convinced that the restoration started at the beginning of the century could only be successful if one resolutely forgot about the social philosophy of the eighteenth century and returned to those concepts on which the strength and greatness of the "century of faith" rested. Justification and confirmation for this mistrust of liberal principles existed in the continuance of the political philosophy which the Scholastics of the Spanish Counter-Reformation had developed. It was also found in the still strong influence of Maistre and Bonald, which was used to counter the seditious character of the rationalistic Cartesian-inspired systems, and in the aversion of many clerics to the new bourgeois society, which was identified with excessive stock market speculations and the search for material pleasures. In short, political and social notions, pastoral prejudices and traditional thought combined in varying proportions to lead a considerable number of the clergy and a few militant laymen to an authoritarian Catholicism. Its aim was to preserve and to regain privileges and external prestige for the Church within Catholic states freed from the pressure of anti-Christian currents, such as in the Spain of Isabella II, in the Empire of the Habsburgs, and until 1859 in several Italian states. The official publication of this intransigent Catholicism was the Civiltà cattolica, published by the Roman Jesuits. Its guiding principles were those outlined in the essay "Ensayo sobre el catolicismo, el liberalismo y el socialismo" (1851) by the Spaniard Donoso Cortés,[1] which also became available soon thereafter in French and German. Civiltà cattolica, founded in 1849, had as its principal goal the complete restoration of Christian principles in the life of the individual, of the family, and of society. In some countries the Society of Jesus was responsible for the view held by many people that these principles were the only ones which were acceptable to Catholic orthodoxy.

In contrast to 1815, the monarchical and reactionary governments which were totally devoted to the Church by the middle of the century had lost the support of the young. Thus, there were many Catholics who, deeply sympathetic with the currents of their century, attacked the intransigent group by arguing that the attempt to return to the concepts of the restoration period was not only dangerous but also futile. Not all of them agreed with Montalembert's Intérêts catholiques au XIX^e^ siècle (1852), in which he took the position that the religious renascence of the first half of the century was the exclusive result of the liberties which the Church enjoyed under a parliamentary regime. But most of them pointed out that a significant number of the leaders in the state no longer practiced their religion and that for this reason it was utopian to expect disinterested aid and protection from the state; at best the Church could hope for a benevolent neutrality. Some of them went further. In light of the genuine values and of the real humanitarian progress which liberalism in spite of some excesses had produced, they were prepared to accept the modern concept of greater rights for the individual. It hardly needs mentioning that they were not always aware of the danger that the excessive autonomy of the individual could result in the claim of man's total independence from God.

---

[1] Concerning Juan Donoso Cortés (1809–53), see J. Schramm, Donoso Cortés (Madrid 1936) and J. Chaix-Ruy, Donoso Cortés, théologien de l'histoire et prophète (Paris 1956).

Gradually there arose two opposing Catholic groups which, while both were intent on serving the Church, completely differed in how best this could be accomplished. One group saw the modern world of its century as an historical epoch with its own peculiar organizational form and thought it necessary to be its advance guard. Tactfully the members of this group threw a veil over the condemnations in the encyclical Mirari vos, the memory of which was beginning to pale, and demanded that the Church embrace liberalism just as in earlier times it had done with Greco-Roman civilization, the reaction of the parishes to the feudalism of the Middle Ages, and the humanistic endeavors of the Renaissance. The others, regarding the modern world as the anti-Christian legacy of the revolution, preferred to avoid error by breaking off all contacts and desired a tightening of prohibitions in order to avoid infection. They insisted on the solemn repetition of the earlier condemnation of liberalism and other modern errors by the magisterial office. They were oblivious of the dangers of such a course of action, which could only intensify the ambiguities as a result of which many liberals had come to the firm conviction that a society in keeping with the demands of the time could only be built if the Catholic Church was deprived of all influence.

Conflicts between the two groups were unavoidable. They were aggravated at the same time by the intrusion of additional debates which split the Catholic elite in many countries. In France, where political problems easily assumed an ideological and religious character, it was the question of reconciliation with the Empire after the coup d'état; in Italy it was the Roman Question; in Germany it was the growing contrast between university theologians and defenders of Scholasticism, in which could be seen the same spiritual opposition which separated the believers in progress with their sense of history from those who preferred to trust the methods which previously had been approved by a hierarchical authority.

The Division of the Catholics in France

Internal Catholic controversies over modern liberties reached their high point in France. Elsewhere the problem was dealt with as a practical one. Rome conceded under Pius IX as well as under Gregory XVI that on this level attitudes could be different, depending on each case. While liberal legislation in Piedmont was formally condemned, it was tolerated in Belgium and even appreciated in countries with a Catholic minority, such as the United States, England, and the Netherlands. But such practices confused the French, who with their logical bent desired coherent theories which could be raised to the level of universal validity. Revived by the differences of opinion swirling around the Falloux Law, whose proponents and opponents indulged themselves in treating the matter on the level of fundamentals, the old debates over the ideal Christian society, which ever since the condemnation of Lamennais had receded into the background, once again began to agitate some people. Numerically weak, their influence nevertheless stretched far beyond the borders of France.[2]

The Catholics who believed in freedom in turn were divided over several important issues. There was the group which in 1855 had reorganized the newspaper Le Correspondant. It was headed by a few anti-Bonaparte laymen who were closely allied with Orléanist circles: Falloux, Albert de Broglie, Cochin, and primarily Montalembert, who thanks to their personal qualities, their social position, their influence in political life, and their great services in the cause of Catholicism also influenced people who did not sympathize with all of their ideas. This group, "academic and in vogue" (Planque), which in some respects approached the ideal of "devout humanism," was also represented in the provinces[3] and in the great orders. Among the Dominicans its views were championed by Lacordaire, among the Oratorians by Gratry, and even among the Jesuits by P. de Ravignan and the first editors of Études. But above all it profited from the support and the growing prestige of Monsignor Dupanloup, the eloquent and active bishop of Orléans, whom his defense of the temporal position of the Pope after the Italian War placed in the forefront of Europe's religious politics. In contrast to Montalembert, who just as during the time of L'Avenir unreservedly continued to rely on freedom in Church as well as in state, Dupanloup's liberalism was highly relative. Basically his aim, as that of the Belgian bishops and of Ketteler, was to employ new methods and institutions which corresponded to liberal aspirations and under the circumstances were the only possible ones, in order to create a modernized Christian society in which liberty "was regarded as the guarantee for the activity of the Church" (Gadille). Yet he was viewed by the ultramontane press as the religious leader of the "liberal Catholic faction," while conversely many moderate Catholics, convinced that they were in agreement with the spirit of the century, accused him of a lack of logic precisely because he refused to apply liberal principles to the solution of the Roman Question.

---

[2] P. Sylvain wrote about Veuillot, the chief enemy of Catholic liberalism: "No other French writer contributed as much to the forming of the French-Canadian mentality" ("Quelques aspects de l'antagonisme libéral—ultramontain au Canada français," RSoc 8 [1967], 275–97). The few Spanish liberal Catholics like Mañe y Flaqeur, the manager of the Diario of Barcelona, the founders of the Revista mensual (1868), and the chief representative of the liberal current in Hungary, Baron J. Eötvös, looked to Montalembert for inspiration.

[3] Among others in Nancy, with focus on Guerrier de Dumast (cf. de Montclos, 241–42).

A much more consistent liberalism was represented by the clerics led by Monsignor Maret, the dean of the theological faculty at the Sorbonne.[4] On the one hand, they did not hesitate to proclaim a "Catholic and liberal reform" within the Church, which was to rejuvenate the old institutions like synods and councils which limited authority and to free Catholic research from the stranglehold of the Index. They made no secret of their sympathies for the constitutional efforts of the Romans or of their conviction that the temporal power of the Pope was more damaging than useful for the exercise of his spiritual mission. On the other hand, in the question of the relation between the two powers, they openly adhered to the concept of the modern state, which was allied with the principles of 1789, which, "correctly understood, were rooted in Christianity just as much as in philosophical reason" (Maret). These neo-Gallicans saw in the concordat an instrument of cooperation in freedom between the Church and a secularized society. But such also were the ideas of a majority of the Catholic middle class which was frequently willing either to exclude or to ignore of the official doctrines of the Church whatever happened to be too much of a burden for its intellectual and political concepts. "The very small number of consciously liberal Catholics and the high number of moderate, i.e., unwittingly liberal, Catholics, were indeed two significant characteristics of French Catholicism" (Maurain).

These groups were opposed by those who in contrast to the liberal Catholics proudly designated themselves as "nothing but Catholics" and thereby emphasized their loyalty to the Roman standpoint, whose hard line they wanted to strengthen. They remained faithful to the counterrevolutionary traditionalism of the first third of the century and lacked the power of discrimination to detect the kernel of truth inherent in liberalism. They tended to judge political decisions according to absolute principles, from which they deduced their logical consequences, instead of searching for compromises adapted to concrete situations varying according to time and place. The leader of this group was Monsignor Pie,[5] who in his Instructions synodales sur les erreurs du temps présent (1855–71) ceaselessly pilloried naturalism, which wanted to alienate God and the Church from the concerns of the world. Inspired especially by Dom Guéranger, he developed a political supernaturalism which was based on the Kingdom of Jesus Christ in this world and the glorification of the Pope-King. He did not advocate theocracy as such, i.e., the exercise of direct political power by the Church, but while admitting that the complete attainment of a Christian society would not come before the end of time, he nevertheless demanded the renewal of faith in the individual and the family as well as the Christianization of the state and the state's agencies. Overly zealous admirers became even more reactionary, however, and ignoring the eschatological perspectives and the reservations of the bishop of Poitiers with respect to too much of a direct political engagement, exaggerated the secularization of the supernatural. They did not hesitate to proclaim the direct sovereignty of Church and Pope over all of civil society. They expected that with the aid of Bourbon President Chambord a Christian state, as the Middle Ages had seen it, would soon be established.

---

[4] On this group, which received less attention than the more brilliant, as well as more superficial, one of Le Corespondant, see de Montclos, 130–32, 225–27, 287–323; J. Gadille, op. cit., 89–108, 134–39.

These extreme ideas were spread with an absolute lack of differentiation and were often accompanied by unjust condemnations of Catholics who thought differently. The leading journalist who acted in this fashion and intensified the polarization was Louis Veuillot. Veuillot's achievements are undeniable: his devotion to the Pope, his personal altruism, and the great accomplishment when through his sarcastic contempt of anticlericals he helped to free the average Catholic from the inferiority complex which had burdened him for so long. But he also did more than anyone else to poison the atmosphere. The intransigence of his Catholicism—that of a convert—all too often made him forget the requirements of Christian charity and led him to a wholesale condemnation of modern civilization, for which he held the foolishness of the freethinkers of his time responsible. While the bishops were reluctant to admonish this journalist who often criticized them for what he regarded as their lack of orthodoxy, he quickly became an oracle for the provincial clergy, which valued his popular language and his massive criticisms. With this clergy acting as an intermediary, Veuillot's influence was effective with a limited, but not to be underestimated, number of the faithful. For a long time they maintained a stance of clerical intolerance and systematic defamation of civil authority.

---

[5] On Louis Pie (1815–80), after 1849 bishop of Poitiers, see L. Baunard, Histoire du cardinal Pie, 2 vols. (Paris 1893); E. Catta, La doctrine politique et sociale du cardinal Pie (Paris 1959), which needs to be read in conjunction with J. Gadille, op. cit., 48–59.

Catholic Liberalism outside France around 1860

The debates in Belgium proved most similar to those in France. There also around 1860, under the influence of the bitter press polemics which agitated French Catholicism and of the domestic political situation, the question about the bearable extent of Catholic accommodation to the system of modern freedoms was translated from the level of tactics to the level of ideas. While those with personal contacts to Montalembert and his friends continued to praise the extremely liberal constitution as the ideal, others began to worry over the change of Belgian liberalism to an anticlerical radicalism which no longer had anything in common with the unionism of 1830. They raised the point that the traditional privileges of the Church had been surrendered and that the opponents had gained freedom for the unlimited propagation of their ideas, but that they, after having achieved the legal majority, now systematically prevented the Church from taking advantage of the concessions which it had been promised in return. Even if the Catholics should regain the majority in the parliament, they argued, it would be impossible for them to conduct an unequivocally Catholic policy as long as they were obligated to respect the freedom of evil. Without agreeing in all points with the extreme positions of Veuillot—a comparison between the newspapers L'Univers and Le Bien Public, the chief paper of the Belgian ultramontanes founded in 1853, is very revealing—and clearly distancing themselves from the antiparliamentarism of the French polemicist, they began to talk of the necessity of amending the constitution as soon as circumstances permitted it. Between these two extremes stood Cardinal Sterckx and the canonists of Louvain, who drew attention to the practical advantages of the constitution, which guaranteed the Church a unique independence from the civil authority. They had to overcome the growing resistance of many younger bishops, trained in Rome, who regarded the Catholicization of some aspects of liberalism as impossible.

In Italy the problem was quite different. After the collapse of the neoguelf movement, which by many had been seen as the meeting point of the Catholic sentiment and the liberal sentiment, the development of the Roman Question made a reconciliation between liberal endeavors and Catholic loyalty to the faith much more difficult. The idea, propagated by Montalembert and the Belgian Catholics, of a Christian reconquest of society with the help of political freedoms found only few adherents in Italy. On the one hand, many patriotic and constitutional Catholics, disappointed by the "betrayal" of Pius IX, without reservation joined the liberal camp, i.e., the moderates, and for the achievement of their political ideals allied themselves with the anticlerical left "by leaving everything religious behind them and being concerned with it only in the last hour when the priest is called" (Curci). On the other hand, the indignation of many over the more statist than truly liberal policy of the Turin government, which de facto constituted a serious infringement of the rights of the Church and a limitation of its freedom even in the spiritual sphere, led to a reaction of embitterment and an indiscriminate condemnation of liberalism, no matter how moderate it might be. This intransigent direction enjoyed the complete approval of Rome and was spread throughout the country by such belligerent newspapers as Don Margotti's Unità cattolica and Don Albertario's Osservatore cattolica. Under the pontificate of Pius IX, after the passing enthusiasm of the "mediating" priests immediately after 1860,[6] it won most of Italy's clerics and militant Catholics.[7]

But even if the circumstances in Italy prevented the formation of a liberal Catholic party which, like those in France and Belgium, could have been politically influential, a Catholic liberal spirit, which believed in the possibility of a reconciliation of the Catholic faith with constitutional institutions and modern civilization, had not quite disappeared. This was especially so as the memory of the first two years of the pontificate fostered the conviction that such a reconciliation was not a doctrinal matter but merely a matter of timing with respect to the Roman Question. This liberal Catholic spirit, strongly determined by the differences of cultural traditions in the various parts of Italy and the preferences of individuals, could be found in many groups: among moderate constitutionalists like C. Balbo; among the genuinely faithful like A. Manzoni who were of the opinion that it was permissible to disagree with Rome politically; among Catholics like Minguetti who were disconcerted by the inflexibility of the Papal State; among utopians like the Tuscans Ricasoli and Capponi who stood on the outer fringes of orthodoxy; among reformers of a certain unconditional faith like Rosmini, whose influence lasted far beyond his death (1855); among historians of the tradition of Catholic Romanticism like the Lombard Cantù[8] and Tosti, the monk of Monte Cassino;[9] among admirers of Montalembert, like the future cardinal Capecelatro of Naples; and among the small Genoese group of the Annali cattolici which, encouraged by Archbishop Charvaz, in 1866 renamed its newspaper Revista Universale in order to attract more readers through this less denominational title, and wanted to bring into existence a Catholic party which, following the example of the Belgians and the Germans, alike was to be loyal to Pope, King, Catholic orthodoxy, and constitutional institutions.[10] Behind these leading figures was ranged the great number of those who continued to receive the sacraments, but who on the religious level combined the principle of authority with freedom of conscience and wanted to assure the independence of civil society within its own sphere. They were also the ones who, openly acknowledging the historical benefits which the Church had bestowed on Italy, were yet of the opinion that the status under which the Church had existed since the Middle Ages was not sacrosanct and that it was perfectly legitimate to adjust it to the requirements of the nineteenth century. This adjustment meant for some a clearer demarcation between the realms of religion and politics and, despite the protests of the Holy See, the cancellation of archaic ecclesiastical privileges, and for others the introduction of separation of Church and state and the renunciation of the exercise of the temporal power of the Pope.

---

[6] Concerning the liberal tendencies among the clergy, see G. Martina, op. cit., 765–68, and for an individual, but very significant case, A. Gambasin, Il clero padovano (Rome 1967), 117–69, 279–300; also A. Fappani, Il clero liberale bresciano negli anni dell'unità d'Italia (Brescia 1968); R. Fantini, "Sacerdoti liberali bolognesi dal 1848 all'unità nazionale," Bolletino del Museo del Risorgimento 5 (1960), 453–84.

[7] It must be noted, however, as Spadolini has shown, that the intransigents of the period after 1860, in contrast to those of the first half of the century, were not necessarily political reactionaries and that as justification for their refusal to cooperate with the liberals they no longer cited the principle of legitimacy and of divine right of sovereigns, but placed the rights of God and the Church above society and subjected politics to morality. The political philosophy developed by P. Taparelli d'Azeglio in the Civiltà cattolica is symptomatic of the new attitude.

In Germany the reconciliation between Church and state within a liberal framework occasioned fewer dramas of conscience than in the Latin countries. The reason for this was in part the fact that the German Catholics as a minority demanding religious freedom, unlike France or Belgium, did not seem to favor error but to the contrary seemed to support Catholicism. Furthermore, the German Catholics, influenced by Catholic Romanticism, in their praise of freedom harked back less to the principles of 1789 than to corporative freedom as it had existed prior to the absolute monarchy. Finally, unlike the Latin countries, religious freedom for them did not include the freedom of unbelief, but simply implied a nondenominational state with a Christian way of life. Despite a certain worry in conservative circles and some reservations in Austria[11] and Bavaria, the disagreeableness of the petty bureaucratic interferences in the life of the Church was considered fairly balanced by the official recognition which the support of the state lent to the Church. Thus, the militant Catholics and the defenders of the principles, strengthened by the experience of Prussia after 1848, agreed to acknowledge the religious advantages of constitutional freedom, which they were careful not to label "freedom to lose," even though this did not keep them from directing fierce attacks on the anti-Christian character of ideological liberalism. This moderate position, represented by Ketteler in his work Freiheit, Autorität und Kirche (1862), for a long time was accepted by the large majority of German Catholics[12] and even at the time of the Syllabus, when only a few extreme voices on the right (Austrian Jesuits, among others) and on the left (Döllinger's group) muddied the waters of unity.

---

[8] Concerning Cesare Cantù (1804–95), see F. Bertolini, Cantù e le sue opere (Florence 1895); P. M. Manfredi, Cesare Cantù (Turin 1905); ECatt III, 646–49; also Carteggio Montalembert Cantù, ed. by F. Kancisvili (Milan 1969).

[9] On Luigi Tosti (1811–97), see A. Capecelatro, Commemorazione di Luigi Tosti (Monte Cassino 1868) and A. Quacquarelli, Il Pater Tosti nella politica del Risorgimento (Genoa 1945).

[10] Concerning these two journals, see O. Confessore: Annali dell'Univ. di Lecce, Fac. di Lettere 2 (1964–65), 158–210; O. Confessore in SpAzLCIt I, 141–76.

But violent controversies took place in the German-speaking countries over the question of academic freedom and ecclesiastical authority. Some representatives of the Catholic renascence, led by Döllinger, wanted to free Catholic intellectuals from the inferiority complex which a flourishing Protestant and rationalistic scholarship had given them. They thought it absolutely necessary to provide them with complete freedom of research, aside from the few questions which touched upon defined dogma and which they tried to avoid as much as possible.

Their intentions were genuine and their attempt to withdraw scholarly work from the control of the Inquisition was justified. But they insisted on seeing only one aspect of a complex situation. A reaction was therefore unavoidable; unfortunately it originated with men who often were ignorant of the new methods of scholarship and in some instances were actually hostile to them. Friction resulted inevitably when the narrowmindedness of one side provoked the free attitude of the other. Some people now opposed any intervention by the ecclesiastical magisterial office on principle and wanted to escape from all control by the ecclesiastical authorities. In this way there developed on the soil of classical liberal Protestantism a tendency among Catholic intellectuals which had its equal only in the small English group of The Rambler.

---

[11] After 1855 there is hardly any mention of the small group of Güntherians, so active in 1848; for this time they were very representative of the Viennese middle class with respect to politics and culture; at the same time they were hostile to democracy and autocracy, and were believers in a free Church in a free state and in intellectual freedom (see T. Simons in CHR 55 [1969], 173–94, 377–93, 610–26).

[12] This was also the position of the Catholics in Alemannic Switzerland (see W. Ganz, "Philipp Anton von Segesser als Politiker," Schweizerische Zeitschrift für Geschichte 1 [1951], 245–74). Monsignor Mermillod defended a similar position in Romansch Switzerland.

The journal The Rambler was founded in England in 1848 by the convert Richard Simpson[13] with the objective of countering the intellectual inferiority of English Catholicism. Repeatedly the journal was the outspoken advocate for a limited autonomy of laymen in the Church. Its iconoclastic tendencies were reinforced in 1859 when the young John Acton assumed the directorship.[14] He was a student of Döllinger's and for a period of fifteen years embodied English Catholic liberalism. He characterized himself as "a man who has renounced everything that is incompatible with freedom in Catholicism and with the Catholic faith in politics." The independent position of the journal (and also that of Home and Foreign Review, which followed it in 1862) with respect to academic freedom, the Roman Question, and numerous other burning religious issues provoked the reaction of Wiseman and Manning, both of whom were avidly supported by W. G. Ward, the English emulator of Veuillot, and his Dublin Review. One of the saddest consequences of this controversy was the fact that it compromised Newman, who could not be further away from religious and political liberalism and who had attempted the role of mediator in vain.[15]

The Syllabus and Its Consequences

The different manifestations of liberalism in Catholic life, often incautiously expressed and occasionally accompanied by openly equivocal conduct, were an irritant for the men of faith. Confronted with this "religion of freedom" and a "religion of learning," they endeavored once again to confirm the "rights of God over minds and society." They were deeply worried because, as conservatives almost instinctively tied to the past, they had great difficulty distinguishing between eternal verities which must be preserved at all cost and contingent structures of the ecclesiastical and civil order. Many others were additionally shaken by the fact, no longer to be glossed over by 1860, that whenever liberals came to power, anticlerical legislation soon followed. This aspect worried the Romans especially, whom the events after 1848 in Italy confirmed in the belief of a close connection between the principles of 1789 and the destruction of traditional values in the social, moral, and religious order. Pius IX came to believe that he had to take action so that his silence would not discourage the few Catholic nations which to some degree had remained faithful to the—in his eyes best—system of a privileged Church protected by the state. Inasmuch as circumstances had forced him to make practical concessions in several countries, he now considered it so much more urgent unmistakably to draw attention to principles. To the extent that concepts condemned by his predecessors Pius VI, Pius VII, Leo XII, and Gregory XVI took root in officially Catholic countries like Spain, the Latin American republics and Italy, he seized every opportunity to emphasize the corresponding classical doctrine of the Church.[16] Additionally, however, the idea of a comprehensive condemnation of all ideas of modern society regarded as erroneous gained ground gradually. It was started in 1849 by Cardinal Pecci and later taken up by the Civiltà cattolica. After the revival of the Roman Question in 1859 it was promoted again, and in the fall of that year the Vatican asked some trusted churchmen like Monsignor Pie, Dom Guéranger, and the president of the University of Louvain, Xavier de Ram, for suggestions as to which errors ought to be condemned and which points of doctrine ought to be emphasized.

---

[13] On Richard Simpson (1820–76), see D. McElrath, Richard Simpson. Study in English Liberal Catholicism (Louvain 1972); D. McElrath is preparing an edition of his correspondence.

[14] There is not yet a good document-based biography of John Acton (1834–1902). But consult: H. Butterfield, Lord Acton (London 1948); D. Matthew, Lord Acton and his Times (London 1968); G. Himmelfarb, Lord Acton. A Study in Conscience and Politics (London 1954); also E. Watts in RPol 28 (1966), 493–507; U, Noack, Katholizität und Geistesfreiheit. Nach den Schriften von John Dalberg-Acton (Frankfurt 1947); D. McElrath, Lord Acton. The Decisive Decade 1864–1874 (Louvain 1970). With respect to his correspondence, see O. Chadwick in JEH 16 (1965), 114f.; D. McElrath in RHE 65 (1970), 87–89.

[15] In addition to H. McDougall, op. cit., see the excellent introduction by J. Coulson to the new edition of Newman's, at the time very controversial, article "On consulting the Faithful in Matters of Doctrine," (New York 1961).

On the basis of the replies, a first draft of the Syllabus errorum in Europa vigentium with seventy-nine propositions was prepared by the spring of 1860. But in the fall Rome received a long pastoral letter from Bishop Gerbet of Perpignan. Gerbet was a former collaborator of Lamennais, but he now fulminated against what he once had revered. The document under the title of "Instruction sur les erreurs du temps présent," contained a list of eighty-five erroneous statements and appeared to the Pope as an even better basis for his own solemn project. According to P. Martina, he did so wrongly, as the first draft dealt more with principles and had a more comprehensive character. Several successive commissions of theologians and cardinals, whose work was closely observed by the Pope, for more than a year worked on the theological justification of Gerbet's propositions. Disregarding the pronounced reserve of many Curia cardinals, who would have preferred a return to the first draft, Pius IX decided to present the new list of sixty-one propositions to the bishops who visited Rome in the summer for the purpose of lending support for the Pope's temporal power. The list was based on Gerbet's pastoral letter and summarized the most important modern efforts to liberate philosophy, morals, and politics from the control of religion. Although the information was provided on a confidential basis, some of it was leaked. The premature disclosure of the document occasioned a storm of indignation in the anticlerical press against Rome's obscurantism. Episcopal reactions, few in number, were rather reserved. Nonetheless, the Pope insisted on his original idea and the commission continued work on Monsignor Gerbet's propositions. Still, it proceeded so slowly that it seemed that the great condemnation of modern errors was being postponed to a later day; some hoped it was sine die.

---

[16] Encyclicals, but also briefs to authors who defended the "right principles," and especially many addresses. Their listing in Acta SS. D. N. Pii IX ex quibus excerptus est Syllabus (Rome 1865).

But in the summer of 1863 two unfortunate speeches once more brought the problem to the fore. One was the apology which Montalembert, impatient with the "timidity" of his friends, made at the international congress of Belgian Catholics in Mechelen in defense of a "free Church in a free state."[17] The other one was Döllinger's bold demand for the independence of Catholic scholars from the ecclesiastical magisterial office, which he presented in Munich. The first speech received a strong echo and was a challenge to all those who saw the chief danger of their time in liberal Catholicism. They now insisted that Rome react clearly and unequivocally. Several interventions spared Montalembert a public censure, but Pius IX more and more became convinced that he needed to take a solemn step in order to calm the excited spirits. Several factors then delayed his pronouncement by a full year. The French intervened diplomatically, fearing that public opinion would be offended; the Belgians were worried that it might look as though Rome condemned the constitution, and just before elections this would only play into the hands of the liberals; and finally there were the apprehensions of Cardinal Antonelli that some non-Catholic defenders of the temporal power of the Pope, like Adolphe Thiers, might become discouraged. Pius IX was not deaf to these considerations, but this so very impressionable man was also subject to other influences. There was the increasing tendency of many Italian Catholics to take a neutral position; there was the success of Renan's book Vie de Jésus, which graphically made evident the dangers of freedom of the press; there were the recent violations of the rights of the Church in Poland and Mexico; there were Ketteler's warnings of the spiritual independence of the German theologians; and, more generally, there was the threat of promoting radicalism through passivity on the part of the Catholics. The convention of September 1864 was then the final straw which decided Pius IX to hesitate no longer.[18] [17] R. Aubert in Collectanea Mechliniensia 20 (1950), 525–51. On the occasion of this speech, Civiltà cattolica for the first time suggested a distinction between "thesis" and "hypothesis," which was to become classic (cf. J. Leclerc in RSR 41 [1953], 530–34).

---

Consulted again in August 1864, the cardinals of the Inquisition had renewed their objections to the list of Gerbet's propositions and had suggested a different approach. They thought the Pope should repeat his earlier condemnations in summary form. The Pope decided to follow the new suggestion and within a few weeks there was drafted, with the special assistance of the young Barnabite L. Bilio, an encyclical and a list of excerpts from addresses and writings of the Pope which he had made since the beginning of his pontificate and in which he had already condemned the various "modern errors." At the end of December the encyclical Quanta cura was published; appended to it was a catalog of eighty unacceptable propositions under the title of Syllabus errorum.[19] In it the Pope condemned pantheism and rationalism; indifferentism, which regards all religions as equal in value; socialism, which denies the right to private property and subordinates the family to the state; the erroneous concept regarding Christian marriage; Freemasonry; the rejection of the temporal power of the Pope; Gallicanism, which wanted to make the exercise of ecclesiastical authority dependent on the authorization by the civil power; statism, which insists on the monopoly of education and dissolves religious orders; and naturalism, which regards the fact that human societies no longer have respect for religion as progress and which demands laicization of institutions, separation of Church and state, and absolute freedom of religion and the press. The last aspect in particular impressed the public, as the propositions of the Syllabus, taken out of context, often were bewildering and justified the evaluation of Dom Butler that "it was a most inopportune" document.

The majority of non-Catholics at first were confirmed in their belief in the incompatibility of an ultramontane Church with the ways of life and habits of thought of the nineteenth century. The ultramontane press, jubilant over the Syllabus, heightened the impression to the point that many Catholics began to ask themselves whether conditions were really as they were depicted.

Actually, though, excitement was not very strong everywhere. In Italy, the press engaged in verbal skirmishes but the public remained calm, some because long ago they had stopped paying attention to the strictures of the Vatican in political questions, and others because they realized that an exact interpretation of the Roman document required careful exegesis. Generally the document was debated in connection with the Roman Question, and was seen less as a stand against modern society than against the convention of September. In Great Britain the non-Catholic public was virtually unanimous in finding the Pope's campaign against modern society totally ridiculous, primarily because he had condemned virtually everything. English Catholics, on the other hand, attempted, not very successfully, to argue that Pius IX had condemned the doctrinal errors and excesses of liberalism, and not the liberal institutions as England knew them. A similar situation prevailed in the Netherlands. Although there the Catholic newspapers also adopted this interpretation, the papal document contributed to increasing Protestant hostility to the papacy and to the hastening of the break between Catholics and liberals in parliament.

---

[18] See R. Mori, La Questione Romana 1861–65 (Florence 1963), 331, 338.

[19] Text in Acta Pii IX III, 687–700 (Quanta cura), 701–11 (Syllabus). Commentary in L. Choupin, Valeur des décisions . . . du Saint-Siège (Paris 1928), 187–415.

The situation was different in the German-speaking countries. The Austrian government initially feared that, emboldened by the encyclical, the clergy would demand an even more favorable application of the concordat. Döllinger and friends deplored the Syllabus; but the Mainz faction, whose influence reached the broad mass of the Catholics beyond the range of the intellectuals, noted the condemnation of atheistic philosophers and of bold theologians with satisfaction. With few exceptions, however, they took the justified position that the rejection of anti-Christian liberalism was no obstacle to continued exploitation of constitutional liberties. This interpretation also quickly gained ground in Belgium, even among the ultramontanes, but in the initial period the despondency of the constitutionally inclined Catholics was very great. In France agitation lasted for several weeks. Many moderate liberal Catholics were severely shaken in their convictions. Others were aware that the reminder of the principles on the whole did not really change the situation, but they also were despondent as the exaggerated comments of Veuillot's press forced them to observe the widening gap which separated the skeptics from the Church. Many bishops immediately wrote to Rome, pointing to the dangers of ambiguity, and demanded a clarification. Some of the others, among them Darboy and Maret, in the interest of preventing extreme interpretations on the part of their colleagues, persuaded the government to forbid the official publication of the encyclical under the pretext that its condemnations were directed against the constitution of the Empire. With the genius of the born polemicist, Dupanloup, assisted by Cochin, used this antiliberal measure to write a mitigating commentary on encyclical and Syllabus in the form of a defense of the Pope, who was being unjustly attacked by a hostile press and equally hostile cabinet ministers. Beyond this he was sufficiently skillful to woo the Romans by adding to his commentary an eloquent indictment of the recent convention in which the French imperial government had promised the Italian government to evacuate Rome.[20] This "translation of the encyclical into contemporary language" (A. Dechamps), in which the severity of the original was attenuated somewhat, was highly successful in Europe and even in America and within a few days persuaded public opinion to reject anticlerical criticisms. Pius IX, grateful to Dupanloup for his sharp attack on the imperial government, sent him a brief of commendation. The brief was very carefully formulated, but in conjunction with the praises of numerous bishops it gave Dupanloup's pamphlet the veneer of a more or less official interpretation of the Syllabus, even though many who disagreed with it attempted to belittle its significance.[21] This fact has a certain importance for the later history of Catholic liberalism, and for this reason Dupanloup's brochure deserves more than a merely anecdotal interest.

For the moment the storm subsided and theoretically both factions were back where they had started, inasmuch as Dupanloup's action had saved the liberal Catholics from seemingly inevitable retreat. For this reason they were able to maintain their position until the accession of Leo XIII, even if in the meantime they were forced to strike their sails. Many also acknowledged, in consequence of the papal condemnation, that in their utterances they occasionally had been too radical or imprecise. Above all they recognized the necessity of discretion[22] in order not to anger the aging Pope, who was increasingly irritated by the growing sectarianism of those who called themselves liberals. Toward the end, Pius IX, who almost daily condemned liberalism as the "error of the century," was no longer able to see the radical difference between Catholic liberalism and liberalism as such.[23] While regular liberalism, even if its adherents practiced their religion, was naturalistic and wanted to separate man as much as possible from his religious ties, liberal Catholics both intellectually and practically were guided by the demands of their faith and accepted, sometimes somewhat unwillingly, their subjection to the decisions of the Church. Pius IX admitted the difference, but only unwillingly. "Catholic liberalism," he declared in 1874, "has one foot in the truth and one foot in error, one foot in the Church and one foot in the spirit of the century, one foot on my side and one foot on the side of my enemies." He was willing in many cases to tolerate the "hypothesis," but could not refrain from showing his dislike of those who in his eyes too easily decided for this option and now could proceed from practically admissible concessions to a surrender of principles. The full favor of the Pope was reserved for the "Knights of the Absolute," who, without consideration of intellectual developments or of local requirements, maintained what was supposed to be the "right of a Christian society." The frequent encouragements which Rome sent to their leaders finally convinced them that the Pope had entrusted them with a genuine mission.[24] Liberal Catholics had escaped condemnation, but they were clearly aware that they were in disfavor. For the next fifteen years the scene was dominated by extremists—liberal radicals and intransigent ultramontanes—who were equally intolerant and wanted to force their thinking upon everyone else.

---

[20] La Convention du 15 Septembre et l'Encyclique du 8 Decembre. Concerning the preliminary work on this brochure, published on 24 January 1865, see R. Aubert, RHE 51 (1956), 83–142.

[21] Emphasizing the fact that Pius IX congratulated Veuillot and Schrader, who had interpreted the Syllabus much more strictly, in even warmer terms.

[22] At least the majority. Montalembert, embittered by disappointment and illness, charged his former supporters with avoiding hot issues (See A. Latreille in RHEF 54 [1968], 281–314).

[23] See the inspired "Considérations sur le libéralisme" by A. Simon in Ris 4 (1961), 3–25.

Antiliberalism and Social Catholicism

Recent investigations have revealed that the Catholic opposition to liberalism was not always only confined to negative criticism. To be sure, there were among the opponents of the liberal Catholics many closed minds without any understanding of the times; but the more flexible among them, who succeeded in gaining the attention of a considerable segment of the Catholic public, were imbued with a two-fold positive ideal. For one, they wanted to react to the timidity of many of their brethren who seemed to be reconciled with the liberal view that religion was a private matter without any impact on social life. For another, they demanded the right to the "actual state," compared to the "legal state," which was dominated by a numerically small oligarchy. This makes understandable why from the second third of the nineteenth century onward these "reactionaries" in particular undertook more social initiatives than the liberal Catholics, of whom it might have been thought that they had more in common with democratic ideals. It also explains why these efforts were primarily directed toward the immediate amelioration of the poverty of the working class rather than to a solution of its real problems through structural reforms. The intention was to obtain the sympathy of the workers and their support in the battle against the anticlerical bourgeois state. It finally also makes clear why these efforts were more often inspired by the nostalgic ideal of a return to an idealized, patriarchal, and corporative past than by a realistic accommodation to the new situations created by the Industrial Revolution.

---

[24] Very characteristic in this respect is the document published by A. Louant, "Charles Périn et Pie IX," Bulletin de l'Institut historique belge de Rome 27 (1952), 181–220.

The connection between antiliberalism and social efforts was shown early in the Civiltà cattolica,[25] in which, for example, Father Taparelli in 1852 held the view that the corporations dissolved by the French Revolution were rooted in natural law. Pius IX devoted one paragraph of the encyclical Quanta cura to the unmasking not only of the illusions of socialism, which wants to put the state in the place of providence, but also of the pagan character of economic liberalism, which in the relationship between capital and labor eliminates the moral factor.

Such ideas inspired several of the first initiators of the Catholic movement in Italy, who in this as yet hardly industrialized state were concerned chiefly with the pitiful situation of the rural masses, and whose initiatives actually reached their full effectiveness only under the subsequent pontificate.

In France during the July Monarchy there had existed an early form of Christian socialism in addition to the Société d'économie charitable, in which Viscount Armand de Melun had gathered legitimate representatives of social work who, while genuinely touched by the misery of the proletariat, were also rather reticent to call for an intervention by the state in economic life. Christian socialism could be traced to converted followers of Saint-Simon and Fourier, to former readers of L'Avenir who remembered the bold and social views of Lamennais, and to some members of the Society of Saint Vincent de Paul who had realized that alms were not the only solution. But the movement received a mortal blow by the general reaction to everything which resembled the kind of socialism which developed after the crisis of 1848. Thus, for a period of twenty years social Catholicism was represented almost exclusively by conservatives who were decided followers of the paternalistic approach. They tried less to change the condition of the workers for reasons of justice than to lead the workers back to the Church and to maintain the established order at the price of a few improvements in their material situation. The majority of the engaged men of the Second Empire, who were often met with the indifference and even the mistrust of the broad masses of the faithful and of the clergy, were inspired by the theories of [25] P. Droulers, "Question sociale, État, Église dans la Civiltà cattolica à ses débuts," ChStato I, 123–47. Concerning the reinstallation of the corporations by Pius IX in 1852, see E. Lodolini in RstRis 39 (1952), 664–82; L. Dal Pane in Giornale degli economisti, n.s. 8 (1949), 603–8.

---

Le Play,[26] whose scholarship left much to be desired and which, in conjunction with a narrow interpretation of the Syllabus, served to lead these social Catholics to a "counterrevolution" opposed to the doctrine of human rights and democratic egalitarianism. In this fashion much personal generosity was wasted without actually reaching the working class. On the contrary, the working class now strove to take its fate and the battle for its liberation into its own hands.

In Belgium the situation was hardly any different. The few progressive Catholics who, together with E. Ducpétiaux, suggested a few hesitant legal measures in favor of the workers met general rejection at the congress of Mechelen. The man who set the tone in this question was Charles Périn, from 1845 until 1881 professor of economics at the University of Louvain, whose work De la richesse dans les sociétés chrétiennes (1861) was translated into most of the European languages. But while this champion in the ideological and political struggle against liberalism energetically drew attention to the exploitation of the workers by the new middle class and, based on the doctrine that moral laws should also be valid in the economic world, demanded a more humane division of labor, he also denied the state the right to intervene and expected the solution of the social problem only and exclusively from private initiative and growth of the Christian spirit among the employers.

It is paradoxical that the origin of a more realistic Catholic social movement lay in Germany, although its industrial development started only later. The German social movement had an open mind toward labor unions and approved of a restriction of economic liberalism through social legislation, the first steps toward which were outlined in the encyclical Rerum novarum of Leo XIII. There was no denying that the German Catholics, like the others, were at first primarily interested in maintaining order, but what they desired—in contrast to France, where all too many Catholics only wanted to preserve external order and to subjugate the workers to the current situation—was a traditional order, the organized society of the "good old days," which no doubt was not at all democratic but which at least had the advantage that it protected the little people against an unlimited exploitation by the rich. At first, until about 1870, most German Catholics in their attempt to bring the Church to the people and the people to the Church were mostly concerned with the defense of the independent artisans and the organization of the farmers. But gradually attention was paid to the problem of the workers. In 1837, the militant Catholic Franz Josef von Buß of Baden pointed to the dangers of uncontrolled industrialization and demanded action by the state in order to improve the situation of the workers. In his opinion it was up to the Church to assume the defense of the workers, who had no official representation.[27]

---

[26] On the sociologist and founder of the Société internationale des hautes études d'economie sociale, Frédéric Le Play (1806–82), see Duroselle, 672–84 and D. Herbertson, Frédéric Le Play (Ledbury 1952).

In 1846 Adolf Kolping,[28] a former shoemaker's apprentice turned priest, founded the first journeymen's association. Thanks to outstanding collaborators and the active participation of the journeymen themselves, whom Kolping allowed broad participation, the organization grew rapidly with the support of Cardinal Geissel of Cologne. From the Rhineland it spread throughout Germany and to Austria and Switzerland. Gradually other social institutions were founded in the industrial areas of the Rhineland, culminating in the founding of the People's Association of Mönchen-Gladbach. To the care and saving of souls and amelioration of need there was now slowly added the effort to establish a professional organization and a solid action foundation for the activity of the workers. These, it was hoped, would lead to a change of working conditions.

In this development, which presented the problem of the workers to the German Catholics more as a question of institutional reform and less as a matter of mere charitable help, the dynamic Bishop Ketteler of Mainz played a significant role.[29] He was frequently misunderstood and the prelate was often depicted as a pioneer of Christian democracy and as initiator of the booming social works in Germany during his life. Actually, many of these activities, started in the Cologne area, were begun without him. Even if Ketteler in his practical work was occasionally inspired by socialist doctrines, especially by the form which Lassalle had given them, and even if he adopted some of Lassalle's arguments and indictments of capitalism, he harbored no sympathies for modern democracy. Speaking out against the oppression of the economically weak, which society permitted, this Westphalian aristocrat had in mind a return to the corporative society as it had existed in the Holy Roman Empire of the Middle Ages. Yet Ketteler's influence on the social Catholicism of his time was tremendous. In his book Die Arbeiterfrage

---

[27] Cf. Schnabel, G IV, 202–7.

[28] On Adolf Kolping (1813–65), see F. G. Schaffer, Adolf Kolping, 8th ed., revised by J. Dahl and B. Ridder (Cologne 1961), as well as D. Weber, ed., 100 Jahre Kolpingfamilie 1849–1949 (Cologne 1949). Additional literature in LThK VI, 401.

[29] On Ketteler's social activity, see, in addition to the biography by Vigener (which, however, downplays his role), M. Spahn, Hochland 22 (1925), 144–46; T. Brauer, Ketteler. Der deutsche Bischof und soziale Reformer (Hamburg 1927) and especially L. Lenhart, Bischof Ketteler I–II (Mainz 1966–67).

und das Christentum (1864), the fruit of fifteen years of reflection, he did not limit himself to proposing a few concrete reforms, but attempted to demonstrate that the solution of the workers' problems was only possible by a cooperation of state and society, acting in direct opposition to liberal individualism and to the totalitarianism of the modern centralized state. Energetically he attacked the solutions suggested by middle-class capitalism and statist socialism. Instead, under the influence of Catholic Romanticism, which had marked him deeply in his youth, he glorified society as a living hierarchical organism, strongly molded by the unity of faith, in which the artisans were organized with a view toward the general welfare and economic life was freed from the iron law of greed and profits. Thus Ketteler was the first theoretician of a social order based on corporatism, which for more than half a century formed the basis of Catholic social doctrine. Its opposition to the individualistic ideal of economic liberalism after 1870 in more than one case—especially in the social wing of the Center Party, in the Austrian School, and with La Tour du Pin—was more unequivocal than the practical mistrust of and the theoretical objections to socialism.

SECTION FIVE

The Victory of Ultramontanism

CHAPTER 21

Ultramontane Progress and Final Gallican Resistance

The Ultramontane Movement around 1850

As has been shown, the fifteen years of Gregory XVI's pontificate were a decisive phase in the progress of ultramontanism. Yet not all resistance had been removed. The great mass of the clergy and of the faithful were convinced of the advantages which accrued to the Church as a result of its liberation from the tutelage of the governments and of closing Catholic ranks around the Pope. Still, the question was occasionally asked whether it was at all advisable to have such a concentration of power in consequence of this rather extreme centralization. Such a centralization inevitably had to result in a reduction of the authority of the bishops, in uniformity of Church discipline and liturgy, even piety, all of which would mean the complete renunciation of revered local customs and the adoption of a "religious way of life" for the entire Church, analogous to Italy's.

It is of great importance not to lose sight of the complex character of the ultramontane movement and its concrete reality. Its adherents propounded theological and canonical doctrines concerning the special privileges of the Pope and the prerogatives of the Church over the civil power, developed a program for turning the ecclesiastical organization into a more authoritarian and centralistic one, favored restriction of the freedom of scholarship in philosophy and theology, and demanded a new outlook on piety which consisted less in an inner attitude than in frequent receipt of the sacraments and an increase in external devotions. While the ultramontane movement and its opposition to the heritage of the regalism of the Old Regime met with general acclaim, it encountered various forms of resistance because of the ecclesiastical problems posed by it. The resistance originated with the theologians whose minds were closed to dogmatic progress and who refused to see why the Pope now should occupy a more important place in the Church than during the first centuries. But there was also resistance by people who, tied to old religious customs, preferred the particularism of the past to a future with a predominantly supranational character. And finally there was also the opposition of upper clergymen who feared the loss of their historical rights and occasionally wondered whether the traditional character of an episcopate based on divine right was still safe.

Such pockets of resistance could be seen almost everywhere. They could be found in England, where among some Old Catholics the insular thinking of the eighteenth century lived on, and in Lombardy and in Poland, where Josephinist thought continued to be propounded in the seminaries and universities. They held on especially strongly in France and the German-speaking countries, where latent opposition was incited by the very excesses of the ultramontane faction. In essence, though, these were no more than rearguard skirmishes, incapable of stopping the victory of the ultramontane movement.

In France during the Second Republic, the ultramontanes became stronger, ably assisted by Nuncio Fornari. The bishops appointed by Falloux largely thought "Roman" thoughts and helped them to victory at the various provincial councils. At these councils the Holy See succeeded in having some decrees changed and thereby implicitly achieved recognition of its claim to such control. The newspaper L'Univers, edited by Parisis and Gousset, eagerly supported every move made by the Holy See in this connection, and thereby strengthened the impulse with which Catholics had looked toward Rome for years.

The defenders of ultramontanism found considerable support among the lower clergy, which was dissatisfied with the arbitrariness of many bishops. In order to protect themselves, the priests were demanding the restoration of church tribunals, which had been abolished after the French Revolution; the provincial councils of the middle of the century met some of their demands through the reinstitution of officialates. Often this was only illusory, however, and many tribunals existed only on paper. Dissatisfied with the way and methods of episcopal jurisdiction, the parish priests began to turn to the Roman tribunals even in the smallest of episcopal decisions whenever they did not meet the approval of the pastors. The tribunals in turn were only too happy to oblige and to interfere in the internal affairs of French dioceses, going over the heads of the bishops.[1] The tendency to resort to Rome was promoted by some canonists like Abbé André[2] and publications like Le Rappel and La Correspondance de Rome, which in France publicized the decisions favorable to the lower clergy which the Roman congregations had made in the name of universally valid canon law.

---

[1] Cf. J. Vernay, "Un aspect du mouvement ultramontain dans l'Église de France au XIX^e siècle," Bulletin des Facultés catholiques de Lyon, n.s. 34 (1963), 5–18.

[2] On him, see DDC I, 516–19.

Returned to Rome at the beginning of 1851, Cardinal Fornari emphatically continued to support the attempts of the ultramontanes by defending the papers L'Univers and La Correspondance de Rome against the attacks of some bishops, and by promoting the inclusion of Gallican-oriented works in the Index. Between 1850 and 1852 several textbooks employed by the seminaries were condemned. Included were Bailly's Théologie, even though it had been revised as late as 1842, and Lequeux's Traité de droite canonique, which strongly favored episcopal autonomy and common law.

The vociferous enthusiam with which the ultramontane press greeted these steps, and the application of often rather insensitive methods led to a counterreaction. In 1852, a Paris theologian wrote Mémoire sur la situation présente de l'Église gallicaine relativement au droit coutumier, which concerned itself with the most important questions discussed at the time, such as the problem of particular rights as against the universal right of the Church, the reform of liturgy, and the interference by Roman congregations. At the same time, steps were taken to silence those journalists who expressed themselves too loudly in favor of the ultramontane cause. The time was well chosen, inasmuch as many, even non-Gallican, bishops were becoming concerned about priestly agitation; they detected in it the spirit of rebellion which, by appealing to Roman authority, was trying to escape from the supervision of the bishops at home. Additionally, they were shocked by the action of Catholic laymen who presumed to substitute a learning Church for the teaching Church, and became angry over the arrogance with which some journalists assumed they could dictate how the bishops should carry out their duties. Pius IX himself was required to counsel Veuillot to moderation. Errors in leadership by Dupanloup and Sibour, the archbishop of Paris, necessitated the Pope's intervention. In April 1853 he published the encyclical Inter multiples,[3] concerning the problems raised in France. It was a clear disapproval of Gallicanism, even in its moderate form, and of all those who, for whatever reasons, were resisting the ultramontane current.

Rome's Systematic Activity

The publication of the encyclical Inter multiples signified a change in the attitude of Rome. Like most of the great movements in Church history, the ultramontane movement had started from below. Initially the Holy See had confined itself to noting its progress without active interference on its part. But during the final years of Gregory XVI a development was initiated which became notably intensified under the pontificate of Pius IX.

---

[3] Text in Acta Pii IX I, 439–48.

The personality of the Pope alone contributed to it. His charm and open nature, so different from the reserved behavior of his predecessor, together with the aura of a "martyr," which the problems arising from the Roman Question lent him, gradually gave him among the Catholic peoples of the world a popularity such as no Pope had known before him. This, in Church history, singular phenomenon explains in part the enthusiasm with which all of the clergy and of the faithful accepted the doctrine of papal infallibility after it had been unclear for centuries. It also explains the favorable reception of ecclesiastical centralization, which, as everyone knew, also was desired by the Pope.

But Rome was not satisfied with allowing favorable circumstances alone to do the work. The course of the 1848 revolution inevitably meant that at the close of the crisis a systematic plan would be developed to prevent future revolutionary attempts. In its implementation the Jesuits, who had become very influential in the Curia, played a great role. In 1847, Ballerini's Vindiciae, one of the works which was directed against Febronianism and on which ultramontane propaganda was very strongly based, was published again. A short time later Gallican and Febronian textbooks were suppressed, an action which made a deep impression on contemporaries. Parallel with it, the professors at the Gregoriana in their works emphasized the classical theses of the primacy and infallibility of the Pope. Like Passaglia in his Commentarius de prerogative B. Petri (1856), which served as the model for analogous publications, they strove for a more scholarly foundation by returning to the Scripture and the Fathers. Or, like Schrader, they developed the ultramontane positions to an extreme, giving them a clearly theocratic perspective. The number of their students continually grew, thanks to the increase in the national seminaries at Rome,[4] and they in turn spread these ideas throughout the world. Civiltà cattolica effectively popularized them. The proclamation of the Immaculate Conception (1854) can also be seen from the perspective of the increasingly emphasized infallibility of the Pope. This event, which strongly influenced the Catholic world, in singular fashion affirmed the prerogatives of the Pope and his growing importance in the life of the Church.[5]

---

[4] To the old colleges (German-Hungarian, English, Scottish, Irish, Greek, and that of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith), the following seminaries were gradually added: the Belgian seminary in 1844, the Beda Seminary for English-speaking converts in 1852, the French seminary in 1853, the Latin American Pius seminary in 1858, the North American seminary in 1859, the Illyrian seminary in 1863, and the Polish seminary in 1866.

[5] See EThL 31 (1955), 83–86.

Even more than on the doctrinal level, Roman activity proceeded systematically in the practical area of discipline. Rome seized every opportunity to support and strengthen the efforts that were being made by ultramontanes in the various countries to effect closer ties to the center of Christianity and a strengthening of papal power. While nuncios in earlier times had acted as diplomatic liaisons to governments, they now also took a hand in the internal affairs of the Churches in the countries to which they had been assigned. Pro-Roman priests were supported and, if necessary, protected against the accusations of their bishops; frequently they were appointed as prelates in order to raise their standing. The obligation for periodic visits, which had fallen into disuse, was revived, and the increasing contacts with the bishops were augmented by the large assemblies of 1854, 1862, and 1867.[6] Hundreds of bishops gathered in Rome and each time the assemblies appeared as the apotheosis of papal power and Catholic unity. Everything possible was done to stifle regional differences in ecclesiastical life by discouraging all calls for the convocation of national councils, by favoring a return to the integral observation of universal canon law, and by recommending appeals to the Curia, even in unimportant matters. The Pope increasingly appointed bishops without considering the opinions of the local higher clergy, and more than once gave preference to mediocre men of whom he could be sure, rather than appoint able men with an independent view; what made the difference was the Roman education and pliability of the candidates. It was a grave matter that the one-sided reports by ultramontanes about clergymen suspected of lukewarmness toward Rome were uncritically accepted. Such a policy of denunciation developed particularly in France. Until 1860 Pius IX and Antonelli, desirous not to increase internal tensions, assumed a reserved attitude and pointed out to the governments that "it was paradoxical to expect the Holy See to keep within limits a movement from which it could only gain." But the extremely half-hearted attitude of the Gallicans in the Roman Question and their liberal sympathies caused high indignation in Rome and the Pope began to favor their opponents.

It was even attempted to increase Roman influence in the election of Eastern bishops. The opportunity for this move was provided by the Ottoman government when it withdrew Catholics of the Eastern Rite from the civil jurisdiction of schismatic patriarchs and thus made sure that the election of bishops and patriarchs had secular significance. It was necessary to take steps to prevent the elections from taking place under the pressure of influential laymen who conceivably had their material interests more in mind than the spiritual welfare of the Church. The Armenian patriarch Hassun suggested to Rome a transitional solution which would simultaneously enhance the role of the apostolic delegate and preserve the essentials of the traditional system. The majority of the consulted cardinals in Rome agreed with this approach, but Cardinal Barnabo, the prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, and some of his supporters tended to see a schismatic factor in the slightest autonomy in ecclesiastical discipline and were unwilling to grant the Uniates more than their liturgical peculiarities.[7] Pius IX, personally agreeing with Barnabo, consulted Valerga, the Latin patriarch of Jerusalem, on the matter; Valerga came out in favor of a radical reform of the Eastern patriarch statute in order to give it a centralistic tone. The Pope used the presence of all patriarchs during the festivities of 1867 in Rome to inform them of his intentions. From now on, the lower clergy and laymen would no longer participate in elections, the patriarch elected by the bishops alone would assume his position only after being confirmed by the Pope, and the appointment of bishops would be in the hands of the Holy See. It would select one candidate from a list of three names submitted by the patriarch, the bishops, and the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. The immediately following protest by the Maronite and Melchite patriarchs resulted in a postponement of the application of the measure in the jurisdictional area of the two patriarchates; but for the Armenian Church it went into effect immediately with the papal bull Reversurus of 12 July 1867.[8] The announcement that these steps, amounting to a reversal of the status expressly granted by Benedict XIV, would soon also be extended to other patriarchates created profound consternation in all Uniate Churches. This worry was added to the displeasure with the pressure which increasingly was applied in favor of an adaptation of Eastern Church discipline to the canon law of the Latin Church. It became evident in the commission which was charged with preparing the decrees of the Vatican Council for the Uniate Churches.[9] The attempts violated the venerable traditions of the East too much not to cause considerable resistance, but in Europe they could easily be enforced through the joint actions of the nuncios, bishops, Catholic movements, and ecclesiastical press.

---

[6] Concerning the assembly of 1867, at which according to Manning "the martyrdom of Peter and his primacy over the world" was celebrated (Saint Paul was neglected, see Irenikon 40 [1967], 43), see P. Karlbrandes, Der heilige Petrus in Rom oder Rom ohne Petrus (Einsiedeln 1867) and Aubert, Pie IX 309f.

---

[7] With respect to this point, the Roman officials were in fact less radical than Dom Guéranger, in whose view liturgical uniformity had to be a normal consequence of the unity of the Church. In his encyclical of 8 April 1862 (Acta Pii IX III, 424–36), Pius IX unequivocally affirmed his intention to respect the Eastern liturgies.

[8] See JP VI/1, 453–65. The discussions occasioned by the bull are treated in Mansi XL, 745–1132; DThC I, 1914–15; DHGE IV, 338–42, 679–80, V, 337–38, 345.

[9] See Hajjar, 292–300.

In Austria, the concordat of 1855 had liquidated Josephinist laws and had made possible the reorganization of the educational system in keeping with the wishes of the Holy See. Consequently, Cardinal Rauscher, the archbishop of Vienna, together with the support of his colleagues Rudigier, Gasser, and Fessler, was able to influence the numerous Catholic associations in an ultramontane direction and to promote the activity of the Jesuits and Redemptorists. In Innsbruck, whose department of theology was entrusted to the Jesuits in 1857, Moy and Vering established the Archives for Catholic Canon Law as a strong outpost of Roman ideas, in Budapest F. Hovanyi made the theology department into a center for the reaction to the Josephinist tentacles in Hungary, and in Vienna the most radical ultramontane theses were defended at the University of Vienna by the Jesuit theologian Clemens Schrader[10] and the canonist George Phillips.[11] In his Kirchenrecht (7 vols. [1845–72]), Phillips, like Schrader, betrayed an unabashed romantic enthusiasm for medieval theocracy, identified the Pope with the Church, and expressed a rather legalistic and superficial view of the Church and its unity. The work was only second-rate from an academic point of view, but is proof of an educated mind; it was largely responsible in the German-speaking countries for widely popularizing the doctrine of the infallibility of the Pope and of his universal episcopal office and the doctrine of the indirect sovereignty of the Church over the state.

In Germany, Ketteler assumed the leading position, which Geissel held until his death in 1864. Mainz was still the vanguard of the movement, but Moufang and Heinrich, assisted by the nuncio in Munich and Reisach, who in 1854 had become a Curia cardinal, elsewhere also had supporters who worked toward the same goal: the Jesuits with their increasing numbers and influence, the Germanists, and the priests trained in Innsbruck under the guidance of the Jesuits. All of them, who liked to think of themselves as the sole possessors of the Catholic spirit, gradually impressed their views on the Catholic masses. They imparted to them their ideas about the prerogatives of the Pope and the authority of the Roman congregations in the life of the national Churches, as well as about the ideal image of a good Catholic. Within the span of a few decades they produced a profound change in German Catholicism. The place of the old view of piety, centered around inner spirituality and the exercise of virtue, was taken by a new way of religious life which emphasized superficial exercises, membership in confraternities, and the strict observation of church regulations. Sailer's irenics yielded to an attitude which emphasized the gap between Catholics and non-Catholics by once again applying the old maxim of "Extra Ecclesiam nulla salus." Instead of working for a strengthening of religious convictions by appealing to church history and philosphy, all too often there was nothing more than the demand blindly to bow to the authority of the Church, mention of whose preeminence over the state was never omitted in the process.

---

[10] Clemens Schrader (1820–75), professor of dogmatics at the Roman College from 1852 to 1857 and at the Department of Theology of the University of Vienna from 1857 to 1870.

[11] On George Phillips (1804–72), from 1834 to 1847 professor at the University of Munich and from 1851 until his death professor at the University of Vienna, see J. von Schulte, Die Geschichte der Quellen und Literatur des canonischen Rechts III/1 (Stuttgart 1880), 375–87, and LThK VIII, 468.

In England, the persistent Manning, assisted by the Dublin Review, succeeded within a few years in winning the majority of the Catholic faithful to a very unpretentious and radical ultramontanism, in spite of the opposition of the liberals at the Rambler and the hesitant stance of Newman and other traditionalist bishops. In Ireland, Cardinal Cullen, who was a total adherent of the centralistic plans of the Holy See, carried the day for the Roman concepts.

In France the encyclical Inter multiples played a decisive part in the victory of ultramontanism. It became possible because of the benevolent neutrality of the government at the beginning of the Second Empire, the extension of Dom Gúeranger's campaign in favor of the Roman liturgy, the Rome-oriented development of Saint Sulpice, which trained a majority of the young clergy, and the establishment of the French Seminary at Rome. The last was accomplished in 1853 with the support of Monsignor de Ségur,[12] whose writings greatly helped in spreading the "Roman spirit" in France. Louis Veuillot's newspaper L'Univers, like L'Avenir twenty years earlier, grew into a battle instrument of the movement. It started a campaign to win the lower clergy for a theocratic concept of society in which politics would be in the service of religion, and for a Church in closer contact with the papacy; in this way it would be better prepared to withstand the dangers of "revolution." Ultimately Veuillot succeeded in creating among French Catholics a "cult of the papacy" as could be found in no other country. At the same time the works of Bossuet, of the Maurists and their students, and of the Jansenists,[13] which in earlier generations had formed the foundation for the training of the clergy, were replaced by an ecclesiastical literature whose academic content was virtually nonexistent, but whose orientation was clearly ultramontane.

---

[12] Cf. M. de Hédouville, op. cit., 208–27.

[13] This reaction is explained by the connection which in the course of time sprang up between Gallicanism and Jansenism. It was reflected in part in the attacks against the Jansenists by Sainte-Beuve (1840–59) and the publication of the hitherto unpublished memoirs of the Jesuit Rapin (Paris 1861–65).

The Excesses of Neo-Ultramontanism and the Reaction in Germany and France

As all other movements, ultramontanism also was not able to avoid excesses. Thoughtful ultramontanes clearly recognized the weaknesses of Gallicanism. More clearly than their opponents they realized that the development of ecclesiastical institutions had not come to an end with the conclusion of the patristic period. They were of the opinion that Rome's intervention in the affairs of the national Churches, which would be able to resist the encroachments of the governments only with difficulty, was justified. They desired a clear centralization, convinced that it was indispensable for the solution of religious problems on the only level where this was possible, namely on the supranational one. But they also often lacked moderation and occasionally a sense of the fitting in their methods and ideas. (Reference was already made above to the abusive practice of secret denunciations made with irresponsible frivolousness). After 1860 certain tendencies became clear which Wilfrid Ward and Dom Butler suggested be termed "neo-ultramontanism." Some people wanted to see the role of the bishops reduced to an intolerable point; some portrayed the most extreme theses of medieval theocracy as divine law; others wished to extend the infallibility of the Pope to all of his pronouncements, even those which concerned religious policy, or they developed forms of papal veneration which amounted to "idolatry of the papacy." The Pope was referred to as the "Vice-God of Mankind" and as the "Permanent Word Incarnate." Monsignor Mermillod preached on the "three incarnations of the Son of God" in the womb of the Virgin Mary, in the Eucharist, and in "the old man in the Vatican." The Civiltà cattolica went so far as to write that "when the Pope meditates, it is God who is thinking through him." All of these exaggerations and flatteries, to which Pius IX did not object, were splashed throughout the Catholic press, to the great disgust of those who were incapable of realizing that these unfortunate formulations were not merely thoughtless expressions emerging from the simple soul of the masses. They certainly did their part in fortifying the last remaining centers of resistance.

The stupidities of neo-ultramontanism angered the German professors the more as they already had great difficulty in swallowing the more moderate views of Bellarmine's followers. As they tended to see ecclesiastical reality only in historical terms, their view in general was too retrospective. They ignored that, considering its involvement with history, the Church perforce had to adapt its institutions to contemporary times. As experts on Christian antiquity, they refused to recognize as legitimate the development of papal prerogatives in the course of the centuries. Their view was supported by the questionable nature of many of the arguments advanced by the representatives of ultramontanism, whose scholarly pronouncements often were not able to keep pace with Catholic thought. They were accused of being a group of fanatics who, while they had a certain power as a result of the support of a considerable number of pious laymen, nevertheless were discrediting the standing of the Church in the eyes of society's leaders. Additionally, there was the hostility between the "German theologians" and the representatives of Scholasticism, which had assumed the form of conflict between Rome and Germany. It was incited by the condemnations and occasionally broad-based criticisms which Rome hurled against these German theologians; it involved accusations which not only offended the German scholars' sense of academic superiority, but also their national pride.

The opposition of the Catholic scholars to the growth of ultramontanism could have confined itself to the type of passive resistance which the professors at Tübingen exercised. But under the influence of Döllinger, the intellectual leader of the movement of reaction to the incursion of the "Romans" into Catholic scholarship and the administration of the Church in Germany, it assumed the character of an open battle. The last word on Döllinger's development during these years, which step by step led him from a theological to a dogmatic opposition, has not yet been spoken; there can be no doubt, however, that on the Catholic side there was too much of a tendency to simplify matters. Once Döllinger had become suspicious of the centralizing tendencies of the Romans, which were in line with the aggressive orientation of the Neo-Scholastics, his apprehension of papal absolutism made him increasingly fearful. The Syllabus confirmed his fears of the dangers to academic freedom and of the introduction of a medieval theocratic system as an article of faith. He was convinced that the future of Catholicism itself was in danger if there was no change in the behavior of the Church. At the convention of Catholic scholars in 1863 in Munich he collided with the Neo-Scholastics. His indignation reached its peak in 1867 when Inquisitor Arbues was canonized. Now there arose the question of whether the ultramontane faction, disregarding ecclesiastical institutions, was not in fact falsifying the religious ideal of Christianity. But the very virulence of his polemics against the "papal system," which he portrayed as a creation of the Middle Ages, incited the bishops against him, including those who, like Rauscher and Ketteler, also regarded certain forms of Roman centralization as excessive. Thus, open resistance to ultramontanism in Germany remained essentially restricted to the universities.

In France, on the other hand, a group of decided opponents of ultramontanism within the episcopate once again came to the fore during the final years of the Second Empire. It had two different roots. The dean of the theological faculty at the Sorbonne, Monsignor Maret,[14] who identified with the ecclesiological views of Bossuet, was deeply concerned about the absolutist and theocratic manipulations of the neo-ultramontanes. He surrounded himself with a small group of intelligent priests with liberal and moderately Gallican views,[15] and through his close relationship with Napoleon III succeeded in having several of them appointed as bishops. Although the effectiveness of these bishops was limited by the Roman enthusiasm of their clergy and a majority of their flocks, they nonetheless constituted a very intimate association of opponents of Roman policies. They were led by Monsignor Darboy,[16] archbishop of Paris after 1863. Indignant about the behavior "of these strange Catholics whose piety consisted mainly of greeting the Pope from afar in order to insult the bishops near by," Darboy several times, and with a frankness to which Rome was no longer accustomed, informed the Pope of his profound consternation with regard to the interference of the Roman congregations in episcopal administrations. He condemned this as an attempt to introduce in France "the regimen of mission countries."

Raised in a totally different theological climate and having long been cool toward the Bonapartist bishops, the liberal Catholics of the Correspondant, who once had seen in ultramontanism the guarantee for the freedom of the Church, now began to move closer to the group around Maret and Darboy. They saw ultramontanism represented and personified in L'Univers and the Civiltà cattolica, in men, that is, who had not the slightest inkling of the true requirements of modern society and who favored absolutism in Church and society. Even men as devoted to the Holy See as Dupanloup, who more than once had stated his belief in the infallibility of the Pope, now began to fear its final formulation. They feared that it would lead to a consolidation of the positions of the

---

[14] With respect to his theological position, see, in addition to the biography by G. Bazin (3 vols. [Paris 1891]), R. Thysman in RHE 52 (1957), 401–65 and DThC IX, 2033–37.

[15] The future Cardinal Lavigerie belonged to them until 1866. He tried to keep the excesses of Roman centralization within limits and to preserve the originality of national modes of thought; in 1862 he submitted a plan to the French government in which he suggested the inclusion of men from the large Catholic countries in the Roman congregations and in the college of cardinals of the Curia (see de Montclos, 200–223).

[16] On Georges Darboy (1813–71), one of the smartest French bishops, a good biography is still lacking. For the time being, consult those by J. Foulon (Paris 1889), DHGE XIV, 84–86, and J. -R. Palanque, op. cit., 21–25.

Syllabus and other documents which assumed religious-political views incompatible with the modern mind. Thus, the extent of the ultramontane victory in France led to the formation of a new Gallican front, whose most active members were precisely those men who twenty years earlier had been the champions of this victory.

CHAPTER 22

The Vatican Council

Preparation

The decision of Pius IX to convoke a council must be seen from the pastoral perspective of the reaction to naturalism and rationalism which he had pursued since the beginning of his pontificate. As painful and retrogressive the modalities occasionally might be, essentially it was his intention once again to provide Catholic life with a focus on the fundamental events of revelation. Additionally, he intended to undertake the highly necessary adaptation of canon law to the profound changes which had taken place during the past three centuries since the last ecumenical council.

The idea of a council as a cure for the crisis from which the Church was suffering had been suggested to Pius IX as early as 1849, and slowly matured. At the end of 1864 he consulted a number of cardinals, who happened to be in Rome, about the advisability of the matter. In spite of some qualifications, their opinion on the whole was rather positive, and the Pope decided to pursue the issue carefully. He asked about forty bishops, selected from the most important Catholic countries, and a few bishops who held offices in Churches of the Eastern Rite to submit suggestions for an agenda. Gradually he then formed four commissions, which he charged with working out the details of the program. A majority of the Curia, however, was not very enthusiastic about the papal plan, and their reticence caused the Pope to hesitate for more than two years. He was also moved by the not totally unjustified fear that the contrasting tendencies evident in the Church in many areas, such as the question of modern freedoms and the growing Roman centralization, might come to a head at the council. But finally, encouraged by a number of respected bishops, the Pope on 26 June 1867 publicly made known his intention, and one year later he invited to Rome for 8 December 1869[1] all Catholic bishops and those people who had the right to participate in a council.[2]

During the consultative deliberations, more than one bishop suggested that the council be used to attempt contacts with the separated Christians. This was in part based on the hopes of a return of the Orthodox, which grew out of the changes in the Slavic world and the Near East. Similarly, with respect to the Reformed Churches, the continuation of the Oxford Movement in the Anglo-Saxon countries and the crisis which the progress of liberal Protestants had caused in the German Lutheran Church had occasioned unionist thoughts on all sides.[3] It is true that the Holy See reacted rather reservedly and during the 1860s, especially under the influence of Manning, several times stiffened its attitude.[4] Nevertheless, Pius IX and several of his advisers continued to hope for a return of the separated Christians and they believed that at least in the Near East there were some opportunities which should not be allowed to pass. With this possibility in mind, a letter was directed to all Orthodox bishops in September 1868, in which they were asked to return to Catholic unity in order to be able to participate in the council; a few days later a global letter was sent to Protestants and Anglicans.[5] But this clumsy and double procedure was generally badly received and to us, today, from an ecumenical point of view appears as one of the saddest cases of missed opportunities.[6]

In the Catholic world the announcement of the council quickly intensified the opposition between the currents which for a number of years had been facing one another: Gallicans and liberal Catholics on one side, ultramontanes and opponents of the modern freedoms on the other.[7] The selection of the consultants who were supposed to prepare the conciliar decrees—sixty Romans and thirty-six foreigners, almost all of them known for their unequivocally ultramontane and antiliberal views[8]—worried those who had hoped that the council would give the bishops who stood on the periphery the long-awaited opportunity to achieve a limited opening of the Church to modern ideas. Instead they believed that they saw a certain tactic at work: a secret preparation of the council beyond all conflicting debates and only with exclusive consideration of the point of view of the Curia, and then discussionless acceptance by the council fathers of all proposals, worked out beforehand down to the smallest detail. A misunderstood piece of news, the "Correspondance de France," which on 6 February 1869 was published in the newspaper of the Jesuits, the Civiltà cattolica, seemed to confirm this prognosis by announcing the definition of papal infallibility by acclamation and therefore without any possibility of clarifying the matter through discussion. Reactions were violent, especially in the German-speaking countries and even in the circles which normally could not be accused of harboring any systematic hostility toward Rome.[9] Döllinger, whose hostility to the Curia had grown noticeably during the last several years, under the pseudonym of Janus published a critical and partisan book attacking the primacy of the Pope and the Roman centralization.[10] In France also press polemics appeared, somewhat milder in tone, because the liberal Catholics considered a definition of papal infallibility as inopportune and the ultramontanes viewed it as desirable. In this fashion the problem, initially virtually not intended to be on the program, during the months preceding the council moved into the foreground of activity. Several respected bishops like Monsignor Dechamps, archbishop of Mechelen, and Monsignor Manning, archbishop of Westminster, demanded immediately that the council be utilized solemnly to define the truth of this publicly contested point. Monsignor Dupanloup, on the other hand, after a long silence came out against the definition because he deemed it inopportune. The majority of the German bishops at their annual conference at Fulda in September 1869 also expressed reservations about the future definition of the personal infallibility of the Pope.[11]

---

[1] Bull Aeterni Patris of 29 June 1868 (Mansi L, 193–200).

[2] In this group were ultimately also included the bishops in partibus, notwithstanding the reluctance of the Pope, who would have preferred to exclude Monsignor Maret (see J. Hamer in RSPhTh 44 [1960], 40–50). It is to be noted that, contrary to repeated assertions at the time of the council, the number of vicars apostolic did not exceed 10 percent of the total number of fathers.

[3] See the information in Aubert, Pie IX, 478f., 484–86, 564.

[4] Ibid., 479–85. Concerning the decrees of 1864 and 1865, which forbade English Catholics to participate together with the Anglicans in the Association for the Promotion of the Union of Christendom (A.P.U.C.), see E. Purcell, Life and Letters of A. Phillips de Lisle I (London 1900), 346–422 and C. Butler, Life and Times of Bishop Ullathorne I (London 1926), 334–68.

[5] Text of the letters of 8 and 13 September 1868 in Mansi L, 199–205.

[6] See F. de Wyels in Irenikon 6 (1929), 488–516, 655–86.

[7] See Aubert, Vat., 84–101. Also R. Lill, "Die deutschen Theologieprofessoren im Urteil des Münchener Nuntius," Reformata reformanda II (Münster 1965), 483–507.

Several governments on their part feared decisions of the council concerning civil marriage, secular education, and constitutional freedoms, and were apprehensive over a possible reconfirmation of certain medieval prerogatives of the Church over the civil authority. The request by some bishops, which was received positively by Rome, to make the Syllabus of 1864 the basis for council deliberations, could not but intensify such fears. All those in the Church who were afraid of the triumph of the ultramontanes at the council tried to reinforce the suspicions of the governments, hoping thereby to cause diplomatic admonitions and warnings. For a while France considered appointing an ambassador extraordinary for the council as it had done for the Council of Trent,[12] and in April the minister president of Bavaria, Prince Chlodwig zu Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst, tried to bring about a joint intervention of the European governments;[13] they, however, preferred to barricade themselves behind an attitude of watchful waiting.

---

[8] See R. Aubert, "La composition des commissions préparatoire du I^er^ Concile du Vatican," Reformata reformanda II (Münster 1965), 447–82.

[9] Cf. J. Granderath, op. cit. I, 187–246.

[10] Der Papst und das Conzil (Leipzig 1869).

[11] R. Lill, Die ersten deutschen Bischofskonferenzen (Freiburg i. Br. 1964), 80–91.

Infallibilists and Anti-Infallibilists

The council opened on 8 December 1869 in the presence of about seven hundred bishops, i.e., of more than two-thirds of those entitled to participate. Among them were 60 prelates of Eastern Rites, for the most part from the Near East, and almost 200 fathers from outside of Europe: 121 from America, 49 of these from the United States, 41 from India and the Far East, 18 from Oceania, and 9 from the missions in Africa. It should be noted, however, that while the prelates from the other parts of the world amounted to about one-third of the council, many of them, especially the missionaries, in reality were European, and that with the exception of the bishops of the Eastern Rites there were no native bishops from Asia and Africa. Within this European predominance there was a Latin predominance. There were some significant English-speaking groups (among them the Irish element predominated) and about seventy-five Germans and Austrians, but disregarding the Spaniards and Latin Americans, who comprised about one hundred members, the French constituted about 17 percent of the assembly (for many missionaries hailed from France) and the Italians constituted a whopping 35 percent, so that the French and Italians together amounted to more than half of the council fathers. The overwhelming Italian predominance, which was strongly criticized, interestingly enough had no tactical rationale; it was merely the result of historical circumstances. In antiquity the number of dioceses established in southern and central Italy was high, in more recent times a large part of the Catholic apostolate in the Greek and Turkish islands was entrusted to Italian missionaries, and Italians occupied a large number of the positions in the Curia. The Italian prelates by themselves constituted not only one-third of the assembly, they also provided two-thirds of the consultants and experts, all of the secretaries, and all five presidents; only one important position, that of secretary general, was entrusted to a foreigner, to the Austrian Fessler.

---

[12] The detailed treatment by E. Ollivier, op. cit. I, 403–536 has been revised in this instance by de Montclos, 391–405.

[13] See J. Grisar, Bayern, Staat und Kirche (Munich 1961), 216–40.

The controversies which in the course of 1869 swirled around papal infallibility and especially the clumsy interference of Monsignor Dupanloup in the middle of November soon after the opening of the council resulted in the replacement of national groupings, which had begun in the first few days, with an ideological grouping.[14] On one side stood the fathers who did not doubt, who in fact expected, that the council would again emphasize those principles which in their view in an ideal Christian society had to form the foundation for the relationship between Church and state and who desired a solemn definition of the infallibility of the Pope. Even if they were not in agreement with all of the centralizing steps of the Roman Curia and thought of some manifestations of papal veneration as ludicrous, many fathers were convinced that the Gallican and Febronian theses which called for a limitation of the papal primacy in favor of the episcopate would be a regression. It would go counter to the old traditions favored by a number of unequivocal statements in Scripture (for example: "Tu es Petrus"), by some formulations stemming from the time of the church Fathers (for example: "Roma locuta est, causa finita est"), and by all of the great Scholastic teachers, from Thomas Aquinas to Bellarmine and Alphonsus Liguori. Confronting some of the difficulties of a historical nature with the living faith of the Church, they were especially impressed by the almost universal agreement of the Church of their time with the thesis of the personal infallibility of the Pope, a concept which in the preceding twenty years had been affirmed by provincial councils several times. Under such circumstances it appeared quite normal to them that controversies which they considered fruitless should be nipped in the bud. Extratheological reasons lent additional weight to the conviction of many prelates. In addition to their veneration of Pius IX, they were convinced that emphasis on the monolithic character of the Roman unity would send non-Catholics to the Church, because they were confused by the hesitation of the Churches separated from Rome or by the contradictions in modern philosophical systems (this aspect was emphasized particularly by the convert Manning). Noticeable also was their endeavor to emphasize the principle of authority as strongly as possible in a world undermined by democratic efforts, which in their eyes were nothing more than a milder form of anarchy, inspired in the main by Protestantism. Finally, given the developing crisis before their eyes, they desired to see an increasingly centralized organization for the offensive and defensive strategy of the Church.

---

[14] See R. Aubert, "Motivations théologiques et extrathéologiques des partisans et des adversaires de la définition dogmatique de l'infaillibilité du pape à Vatican I," L'infaillibilité, ed. by E. Castelli (Paris 1970), 91–103.

Precisely the same mixture of considerations of a theoretical-doctrinal kind and extratheological factors brought other bishops to the conviction that such plans would be a shock for the traditional constitution of the Church and threaten civil society in its most legitimate aspects. The number of these bishops was relatively small and for this reason they were known as the "minority," but they enjoyed a high prestige because of the sees[15] which they occupied and because of their theological scholarship. Some—they were actually more numerous than an apologetically oriented historiography later wanted to admit—continued to adhere to the semi-Gallican concept of the ecclesiastical magisterial office, the starting point of which was that the Pope could never treat a question of doctrine independently from ratification by the episcopate. The influence of the tradition of Bossuet, the episcopal mentality passed down from the Febronian theologians and the canonists of the preceding century, historical difficulties such as the condemnation of Pope Honorius, an archaic theological attitude which clung too much to the sources and had little understanding for dogmatic developments, led them to the conclusion that either the Pope did not possess the privilege of personal infallibility or that the problem at best was still obscure and its treatment therefore premature.

More widespread seemed to be the legitimate, albeit occasionally exaggerated worry about the second element in the divine structure of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. The proposed definition of the infallibility of the Pope appeared to many fathers as the separation of a partial aspect from an indivisible whole, the effect of which would result in the virtual abolition of the episcopate.[16] The way in which the council had been prepared seemed to justify their apprehensions. Did the agenda,[17] determined by the Pope and, in contrast to the Council of Trent, not by the fathers, sufficiently respect their freedom of action? And could the bishops expect to play more than the role of extras in a scene staged in advance by the Curia? The bad acoustics of the council auditorium, which did not satisfy minimum requirements for holding genuine debates, was a further case in point.

---

[15] Almost the entire Austro-Hungarian episcopate under the leadership of Cardinal Rauscher, a renowned patrologist and fervent defender of the rights of the Holy See against Josephinist and liberal demands; all of Germany's sees; a considerable number of French prelates, among them the archbishops of Paris and Lyon; several North American archbishops; the archbishop of Milan, the most populous Italian diocese; and three Eastern patriarchs.

[16] This appears to have been Ketteler's view. Concerning his attitude (very characteristic of those bishops who were devoted to Rome and open toward the idea of the infallibility of the Pope, but who rejected the definition in the context in which it was offered to them), see the balanced treatment by V. Conzemius, "Acton, Döllinger und Ketteler," AMrhKG 14 (1962), 194–238, which corrects the exaggerated thesis put forth by F. Vigener in his biography of the prelate.

[17] Text in Mansi L, 215–22. See Aubert, Vat., 78–83 on the development of the regulation. It was modified by the Pope on 20 February 1870 in a way which displeased the

There was additional concern about the fact that several of the best-known supporters of the definition wanted to include in the subject area of the infallibility of the Church, i.e., of the Pope, a number of "Catholic truths" which did not belong to the depositum fidei and had only indirect connection with it. This was particularly the case in the religious-political area. Many people indeed noted that the definition of papal infallibility in the extensive form suggested by its proponents would strengthen the authority of such documents as the bull Unam sanctam, the declaration of Sixtus V concerning the right to depose sovereigns, and especially the Syllabus, whose judgments were a special burden for the council. Both European and American newspapers were extensive witnesses to this concern. Besides, the way in which the question of infallibility was being dealt with by the ultramontane papers was enough to justify the belief of those who were convinced "that it was the intention to declare the Pope infallible in matters of faith in order to give him the appearance of infallibility in other matters as well" (Leroy-Beaulieu). It was expected that the governments would not tolerate such a course of events without voicing their opposition, but of course this would be to the disadvantage of the local Churches. Beyond the question of immediate tactics there was also a question of principle. It was raised by those who believed that the political future belonged to the liberal institutions, and that the Church, as long as it showed itself as a defender of an autocratic authoritarianism, stood to lose everything. Finally, there were the ecumenical aspects: the proposed definition would add to the difficulties of establishing closer relations with the separated brethren, especially of the Christians in the East; it would promote the aggressiveness of certain Protestants; and could even provide a new schism in the intellectual circles of Germany which were strongly impressed by Döllinger's arguments.

If the feeling of discontent which showed itself at the beginning of the council rapidly resulted in an organized opposition, this was in part the result of some misunderstandings, but to an overwhelming degree it was the result of a regrettable maneuver of the infallibilists. For the purpose of preparing the election of the dogmatic commission, the so-minority even more (see Mansi L, 854–55 and C. Butler, op. cit., 243–53). Cf. H. Jedin, "Die Geschäftsordnungen der beiden letzten ökumenischen Konzilien in ekklesiologischer Sicht," Cath 14 (1960), 105–18.

---

called deputatio de fide, which was to deal with the question of papal infallibility, two different election committees had been formed: one by Dupanloup, the other one by Manning. The latter insisted on the exclusion from the deputation of all fathers who were suspected of opposing the definition. A list compiled under his supervision and approved by one of the council presidents was distributed to the fathers. For the most part they had no personal knowledge of the other members of the council and on 14 December elected the proposed members in good faith. This procedure, which excluded from the deputation such competent men as Cardinal Rauscher and Monsignor Hefele, the learned author of the Conciliengeschichte, was a gross mistake. It put an end to the possibility of a dialogue between the two opposing positions and by its partisanship angered the members of the minority who, erroneously, believed that this maneuver by Manning's group had been engineered by the Curia. Even more, it created the impression outside of the assembly that the elections had only been a guise. From this moment on there were many who began to doubt the freedom of the council.

First Council Debates

After three weeks of exhausting formalities, the discussion concerning the first constitutional draft "against the many errors stemming from modern rationalism" was begun on 28 December.[18] It immediately became the object of strong criticism. To many fathers it was obscure, insufficiently pastoral and too aggressive, and went far beyond the points that had been discussed freely by the theologians. Criticism originated both from the infallibilists and the minority, an advantageous fact in that it gave hope that the council would proceed less inhibitedly than had been feared. After six sessions of debate, the presidents announced on 10 January that the schema was being returned to the deputies for revision. Some men were astonished that the decision was made without prior advice from the assembly, which in its majority probably would have adopted the draft with only minor changes. That this was not done shows clearly that the Roman leaders—contrary to the intention of which they were accused even before the opening of the council—were far from exploiting the obedient majority and that they tried to achieve the best possible result even at the cost of some humiliations.

---

[18] Mansi L, 58–119, 122–276. The protracted drafting of this schema can be followed in the minutes of the preparatory commission for doctrinal questions (ibid. XLIX, 617–736). See also L. Orban, Theologia Güntheriana et Concilium Vaticanum, 2 vols. (Rome 1942–49) and, with respect to the atmosphere of this commission, the letters of the American consultant Corcoran, edited by J. Hennesey in CHR 48 (1962), 157–81.

In order to occupy the fathers during the time which the revision of the first doctrinal schema required, discussions were begun on the schemata concerning church discipline and the adaptation of canon law. Many of the fathers believed that this adaptation to the new circumstances of the nineteenth century was the principal task of the council. For this purpose, twenty-eight schemata or draft proposals had come from the disciplinary commission, even though most of them were of a picayune nature and failed to display any openness to the future or any pastoral imagination in the search for truly new formulations;[19] eighteen additional ones had been worked out by the commission dealing with the religious orders,[20] which thanks to the leadership of its authoritarian and effective president, Cardinal Bizzarri, had done fruitful work. Furthermore, the preparatory commission for the missions and the Churches of the Eastern Rite had prepared three schemata[21] and the commission for political-ecclesiastical problems had worked out eighteen schemata[22] which concerned topics of genuine interest and often were more timely than the ones which had been prepared by the commission for church discipline.[23] Only a few of the eighty-seven schemata were distributed to the fathers during the council and ultimately there was not enough time to pass even one of them.

For an entire month, beginning on 14 January, the first four schemata were debated.[24] Because no time limit existed, many fathers were tempted to lose themselves in details and to discuss purely local problems. Many also—misunderstanding the topic—confined themselves to tiresome homilies concerning the sanctity of priests and the ecclesiastical spirit, which of course did not help progress at all. A number of interjections were of interest, however. Some of the Eastern bishops, for example, raised the question, one which did not seem to have occurred to anyone, as to what extent the disciplinary schemata were relevant to the Eastern Churches. Once again it was realized that seemingly quite neutral questions could involve ecclesiology. This became even more evident in the course of the discussions of the fourth project, dealing with the expediency of the drawing up of a universal catechism which was to take the place of the numerous diocesan catechisms: the proposal, which had not originated with the Roman Curia, was viewed as a sign of mistrust of the bishops.[25]

---

[19] Text in Mansi LIII, 721–81; minutes of the discussions in the preparatory commission, ibid. XLIX, 748–932.

[20] Mansi LIII, 783–854; minutes, ibid. XLIX, 940–79.

[21] Mansi LIII, 45–61, 893–914; minutes, ibid. XLIX, 985–1162.

[22] Mansi LIII, 854–94. The pertinent minutes are no longer extant; some documents, ibid XLIX, 1171–1211 and in addition some indications in the diary and the correspondence of the consultant Moufang, edited by L. Lenhart in AMrhKG 3 (1951), 323–54, 9 (1957), 227–58.

[23] Especially those "de pauperum operariorumque miseria sublevanda" (Mansi LIII, 867–72).

[24] "De episcopis, de synodis et de vicariis generalibus" and "De sede episcopali vacante" (Mansi L, 339–52; 359–518); "De vita et honestate clericorum" (ibid., 517–22, 522–700); "De parvo catechismo" (ibid., 699–702, 703–853).

The dissatisfaction of many fathers with this proposal was aggravated by the distribution on 21 January of the constitutional draft "De Ecclesia Christi."[26] The draft had its good qualities—the patristic sources of its chief author, Clemens Schrader, were clearly discernible—but it also had regrettable weaknesses, especially in the disproportional number of passages devoted to the episcopate and to the papacy, a deficiency which was noted with regret even by some members of the majority. The final chapters as well, concerning the relationship between Church and state, were rejected by many because of strongly theocratic views offensive to the modern mind.[27]

Work on the schema on rationalism, which had been revised by Kleutgen, was resumed on March 18, after the sessions had been interrupted for three weeks to make needed improvements in the acoustics. The new version[28] was favorably received by the fathers, and only small details needed to be ironed out. Aside from a violent incident, caused by the passionate remarks of Monsignor Stroßmayer, and some complaints about the unseemly hurry with which ballots were taken on requests for amendments, the discussions took place in an atmosphere of equanimity. On 24 April the council, despite the last-minute hesitation of the most mistrustful of the minority, solemnly and unanimously approved the first dogmatic document, the constitution Dei Filius.[29] It opposed pantheism, materialism, and modern rationalism with a compact and enlightened presentation of the Catholic doctrine concerning God, revelation, and the faith. For almost a century it was to be the basis of standard theological textbooks.

---

[25] The revised text of this schema was again discussed by the fathers from 29 April until 13 May (Mansi LI, 454–85) and accepted with 491 placet votes against 56 non placet and 44 placet juxta modum votes, but was never officially promulgated. The majority of the fathers were particularly receptive to the reference to the disadvantages of the multiplicity of the catechisms in a world which evinced strong population movements from rural areas to industrial cities and from Europe to other parts of the world. But some opponents of the draft, such as Dupanloup for France and Rauscher for the German-speaking countries, pointed out that, aside from the respect for the episcopal magisterial office, circumstances needed to be considered which demanded the adaptation of catechisms to the prevailing situations in the various areas.

[26] Text in Mansi LI, 539–636. Observations by the fathers, ibid., 731–930. See F. Van der Horst, Das Schema über die Kirche auf dem 1. Vatikanischen Konzil (Paderborn 1963).

[27] See C. Colombo, "La Chiesa e la società civile nel Concilio Vaticano I," SC 89 (1961), 323–43.

[28] Text in Mansi LI, 31–38; minutes of the discussions of the commission, ibid. LIII, 177–94; speeches at the sessions, ibid. LI, 42–426.

[29] Text in Mansi LI, 429–36. Among the historio-theological commentaries see especially A. Vacant, Études théologiques sur les constitutions du concile du Vatican, 2 vols. (Paris

Agitation concerning Papal Infallibility

While inside the council auditorium texts were prudently debated which caused little excitement, outside of it the discussions concerning infallibility, which soon became the center of attention, were in full sway. During the last days of December, Manning, Dechamps, and some German-speaking bishops began to circulate a petition which asked the Pope to put the item on the council agenda. The preparatory commission, however, was not disposed to placing the issue on the agenda itself. During January the petition was signed by more than four hundred fifty people.[30]

This maneuver, organized by a group acting independently from the Curia, was the occasion for the opponents of the definition to organize resistance from among splinter groups which had not yet clearly articulated their views. Monsignor Dupanloup labored under the illusion that his appearance alone would suffice to make him the center of the various discontented groups, but even the feverish activity in which he plunged himself after his arrival in Rome had only very limited success.[31] The actual leader of the minority was a layman, John Acton. As a historian he shared with his teacher Döllinger the objections to the new proposed dogma, but even more than Döllinger he feared the potential indirect consequences on the future development of Catholicism in a society whose preoccupation with the idea of freedom was growing. The recent publication of Acton's correspondence with Döllinger has confirmed the assertions of the English diplomat Odo Russell concerning the preeminent role played by the young English lord in the organizatin of the council minority. Thanks to his numerous international connections and his linguistic abilities he was largely responsible for the fact that at the very beginning of the council the most important leaders of the opposition, many of whom hardly knew one another, were brought together. His acquaintance with parliamentary procedure allowed him to point out to them the possibility of joint action, suggest several operations to them, draw their attention to several intrigues which were being hatched in the opposing camp, supply them with historical documents 1895), to be supplemented and corected by De doctrina Concilii Vaticani Primi (Vatican City 1969), 3–281 and H. Pottmeyer, Der Glaube vor dem Anspruch der Wissenschaft (Freiburg i. Br. 1968).

---

[30] List in Mansi LI, 650–63.

[31] R. Aubert in Miscellanea historiae ecclesiasticae (Louvain 1961), 96–116.

for the buttressing of their position, and play the role of mediator between the leaders of the minority and several foreign governments. It was due to his initiative that together with Archbishop Haynald—a member of the Hungarian House of Lords and therefore also familiar with parliamentary practices—an international committee was formed which was to guarantee the collaboration of the various opposition groups. Several times a week it served as a meeting place for about ten Austrian, German, French, British, Italian, and American bishops. The committee circulated a counterpetition which demanded from the Pope that he forego the definition of his infallibility. The counterproposal garnered 136 signatures, i.e., one-fifth of the assembled fathers.[32] It did not, however, prevent Pius IX from deciding on 1 March to include a formal definition of the infallibility of the Pope in the draft of the "Dogmatic Constitution of the Church."

The leaders of the minority did not confine themselves to increased personal contacts with those fathers whom they hoped to win for their cause. Convinced of the disastrous consequences for the Church of the proposed definition, and believing that they were justified in using all possible means of preventing it, some of them thought it advisable to mobilize public opinion in the hope that it would exert the necessary pressure on the council leaders from the outside. Several Roman salons turned into veritable snake pits of intrigue in the service of this or that view, for the proponents of the definition quickly, with the agreement of the Vatican, imitated the tactics of their opponents. But if in this still very aristocratic society the salons occupied a very important place, the newspapers constituted an even more potent instrument. Both camps tried to enlist the press, especially as the interest of the public in the affairs of the council had become evident.

Among the journalist polemics, particularly those of Louis Veuillot in favor of the definition and those of Monsignor Dupanloup in opposition to it, the "Roman Letters" assumed a special place. Döllinger published them in the Allgemeine Zeitung of Augsburg under the pseudonym of Quirinus. As a kind of council chronicle they were designed, by way of a tendentious depiction of participants and events, to discredit from the beginning all the decisions at which the assembly might arrive. Acton supplied Döllinger with the necessary information,[33] which he received from some bishops who did not consider the obligation of secrecy, which the Pope had unilaterally decreed, as binding.

---

[32] List in Mansi LI, 677–86.

[33] The considerable contributions of Acton's to the "Römische Briefe," which had been suspected, was made clear by V. Conzemius (JEH 20 [1969], 267–94; ThQ 140 [1960], 428–32; RQ 59 [1964], 186–229, 60 [1965], 78–119), who also succeeded in differentiating the concepts of the two men, who, both searching for the best method to serve the cause of the minority, grew more and more apart. See also D. McElrath, op. cit.

The feuds of the press were augmented on both sides by continuing publications of brochures which, like those of Dechamps or Gratry, were identified by name, but which more often remained anonymous. There were also attempts by some members of the minority to enlist the support of the governments in Vienna, Munich, London, and especially Paris. Everyone was aware of the tremendous weight of Napoleon III, whose military and diplomatic support was absolutely essential for the survival of the remnants of the Pope's temporal power.[34] The various attempts by some bishops to cause their governments to intervene were a failure with respect to placing the item of papal infallibility on the agenda, but it can justifiably be assumed that they were not quite without influence. Cardinal Antonelli was in any case concerned with the matter, but now the attention of several members of the Curia and a number of the majority moderates was drawn to the influence which the agitation occasioned by the proposed definition had in the secular world on the discussions concerning the legitimacy of modern freedoms and the right of the Church to intervene in civil affairs. An effort was made to restrict the question of infallibility to the strictly doctrinal area in order to dispel the worries of any who were afraid that, once the Pope was acknowledged as infallible, he would be in the position, as one of them said, "in the future to decree [as infallible] any syllabus, even the most controvertible one."

With public and governmental concern growing on the fringe of the council, the assembly continued its work; but it soon became clear that, considering the speed with which progress was made, the chapter dealing with the primacy and the infallibility of the Pope would reach the discussion stage in the following spring at the earliest. Therefore, new petitions in March demanded that this chapter, which greatly disturbed the council, be dealt with immediately after the conclusion of the discussion on the constitution concerning rationalism. Although three out of the five council presidents were reluctant to do so because they did not wish to anger the minority,[35] Pius IX, whose irritation with the opposition was growing, decided in favor of the petition.

---

[34] On the political aspects of the council see: for France, E. Ollivier, op. cit., to be supplemented by J. Gadille, A. du Boÿs. L'intervention du gouvernement impérial à Vatican I (Louvain 1968) and de Montclos, 446–70; for Austria, Engel-Janosi I, 156–70; for Germany, E. Weinzierl-Fischer in MÖSTA 10 (1957), 302–21; for England, A. Randall in Dublin Review 479 (1959), 37–56 and especially D. McElrath, op. cit., 141–83; for Switzerland, V. Conzemius in Schweizerische Zeitschrift für Geschichte 15 (1965), 204–27.

[35] Their moderation, especially that of Cardinal Bilio, was clearly demonstrated by M. Maccarrone, op. cit. The intransigence of Cardinal Capalti, on the other hand, becomes clear from his Diario, recently published by L. Pásztor.

The Constitution Pastor Aeternus

In order to gloss over the extraordinary procedure involved in giving chapter 11 priority, it was decided to reformulate it in such a way that it became a small constitution, especially devoted to the Pope.[36] The discussion was opened on 13 May by the moderate expert opinion of Monsignor Pie. The general discussion, even at this early stage, essentially reduced itself to a debate of the expediency of the definition and in places was conducted with great passion. After about fifteen sessions, in which the presentations of Manning and Dechamps and the criticisms of Hefele, Stroßmayer, Maret, and Darboy stood out, the assembly proceeded to a discussion of the details of the text. It was especially concerned with the fourth chapter, which contained a definition of papal infallibility which the commission had already improved, but which failed to take sufficient account of the legitimate role of the episcopate, in addition to the Pope and in conjunction with him, as part of the supreme magisterial office of the Church. Fifty-seven members addressed the measure, presenting theological arguments and historical difficulties, and pointing up the practical advantages and disadvantages of a definition under the prevailing conditions. These often tiring debates, which took place in increasingly unbearably hot weather, at least permitted more precise formulations and removed some obstacles. A few suggestions stood out from the monotony of the debates, such as the formula which Rauscher had proposed on the very first day as a basis for compromise between majority and minority; it was taken from the formula suggested by S. Antonin of Florence in the fifteenth century.[37] There was also the proposal by Ketteler, who, in keeping with his views of the corporative constitution of the Church, insisted on the necessary cooperation between the Pope and his natural advisers, the bishops; and there was especially the proposal by the Dominican Cardinal Guidi, whom Pius IX rewarded with severe reproaches for his pains.[38]

In the meantime the negotiations in the hallways outside of the auditorium had grown in intensity and it was hoped that a compromise formula could be found which would prevent the divisions within the assembly from becoming known to the public. Indeed, many defenders of infallibility in the meantime had acquired a better grasp of the complexity of the problem and the necessity of greater differentiation, while the opponents learned that the faith of the Church in this matter was broader and firmer than many of them had thought at the beginning. But primarily the greatest part of the fathers—standing between the two extremes of the enthusiasts of the majority and the diehards—basically consisted of moderates for whom all of the agitation was painful and deeply worrisome. Far from being intent on the destruction of the opponents, they desired only to find a middle ground on which a compromise was possible. This was especially true for the majority of the Italians, who constituted one-third of the council participants and who had not taken a definite position in the initial maneuvering to include the infallibility issue on the agenda. By dint of their numbers they lent decisive support to the informal compromise faction. This group, conciliatory from the outset, finally succeeded in having a more flexible formula accepted, which occupied a middle ground between the neo-ultramontane and the anti-Curial extremists, and which allowed for adjustments in the future. It is quite likely that an even greater portion of the minority would have voted for the ultimately adopted solution if Pius IX, who in the course of the last months had intervened increasingly openly in favor of the definition,[39] had not been so intransigent.

---

[36] The various developmental phases of the text and the discussion in the public session as well as in the commission in Mansi LII, 4–1253, LIII, 240–83.

[37] Concerning this formula, often mentioned in these debates, see U. Betti in Memorie domenicane 76 (1959), 173–92.

[38] On the speech and the reactions to it, see M. Maccarrone, op. cit. I, 424–232.

Whatever the extent of his personal responsibility, it is a fact that the attempts at achieving a reconciliation with the opponents failed, in spite of the good impression made by the summary which Monsignor Gasser had prepared in the name of the theological commission. It was an authorized commentary which even today is of essential importance in grasping the nuances of the council text.[40] In the preliminary balloting, 451 placet votes were cast, together with 88 non placet and 62 placet juxta modum votes. Hoping that the size of the opposition would provide a reconsideration, the minority made a final appeal to Pius IX in order to obtain the elimination of a controverted expression in the canon concerning papal primacy and the addition of a few words in the definition of the infallibility of the Pope which would imply the close cooperation of the Pope with the Church as a whole. But Pius IX, who was pressured in the opposite direction by the extremists of the majority, proved unyielding and inflexible. For this reason about sixty bishops decided to leave Rome before the final vote in order to avoid having to cast their non placet in front of a Pope who was personally affected by the issue. The other members of the minority believed that, despite the inclusion of an unfortunate phrase which designated the Pope infallible

---

[39] C. Butler already demonstrated several instances of exertion of pressure by Pius IX. M. Maccarrone (op. cit., especially 350–52, 395, 409–13, 464–77), by using hitherto ignored documents, has shown more precisely how Pius IX repeatedly during the final negotiations intervened personally on behalf of the ultras among the majority.

[40] Mansi LII, 1204–30.

"ex sese, non autem ex consensu Ecclesiae"[41]—designed to dispel the slightest suspicion of Gallicanism—the most serious objections had been removed as a result of the various textual improvements and Monsignor Gasser's commentary. They decided to approve the final version, which on 18 July was solemnly and almost unanimously passed by the members present.[42]

During the subsequent weeks the council continued its work at a slower pace; because of the heat and of the Franco-Prussian War, most of the fathers left Rome during the summer. The occupation of Rome by Italian troops on 20 September terminated the council, and on 20 October the Pope announced its adjournment sine die.

The end of the debates, however, did not produce an immediate acquiescence. Agitation continued for some time[43] and there occurred some regrettable apostasies, especially in the German-speaking countries. Led by university professors who took their cue from Döllinger, the so-called Old Catholic schism came into existence. Among the bishops of the minority some, like Hefele and Stroßmayer, hesitated for a while, but ultimately none of them denied his approval of the new dogma.

---

[41] On the precise meaning of this phrase, see G. Dejaifve in Salesianum 24 (1962), 283–95 and H. Fries in Volk Gottes. Festgabe J. Höfer (Freiburg i. Br. 1967), 480–500.
[42] Text in Mansi LII, 1330–34. Among the historio-theological commentaries see especially U. Betti, La costituzione dommatica "Pastor aeternus" (Rome 1961); G. Thils, Primauté pontificale et prerogatives épiscopales. "Potestas ordinaria" au concile du Vatican (Louvain 1961); U. Betti, L'infaillibilité pontificale (Gembloux 1969); U. Betti, De doctrina Concilii Vaticani I (Vatican City 1969), 285–575.
[43] Aubert, Pie IX, 359–67, 546f.

CHAPTER 23

The Rise of the Old Catholic Community

The internal Catholic protest movement against the dogma of the universal episcopate and the infallibility of the Pope spread after the summer of 1870, especially in Germany and Switzerland. It experienced several stages, and contrary to the initial intentions of its leaders culminated in the establishment of its own Church. The nucleus was formed by the university theology professors Döllinger, Johannes Friedrich, and J. A. Messmer of Munich, G. J. Hilgers, F. P. Knoodt, J. Langen, and Franz Heinrich Reusch of Bonn, Johann Baptist Baltzer, Joseph Hubert Reinkens, and T. Weber of Breslau, A. Menzel and Friedrich

Michelis of Braunsberg, Eduard Herzog of Lucerne, and a layman, the Prague canonist and legal historian J. F. von Schulte. Sectarian radicalism, which had characterized German Catholicism, was at first alien to the professors. They regarded themselves as conservatives adhering to the old Catholic faith in the face of erroneous innovations;[1] some of them had been close to Günter's theology.

At the council, primarily historical objections had been raised against the doctrine of infallibility and the way it was dealt with. The protesting theologians were now joined by some noted historians who as Catholics in a liberal age had earned their right to academic equality. Among them were F. W. Kampschulte and C. A. von Cornelius with his students A. von Druffel, M. Ritter, and F. Stieve.

The professors were joined virtually only by academicians and middle-class citizens. Some of them were guided by the same religious and scholarly impulses, others more by a religious liberalism which had begun to split away from the Church even before 1870. This burdened the movement as much as the nationalism of many of its members which reflected the climate of the founding of the German Empire. Old Catholicism was and remained an elitist movement; in the 1870s it reached its peak in Germany with about sixty thousand members. After all, the Catholic masses and their organizations had contributed to the development which culminated in the Vatican Council; after the annexation of the Papal State they felt even more impelled to stand by the imperiled Pope. The political leaders, who prior to 1869 had warned against the dogma, also made their peace with the decrees of the council.

In August 1870 more than one thousand three hundred Rhenish Catholics protested against the council; in Nuremberg thirty-two professors appealed to an "ecumenical council, true and free, and therefore to be held not in Italy but on this side of the Alps."[2] Expectations of support by the episcopate diminished when at the end of August the majority in Fulda agreed on a pastoral letter, temperately defending council and dogma;[3] they disappeared totally only in April 1871, when Hefele as the last German bishop published the council decrees.[4]

---

[1] Cf. the statement by the Bonn professor Reusch: "Our Catholic conscience forbids us the acceptance of the two doctrines because in word and tradition they contradict the old Church to which we are connected as Catholic priests." Conzemius, Katholizismus ohne Rom, 63.

[2] The texts of the protest declarations: CollLac VII, 1731f.

[3] Text: CollLac VII, 1733ff.; Butler-Lang, 455–58; Lill, Bischofskonferenzen, 95–112.

[4] Some of the opponents of the dogma who were willing to act only in conjunction with the bishops thereupon withdrew from the movement, such as the dogmatist Kuhn (Tübingen) and Dieringer (Bonn), who resigned from his teaching position.

The agitation over council and dogma, in which the entire liberal press took the side of the opponents, experienced a renewed intensification after the temporary diversion of the Franco-German War. The reason was that several bishops after the fall of 1870 proceeded against the opponents of the council by withholding the missio canonica, suspension, excommunication, and denial of the sacraments. The victims appealed to the state for assistance. The governments granted them protection and guaranteed them the continuation of temporal and ecclesiastical offices; the ensuing feud with the bishops led to the Kulturkampf.

In September 1870 the first congress of Old Catholics was held in Munich with three hundred delegates from Germany, Switzerland, and Austria. The participation of guests from the Orthodox and Anglican Churches and the small Utrecht Church signified not only the joint opposition to Rome which the Vatican Council had intensified, but also a novel ecumenical content which Döllinger and his friends consciously promoted by appealing to the common Christian tradition of old. Döllinger's program underscored the conservative nature of the protest movement and claimed for it the right to continued equal membership in the Catholic Church. Döllinger passionately advised against division, and he himself never formally joined the Old Catholic Church. Schulte, Friedrich, Michelis, and Reinkens, on the other hand, called for the establishment of an emergency community, and the majority of the congress participants agreed with them.

In Rome, the momentous decision, which, like the whole movement, confirmed old prejudices against the German professors, determined future development. At first local Catholic Associations were formed. The Second Congress in 1872 in Cologne, which officially adopted the name "Old Catholic," decided to establish regular pastoral care and appointed a commission for the preparation of the election of a bishop. On 14 June 1871 the Breslau professor Joseph Hubert Reinkens was chosen. He was consecrated by a bishop of the Utrecht Church[5] and thus entered into the apostolic succession.[6]

Reinkens, placed under interdict by Pius IX, established an episcopal administration in Bonn, assisted by Reusch as vicar general. He was acknowledged as a Catholic bishop by Prussia, Baden, and Hessen-Darmstadt; legislation passed in these states during the Kulturkampf assured the Old Catholics of their share of Catholic Church property and use of Catholic churches.[7] Only to the extent that the Kulturkampf was acknowledged as a mistake and was dismantled after 1878 did the support of the states flag; earlier than other proponents of the Kulturkampf, Bismarck recognized that as an ally against Rome Old Catholicism was too weak.

---

[5] The consecration followed the rite prescribed in the Pontificale Romanum.

[6] Reinkens perpetuated the succession. In 1876 he consecrated E. Herzog as bishop and in 1895 his vicar general T. Weber, who one year later became his successor.

The constitution drafted by Schulte according to old Christian models granted legislative powers and the right to elect bishops to the synods, formed of representatives of the clergy and laymen. After approval by the Third Congress in 1873 in Constance, it was ratified by the first synod in 1874 in Bonn. The synods of the subsequent years with respect to doctrine remained based on the undivided Church of the first millenium; tempered and timely reforms were introduced into worship and after 1880 German was employed in the liturgy of the Mass. Against the will of Reinkens, Reusch and other fellow champions, liberal forces in 1879 succeeded in abolishing celibacy.

In Switzerland, where the conditions were particularly favorable, Reinkens and Michelis actively participated in the establishment of a Church. In 1875 the first synod gathered in Olten and established the "Christ Catholic Church of Switzerland." In doctrine it followed the German model, in its constitution it was more democratic. In 1876 Eduard Herzog was elected bishop and during almost fifty years of work established a Church oriented to Bible and Eucharist. The theological university established in 1874 in Berne by the government as an instrument in the Kulturkampf, with Herzog's authoritative assistance grew into a considerable theological center which after the turn of the century was influential far beyond the borders of Switzerland.[8] The reason for this was that the German leadership came to an end with the expiration of the outstanding scholarship of that generation. All attempts to maintain the theological faculty at Bonn, which, except for one member, was totally Old Catholic, failed; after the death of Reusch (1900) and Langen (1901) the remaining chairs were filled again with Catholics.[9]

In Austria, where the government remained passive and where the bishops, especially Rauscher, avoided a confrontation by extremely lenient treatment, the protest movement developed very slowly. After 1872 there existed four Old Catholic communities, to be officially recognized by the state in 1877. An increase occurred during the 1890s in consequence of the more nationally than religiously inspired Away-from-Rome Movement. In 1879 its first synod took place and it adopted the German patterns. After 1881 the small Church, whose constitution was also drafted by Schulte, was guided by an episcopal administrator.

---

[7] The Catholic bishops refused this arrangement and under protest stopped services in the churches allotted to the Old Catholics.

[8] Since 1893 the department has issued the scholarly quarterly Internationale kirchliche Zeitschrift (until 1910 Revue Internationale de Théologie).

[9] In 1902 a chair for Old Catholic theology was created at the University of Bonn, directly responsible to the university president.

The Old Catholic bishoprics and the Utrecht Church, which prior to 1870 had been totally isolated, in 1889 formed the Union of Utrecht. It is an autonomous union of national Churches free from Rome, whose honorary primate is the archbishop of Utrecht. A joint declaration again accepted the faith of the first millenium and the kind of Roman primacy which then prevailed. It repeated the protest against the dogmas of 1854 and 1870, as well as its readiness for the "removal of the differences existing since the schism."[10] Döllinger's internationally recognized scholarship and his ecumenical efforts[11] in 1874–75 resulted in the Bonn conferences of union consisting of Old Catholic, Russian Orthodox, and Anglican theologians. In the nineteenth century they were a bold attempt at interdenominational theological discussions and thus a precursor to ecumenism, in the service of which the future international congresses of Old Catholics placed themselves. But the practical result of the conferences was small; they suffered from their small basis and from the resentful and antiecumenical polemics against Rome, which for a long time characterized Old Catholicism.

---

[10] On the future development of Old Catholicism, which in the countries of its roots has declined but which as a consequence of the adherence of new national Churches (Poland, U.S.A.) has grown in absolute terms, see Algermissen, op. cit; Conzemius, Katholizismus ohne Rom, 55, 68ff., 79ff., 81–102; K. Algermissen in LThK I, 398–402; W. Küppers in RGG I, 295–99.

[11] After Döllinger grew out of the combative attitude of his earlier years, theological scholarship and ecumenical interest were essentially one to him. At the Munich assembly of scholars he characterized the impartial examination of denominational doctrinal differences as an urgent task of theology.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

GENERAL BIBLIOGRAPHY

I. GENERAL HISTORY

WORLD HISTORY: O. Westphal, Weltgeschichte der Neuzeit. 1750–1950 (Stuttgart 1953); F. Valjaveč, ed., Historia Mundi IX and X (Berne 1961); G. Mann, ed., Propyläen-Weltgeschichte VII and VII (Berlin 1960); D. K. Fieldhouse, Die Kolonialreiche seit dem 18. Jahrhundert (Fischer-Weltgeschichte 29), (Frankfurt am Main 1965); G. N. Clark, ed., The New Cambridge Modern European History VII, IX, and X (Cambridge 1960, 1960, 1965).

EUROPE: B. Croce, History of Europe in the 19th Century (New York 1963); W. Mommsen, Geschichte des Abendlandes von der Französischen Revolution bis zur Gegenwart, 1789–1945 (Munich 1951); H. Herzfeld, Die moderne Welt. 1789–1945, 2 vols. (Braunschweig 1966); L. Salvatorelli, Storia del novecento (Florence 1957); C. Zaghi, Napoleone e Europa (Naples 1969); R. R. Palmer, The Age of Democratic Revolution, 2 vols. (Princeton 1959–64); M. Beloff, ed., L'Europe du XIX^e et du XX^e siècle I (Paris 1959); J. B. Duroselle, L'Europe de 1815 à nos jours. Vie politique et relations internationales (Nouvelle Clio 38), (Paris 1964); G. A. Craig, Europe since 1815 (Englewood 1966); G. Lefebvre, La Révolution Française (Peuples et Civilisations 13), (Paris 1968); G. Lefebvre, Napoléon (Peuples et Civilisations 14), (Paris 1953); F. Ponteil, L'Éveil des Nationalités et le Mouvement Libéral, 1815–1848 (Peuples et Civilisations 15), (Paris 1968); C. H. Pouthas, Démocraties et Capitalisme, 1848–1860 (Peuples et Civilisations 16), (Paris 1948); H. Hauser et al., Du Libéralisme à L'Impérialisme (Peuples et Civilisations 17), (Paris 1952); E. Weis, Der Durchbruch des Bürgertums, 1776–1847 (Propyläengeschichte Europas 4), (Frankfurt am Main 1978). T. Schieder, Staatensystem als Vormacht der Welt, 1848–1918 (Propyläengeschichte Europas 5), (Frankfurt am Main 1977); A. Sorel, L'Europe et la Révolution française, 8 vols. (Paris 1885–1911); J. L. Godechot, La grande nation. L'expansion révolutionnaire de la France dans le monde de 1789 à 1799, 2 vols. (Paris 1956); E. Naujoks, Die Französische Revolution und Europa (Stuttgart 1969); L. Bergeron, F. Furet, and R. Koselleck, Das Zeitalter der europäischen Revolution 1780–1848 (Fischer-Weltgeschichte 26), (Frankfurt am Main 1969); L. Salvatorelli, La rivoluzione europea. 1848–1849 (Milan 1949); P. Robertson, Revolutions of 1848 (New York 1960); A. J. P. Taylor, The Struggle for Mastery in Europe, 1848–1918 (Oxford 1954); C. Brinton, A Decade of Revolution, 1789–1799 (New York 1934); G. Bruun, Europe and the French Imperium, 1799–1814 (New York 1938); F. B. Artz, Reaction and Revolution, 1814–1832 (New York 1934); W. F. Langer, Political and Social Upheaval, 1832–1852 (New York 1969); R. C. Binkley, Realism and Nationalism, 1852–1871 (New York 1935).

FRANCE: Nouvelle histoire de la France, vols 1–10. Editions du Seuil (Paris 1972); P. Gaxotte, La Révolution française. Nouvelle edition avec Jean Tulard (Paris 1977); M. Vovelle, Religion et Révolution: La dechristianisation de l'An II (Paris 1976); P. H. Beik, The French Revolution Seen from the Right (New York 1970); J. N. Moody, French Education since Napoleon (Syracuse 1978); F. Furet and D. Richet, The French Revolution (London 1970); J. Godechot, The Counter-Revolution (New York 1971); G. de Bertier de Sauvigny, The Restoration (New York 1967); R. Rémond, La vie politique en France depuis 1789, 2 vols. (Paris 1965–69); R. Rémond, La Droite en France de 1815 à nos jours

(Paris 1963); J. L. Godechot, Les révolutions, 1770–1799 (Paris 1965); J. L. Godechot, L'Europe et l'Amérique à l'époque napoléonienne, 1800–1815 (Paris 1967); B. Groethuysen, Philosophie de la Révolution française (Paris 1956); I. Kaplow, ed., New Perspectives on the French Revolution (New York 1965); A. Gérard, La Révolution française, mythes et interprétations, 1799–1970 (Paris 1970); J. Chastenet, Histoire de la Troisième République, 7 vols. (Paris 1952–63); G. Dupeux, La Société française, 1789–1960 (Paris 1964); J. L. Godechot, Les institutions de la France sous la Révolution et l'Empire (Paris 1968); F. Ponteil, Les institutions de la France de 1814 à 1870 (Paris 1966); A. Prost, L'enseignement en France 1800–1967 (Paris 1968); L. Duguit, H. Monnier, R. Bonnard, Les constitutions et les principales lois politiques de la France depuis 1789 (Paris 1952); Le Moniteur Universel (1799–1868) and Journal officiel (Paris 1869seqq.) for legislation and parliamentary debates.

BELGIUM, NETHERLANDS, LUXEMBURG: S. Schama, Patriots and Liberators: Revolution in the Netherlands, 1780–1813 (New York 1977); C. H. E. De Wit, De Strijd tussen Aristocratie en Democratie in Nederland, 1780–1848 (Heerlen 1965); P. Gerin, S. Vervaeck, J. De Belder, J. Hannes, Bibliographie de l'histoire de Belgique, 1789–1914, 3 vols. (Louvain 1960–66); H. Pirenne, Histoire de Belgique VI/VII (Brussels 1926–32); J. Van Houtte, ed., Algemene Geschiedenis der Nederlanden VIII/XII (Antwerp and Zeist 1955–58); J. Deharveng, ed., Histoire de la Belgique contemporaine, 1830–1914, 3 vols. (Brussels 1928–30); T. Luykx, Politieke geschiedenis van Belgie van 1789 tot heden (Brussels 1969); A. Simon, Le parti catholique belge (Brussels 1958).

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL: M. Artola, Los origines de la España contemporanea, 2 vols. (Barcelona 1958); F. G. Bruguera, Histoire contemporaine d'Espagne. 1789–1950 (Paris 1953); R. Carr, Spain, 1808–1939 (Oxford 1966); M. Fernández Almagro, Historia política de la España contemporánea, 2 vols. (Madrid 1956–59); H. V. Livermore, A New History of Portugal (Cambridge 1966);

ITALY: C. Spellanzon, Storia del Risorgimento e dell'unità de'Italia, 5 vols. (Milan 1932–40); W. Maturi, Interpretazioni del Risorgimento (Turin 1962); L. Salvatorelli, Spiriti e figure del Risorgimento (Florence 1962); D. Mack Smith, Italy. A Modern History (Ann Arbor 1959).

GERMAN STATES AND SWITZERLAND: B. Gebhardt, H. Grundmann, Handbuch der deutschen Geschichte I and II (Stuttgart 1960); L. Just, ed., Handbuch der deutschen Geschichte III (Constance 1956); H. Holborn, A History of Modern Germany II and III (New York 1959); E. Marcks, Der Aufstieg des Reiches, 1807–78, 2 vols. (Stuttgart 1936); A. H. Springer, Geschichte Österreichs seit dem Wiener Frieden 1809, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1863–65); G. Mann, Deutsche Geschichte im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert (Frankfurt am Main 1966); A. Ramm, Germany, 1789–1919 (London 1967); T. S. Hamerow, Restoration, Revolution, Reaction. Economics and Politics in Germany, 1815–71 (Princeton 1958); H. Hantsch, Die Geschichte Österreichs II (Graz 1962); G. A. Craig, Germany, 1866–1945 (New York 1978); F. Schnabel, Deutsche Geschichte im 19. Jahrhundert, 4 vols. (Freiburg 1929–37); V. Valentin, Geschichte der deutschen Revolution von 1848–49, 2 vols. (Berlin 1930–31); R. Charmatz, Österreichs innere Geschichte von 1848 bis 1895, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1918); V. Bibl, Der Zerfall Österreichs, 2 vols. (Vienna 1922–24); H. v. Srbik, Deutsche Einheit, 4 vols. (Munich 1935–42); E. Fueter, Die Schweiz seit 1848 (Zurich 1928).

GREAT BRITAIN: G. M. Trevelyan, British History in the Nineteenth Century and after (London 1937); E. Halévy, History of the English People in the Nineteenth Century, 6 vols. (London 1949–52); L. Woodward, The Age of Reform, 1815–70 (Oxford History of England), (Oxford 1962).

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA: H. G. Dahms, Geschichte der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika (Munich 1953); E. Samhaber, Geschichte der Vereinigten Staaten von Nordamerika (Munich 1954); E. Angermann, "Die Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika," Historia Mundi X (1961), 253–331; R. Hofstadter, W. Miller, D. Aaron, W. Jordan, and L. Litwack, The United States (Englewood Cliffs 1976); J. A. Garraty, The American Nation (New York 1979); J. M. Blum, E. S. Morgan, W. L. Rose, A. M. Schlesinger, Jr., K. M. Stampp, C. Vann Woodward, The National Experience: A History of the United States (New York 1973); R. N. Current, T. H. Williams, F. Freidel, American History: A Survey (New York 1979); B. Bailyn, D. B. Davis, D. H. Donald, J. L. Thomas, R. H. Wiebe, G. S. Wood, The Great Republic: A History of the American People (Lexington, Mass. 1977).

LATIN AMERICA: S. de Madariaga, The Fall of the Spanish American Empire (London 1947); H. V. Livermore, ed., Portugal and Brazil (Oxford 1953); A. P. Whitaker, "Die iberoamerikanische Welt von 1825–1920," Historia Mundi X (1961), 332–57.

II. CHURCH HISTORY

1. GENERAL CHURCH HISTORY

L. A. Veit, Die Kirche im Zeitalter des Individualismus II: 1800 bis zur Gegenwart (Freiburg im Breisgau 1933); L. Rogier, R. Aubert, D. Knowles, Geschichte der Kirche IV (Einsiedeln 1966); E. E. Y. Hales, The Catholic Church in the Modern World. A Survey from the French Revolution to the present (London 1958); K. S. Latourette, Christianity in a Revolutionary Age. A History of Christianity in the 19th and 20th Centuries, 5 vols. (New York 1958–62); J. Lortz, Geschichte der Kirche in ideengeschichtlicher Betrachtung II (Münster 1964); L. Girard, Le catholicisme en Europe de 1814 à 1878 (Les Cours de Sorbonne), (Paris 1962); Daniel-Rops, L'Église des Révolutions, 2 vols. (Paris 1960–63); H. Hermelink, Das Christentum in der Menschheitsgeschichte von der Französischen Revolution bis zur Gegenwart, 3 vols. (Stuttgart 1951–55); K. D. Schmitt, Grundriß der Kirchengeschichte IV: Geschichte der Kirche im Zeitalter des Individualismus und des Säkularismus (Göttingen 1960); K. D. Schmitt, E. Wolf, Die Kirche in ihrer Geschichte. Ein Handbuch IV, Part 1; F. Heyer, Die katholische Kirche vom Westfälischen Frieden bis zum ersten Vatikanischen Konzil (Göttingen 1963); A. Fliche and V. Martin, Histoire de l'Église, vols. 20 and 21, (Paris 1949, 1964); K. Bihlmeyer and H. Tüchle, Church History, 3 vols. (New York 1979).

2. PAPACY

J. Schmidlin, Papstgeschichte der neuesten Zeit, 4 vols. (Munich 1933–39); F. X. Seppelt, G. Schwaiger, Geschichte der Päpste (Munich 1964); P. Paschini, P. Brezzi, I papi nella storia II (Rome 1961); C. Ledré, Un siècle sous la tiare. De Pie IX à Pie XII (Paris 1955); G. Mollat, La Question romaine de Pie VI à Pie XI (Paris 1932); V. Del Giudice, La Questione romana (Rome 1948); C. Berthelet, Conclavi pontifici e cardinali nel secolo XIX (Rome 1903); E. De Marchi, Le Nunziature apostoliche dal 1800 al 1956 (Rome 1957); Notizie dell'anno (until 1860); Annuario pontificio (1861–70, 1912seqq.); La Gerarchia cattolica (1872–1911).

3. THE HISTORY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN INDIVIDUAL COUNTRIES

GERMANY: H. Brück, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in Deutschland im 19. Jahrhundert (Mainz 1902–3); G. Goyau, L'Allemagne religieuse. Le Catholicisme, 4 vols. (Paris 1905–9); F. Schnabel, Deutsche Geschichte im 19. Jahrhundert IV: Die religiösen Kräfte (Freiburg i. Br. 1937); P. Funk, Von der Aufklärung zur Romantik (Munich 1925); F. Heyer, Die katholische Kirche von 1648 bis 1870 (Göttingen 1963); H. Schrörs, Die Kölner Wirren. Studien zu ihrer Geschichte (Berlin and Bonn 1927); H. Bastgen, Die Verhandlungen zwischen dem Berliner Hof und dem Heiligen Stuhl über die konfessionell gemischten Ehen (Paderborn 1936); H. Bastgen, Die Besetzung der Bischofssitze in Preußen in der ersten Hälfte des 19. Jahrhunderts, 2 parts (Paderborn 1941); R. Lill, Die Beilegung der Kölner Wirren (Düsseldorf 1962); J. -B. Kißling, Geschichte der deutschen Katholikentage, 3 vols. (Münster 1920–21); R. Lill, Die ersten deutschen Bischofskonferenzen (Freiburg i. Br. 1964); A. K. Huber, Kirche und deutsche Einheit im 19. Jahrhundert (Königstein 1966); K. Buchheim, Ultramontanismus und Demokratie. Der Weg der deutschen Katholiken im 19. Jahrhundert (Munich 1963); K. Bachem, Vorgeschichte, Geschichte und Politik der deutschen Zentrumspartei I (Cologne 1927, reprint Aalen 1967); F. Hanus, Die preußische Vatikangesandtschaft, 1747–1920 (Munich 1954); G. Franz-Willing, Die bayerische Vatikangesandtschaft, 1803–1934 (Munich 1965); F. Engel-Janosi, Österreich und der Vatikan 1846–1918 I (Graz, Vienna and Cologne 1958); R. Hacker, Die Beziehungen zwischen Bayern und dem Heiligen Stuhl in der Regierungszeit Ludwigs I. (Tübingen 1967); H. Schiel, Johann Michael Sailer, 2 vols. (Regensburg 1948–52); W. Schellberg, Johann Görres (Cologne 1926); J. Janssen, Friedrich Leopold Graf zu Stolberg (Freiburg i. Br. 1877); E. Hosp, Hofbauer (Vienna 1951); R. Till, Hofbauer und sein Kreis (Vienna 1951); O. Pfülf, Kardinal Johannes von Geissel, 2 vols. (Freiburg i. Br. 1895–96); L. Lenhart, Bischof Ketteler, 3 vols. (Mainz 1966–68); L. v. Pastor, August Reichensperger, 2 vols. (Freiburg i. Br. 1899); F. Schmidt, Peter Reichensperger (Mönchen-Gladbach 1913); S. J. Schäffer, J. Dahl, Adolf Kolping (Cologne 1961); J. Friedrich, Ignaz von Döllinger, 3 vols. (Munich 1899–1901).

AUSTRIA: F. Engel-Janosi, Österreich und der Vatikan, 2 vols. (Graz 1958–60); F. Engel-Janosi, Die politische Korrespondenz der Päpste mit den österreichischen Kaisern 1804–1918 (Vienna 1964); J. Grisar, De historia Ecclesiae catholicae austriacae saeculi XIX (Rome 1936); A. Hudal, Die österreichische Vatikanbotschaft 1806–1918 (Munich 1952); C. Wolfsgruber, Joseph Otmar von Rauscher (Vienna 1888); C. Wolfsgruber, Kardinal Schwarzenberg, 3 vols. (Vienna 1905–17).

FRANCE: A. Latreille, L'Église catholique et la révolution française, 2 vols. (Paris 1950); G. Bourgin, "Les sources manuscrites de l'histoire religieuse de la France moderne," RHEF 10 (1924), 27–66, 172–206, 333–58, 466–92; J. Gadille, "Les sources privées de l'histoire contemporaine du catholicisme en France," RH 238 (1967), 333–46; G. Weill, "Le catholicisme français au XIX^e^ siècle," Revue de synthèse historique 15 (1907), 319–56; A. Latreille, J. -R. Palanque, É. Delaruelle, R. Rémond, Histoire du catholicisme en France III (Paris 1962); W. Gurian, Die politischen und sozialen Ideen des französischen Katholizismus, 1789–1914 (Freiburg i. Br. 1929); A. Dansette, Histoire religieuse de la France contemporaine, 2 vols. (Paris 1948/51); A. Debidour, Histoire des rapports de l'Église et de l'État en France de 1789 à 1870, 2 vols. (Paris 1891); A. Debidour, L'Église catholique et l'État sous la III^e Republique, 1870–1906, 2 vols. (Paris 1906); A. Rivet, Traité du culte catholique et des lois civiles d'ordre religieux (Paris 1947); J. Brugerette, Le prêtre français et la société contemporaine, 3 vols. (Paris 1933–38); F. Boulard, Essor ou déclin du clergé français (Paris 1950); L. Baunard, L'Épiscopat français depuis le Concordat jusqu'à la Séparation (Paris 1907); L. Baunard, Un siècle de l'Église de France, 1800–1900 (Paris 1901); L. Grimaud, Histoire de la liberté d'enseignement en France, 6 vols. (Grenoble and Paris 1944–54); P. Nourisson, Histoire légale des congrégations religieuses en France depuis 1789, 2 vols. (Paris 1928); G. Le Bras, Études de sociologie religieuse, 2 vols. (Paris 1955–56); G. Weill, Histoire de l'idée laïque en France au XIX^e siècle (Paris 1929); A. Mellor, Histoire de l'anticléricalisme français (Paris 1966); P. Droulers, Action pastorale et problèmes sociaux sous la Monarchie de Juillet chez Monseigneur d'Astros (Paris 1954); E. Sevrin, Un évêque militant et gallican au XIX^e siècle, Monseigneur Clausel de Montals, 2 vols. (Paris 1955); F. Lagrange, Vie de Monseigneur Dupanloup, 3 vols. (Paris 1883–84); DHGE XIV, 1070–1122); A. de Falloux, Mémoires d'un royaliste, 2 vols. (Paris 1888); E. Veuillot, Le comte de Falloux et ses Mémoires (Paris 1888); C. de Ladoue, Monseigneur Gerbet, sa vie, ses œuvres, 3 vols. (Paris 1870); F. Gousset, Le cardinal Gousset (Besançon 1903); P. Delatte, Dom Guéranger, abbé de Solesmes, 2 vols. (Paris 1909–10); J. Paguelle de Follenay, Vie du cardinal Guibert, 2 vols. (Paris 1896); T. Foisset, Vie du R. P. Lacordaire, 2 vols. (Paris 1870); L. Baunard, Le cardinal Lavigerie, 2 vols. (Paris 1896); X. de Montclos, Lavigerie, le Saint-Siège et l'Église, 1846–78 (Paris 1965); G. Bazin, Vie de Monseigneur Maret, 3 vols. (Paris 1891–92); F. Besson, Vie de S. É. le cardinal Mathieu, 2 vols. (Paris 1882); J. Leflon, Eugène de Mazenod, 3 vols. (Paris 1896–1902); A. d'Andigné, Un apôtre de la charité, Armand de Melun (Paris 1962); E. Lecanuet, Montalembert, 3 vols. (Paris 1896–1902); C. Guillemant, P. -L. Parisis, 3 vols. (Paris 1916–25); L. Baunard, Histoire du cardinal Pie, 2 vols. (Paris 1893); C. -J. Destombes, Vie de S. É. le cardinal Régnier, 2 vols. (Paris 1885); M. de Hédouville, Monseigneur de Ségur, sa vie, son action (Paris 1957); F. Poujoulat, Vie de Monseigneur Sibour (Paris 1857); M. J. Rouet de Journel, Une russe catholique. La vie de Madame Swetchine (Paris 1953); E. and F. Veuillot, Louis Veuillot, 4 vols. (Paris 1902–13).

ITALY: Archiva Ecclesiae 3/4 (1960–61), 87–179, 223–87; Silvino da Nadro, O.F.M.Cap., Sinodi diocesani italiani. Catalogo bibliografico degli atti a stampa, 1574–1878 (Vatican City 1960); A. -C. Jemolo, Chiesa e Stato in Italia negli ultimi cento anni (Turin 1963); P. Scoppola, Chiesa e Stato nella storia d'Italia. Storia documentaria dall'Unità alla Repubblica (Bari 1967); P. Scoppola Dal Neoguelfismo alla Democrazia cristiana (Rome 1957); A. Della Torre, Il cristianesimo in Italia dai filosofisti ai modernisti (Milan 1912); G. De Rosa, Storia del movimento cattolico in Italia, 2 vols. (Bari 1966); I cattolici italiani dall'800 ad oggi (Brescia 1964); T. Chiuso, La Chiesa in Piemonte dal 1797 ai giorni nostri, 4 vols. (Turin 1888); T. Salvemini, La statistica ecclesiastica con speciale riguardo al clero in Italia (Ferrara 1941); G. Spini, Risorgimento e protestanti (Naples 1956); C. Castiglioni, Gaysruck e Romilli, arcivescovi di Milano (Milan 1938); C. Castiglioni, Monsignor Nazari di Calabiana (Milan 1952); E. Federici, Sisto Riario Sforza (Rome 1945); G. Russo, Il cardinale Sisto Riario Sforza e l'unità d'Italia (Naples 1962); J. E. Borrel, Vie de Monseigneur Charvaz (Chambéry 1909); P. Stella, Don Bosco nella storia della religiosità cattolica, 2 vols. (Zurich 1968–69); A. Castellani, Il b. Leonardo Murialdo, 2 vols. (Rome 1966–68).

SPAIN: J. del Burgo, Fuentes de la Historia de España. Bibliografia de las guerras carlistas y de las luchas políticas del siglio XIX, 4 vols. (Pamplona 1954–60); V. de la Fuente, Historia eclesiástica de España VI (Barcelona 1875); P. Gams, Die Kirchengeschichte von Spanien III/2 (Regensburg 1872, reprint Graz 1956); E. A. Peers, The Church in Spain, 1737–1937 (London 1938); E. A. Peers, Spain, the Church, and the Orders (London 1939); J. M. Cuenca, La Iglesia española ante la Revolución liberal (Madrid 1971); J. Becker, Relaciones diplomáticas entre España y la Santa Sede durante el siglio XIX (Madrid 1909); M. Menéndez y Pelayo, Historia de los heterodojos españoles VII (Madrid .1932).

BELGIUM: Sources de l'histoire religieuse de la Belgique. Époque contemporaine. Colloque de Bruxelles 1967 (Louvain 1968); A. Simon, Réunions des évêques de Belgique. Procès-verbaux, 1830–83, 2 vols. (Louvain 1960–61); A. Simon, Instructions aux nonces de Bruxelles, 1835–89 (Brussels 1961); R. Aubert, "Kirche und Staat in Belgien im 19. Jahrhundert," W. Conze, ed., Beiträge zur deutschen und belgischen Verfassungsgeschichte im 19. Jahrhundert (Stuttgart 1967); V. Mallinson, Power and Politics in Belgian Education, 1815–1961 (London 1963); A. Tihon, Le clergé et l'enseignement moyen pour garçons dans le diocèse de Malines, 1802–1914 (diss., Louvain 1970); "Prêtres de Belgique, 1838–1930," NRTh 57 (1930), 617–744; S. Scholl, ed., 150 jaar katholieke arbeidersbeweging in Belgie, 1789–1939, 3 vols. (Brussels 1963–66); N. Piepers, La "Revue générale" de 1865 à 1940 (Louvain 1968).

PORTUGAL: F. de Almeida, Historia da Igreja em Portugal IV, 1/4 (Coimbra 1917–23); M. de Oliveira, Historia eclesiástica de Portugal (Lisbon 1940).

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND: J. H. Whyte, "Historians of XIXth-century English Catholicism," Clergy Review 52 (1967), 791–801; G. A. Beck, ed., The English Catholics, 1850–1950 (London 1950); D. Mathew, Catholicism in England (London 1936); P. J. Corish, ed., A History of Irish Catholicism IV/V (Dublin 1968seqq.); A. Bellesheim, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in Schottland (Mainz 1883); P. Thureau-Dangin, La renaissance catholique en Angleterre au XIX^e siècle, 3 vols. (Paris 1899–1906); O. Chadwick, The Victorian Church, 2 vols. (London 1966–70); C. Butler, The Life and Times of Bishop Ullathorne, 2 vols. (London 1926); W. Ward, The Life and Times of Cardinal Wiseman, 2 vols. (London 1897); W. Ward, The Life of John Henry Cardinal Newman, 2 vols. (London 1912); E. Purcell, Life of Cardinal Manning, 2 vols. (London 1895).

THE NETHERLANDS: L. J. Rogier, N. De Rooy, In vrijheid herboren. Katholiek Nederland, 1853–1953 (The Hague 1957); P. Albers, Geschiedenes van het herstel der hiërarchie in de Nederlanden, 2 vols. (Nijmegen and The Hague 1903–04); A. Commissaris, Van toen wij vrij werden, 1795–1903, 2 vols. (Groningen 1929); J. Witlox, De Katholieke Staatspartij, 2 vols. ('s-Hertogenbosch 1919–27); J. A. De Kok, Nederland op de breuklijn Rome-Reformatie. Numerieke aspecten van protestantisering en katholieke herleving in de Noordelijke Nederlanden, 1580–1880 (Assen 1964).

SWITZERLAND: A. Büchi, Die katholische Kirche in der Schweiz (Munich 1902); T. Schwegler, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in der Schweiz (Stans 1945); K. Müller, Die katholische Kirche in der Schweiz seit dem Ausgang des 18. Jahrhunderts (Einsiedeln 1928); F. Strobel, Die Jesuiten und die Schweiz im 19. Jahrhundert (Olten 1954).

SCANDINAVIA: A. Palmqvist, Die römisch-katholische Kirche in Schweden nach 1781, 2 vols. (Upsala 1954–58); K. Kjelstrup, Norvegia catholica, 1843–1943 (Rome 1947); J. Metzler, Die apostolischen Vikariate des Nordens (Paderborn 1919).

RUSSIA AND POLAND: A. M. Ammann, Abriß der Ostslawischen Kirchengeschichte (Vienna 1950); A. Boudou, Le Saint-Siège et la Russie, 2 vols. (Paris 1922–25); E. Winter, Rußland und das Papsttum II (Berlin 1961); W. Urban, Ostatni etap dziejów Kościola w Polsce przed nowym tysiacleciem, 1815–1965 (Rome 1966); O. Beiersdorf, Papietswo wobec sprawy polskiej w latach 1772–1864 wybor źrodel (Wroclaw 1960); J. Wasilewski, Arcybiskupi i administratorowie archidiecezji Mohylowskiej (Pinsk 1930); J. A. Malinowski, Die deutschen katholischen Kolonien am Schwarzen Meere (Stuttgart 1927); S. Zaleski, Jezuici w Polsce V (Cracow 1907); J. Bjelogolovov, Akten und Dokumente in Bezug auf die Organisation und Verwaltung der römisch-katholischen Kirche in Rußland (St. Petersburg 1905); A. Welykyj, Documenta Pontificum Romanorum historiam Ukrainiae illustrantia II (Rome 1954); S. Olszamowska-Skowronska, La correspondance des papes et des empereurs de Russie (1814–78) selon les documents authentiques (Rome 1970).

Southeastern Europe and the Near East: G. G. Golubovich, Biblioteca bio-bibliografica della Terra Santa e dell'Oriente cristiano, 8 vols. (Karachi 1906–30); E. von Mülinen, Die lateinische Kirche im Türkischen Reiche (Berlin 1903); F. W. Hasluck, Christianity and Islam under the Sultans, 2 vols. (Oxford 1929); A. Schopoff, Les Réformes et la protection des chrétiens en Turquie, 1673–1904 (Paris 1904); G. Goyau, Le protectorat de la France sur les chrétiens de l'Empire ottoman (Paris 1895); J. Friedrich, Die christlichen Balkanstaaten in Vergangenheit und Gegenwart (Munich 1916); B. Rupčič, Entstehung der Franziskanerpfarreien in Bosnien und Herzegowina und ihre Entwicklung bis zum Jahre 1878 (Wroclaw 1937); I. Simrak, Graeco-catholica Ecclesia in Jugoslavia (Zagreb 1931); P. Tocanel, Storia della Chiesa cattolica in Romania III: Il Vicariato apostolico e le missioni dei Frati Minori Conventuali in Moldavia, 2 vols. (Padua 1960–65); K. Lübeck, Die katholische Orientmission in ihrer Entwicklung dargestellt (Cologne 1917); Hilaire de Barenton, O.F.M.Cap., La France catholique en Orient durant les trois derniers siècles (Paris 1912); Les jésuites en Syrie, 1831–1931 (Paris 1931); A. Posseto, Il patriarcato latino di Gerusalemme (Milan 1938); F. de Portu, Notice sur le diocèse de Smyrne et le vicariat apostolique de l'Asie Mineure (Smyrna 1908).

United States: J. T. Ellis, A Guide to American Catholic History (Milwaukee 1959); C. R. Fish, Guide to the Materials for American History in Roman and other Italian Archives (Washington 1911); T. McAvoy, "Catholic Archives and Manuscript Collections," The American Archivist 24 (1961), 409–14; P. Cadden, The Historiography of the American Catholic Church, 1785–1943 (Washington 1944); H. J. Browne, "American Catholic History, A Progress Report, Research and Study," CH 26 (1957), 372–80; J. G. Shea, History of the Catholic Church in the United States, 4 vols. (New York 1886–92); T. McAvoy, A History of the Catholic Church in the United States (Notre Dame 1969); J. T. Ellis, American Catholicism (Chicago 1956); L. Hertling, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in den Vereinigten Staaten (Berlin 1954); R. F. McNamara, "Etats-Unis," DHGE XV, 1109–47; A. Greeley, The Catholic Experience. An Interpretation of the History of American Catholicism (Garden City 1968); F. Kenneally, United States Documents in the Propaganda Fide Archives, 2 vols. (Washington 1966–68); J. T. Ellis, Documents of American Catholic History (Milwaukee 1956); D. Shearer, Pontificia Americana. A Documentary History of the Catholic Church in the United States, 1784–1884 (Washington 1933); P. Guilday, The National Pastorals of the American Hierarchy, 1792–1910 (Washington 1923); P. Guilday, A History of the Councils of Baltimore (New York 1932); E. Shaughnessy, Has the Immigrant kept the Faith? A Study of Immigration and Catholic Growth in the United States (New York 1925); J. A. Burns, The Growth and Development of the Catholic School System in the United States (New York 1912); J. A. Burns, J. Kohlbrenner, A History of Catholic Education in the United States (New York 1937); D. T. McColgan, A Century of Charity: the first one hundred Years of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul in the United States, 2 vols. (Milwaukee 1951); P. J. Dignan, A History of the Legal Incorporation of Catholic Property in the United States, 1784–1932 (Washington 1933); F. McDonald, The Catholic Church and the Secret Societies in the United States (New York 1946); R. Corrigan, Die Propaganda-Kongregation und ihre Tätigkeit in Nord-Amerika (Munich 1928); T. Roemer, The Ludwig-Missionsverein and the Catholic Church in the United States, 1838–1918 (Washington 1933); R. Clarke, Lives of Deceased Bishops of the Catholic Church in the United States, 3 vols. (New York 1888); J. B. Code, Dictionary of the American Hierarchy (New York 1940); R. Baudier, The Catholic Church in Louisiana

(New Orleans 1939); W. Casper, History of the Catholic Church in Nebraska, 3 vols. (Milwaukee 1960–66); R. Trisco, The Holy See and the Nascent Church in the Middle Western United States (Rome 1962); W. Schoenberg, A Chronicle of the Catholic Historiography of the Pacific Northwest, 1743–1960 (Spokane 1962); E. V. O'Hara, Pioneer Catholic History of Oregon (Portland 1907); C. Blanchard, History of the Catholic Church in Indiana, 2 vols. (Logansport 1898); H. H. Heming, The Catholic Church in Wisconsin (Milwaukee 1895–98); J. F. Kempker, History of the Catholic Church in Iowa (Iowa City 1887); J. H. Lamott, History of the Archdiocese of Cincinnati (New York 1921); M. J. Hynes, History of the Diocese of Cleveland (Cleveland 1953); G. Garraghan, The Catholic Church in Chicago (Chicago 1921); G. Paré, The Catholic Church in Detroit (Detroit 1951); J. Smith, The Catholic Church in New York, 2 vols. (New York 1905); L. J. Kirlin, Catholicity in Philadelphia (Philadelphia 1909); F. J. Magri, The Catholic Church in the City and Diocese of Richmond (Richmond 1906); J. H. Bailey, A History of the Diocese of Richmond, the Formative Years (Richmond 1956); J. E. Rothensteiner, History of the Archdiocese of St. Louis, 2 vols. (St. Louis 1928); J. M. Reardon, The Catholic Church in the Diocese of St. Paul (St. Paul 1952); F. Parkman, The Jesuits in North America (Boston 1963); V. O'Daniel, The Dominican Province of St. Joseph (New York 1942); G. Herbermann, The Sulpicians in the United States (New York 1916); A. Gabriel, The Christian Brothers in the United States (New York 1948); M. de L. Walsh, The Sisters of Charity of New York, 1809–1959, 3 vols. (New York 1960); T. P. McCarty, Guide to the Catholic Sisterhoods in the United States (Washington 1964); W. Sweet, The Story of Religion in America (New York 1950); C. Olmstead, History of Religion in the United States (New Jersey 1960); S. Ahlstrom, A Religious History of the American People (New Haven 1972); S. Ahlstrom, Theology in America: The Major Protestant Voices from Puritanism to Neo-Orthodoxy (Indianapolis 1976); N. Burr, A Critical Bibliography of Religion in America (New Jersey 1961); N. Burr, Religion in American Life (New York 1971); L. Loetscher, American Christianity: An Historical Interpretation with Representative Documents, 2 vols. (New York 1960–63); J. Brauer, Reinterpretation in American Church History (Chicago 1968); E. Gaustad, Historical Atlas of Religion in America (New York 1962); R. Handy, A History of the Churches in the United States and Canada (Oxford 1976); M. Marty, Righteous Empire: The Protestant Experience in America (New York 1970); A. Stokes, Church and State in the United States, 3 vols. (New York 1950); S. Mead, The Lively Experiment: The Shaping of Christianity in America (New York 1963); E. Humphrey, Nationalism and Religion in America (New York 1965); W. McLoughlin, Modern Revivalism: Charles Grandison Finney to Billy Graham (New York 1959); W. Kennedy, The Shaping of Protestant Education: An Interpretation of the Sunday School and the Development of Protestant Educational Strategy in the United States, 1789–1860 (New York 1966); R. Billington, The Protestant Crusade, 1800–1860: A Study of the Origins of American Nativism (New York 1938); C. Griffin, Their Brother's Keepers: Moral Stewardship in the United States, 1800–1865 (New Brunswick 1960); D. Riemers, White Protestantism and the Negro (New York 1975); R. Michaelson, Piety in the Public Schools: Trends and Issues in the Relationship Between Religion and the Public School in the United States (New York 1970); R. Handy, A Christian America: Protestant Hopes and Historical Realities (New York 1971); K. Bailey, Southern White Protestantism in the Twentieth Century (New York 1964); P. Gaston, The New South Creed, A Study in Southern Mythology (New York 1970); G. Lenski, The Religious Factor: A Sociological Study of Religion's Impact on Politics, Economics, and Family Life (New York 1961); M. Ewens, The Role of the Nun in Nineteenth-Century America (University of Minnesota 1971); B. J. Meiring, Educational Aspects of the Legislation of the Councils of Baltimore, 1829–1884 (diss., University of California 1963); P. Gleason, ed., Documentary Reports on Early American Catholicism

(New York 1978); A. H. Dorsey, The Flemmings (New York 1869); J. England, The Works of the Right Rev. John England, First Bishop of Charleston, 5 vols. (New York 1849); A. M. Greeley, "Catholicism in America: 200 Years and Counting," The Critic XXXIV (1976), 14–47, 54–170; H. J. Nolan, ed., Pastoral Letters of the American Hierarchy, 1792–1970 (Huntington 1971); R. F. Hueston, The Catholic Press and Nativism, 1840–1860 (New York 1976); W. B. Faherty, Dream by the River. Two Centuries of Saint Louis Catholicism, 1766–1967 (St. Louis 1973); J. P. Gallagher, A Century of History: the Diocese of Scranton, 1869–1968 (Scranton 1968); R. H. Lord, J. E. Sexton, E. T. Harrington, History of the Archdiocese of Boston in the various Stages of its Development 1604 to 1943, 3 vols. (New York 1944); G. J. Garraghan, The Jesuits of the Middle United States, 3 vols. (New York 1938); J. Rippinger, "Some Historical Determinants of American Benedictine Monasticism, 1846–1900," American Benedictine Review XXVII (1976), 63–84; T. Radzialowski, "Reflections on the History of the Felicians in America," Polish-American Studies XXXII (1975), 19–28; J. M. Daley, Georgetown University: Origin and Early Years (Washington 1957); J. T. Ellis, The Formative Years of the Catholic University of America (Washington 1946); M. H. Sanfilippo, "Personal Religious Expressions of Roman Catholicism: A Transcendental Critique," Catholic Historical Review LXII (1976), 366–87; J. Dolan, Catholic Revivalism in the United States, 1830–1900 (Notre Dame 1977); J. P. Gaffey, "Patterns of Ecclesiastical Authority: The Problem of the Chicago Succession," Church History XLII (1973), 257–70; D. Spalding, "Martin John Spalding's 'Dissertation on the American Civil War,'" Catholic Historical Review LII (1966), 66–85; J. R. G. Hassard, Life of the Most Reverend John Hughes, D. D., First Archbishop of New York (New York 1969); T. W. Spalding, Martin John Spalding: American Churchman (Washington 1973); T. R. Ryan, Orestes A. Brownson (Huntington 1976); R. M. Leliaert, "The Religious Significance of Democracy in the Thought of Orestes A. Brownson," Review of Politics XXXVIII (1976), 3–26; P. H. Lemcke, Life and Work of Prince Demetrius Augustine Gallitzin (London and New York 1940); J. Oetgen, An American Abbott: Boniface Wimmer, O.S.B., 1809–1887 (Latrobe, Pa. 1976); P. L. Johnson, Crosier on the Frontier: A Life of John Martin Henni, Archbishop of Milwaukee (Madison 1959); P. L. Johnson, Stuffed Saddlebags: The Life of Martin Kundig, Priest, 1805–1879 (Milwaukee 1942); P. Horgan, Lamy of Santa Fe; His Life and Times (New York 1975); V. R. Greene, For God and Country: The Rise of Polish and Lithuanian Ethnic Consciousness in America, 1860–1910 (Madison 1975); W. Galush, "The Polish National Catholic Church: A Survey of its Origins, Development and Missions," Records of the American Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia LXXXIII (1972), 131–49; A. Kuzniewski, "The Polish National Catholic Church—The View From People's Poland," Polish-American Studies XXXI (1974), 30–34; H. B. Leonard, "Ethnic Conflict and Episcopal Power: The Diocese of Cleveland, 1847–1870," Catholic Historical Review LXII (1976), 388–407; D. P. Killen, "Americanism Revisited: John Spalding and Testem Benevolentiae," Harvard Theological Review LXVI (1973), 413–54; A. I. Abell, American Catholicism and Social Action; A Search for Social Justice (Garden City 1960); T. O. Hanley, ed., The John Carroll Papers, 3 vols. (Notre Dame 1976); P. Gleason, "The Main Sheet Anchor: John Carroll and Catholic Higher Education," Review of Politics XXXVIII (1976), 576–613; J. W. Sanders, The Education of an Urban Minority: Catholicism in Chicago, 1833–1965 (New York 1977); V. P. Lannie, "The Emergence of Catholic Education in America," Notre Dame Journal of Education III (1973), 297–309.

CANADA: M. Sheehan, A Current Bibliography of Canadian Church History: Canadian Historical Association Report; D. de St-Denis, O.F.M.Cap., L'Église catholique au Canada. Précis historique et statistique (Montreal 1956); H. H. Walsh, The Christian Church in Canada (Toronto 1956); J. S. Moir, Church and State in Canada, 1627–1867. Basic documents (Toronto 1967); L. Pouliot, "Canada," DHGE XI, 675–98; A. de Barbézieux, O.F.M.Cap., Histoire de la province ecclésiastique d'Ottawa, 2 vols. (Paris 1925); W. P. Bull, From MacDonnell to McGuignan. The History of the Growth of the Roman Catholic Church in Upper Canada (Toronto 1939); A. Morice, Histoire de l'Église catholique dans l'Ouest canadien III/IV (Winnipeg 1928); A. A. Johnston, A History of the Catholic Church in Eastern Nova Scotia (Antigonish 1963); H. Têtu, Les évêques de Québec. Notices biographiques (Québec 1889); Mgr. Tangay, Répertoire général du clergé canadien (Montréal 1893); L. E. Hamelin, "Évolution numérique du clergé catholique dans le Québec," Recherches sociographiques 2 (1961), 189–243; Mandements, lettres pastorales et circulaires des évêques de Québec, 9 volumes (Québec 1887–98). Mandements, lettres pastorales et circulaires des évêques publiés dans le diocèse de Montréal, 13 vols. (Montréal 1887–1926); J. Grant, A History of the Christian Church in Canada, 3 vols. (Toronto 1966–72); J. Moir, Church and State in Canada, 1627–1867: Basic Documents (Toronto 1967); P. Carrington, The Anglican Church in Canada: A History (Toronto 1963); W. Reid, The Church of Scotland in Lower Canada: Its Struggle for Establishment (Toronto 1936); M. Armstrong, The Great Awakening in Nova Scotia, 1776–1809 (Hartford 1948); E. Norman, The Conscience of the State in North America (Cambridge 1968); S. Crysdale, The Industrial Struggle and Protestant Ethic in Canada (Toronto 1961); J. Grant, The Canadian Experience of Church Union (London 1967); C. Silcox, Church Union in Canada: Its Causes and Consequences (New York 1933); C. Sissons, Church and State in Canadian Education (Toronto 1959).

AUSTRALIA: P. F. Moran, History of the Catholic Church in Australasia, 2 vols. (Sydney 1896); P. O'Farrell, The Catholic Church in Australia, 1788–1967 (London 1968); P. O'Farrell, ed., Documents in Australian Catholic History, 2 vols. (London 1969).

LATIN AMERICA: R. Streit, J. Dindinger, Bibliotheca Missionum III (Freiburg i. Br. 1927); J. L. Mecham, Church and State in Latin America (Chapel Hill 1966); E. Ryan, The Church in the South American Republics (New York 1932); F. B. Pike, ed., The Conflict between Church and State in Latin America (New York 1964); J. J. Kennedy, Catholicism, Nationalism and Democracy in Argentina (Notre Dame 1958); J. S. Campobassi, Laicismo y catolicismo en la educación pública argentina (Buenos Aires 1961); F. López Menéndez, Compendio de la historia eclesiástica de Bolivia (La Paz 1965); P. F. da Silveria Camargo, Historia eclesiástica do Brasil (Petropolis 1955); J. Dornas Filho, O padroado e la Igreja brasileira (São Paulo 1939); Julio Maria, A Religiâo: Livro do Centenario I (Rio de Janeiro 1900); C. Silva Cotapos, Historia eclesiástica de Chile (Santiago de Chile 1925); M. Cruchaga Montt, De las relaciones entre la Iglesia y el Estado en Chile (Madrid 1929); J. M. Groot, Historia eclesiástica y civil de Nueva Granada, 4 vols. (Bogotá 1889–93); J. P. Restrepo, Le Iglesia y el Estado en Colombia (London 1885); B. E. Haddox, Sociedad y religión en Colombia (Bogotá 1965); J. Maramillo, El pensiamento colombiano en el siglo XIX (Bogotá 1964); J. T. Donoso, La Iglesia ecuatoriana en el siglo XIX, 2 vols. (Quito 1934–36); M. Cuevas, Historia de la Iglesia en México, V (Mexico 1928); J. Bravo Ugarte, Diocesis y obispos de la Iglesia mexicana, 1519–1939 (Mexico 1941); J. Ramírez Cabañas, Las relaciones entre México y el Vaticano (Mexico 1928); G. Decorme, Historia de la Compañia de Jesús en la República Mexicana durante el siglo XIX, 2 vols. (Guadalajara 1914–21); R. Vargas Ugarte, Historia de la Iglesia en el Perú, V (Burgos 1962); A. Watters, A History of the Church in Venezuela, 1819–1930 (Chapell Hill 1933); F. B. Pike, "The Catholic Church in Central America," RPol 21 (1959), 83–113.

4. Catholic Churches with Eastern Rite

J. Hajjar, Les chrétiens uniates du Proche-Orient (Paris 1962); J. Hajjar, L'apostolat des missionnaires latins dans le Proche-Orient selon les directives romaines (Jerusalem 1956); S. Sidarous, Les patriarcats dans l'Empire ottoman et spécialement en Égypte (Paris 1907); Statistica con cenni storici della gerarchia e dei fedeli di rito orientale (Vatican City 1932); C. de Clercq, Conciles des Orientaux catholiques, 2 vols. (Paris 1949–52); S. Congregazione per la Chiesa Orientale. Codificazione canonica orientale. Fonti, 3rd ser. (Rome 1931seqq.); C. Charon (= C. Korolewski), Histoire des patriarcats melkites II/III (Rome and Paris 1910–11); A. D'Avril in ROC 3 (1898), 1–30, 265–81; T. Anaissi, Bullarium Maronitarum (Rome 1911); G. Beltrami, La Chiesa caldea nel secolo dell'unione (Rome 1933); M. Cramer, Das christlich-koptische Ägypten einst und heute. Eine Orientierung (Wiesbaden 1959); V. Inglisian, Hunderfünfzig Jahre Mechitaristen in Wien, 1811–1961 (Vienna 1961); The articles "Maronites," "Nestorienne (Église)," "Roumanie," "Syrienne (Église)," DThC; The articles "Alep," "Antioche," "Antonins," "Arménie," "Audo," "Beyrouth," "Constantinople," "Égypte," DHGE. E. Likowski, Dzieje Kosciola unickiego na Litwie i Rusi w XVIII i XIX wieku, 2 vols. (Warsaw 1906); A. Korczok, Die griechisch-katholische Kirche in Galizien (Leipzig 1921); N. Nilles, Symbolae ad illustrandam historiam Ecclesiae in terris Coronae S. Stephani, 2 vols. (Innsbruck 1885); I. Radu, Istoria diocezei romane-unite a Orazü-Mari (Oradea Mare 1930).

5. Mission History

Bibliotheca Missionum, R. Streit, J. Dindinger, eds. (Freiburg im Breisgau 1916seqq.), VIII, XII–XIV, XVII–XXI, XXVII; Collectanea S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide I (1622–1866), II (1867–1906), (Rome 1907); S. Delacroix, Histoire Universelle des Missions Catholiques III: Les Missions Contemporaines (1800–1957), (Paris 1958); K. S. Latourette, A History of the Expansion of Christianity IV/VI: The Great Century (New York 1941); A. Launay, Histoire Générale de la Société des Missions Étrangères, 3 vols. (Paris 1894); F. Schwager, Die katholische Heidenmission der Gegenwart I–IV (Steyl 1907).

6. Orders and Congregations

M. Heimbucher, Die Orden und Kongregationen der katholischen Kirche, 2 vols. (Paderborn 1932–34); M. Escobar, ed., Ordini e Congregazioni religiose, 2 vols. (Turin 1951–53); C. Tyck, Notices historiques sur les congrégations et communautés religieuses et les instituts missionnaires du XIX^{e} siècle (Louvain 1892); H. C. Wendlandt, Die weiblichen Orden und Kongregationen der katholischen Kirche und ihre Wirksamkeit in Preußen von 1818 bis 1918 (Paderborn 1924); S. Hilpisch, Geschichte des benediktinischen Mönchtums (Freiburg i. Br. 1929); P. Schmitz, Histoire de l'Ordre de S. Benoît VI/VII (Maredsous 1948–56); P. Weissenberger, Das benediktinische Mönchtum im 19./20. Jahrhundert (Beuron 1958); L. F. Lekai, Geschichte und Wirken der Weißen Mönche. Der Order der Cisterzienser (Cologne 1958); N. Backmund, Monasticon Praemonstratense, 3 vols. (Straubing 1949–56); A. Walz, Compendium historiae Ordinis Praedicatorum (Rome 1948); A. Mortier, Histoire des Maîtres généraux de l'ordre des Frères Prêcheurs VII (Paris 1915); H. Holzapfel, Manuale historiae Ordinis FF. Minorum (Freiburg i. Br. 1909); M. de Pobladura, Historia generalis Ordinis Fratrum Minorum capucinorum III (Rome 1951); R. Villoslada, Manual de historia de la Compañia de Jesús (Madrid 1954); P. Albers, Liber saecularis historiae Societatis Iesu ab anno 1814 ad annum 1914 (Rome 1914); H. Azzolini in AHSI 2 (1933), 88–92; J. Burnichon, La Compagnie de Jésus en France. Histoire d'un siècle.

1814–1914, 4 vols. (Paris 1914–22); L. Frias, Historia de la Compañia de Jesús en su Asistencia moderna de España, 2 vols. (Madrid 1923–44); B. Basset, The English Jesuits (New York 1968); P. Galletti, Memorie storiche intorno alla Provincia Romana della Compagnia di Gesù, 1814–1914 (Prato 1914); A. Monti, La Compagnia di Gesù nel territorio della Provincia torinese V (Chieri 1920); A. Aldegheri, Breve storia della Provincia veneta della Compagnia di Gesù, 1814–1914 (Venice 1914); Volpe, I Gesuiti nel Napoletano, 1804–1914, 3 vols. (Naples 1914–15); F. Strobel, Die Jesuiten und die Schweiz (Olten 1955); G. Decorme, Historia de la Compañia de Jesús en la República mejicana durante el siglo XIX (Guadalajara 1914); T. Hugues, History of the Society of Jesus in North America II/IV (New York 1908–14); A. Brou, Cent ans de missions, 1815–1934. Les jésuites missionnaires au XIX^e et XX^e siècle (Paris 1935); E. Hosp, Die Kongregation des Allerheiligsten Erlösers (Graz 1924). M. de Meulemeester, Histoire sommaire de la Congrégation du T. S. Rédempteur (Louvain 1958); G. Rigault, Histoire générale de l'Institut des Frères des Écoles chrétiennes, 9 vols. (Paris 1936–53); K. Zähringer, Die Schulbrüder (Freiburg i. Br. 1962); H. Neufeld, Die Gesellschaft Mariens (Munich 1962); P. Coste, G. Goyau, Les Filles de la Charité (Paris 1933). J. F. Devaux, Les Filles de la Sagesse II (Cholet 1955); L. Ziegler, Die Armen Schulschwestern von Unserer Lieben Frau (Munich 1935); A. Hillengass, Die Gesellschaft vom heiligen Herz Jesu (Stuttgart 1917).

7. HISTORY OF THEOLOGY

E. Hocedez, Histoire de la théologie au XIX^e siècle 3 volumes (Brussels 1947–52); M. Grabmann, Die Geschichte der katholischen Theologie seit dem Ausgang der Väterzeit (Freiburg i. Br. 1933); L. Scheffczyk, Theologie in Aufbruch und Widerstreit. Die deutsche katholische Theologie im 19. Jahrhundert (Bremen 1965).

BIBLIOGRAPHY TO INDIVIDUAL CHAPTERS

Part One

Between the Revolutions of 1830 and 1848

SECTION ONE

The Continuation of Catholic Renewal in Europe

1. The Progress of Ultramontanism and the Growth of the International Orders

LITERATURE

On the further development of ultramontanism there are several references in the tendentious work by J. Friedrich, Geschichte des Vaticanischen Conzils I: Vorgeschichte (Bonn 1877), 96–142, 200–226. Comprehensive descriptions by R. Aubert and Y. Congar in L'Ecclésiologie au XIX^{e} siècle (Paris 1960), 11–35, 97–104.

ON FRANCE: see vol. VII in this series, pp. 400–1, for the works by J. Martin and P. Poupard on the activity of the nuncios, as well as biographies of Guéranger, Montalembert, Gousset, and Parisis.

ON GERMANY: H. Becher, Der deutsche Primas (Colmar 1943), 175–223; F. Vigener in HZ 111 (1913), 565–81; the biographies (listed in the General Bibliography) of Geissel and Döllinger.

ON AUSTRIA: E. Winter, Der Josephinismus (Vienna 1962), 222–98 and F. Maaß, Lokkerung und Aufhebung des Josephinismus 1820–50 (Vienna 1961).

ON THE GROWTH OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS UNDER THE GENERALSHIP OF P. ROOTHAAN: his biography by P. Albers (2 vols. [Nijmegen 1912]) to be supplemented by those by P. Pirri (Isola del Liri 1930) and R. G. North (Milwaukee 1944), and by Io. Ph. Roothaan. Testimonia aequalium (Rome 1935), the edition of his correspondence (5 vols. [Rome 1935–40]) and his Opera spiritualia (2 vols. [Rome 1936]). Also J. A. Otto, Gründung der neuen Jesuitenmission durch General P. J. P. Roothaan (Freiburg i. Br. 1939) and J. de Guibert, La spiritualité de la Compagnie de Jésus (Rome 1953), 461–68. With respect to national developments, see the works (General Bibliography) by J. Burnichon for France, L. Frias for Spain, P. Galetti and Volpe for Italy, and F. Strobel for Switzerland.

On the Restoration of the Dominicans in France: in addition to the biographies of Lacordaire (see above, chap. 1, n. 16), those of P. Jandel (by H. Cormier [Paris 1890]) and P. Besson (by E. Cartier [Paris 1865]), a collection of documents by R. Devas, Ex umbris. Letters and Papers hitherto unpublished of the Fathers Lacordaire, Jandel, Danzas (Hawkesyard 1920); also Année dominicaine 1921, 118–20 and A. Duval in AFP 36 (1966), 493–542.

On the Restoration of the Benedictines in France: the works on Guéranger (chap. 1 above, n. 17) as well as the biographies of Dom Pitra (by F. Cabrol [Paris 1891] and by A. Battandier [Paris 1896]), of Dom Couturier (by A. Houtin [Angers 1899]) and of Dom Gauthey (by R. B. Laure [Grenoble 1944]).

2. Old and New in Pastoral Care and Moral Theology

Literature

F. X. Arnold, Grundsätzliches und Geschichtliches zur Theologie der Seelsorge (Freiburg i. Br. 1949); F. X. Arnold, Seelsorge aus der Mitte der Heilsgeschichte (Freiburg i. Br. 1956), 152–95; H. Schuster, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie, ed. by F. X. Arnold et al., I (Freiburg im Breisgau 1964), 47–76; H. J. Müller, Die ganze Bekehrung. Das zentrale Anliegen des Theologen und Seelsorgers J. M. Sailer (Regensburg 1949); A. Schrott, Seelsorge im Wandel der Zeiten (Graz 1949), 153–266; Schnabel, G IV, especially 50–56, 270–76; M. H. Vicaire in Histoire illustrée de l'Église II (Geneva 1948), 261–326; P. Broutin, "L. Querbes. Recherches sur l'évolution de la pastorale au XIX^e siècle," NRTh 81 (1959), 696–720; E. Vercesi-E. Santini, La sacra eloquenza dal sec. XVII ai nostri giorni (Milan 1930).

On Catechetics: DThC II, 1951–67; F. H. Thalhofer, Entwicklung des katholischen Katechismus in Deutschland von Canisius bis Deharbe (Freiburg i. Br. 1899); F. X. Arnold, Dienst am Glauben (Freiburg i. Br. 1948), 31–92; B. Dreher, Die biblische Unterweisung im evangelischen und katholischen Religionsunterricht (Freiburg i. Br. 1963), 9–55; H. Kreutzwald, Zur Geschichte des biblischen Unterrichts (Freiburg i. Br. 1957), 107–79; J. Hofinger, Geschichte des Katechismus in Österreich (Innsbruck 1937), 238–77; P. Broutin, "Le mouvement catéchistique en France au XIX^e siècle," NRTh 82 (1960), 494–512, 607–32, 699–715.

On Moral Theology during the First Half of the Nineteenth Century: B. Häring, Das Gesetz Christi I (Freiburg i. Br. 1961), 62–64; J. Diebolt, La théologie morale catholique en Allemagne 1750–1850 (Strasbourg 1926), 166–354; P. Hadrossek, Die Bedeutung des Systemgedankens für die Moraltheologie in Deutschland seit der Thomas-Renaissance (Munich 1950); 76–214; F. Steinbüchel, Der Zerfall des christlichen Ethos im 19. Jahrhundert (Frankfurt 1951).

On the Progress of the Liguoric Moral: I. von Döllinger and F. H. Reusch, Geschichte der Moralstreitigkeiten in der römisch-katholischen Kirche I (Nördlingen 1889); 462–76; G. Cacciatore, S. Alfonso de'Liguori e il Giansenismo (Florence 1944), 440–59; J. Guerber, "Le rôle de P. B. Lanteri dans l'introduction de la morale ligorienne en France," Spicilegium Historiae Congreg. SS. Redemptoris 4 (1956), 343–76; M. de Meulemeester, "Introduction de la morale de S. Alphonse de Liguori en Belgique," EThL 16 (1939), 468–84.

3. Catholic Thought Searching for New Ways

LITERATURE

Hocedez II; J. Bellamy, La théologie catholique au XIX^e siècle (Paris 1904); L. Scheffczyk, Theologie im Aufbruch und Widerstreit. Die deutsche katholische Theologie im 19. Jahrhundert (Bremen 1925); C. Werner, Geschichte der katholischen Theologie. Seit dem Trienter Concil bis zur Gegenwart (Munich 1867).

HERMESIANISM: H. Schrörs, Ein vergessener Führer der Rheinischen Geistesgeschichte des 19. Jahrhunderts (Bonn 1925); H. Schrörs, Die Kölner Wirren 1837 (Cologne 1927); H. Schrörs, "Hermesianische Pfarrer," Annalen des Historischen Vereins für den Niederrhein 103 (1919), 76–183; H. Bastgen, Forschungen und Quellen zur Kirchenpolitik Gregors XVI. (Paderborn 1929), 18–74, 245–77, 437–548; S. Merkle in HJ 60 (1940); 179–220; J. Pritz, Franz Werner (Freiburg i. Br. 1957); G. Schönig, A.J. Binterim (Düsseldorf 1933); Hocedez I, 195–203, II, 37–39; B. Guzzetti, La perdita della fede nei cattolici (Venegono 1940), 41–73; D. Gla, Repertorium der katholisch-theologischen Literatur I/2 (Paderborn 1904), 355–70.

GÜNTHERIANISM: F. P. Knoodt, A. Günther, 2 vols. (Vienna 1881; tendentious, but well-informed); E. Winter, Die geistige Entwicklung Anton Günthers und seiner Schule (Paderborn 1931); P. Wenzel, Das wissenschaftliche Anliegen des Güntherianismus (Essen 1961); P. Wenzel, Der Freundeskreis um Anton Günther (Essen 1965; consult also U. Engelmann in Erbe und Auftrag 42 [1966], 240–45); J. Pritz, Glauben und Wissen bei Anton Günther. Eine Einführung in sein Leben und Werk (Vienna 1963); A. Dempf, Weltordnung und Heilsgeschichte (Eichstätt 1958); K. Beck, Offenbarung und Glaube bei Anton Günther (Vienna 1967); Hocedez II, 39–59.

TÜBINGEN AND MUNICH: in addition to the general works listed above: J. R. Geiselmann, Die katholische Tübinger Schule (Freiburg im Breisgau 1964); M. Miller, "Die Tübinger katholisch-theologische Fakultät und die württembergische Regierung 1835–46," ThQ 132 (1952), 22–45, 213–34; S. Lösch, "Die katholisch-theologische Fakultät zu Tübingen und Gießen 1830–50," ThQ 108 (1927), 159–208 (about Gießen); A. Schuchert, "Die katholisch-theologische Fakultät an der Universität Gießen", Jahrbuch für das Bistum Mainz 1 (1946), 64–75; H. Witetschek, "Die Bedeutung der theologischen Fakultät der Universität München für die kirchliche Erneuerung in der letzten Hälfte des 19. Jahrhunderts," HJ 86 (1966), 107–37; A. Lauscher, Die katholisch-theologische Fakultät der Universität zu Bonn (Düsseldorf 1920); S. Lösch, Professor A. Gengler. Die Beziehungen der Bamberger Theologen zu Döllinger und Möhler (Würzberg 1963; letters from the years 1827–43); J. Friedrich, Ignaz von Döllinger I/II (Munich 1899; numerous documents); J. Zinkl, Magnus Jocham. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der katholischen Theologie und Frömmigkeit im 19. Jahrhundert (Freiburg i. Br. 1950).

THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF LOUVAIN: Simon, Sterckx I, 260–93; L. van der Essen, L'Université de Louvain (Brussels 1945), 279–81; EThL 9 (1932), 608–704; A. Franco, "Geschiedenis van het traditionalisme aan de Universiteit te Leuven 1835–67" (typed diss., Louvain 1956); J. Henry, "Le traditionalisme et l'ontologisme à l'Université de Louvain," Annales de l'Institut supérieur de philosophie 5 (Louvain 1922), 42–149; A. Simon, "Le cardinal Sterckx et al condamnation de Ubaghs en 1843," Collectanea Mechliniensia 16 (Mechelen 1946), 639–44.

TENTATIVE INITIATIVES OF CATHOLIC INTELLECTUALS IN FRANCE: J. R. Derré, Lamennais, ses amis et le mouvement des idées à l'époque romantique (Paris 1962), 461–728; L. Foucher, La philosophie catholique en France au XIX^e siècle avant la renaissance thomiste (Paris 1955), 51–195; N. Hötzel, Die Uroffenbarung im französischen Traditionalismus (Munich 1962), 115–384; Brugerette I, 84–97; H. Bremond, La littérature religieuse d'avant-hier et d'aujourd'hui (Paris 1906), 3–21; P. Moreau, Le Romantisme (Paris 1932), 296–317; P. Fernessole, Les conférenciers de Notre-Dame I: Genèse et fondation (Paris 1935); Lettres de Frédéric Ozanam II: Premières années à la Sorbonne, ed. by J. Caron (Paris 1971).

SECTION TWO

The Ascension of Pius IX and the Crisis of 1848

4. The First Years of the Pontificate of Pius IX: From the Neoguelf Mythos to the Roman Revolution

LITERATURE

ON THE REVOLUTION OF 1848: an excellent comprehensive treatment is that by L. Salvatorelli, La rivoluzione europea 1848–49 (Milan 1949). Also Hermelink II, 40–95. On the shifting fortunes of the Church during this period, there are Aubert, 11–71, 505–10; Schmidlin, PG II, 6–45; Hales, 17–133.

ON GIOVANNI MASTAI BEFORE HIS ELECTION: in addition to the biographies mentioned below on p. 357, A. Serafini, Pio nono I (Rome 1958; numerous letters and other documents); G. Pontrandolfi, Pio IX e Volterra (Volterra 1928); G. L. Masetti-Zannini in Bolletino del Mueso del Risorgimento di Bologna 2 (1957), 91–148; G. L. Masetti-Zannini in RSTI 14 (1960), 283–98; L. Valentini in SC 87 (1959), 321–43; P. Leturia, "El viaje a América del futuro Pio IX," Xenia Piana (Rome 1943), 367–444; G. Margotti, Pio IX ed il suo episcopato nelle diocesi di Spoleto e Imola (Turin 1877); L. Rivera in RStRis 19 (1932), 205–20; F. Minoccheri, Pio IX ad Imola e a Roma. Memorie, ed. by A. M. Bonetti (Naples 1892); Pio IX da vescovo a pontefice. Lettere al cardinale Amat 1832–48, ed. by G. Maioli (Modena 1949); R. Fontini in Archiginnasio 57 (1962), 274–98.

ON THE CONCLAVE OF 1846: T. Buttini in RStRis 27 (1940), 41–68; Engel-Janosi I, 4–19.

ON THE FIRST TWO YEARS OF THE PONTIFICATE: A. -M. Ghisalberti, Nuove ricerche sugli inizi del pontificato di Pio IX (Rome 1940); P. Pirri, "L'amnistia di Pio IX," RSTI 8 (1954), 207–32; P. Pirri, "Massimo d'Azeglio e Pio IX al tempo del quaresimale della moderazione," RSTI 3 (1949), 191–234; R. Quazza, Pio IX e Massimo d'Azeglio nelle vicende romane del 1847, 2 vols. (Modena 1957); R. Lefèvre, "Le riforme di Pio IX e la liberta di stampa," Studi romani 3 (1955), 667–94; Jemolo, 13–48; A. Anzilotti, La funzione storica del giobertismo (Florence 1924); L. de Ruggiero, "Inghilterra e Stato pontificio nel primo triennio del pontificato di Pio IX," ADRomana 76 (1953), 51–172; L. P. Wallace, Pius IX and Lord Palmerston 1846–1849: Power, Public Opinion and Diplomacy (Durham 1959), 3–46; A. Filipuzzi, Pio IX e la politica austriaca in Italia dal 1815 al 1848 nella relazione di R. Weiss (Florence 1958); Engel-Janosi I, 20–37; M. Gualdi, I primi anni del pontificato di Pio IX, la celebre benedizione e la questione romana (Carpi 1952); G. Quazza, "Sull'origine della proposta di Pio IX per la Lega doganale," RStRis 40 (1953), 357–70; P. Pirri, "La politica unitaria di Pio IX dalla lega doganale alla lega italica," RSTI 2 (1948), as well as the other two articles by the same author in the same journal, 1 (1947), 38–84, and 4 (1950), 399–446; J. Anelli Stefanutti, La lega italica promossa da Pio IX (Tarcento 1951; on the role of Monsignor Corbolli-Bussi); R. Cessi, Il mito di Pio IX (Udine 1953); F. Carollo, La missione de Antonio Rosmini a Roma nel 1848 (Palermo 1942); A. Baviera, "La corrispondenza diplomatica del P. Ventura incaricato del governo siciliano a Roma," Miscellanea Di Carlo II (Trapani 1960), 7–60; C. Riva, "La missione diplomatica di Rosmini a Roma nel 1848–49," Studium 63 (1967), 13–27.

THE ROMAN REVOLUTION AND ITS CONSEQUENCES: A. de Liedekerke, Rapporti delle cose di Roma 1848–1849, ed. by A. M. Ghisalberti (Rome 1949); La diplomazia del Regno di Sardegna durante la prima guerra d'indipendenza II: Relazioni con lo Stato pontificio, ed. by C. Baudi de Vesme (Turin 1951); E. Brazão, Relações diplomáticas de Portugal com a Santa Sede. Um ano drámatico, 1848 (Lisbon 1969); A. Capograssi, La conferenza di Gaeta del 1849 (Rome 1941; to be complemented by A. Ghisalberti in RStRis 40 [1953], 235–37); P. Pirri, Pio IX e Vittorio Emanuele II dal loro carteggio privato I (Rome 1944), 1–49, 1–83; E. di Carlo, "Lettere inedite del P. Ventura a Rosmini, nov. 1848–gen. 1849," Regnum Dei 20 (1964), 5–43; M. Degros, Rome et les États pontificaux sous l'occupation étrangère (Paris 1950).

In addition to general works, especially C. Spellanzon, Storia del Risorgimento IV, V, VII (Milan 1938–61) and G. J. Berkely, Italy in the Making 1846–48 (Cambridge 1936–40), see especially G. Quazza, La questione romana nel 1848–49 (Modena 1947); D. Massé, Pio IX e il gran tradimento del '48 (Alba 1948); D. Demarco, Pio IX e la rivoluzione romana del 1848 (Modena 1947; on economic and social causes); C. Minnocci, P. Sterbini e la rivoluzione romana (Maricianise 1967); J. Leflon in AHPont 1 (1963), 385–402; Engel-Janosi, 38–60; L. Rodelli, La Repubblica romana del 1849 (Pisa 1955); M. Cessi Drudi, "Contributi alla storia della Conferenza di Gaeta," RStRis 46 (1959), 219–72; A. M. Ghisalberti, Roma da Mazzini a Pio IX (Rome 1958; the best treatment of the restoration of papal power); L. Pásztor, "La Segreteria di Stato di Pio IX durante il triennio 1848–50," Annali della Fondazione italiana per la storia amministrativa 3 (1966), 308–65.

5. The Consequences of the Events of 1848 in France

SOURCES

In addition to the Moniteur universel (for parliamentary debates), Univers, Ami de la Religion, and Ère nouvelle, see especially the memoirs of A. de Falloux (Paris 1888) and of A. de Melun II (Paris 1891) as well as the notes and letters of Montalembert, ed. by A. Trannoy in RH 192 (1941), 253–89.

LITERATURE

In addition to the biographies of Montalembert, Veuillot, Dupanloup, Lacordaire, Maret, Melun, Sibour, Parisis, and Clausel (General Bibliography), see J. Leflon, L'Église de France et la révolution de 1848 (Paris 1948); Aubert, Pie IX, 40–57, 508–9; Gurian, 185–210; Duroselle, 291–490; H. Cabane, Histoire du clergé de France pendant la Révolution de 1848 (Paris 1908); R. Limouzin-Lamothe and J. Leflon, Monsigneur Denis Auguste Affre (Paris 1971), 301–61; F. Isambert in ArchSR 6 (1958), 7–35; M. Vincienne, Notes sur la situation religieuse de la France en 1848; R. Rancoeur, Bibliographie des traveaux publiés sur le centenaire de 1848 (Paris 1949).

ON THE PROVINCIAL COUNCILS: their decrees are published in ColLac IV. See G. Darboy in Le Correspondant 27 (1851), 193–218; E. Sevrin, Monsigneur Clausel II, 539–56.

ON THE FALLOUX LAW: H. Michel, La Loi Falloux (Paris 1906); F. Ponteil, Histoire de l'enseignement (Paris 1966), 227–45; A. Prost, op. cit. (General Bibliography), 173–77. On the preparation: La commission extra-parlementaire de 1849. Texte intégral inédit des procès-verbaux, ed. by G. Chenesseau (Paris 1937).

6. The Consequences of the 1848 Revolution in the States of the German Confederation and the Netherlands

SOURCES

Verhandlungen der ersten Versammlung des katholischen Vereins Deutschlands . . . (Mainz 1848); ColLac V, 941–1126 (Würzburg Bishops' Conference); L. Bergsträsser, Dokumente des politischen Katholizismus I (Munich 1921); Huber, Dokumente I (see bibliography chapter 7). Selections: E. Heinen, Staatliche Macht und Katholizismus in Deutschland I (Paderborn 1969).

LITERATURE

GENERAL: Brück, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in Deutschland im 19. Jahrhundert III (Mainz 1902), ed. by J. B. Kißling (Münster 1905); Schmidlin, PG II, 135f., 162ff.; Aubert, Pie IX (Fliche-Martin 21), 57–63; Huber, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte seit 1789 II (Stuttgart 1960), 685ff., 703ff., 778ff., III (Stuttgart 1963), 105ff., 114–20, 155; Bihlmeyer-Tüchle III, 329, 333, 335f., 337; Buchheim, Ultramontanismus und Demokratie. Der Weg der deutschen Katholiken im 19. Jahrhundert (Munich 1963); 55–72; Hubert Jedin, "Freiheit und Aufstieg des deutschen Katholizismus 1848–70," Ausgewählte Aufsätze und Vorträge II (Freiburg 1966), 469–84. For Austria: Maaß, Josephinismus V; E. Tomek, Kirchengeschichte Österreichs III, 686–713; E. Weinzierl-Fischer, Die österreichischen Konkordate von 1855 und 1933, 26–59; F. Engel-Janosi, Österreich und der Vatikan 1846–1918 I (Graz, Vienna, and Cologne 1958), chaps. 3, 4; M. Hussarek, "Die Verhandlung des Konkordates vom 18. August 1855," AÖG 109 (1921).

BIOGRAPHIES: Andlaw: by F. Dor (Fribourg 1910); Binterim: C. Schönig, Anton Josef Binterim (1779–1855) als Kirchenpolitiker und Gelehrter (Düsseldorf 1933); Buß: by F. Dor (Fribourg 1910); Diepenbrock: by H. Förster (Wroclaw ^{3}1878), by J. H. Reinkens (Leipzig 1881); Döllinger: J. Friedrich, I. v. Döllinger I, II (Munich 1889), G. Schwaiger, I. v. Döllinger (Munich 1963), J. Finsterhölzl, I. v. Döllinger (Graz, Vienna and Cologne 1969); Geissel: by J. A. F. Baudrie (Cologne 1881), by O. Pfülf (2 vols. [Fribourg 1895–96]); Radowitz: E. Ritter, Radowitz (Cologne 1948); Rauscher: C. Wolfsgruber, Joseph Othmar Cardinal Rauscher (Fribourg 1888).—F. Vigener, Ketteler. Ein deutsches Bischofsleben des 19. Jahrhunderts (Munich 1924); L. Lenhart, Bischof Ketteler, 3 vols. (Mainz 1966–68); H. Brück, Adam Franz Lenning (Mainz 1870); L. von Pastor, August Reichensperger, 2 vols. (Fribourg 1899); F. Schmidt, Peter Reichensperger (Mönchen-Gladbach 1913); C. Wolfsgruber, Friedrich Kardinal zu Schwarzenberg, 3 vols. (Vienna and Leipzig 1906–17).

Union Movement, Catholic Congresses: J. B. Kißling, Geschichte der deutschen Katholikentage I (Münster 1920); L. Lenhart, ed., Idee, Gestalt und Gestalter des 1. deutschen Katholikentages in Mainz 1848 (Mainz 1948); K. Buchheim in LThK VI, 69–72.

Political Catholicism: Bergsträsser, Studien; F. Schnabel, Der Zusammenschluß des politischen Katholizismus in Deutschland im Jahre 1848 (Heidelberg 1910); Bachem, Vorgeschichte, Geschichte und Politik der deutschen Zentrumspartei II (Cologne 1927; Reprint Aalen 1967), 1–95; K. Repgen, Märzbewegung und Maiwahlen des Revolutionsjahres 1848 im Rheinland (Bonn 1955); K. Repgen, "Klerus und Politik 1848," Festschrift für F. Steinbach (Bonn 1960); K. Repgen in LThK IV, 259ff.

Bishops' Conferences: F. H. Vering in AkathKR 21, 22 (1869); H. Storz, Staat und katholische Kirche in Deutschland im Lichte der Würzburger Bischofsdenkschrift von 1848 (Bonn 1934); P. Leisching, Die Bischofskonferenz. Studien zu ihrer Rechtsgeschichte mit besonderer Berücksichtigung ihrer Entwicklung in Österreich (Vienna and Munich 1963), 76–149; R. Lill, Die ersten deutschen Bischofskonferenzen (Freiburg 1964), 14–56.

The Netherlands: Rogier, KathHerleving 50–275 (also Schrikbeeld van een staatsgreep in 1853 [Amsterdam 1959]) and Albers, Herstel are the main sources, to be complemented by J. Witlox, Studien over het herstel der hierarchie in 1853 (Tilburg 1928) and A. Bronkhorst, Rondom 1853. De Aprilbeweging (The Hague 1953); A. Commissaris, op. cit. (General Bibliography); J. M. Gijsen, J.A. Paredis, bisschop van Roermond (Assen 1968); G. Homan in CHR 52 (1966–67), 201–11; J. Schokking, Historisch-juridische schets van de wet van 10.9 1853 (Amsterdam 1894); J. B. van Hugenpoth, De kloosters in Nederland in 1861 (Utrecht 1861; polemical); D. van Wely in Bijdragen voor de geschiedenis van de prov. der Minderbroaders in de Nederlands 14 (1964), 101–259; L. Rogier, "A. Thijm en de katholieke herleving," Annalen van het Thijmgenootschap 37 (1949), 1–23.

Part Two
The Catholic Reaction to Liberalism

Introduction: Pius IX after 1848

SOURCES

Acta Pii IX, 7 vols. (Rome 1854–78); Atti del S.P. Pio IX, 2 vols. (Rome 1857); A. Marcone, La parola di Pio IX ovvero discorsi e detti di S. Santità, 2 vols. (Genoa 1864–71); ASS, Yearbooks beginning 1865; P. Pirri, Pio IX e Vittorio Emanuele dal loro carteggio privato, 3 vols. (Rome 1944–61; also extensive correspondence with persons other than Victor Emmanuel); S. Jacini, Il tramonto del potere temporale nelle relazioni degli ambasciatori austriaci a Roma 1860/70 (Bari 1931); N. Blakiston, The Roman Question. Extracts from the Despatches of O. Russell from Rome 1858/70 (London 1962); Romana . . . Beatificationis et Canonizationis servi Dei Pii IX S.P. Tabella testium et Summarium. Positio super introductione causae, 2 vols. (Rome 1954); Elenchus scriptorum quae in Santa Sedis archivis adservantur (Rome 1954), Appendix ad Elenchum scriptorum (Rome 1955), Positio super virtutibus, 3 vols. (Rome 1961–62).

LITERATURE

In addition to the general church histories (see General Bibliography), consult Schmidlin, PG II, 1–330; Aubert, Pie IX; C. Pouthas, Le pontificat de Pie IX (Cours de Sorbonne, 1945); E. Hales, Pius IX. A Study in European Politics and Religion in the XIXth Century (London 1954); DThC XII, 1686–1716; ECatt IX, 1510–23.

BIOGRAPHIES OF PIUS IX: There exists as yet no critical biography of Pius IX. Most of the descriptions of his life which appeared during the nineteenth century are nothing more than panegyrics; among those to be mentioned are L. Wappmannsperger, (Regensburg 1879), J. M. Stepischnegg (2 vols. [Vienna 1879]); C. Sylvain (3 vols. [Paris 1885]) and A. Pougeois (6 vols. [Paris 1877–86]). Among more recent works there are A. Monti, Pio IX nel Risorgimento italiano (Bari 1928); F. Hayward, Pie IX et son temps (Paris 1948); D. Massé, Pio IX papa e principe italiano (Modena 1957); P. Fernessole, Pie IX, pape, 2 vols. (Paris 1960–63, in need of criticism; also CivCatt [1961] II, 63–64 [1964], II, 59–60; RHE 59 [1964], 198–204); Aubert-Martina, 839–48.

THE ROMAN CURIA UNDER PIUS IX: In addition to Aubert, Pie IX, 280–86, S. Nigro, Seconda Roma 1850/70 (Milan 1941) and F. Hayward, op cit., see the memoirs of contemporaries, especially A. Flir, Briefe aus Rom (Innsbruck 1864); H. d'Ideville, Journal II Rome 1862/64 (Paris 1873); K. von Schlözer, Römische Briefe 1864/69 (Stuttgart 1913); J. Acton in Cambridge Historical Journal 8 (1946), 186–204; La Curia romana e i Gesuiti (Florence 1861; polemical); La Crise d'Église (Paris 1878; polemical).

SECTION ONE

The Temporary Improvement in the Situation of the Church

7. The Seeming Success of the Church in France during the Second Empire and the "Moral Order"

SOURCES

Pastoral letters of bishops in J. -P. Migne, Orateurs sacrés, 2nd Ser. (Paris 1856–66); the correspondence of L. Veuillot (12 vols. [Paris 1931–32]), A. Cochin (2 vols. [Paris 1926]), Lacordaire (see LThK VI, 726), Montalembert (see LThK VII, 294); the memoirs of Monsignor Mabile (ed. by P. Mabile, 2 vols. [Paris 1926]), A. de Melun (2 vols. [Paris 1891]), M. du Camp (La charité privée à Paris, 1885), A. de Broglie (2 vols. [Paris 1938]), H. Loyson (A. Houtin, Le Père Hyazinth dans l'Église romaine [Paris 1920]), H. Taine (Carnets de voyage, 1863–65 [Paris 1897]), Abbé Frémond (ed. by A. Siegfried, I [Paris 1933]); the Catholic press (especially L'Univers, Le Monde, L'Ami de la religion, Le Français, Annales de la charité, Revue de l'enseignement chrétien, Correspondant, Études, and La France ecclésiastique); the Journal officiel (for the discussion of those laws after 1870 concerning religious affairs).

LITERATURE

Basic are J. Maurain, La politique ecclésiastique du Second Empire (Paris 1930, complementing the anticlerical work by Debidour, Histoire); J. Gadille, La pensée et l'action politique des évêques français au début de la III^e^ République, 2 vols. (Paris 1976); Lecanuet I (liberal-Catholic point of view); Debidour, III^e^ République I (a layman's view); E. Barbier, Histoire du catholicisme libéral et du catholicisme social en France 1870–1914 I (Paris 1924, antiliberal point of view); the Sorbonne lectures by C. Pouthas, L'Église et les questions religieuses en France de 1848 à 1877 (Paris 1945). In addition to the two works by L. Baunard and the works by G. Rigault and J. Burnichon, see Aubert, Pie IX, 108–31, 373–84, 517–19, 549–50; Schmidlin, PG II, 120–29; HistCathFr, 297–415; Gurian, 210–49; Brugerette I, 165–294, II, 3–151; C. A. Gimpl, The "Correspondant" and the Founding of the French Third Republic (Washington 1959); the biographies listed in the General Bibliography of Dupanloup, Gerbet, Guéranger, Guibert, Lacordaire, Lavigerie, Maret, Montalembert, Parisis, Pie, Regnier, Ségur, and Veuillot; to be added are J. Foulon, Histoire de Monseigneur Darboy (Paris 1899) and DHGE XIV, 84–86; H. Boissonot, Le cardinal Meignan (Paris 1899); G. Gautherot, E. Keller (Paris 1922); M. de Marcey, Ch. Chesnelong, 3 vols. (Paris 1903); L. Baunard, Kolb-Bernard (Paris 1899).

ON WORKS AND MANIFESTATIONS OF CATHOLIC LIFE: Duroselle, 495–710; H. Rollet, L'action sociale des catholiques en France I (Paris 1947), 11–65; A. de Melun, Manuel des œuvres (Paris 1878); E. Keller, Les congrégations religieuses en France (Paris 1880; statistical indices); L. Baunard, E. Lelièvre (Paris 1907); J. Schall, A. Baudon (Paris 1897); A. d'Andigné, A. de Melun (Paris 1962); M. Lynch, The Organised Social Apostolate of A. de Mun (Washington 1952).

ON THE CLERGY: F. Garilhe, Le clergé séculier français au XIXᵉ siècle (Paris 1898); L. Bougaud, Le grand péril de l'Église de France au XIXᵉ siècle (Paris 1878) and the work by F. Boulard listed in the General Bibliography; J. -F. Six, Un prêtre, A. Chevrier, fondateur du Prado (Paris 1965).

ON DENOMINATIONAL INSTRUCTION: Maurain, op. cit.; A. Prost, op. cit., 177–90 and J. Rohr, V. Duruy. Essai sur la politique de l'Instruction publique au temps de l'Empire libéral (Paris 1967).

ON RELIGIOUS PRACTICE: In addition to the works by G. Le Bras (General Bibliography), see especially C. Marcilhacy, Le diocèse d'Orléans au milieu du XIXᵉ siècle (Paris 1964) and Le diocèse d'Orléans sous l'épiscopat de Monseigneur Dupanloup (Paris 1962); G. Duveau, La pensée ouvrière sur l'éducation pendant la IIᵉ République et le Second Empire (Paris 1948), especially 185–96; P. Pierrard, La vie ouvrière à Lille sous le Second Empire (Paris 1965), 362–427; F. A. Isambert, Christianisme et classe ouvrière (Paris and Tournai 1960); Y. -M. Hilaire in L'information historique 25 (1963), 57–69, 29 (1967), 31–35; by the same author, "Les missions intérieures durant la seconde moitié du XIXᵉ siècle dans la région du Nord," Revue du Nord 46 (1964), 51–68 and "Remarques sur la pratique religieuse dans le bassin houiller du Pas-de-Calais dans la seconde moitié du XIXᵉ siècle," Charbon et sciences humaines (Paris and The Hague 1966), 265–79.

ON THE PROGRESS OF ANTICLERICALISM: Mellor, 286–318; Weill, Idée laïque, 121–244; A. Dessoye, Jean Macé et la fondation de la Ligue de l'enseignement (Paris 1883); G. Duveau, Les instituteurs (Paris 1954); L. Capéran, Histoire contemporaine de la laïcité française I (Paris 1958), 1–94.

8. The States of the German Confederation and Switzerland, 1848–70

SOURCES

Amtliche Tagungsberichte der Generalversammlungen (Katholikentage) 1849seqq.; ColLac V (Provincial Councils and Bishops' Conferences); Aktenstücke betreffend die Fuldaer Bischofskonferenzen 1867–88 (Cologne 1889); Bergsträsser, Dokumente I (see biblio. chapter 6); I. v. Döllinger-Lord Acton, Briefwechsel, ed. by V. Conzemius, I:1850–69, II: 1869–70 (Munich 1963, 1965); Heinen, Staatliche Macht und Katholizismus in Deutschland I (Paderborn 1969).

LITERATURE

GENERAL: Brück, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in Deutschland im 19. Jahrhundert III, ed. by J. B. Kißling (Münster 1905); J. B. Kißling, Geschichte des Kulturkampfes im Deutschen Reich I: Die Vorgeschichte (Freiburg 1911); Bachem, Zentrumspartei II, 96–410; Schmidlin, PG II, 136–41, 162–79, 191ff.; Aubert, Pie IX (Fliche-Martin 21), 132–53, 176–79; Bihlmeyer-Tüchle III, 321, 337, 403–6, 413f.; Buchheim, Ultramontanismus und Demokratie, 72–219; Heyer, Die katholische Kirche von 1648 bis 1870, 94, 129ff., 140–44; Huber, Verfassungsgeschichte III (Stuttgart 1963), 158f., 174ff., 180, 190f., 194–98, 200–203, 665; Jedin, Freiheit und Aufstieg des deutschen Katholizismus; K. H. Grenner, Wirtschaftsliberalismus und katholisches Denken. Ihre Begegnung und Auseinandersetzung im Deutschland des 19. Jahrhunderts (Cologne 1967); R. Lill, Die deutschen Katholiken und Bismarcks Reichsgründung: Reichsgründung 1870/71, ed. by T. Schieder and E. Deuerlein (Stuttgart 1970), 345–65.

On the Church Policy of the Individual States: Prussia: J. Bachem, Preußen und die katholische Kirche (Cologne 1887), 71–85; B. von Selchow, Der Kampf um das Posener Erzbistum 1865 (Marburg 1923); H. Schrörs, "Die Kölner Erzbischofswahl nach Geissels Tode," AHVNrh 108 (1926), 103–40; Constabel, Vorgeschichte des Kulturkampfes; Conzemius, Briefe Aulikes an Döllinger. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der "Katholischen Abteilung" im preußischen Kultusministerium (Rome, Freiburg and Vienna 1968).

Austria: Hussarek, Die Verhandlung des Konkordats; Weinzierl-Fischer, Konkordate, 60–111; Engel-Janosi, Österreich und der Vatikan I, 61–148; Leisching, Bischofskonferenz, 150–250.

Bavaria: Doeberl-Spindler, Entwicklungsgeschichte Bayerns III; the corresponding sections of the works by A. Wendehorst, Das Bistum Würzburg 1803 bis 1957 (Würzburg 1965) and J. Staber, Kirchengeschichte des Bistums Regensburg (Regensburg 1966); for the sixties, see also Brandmüller, Publikation des 1. vatikanischen Konzils in Bayern.

States of the Upper Rhenish Church Province: I. v. Longner, Beiträge zur Geschichte der oberrheinischen Kirchenprovinz (Tübingen 1863); H. Brück, Die oberrheinischen Kirchenprovinz (Mainz 1868); H. Maas, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche im Großherzogtum Baden (Freiburg 1891); H. Lauer, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche im Großherzogtum Baden (Freiburg 1908); A. Hagen, Geschichte der Diözese Rottenburg II (Stuttgart 1958); C. J. Reidel, Die katholische Kirche im Großherzogtum Hessen (Paderborn 1904); M. Höhler, Geschichte des Bistums Limburg (Limburg 1908); L. Golther, Der Staat und die katholische Kirche im Königreich Württemberg (Stuttgart 1874); A. Hagen, Staat und katholische Kirche in Württemberg 1848–62, 2 vols. (Stuttgart 1928); H. Färber, Der Liberalismus und die kulturpolitischen Fragen in Baden 1850–70 (diss., Freiburg 1959); E. Will, "Die Konvention zwischen dem Heiligen Stuhl und der Krone Baden vom 28. Juni 1859," Baden im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert. Verfassungs- und Verwaltungsgeschichtliche Studien, ed. by K. S. Bader, III (1953), 99–188. See also the literature on the Baden Kulturkampf listed in chapter 19.

Biographies: In addition to those listed in the bibliography for chapter 6, there are also L. von Pastor, Johann Baptist Heinrich (Fribourg 1925); F. X. Zacher, Heinrich von Hofstätter, Bischof von Passau 1839–1875 (Passau 1940); J. Nattermann, Adolf Kolping als Sozialpädagoge (Cologne 1959); S. J. Schäffer and J. Dahl, Adolf Kolping (Cologne 1961); O. Pfülf, Hermann von Mallinckrodt (Fribourg 1901); J. Götten, Christoph Moufang, Theologe und Politiker 1817–90 (Mainz 1969); O. Pfülf, Joseph Graf von Stolberg (Fribourg 1913).

Formation of Associations, Political Catholicism, Bishops' Conferences: Kißling, Katholikentage I; Bachem, Zentrumspartei II; Buchheim, Ultramontanismus und Demokratie; Buchheim, Der deutsche Verbandskatholizismus; Lill, Bischofskonferenzen, 56–95; M. Schmolke, Adolf Kolping als Publizist. Ein Beitrag zur Publizistik und Verbandsgeschichte des deutschen Katholizismus im 19. Jahrhundert (Münster 1966); Lucas, Joseph Edmund Jörg. Konservative Publizistik zwischen Revolution und Reichsgründung 1852 bis 1871 (diss., Cologne 1969).

Battles over "Roman" and "German" Theology: Literature in chapter 16; the biographies of Döllinger, Heinrich, Ketteler, Moufang, Rauscher, Schwarzenberg; A. Hagen, "Hefele und das Vatikanische Konzil," ThQ 123 (1942), 223–52; H. Lang, "Die Versammlung katholischer Gelehrter in München . . . 1863," HJ 71 (1952), 246–58; R. Lill, "Die deutschen Theologieprofessoren vor dem Vatikanum I im Urteil des Münchener Nuntius", Reformata Reformanda, Festgabe für Hubert Jedin II (Münster 1965), 483–508; B. Schneider, "Der Syllabus Pius' IX. und die deutschen Jesuiten," AHPont 6 (1968), 371–92; T. Freudenberger, Die Universität Würzburg und das erste vatikanische Konzil I (Neustadt/Aisch 1969).

SWITZERLAND: Literature in vol. VII, chapters 7 and 20, also C. H. Marmier, La convention du 23 avril entre l'évêque de Lausanne et Genève at l'État de Fribourg (Fribourg 1925); V. Conzemius, "Der geistesgeschichtliche Hintergrund des Christkatholizismus . . .," ZSKG 60 (1966), 112–59; V. Conzemius, Katholizismus ohne Rom. Die altkatholische Kirchengemeinschaft (Zürich, Einsiedeln and Cologne 1969), 70–81. See also chapter 8, ns. 52–57.

9. The Rise of Catholicism in the Anglo-Saxon World

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND (AFTER 1848)

LITERATURE: P. F. Moran, ed., The Pastoral Letters and other Writings of Cardinal Cullen, 3 vols. (Dublin 1882); E. S. Purcell, Life of Cardinal Manning, 2 vols. (London 1896); S. Leslie, Henry Edward Manning (London 1921); C. Butler, The Life and Times of Bishop Ullathorne, 2 vols. (London 1926); P. J. Walsh, William J. Walsh, Archbishop of Dublin (Dublin 1928); D. Gwynn, A Hundred Years of Catholic Emancipation (London 1929); C. Butler, The Vatican Council, 2 vols. (London 1930); J. E. Handley, The Irish in Modern Scotland (Cork 1947); G. A. Beck, ed., The English Catholics 1850–1950 (London 1950); P. MacSuibhne, Paul Cullen and his Contemporaries, 3 vols. (Naas 1961–65); V. A. McClelland, Cardinal Manning (London 1962); E. R. Norman, The Catholic Church and Ireland in the Age of Rebellion 1859–73 (London 1965); J. H. Whyte and P. J. Corish, Political Problems 1850/78 (Dublin 1967).

THE UNITED STATES

SOURCES: F. Kenneally, United States Documents in the Propaganda Fides Archives II (Washington 1968); Ellis, Documents, 252–424; D. Shearer (see General Bibliography), 173–375; P. Guilday, The National Pastorals (see General Bibliography), 120–225; ColLac III (Provincial and National Councils); Relazione . . . da Monsignor Bedini (Rome 1854; republished in J. F. Connelly, The Visit of Archbishop G. Bedini to the United States [Rome 1960], 190–287); H. Browne, "The Archdiocese of New York a Century ago, a Memoir of Archbishop Hughes," Historical Records and Studies, 39–40 (1952), 129–90. Also Catholic journals, especially The Metropolitan, 1852–58 and Brownson's Quarterly Review, 1844–64, and newspapers, especially The Freeman's Journal, The Catholic Telegraph, and The Catholic Vindicator.

LITERATURE: Schmidlin PG II, 207–11; Aubert, Pie IX, 427–36, 559–60; Latourette, Christianity III, 4–246; M. Hoffman, The Church Founders of the Northwest (Milwaukee 1937); R. Bayard, Lone Star Vanguard. The Catholic Reoccupation of Texas 1838–48 (St. Louis 1945); L. Lyons, Father N. Blanchet and the Founding of the Oregon Missions 1838–48 (Washington 1940); J. Pillar, The Catholic Church in Mississippi 1837–65 (New Orleans 1964); M. Schroeder, The Catholic Church in the Diocese of Vincennes 1847–77 (Washington 1946); J. McSorley, Father Hecker and his Friends (St. Louis 1952); J. B. Code, "Bishop Hughes and the Sisters of Charity," Miscellanea hist. L. van der Essen (Louvain 1947), 991–1038; C. Walworth, The Oxford Movement in America (New York 1893); F. MacDonald, The Catholic Church and the Secret Societies in the United States (New York 1946); W. D'Arcy, The Fenian Movement in the United States 1858–86

(Washington 1947); P. G. Rahill, The Catholic Indian Missions and Grant's Peace Policy 1870–74 (Washington 1953).

ON IMMIGRATION: a field which requires much more examination, see in addition to the work by Shaughnessy (General Bibliography) T. McAvoy, "The Formation of the Catholic Minority in the United States, 1820–60," RPol 10 (1948), 13–34; E. Rothan, The German Catholic Emigrant in the United States 1830–60 (Washington 1946); M. Kelly, Catholic Immigrant Colonization Projects in the United States, 1815–60 (New York 1939); J. P. Shanon, Catholic Colonization in the Western Frontier (New Haven 1957).

ON THE SECOND PHASE OF NATIVISM: J. Higham, Strangers in the Land. Pattern of American Nativism, 1860–1925 (New Brunswick 1955); R. Lord et al., History of the Archdiocese of Boston II, 648–703.

ON CATHOLIC EDUCATION AND THE TRAINING OF THE CLERGY: J. A. Burns, The Growth and Development of the Catholic School System in the United States (New York 1912); E. Connors, Church-State Relationship in Education in the State of New York (Washington 1951); J. M. Campbell, "The Catholic Contribution to the American College," Vital Problems in Catholic Education in the United States, ed. by R. Deferrari (Washington 1939), 84–107; J. McCadden in CHR 50 (1965), 188–207; T. McAvoy in RPol 28 (1966), 19–46; J. M. Daley, Georgetown University. Origin and Early Years (Washington 1957); J. T. Ellis, The formative Years of the Catholic University of America (Washington 1946), 15–86; W. Morris, The Seminary Movement in the United States, 1833–66 (Washington 1932); J. Sauter, The American College of Louvain, 1857–78 (Louvain 1959).

ON THE CIVIL WAR: M. Rice, American Catholic Opinion in the Slavery Controversy (New York 1944); B. Blied, Catholics and the Civil War (Milwaukee 1955); C. Dunham, The Attitude of the Northern Clergy toward the South, 1860–65 (Toledo 1942); W. Wight in CHR 44 (1958), 290–306; L. Stock in CHR 16 (1930), 1–18.

BIOGRAPHIES: those of the bishops M. Spalding (by J. L. Spalding, Baltimore 1873), McQuaid (by F. Zwierlein, 3 vols. [Rochester 1925–27]), Father Kenrick (by H. Nolan [Washington 1948]), Hughes (by J. Hassard [New York 1865]), Verot (by M. Gannon [Milwaukee 1964]), Bailey (by M. H. Yeager [Washington 1947]), Neumann (by M. Curley [Washington 1952]), Miles (by V. O'Daniel [Washington 1926]), Baraga (by C. Verwyst [Milwaukee 1900]), Purcell (by M. McCann [Washington 1918]), McCloskey (by J. Farley [New York 1918]), Eccleston (by C. Halsey in RACHS 76 [1965], 69–128, 77 [1966], 131–56), and J. O'Shea, The Two Kenricks (Philadelphia 1904).

CANADA

Aubert, Pie IX, 436–41; Latourette, Christianity III, 247–76; L. Pouliot, Monseigneur Bourget et son temps, 2 vols. (Montreal 1955–56), and the biographies of the bishops de Charbonnel (by C. Causse [Gembloux 1931]), Lynch (by H. McKeown [Toronto 1886]), Laflèche (by R. Rumilly [Montreal 1938]), Provencher (by D. Frémont [Winnipeg 1935]), and P. Lefebvre (by P. Poirier [Montreal 1898]); F. H. Walker, Catholic Education and Politics in Upper Canada (Toronto 1955); J. Moir, Church and State in Canada West (Toronto 1959); P. Savard, "La vie du clergé québecois au XIX^{e} siècle," Recherches sociographiques 8 (1967), 259–73; P. Sylvain, "Quelques aspects de l'antagonisme libéral-ultramontain au Canada français," Recherches sociographiques 8 (1967), 279–97; G. Carrière, Histoire documentaire de la congrégation des missionnaires Oblats de Marie Immaculée dans l'Est du Canada, 6 vols. (Ottawa 1957–67); G. Carrière, La

Compagnie de la Baie d'Hudson et les missions catholiques dans l'Est du Canada (Ottawa 1957); G. Carrière, "L'Honorable Compagnie de la Baie d'Hudson et les missions catholiques dans l'Ouest canadien," Revue de l'Université d'Ottawa 36 (1966), 15–39, 232–57; E. Lamirande, "L'implantation de l'Église catholique en Colombie britannique, 1838–1848," Revue de l'Université d'Ottawa 28 (1958), 213–25, 333–63, 453–89; C. Roy, L'Université Laval (Québec 1903); P. Savard in Culture (Québec), 26 (1965), 64–83; J. B. Meilleur, Mémorial sur l'éducation au Bas-Canada (Québec 1876).

AUSTRALIA

E. O'Brien, The Dawn of Catholicism in Australia, 2 vols. (London 1930); H. Birt, Benedictine Pioneers in Australia, 2 vols. (London 1911); T. L. Suttor, Hierarchy and Democracy in Australia, 1788–1870 (Melbourne 1965).

10. The Easing of Tensions in the Iberian World

LITERATURE

SPAIN: Schmidlin, PG I, 614–23, II, 143–48; F. Izaguirre Irureta, "Las relaciones diplomaticás de la Santa Sede con el gobierno español durante la prima guerra carlista," Universidad 35 (Salamanca 1958), 564–93; P. Pérez Embid, "Los católicos y los partidos políticos españoles a mediados del siglo XIX," Nuestro tiempo 5 (Pamplona 1958), 387–409; V. G. Kiernan, The Revolution of 1854 in Spanish History (Oxford 1966); F. Costadellas, El arzobispo Costa y Borras, 1848–1864 (Barcelona 1947); J. Goñi Gaztámbide, "S. Adriani, obispo de Pamplona," HS 21 (1968), 179–312; C. Fernández, El confesor de Isabel II y sus actividades en Madrid (Madrid 1964); J. M. Cuenca Toribio, "La desarticulación de la Iglesia española del antiguo régimen, 1833–40," HS 20 (1967), 33–98; J. M. Cuenca Toribio, "La tercera restauración religiosa del siglo XIX," Anales de la Universidad Hispalense 26 (1966), 1–11; J. M. Cuenca Toribio, "La Jerarquía eclesíastica en el reinado de Isabel II," Atlantida 6 (1968), 600–621; J. M. Cuenca Toribio, Apertura e integrismo en la Iglesia española decimo-nonica (Seville 1970); J. M. Cuenca Toribio, "El pontificado pamplonés de D. P. C. Uriz y Labayru," HS 22 (1969), 129–285; E. Federici, Santa Gioacchina De Vedruna, fondatrice delle Carmelitane della carità (Rome 1958); L. Frías, Historia de la Compañia de Jesús en su Asistencia moderna de España II, 1835–68 (Madrid 1944); P. Jobit, Les éducateurs de l'Espagne contemporaine, les Krausistes (Paris 1936); J. Gorricho, "Epistolario de Pío IX con Isabel II," AHPont 4 (1966), 281–348.

On the secularization of the property of the Church, see J. M. de Antequera, La desamortización eclesiástica (Madrid 1885); J. Vicens Vivés, Historia económica de España (Barcelona 1959), 560–71; J. Porres Martin, La desamortización del siglo XIX en Toledo (Madrid 1966).

On the concordat of 1851, see J. Pérez Alhama, La Iglesia y el Estado español (Madrid 1967); F. Suárez: Ius canonicum (Pamplona) 3 (1963), 65–249.

PORTUGAL: Schmidlin, PG I, 623–27, II, 148–50; L. Frías, op. cit. II, 574–644.

SPANISH AMERICAN REPUBLICS: F. B. Pyke, "Heresy, Real and Alleged, in Peru. An aspect of the conservative-liberal struggle, 1830–75," HAHR 47 (1967), 50–74; F. B. Pyke, "Church and State in Peru and Chile since 1840, a Study in Contrasts," AHR 73

(1967), 30–50; R. Sotomayor Valdés, Historia de Chile, 1831–71, 2 vols. (Santiago 1875–76; concerning the activities of Monsignor Valdivieso); C. Oviedo Cavada, La misión Irarrazaval en Roma 1847–50. Estudios de los relaciones de Iglesia y Estado en Chile (Santiago 1962); C. Oviedo Cavada, "El gobierno chileno y el concepto misionero del Estado, 1832–61," Historia, 5 (Santiago 1966), 197–214; R. Pattee, García Moreno y el Ecuador de su tiempo (Mexico City 1941); W. Promper, Priesternot in Lateinamerika (Louvain 1965); L. Zea, Dos etapas del pensamiento en Hispano-américa. Del romanticismo al positivismo (Mexico City 1949); R. Pérez, La Compañía de Jesús en Colombia y Centro América después de su restauración (Valladolid 1896); R. Pérez, La Compañía de Jesús restaurada en la República Argentina y Chile, Uruguay y Brasil (Barcelona 1931); W. Loor, Los jesuitas en el Ecuador (Quito 1959); C. A. González, F. de P. González Vigil, el precursor (Lima 1961).

BRAZIL: F. Guerra, A questão religiosa do segundo imperio brasileiro (Rio de Janeiro 1952); M. E. Scherer, D. Machado (Munich 1965), 7–162; M. C. Thornton, The Church and Free Masonry in Brazil, 1872–75. A Study in Regalism (Washington 1943); M. Melo, A Maçonaria no Brazil (Recife 1909); T. Assis Bastes, O positivismo e a realidade brasileira (Belo Horizonte 1965); A. Rubert, "O bispado do Rio Grande do Sul e a nomeaçao de seu primo bispo 1848–1853," Revista eclesiastica brasileira, 28 (1968), 88–99; J. C. Fernandes Pinheiro, "Dom Manuel do Monte Rodriguez de Araújo," Revista do Instituto histórico e geográfico brasileira 27 (1867), 194–217; O. T. de Sousa, Diogo Antonio Feijó (Rio de Janeiro 1942); S. Elsner, Die deutschen Franziskaner in Brasilien (Trier 1912).

11. The Catholic Church in the Orthodox World

LITERATURE

UNIONIST PROSPECTS: Aubert, Pie IX, 478–84, 564; C. Korolevsky in Unitas 2 (Paris 1949–50), 189–205; Winter, Rußland II, 287–308; J. G. Remmers, De hereniging sgedachte van I. Gagarine (Tilburg 1951); M. J. de Rouët de Journel in Études 291 (1956), 171–95; M. J. de Rouët de Journel, Une Russe catholique. La vie de Madame Swetchine (Paris 1953); M. J. de Rouët de Journel in Revue des études slaves 3 (1923), 90–104; V. Laurent in Mélanges E. d'Alzon (St. Gérard and Namur 1952), 281–302; A. Tamborra, "Crisi d'Oriente, guerra di Crimea e polemiche politico-religiose fra cattolici e ortodossi, 1853–1856," Clio (Rome 1969), 169–91.

RUSSIA: Allocuzione della Sant. di N. S. Gregorio XVI seguita da una Esposizione corredata di documenti (Rome 1942); S. Olszamowska-Skowrońska, "Le concordat de 1847 avec la Russie d'après les documents authentiques," SPM 8–9 (1962), 447–877; Esposizione documentata sulle costanti cure del S. P. Pio IX a riparo dei mali che soffre la Chiesa cattolica nei dominii di Russia e Polonia (Rome 1866) and the Russian reply: Résumé historiques des Actes de la Cour de Rome (St. Petersburg 1867); A. Welykyj, Documenta (General Bibliography), II, 381–450 and the collection by Bjelogolovov. The Vatican Archives contain numerous pertinent material in the Russian files of the Congregation for Extraordinary Religious Affairs and the correspondence of the nuncios at Vienna. Schmidlin, PG I, 632–39, II, 213–23; J. Helfert, Rußland und die Katholische Kirche in Polen (Vienna 1867); R. Lefèvre, "Santa Sede e Russia e i colloqui dello Czar 1843–46," Gregorio XVI (Rome 1948), II, 159–293; J. S. Pelczar, Pius IX a Polska (Cracow 1914); Dmitri A. Tolstoi, Rimskij Katolitsizm v Rossii, 2 vols. (St. Petersburg 1914); A. van de Waal in Het christelijk Osten en hereeniging 8 (1955–56), 152–62, 303–12; R. Lubienski, Vie de Mon- seigneur C.I. Lubienski (Roulers 1898); DHGE XVI, 867–70, 1471–72; Suppression des couvents dans le Royaume de Pologne (Paris 1865); A. Petrani, Kolegium duchowne w Petersburgu (Lublin 1950); Z. Olszamowska, "La suppression des diocèses catholiques par le gouvernement russe, 1866–69," Antemurale 9 (1965), 41–130; Z. Olszamowska, "Tentatives d'introduire la langue russe dans l'Église latine de la Pologne orientale," Antemurale 11 (1967), 47–169; A. Petrani in Nasza przeszlosc 27 (1967), 215–33; M. E. Jablonska in Roczniki humanistyczne 12 (Lublin 1964), 142–94; M. E. Jablonska in Wiez 3 (Warsaw 1960), 53–70; M. E. Jablonska in Sprawozdania . . . Towarzystwa Naukowego Kathol. Uniw. Lublin 14 (1963–64), 183–88; M. E. Jablonska in Znak 17 (1965), 1653–88; E. M. de Beaulieu, Le Père Honorat de Biala, capucin (Toulouse 1932); A. Szelggiewicz, E. Bojanowski (Poznan 1966); K. Gadacz, Les capucins de la province polonaise dans l'insurrection de 1863–64 (Rome 1963).

The Habsburg Empire: On the activity of Monsignor Stroßmayer, see N. Lalic in Le Monde slave, n.s. 6 (1929), 442–50; C. Loiseau, Le Monde slave, n.s. 4 (1927), I, 379–405; C. Loiseau, Le Correspondant 219 (1905), 251–71; A. Fortescue in Dublin Review 163 (1918), 234–57; K. Krzanič in Nova revija 20 (Markarska 1941), 1–28; Winter, Rußland II, 364–65, 382–90, 500–503; DThC XIV, 2630–25; H. Wendel, Der Kampf der Südslawen um Freiheit und Einheit (Frankfurt 1925), II, 377–81; R. Rißling, Die Kroaten (Graz 1956).

On the Ruthenians in Galicia: M. Malinowski, Die Kirchen-und Staatssatzungen bezüglich des griechisch-katholischen Ritus der Ruthenen (Lemberg 1861); Ammann, 644–59; N. Miko in ZKTh 79 (1957), 467–83.

On the Uniate Rumanians of Transylvania: I. Moldovanu, Acte sinodali ale baserecei romane de Alba Julia, 2 vols. (Blaj 1869–72); G. Filip, Pio IX e i Romeni (Rome 1956); G. Filip, De concilio provinciali Alba-Juliensi et Fagariensi A.D. 1872 (Rome 1954); G. Filip in Acta historica 4 (Munich 1965), 107–41; I. Gorgescu, Mitropolitul Ioan Vancea (Nagyvárad 1952); de Clercq II, 628–55.

Southern Europe, Eastern Europe, and the Levant: See General Bibliography; Schmidlin, PG II, 230–33; Aubert, Pie IX, 410–15; Papers relating to the Condition of Christians in Turkey (London 1861; consular reports).

On the Bulgarian Movement of 1860: I. Sofranov, Histoire du mouvement bulgare vers l'Église catholique au XIX^{e} siècle (Rome 1960); G. Eldarov in MF 60 (1960), 426–54; Patriarch Cyrill, Die katholische Propaganda unter den Bulgaren während der 2. Hälfte des 19. Jahrhunderts I (Sofia 1962; in Bulgarian with French synopsis). On Catholicism in Bulgaria, see also B. Ristewski in Razgledi 2 (1960), 908–36, 1005–29, 3 (1960), 72–90, 158–89.

On Catholicism in Rumania: P. Tocanel (General Bibliography).

Bosnia: I. Kecmanović, I. F. Jukič (Belgrade 1963).

The Levant: S. Salaville, "Monseigneur Hillereau, vicaire apostolique de Constantinople," Union des Églises 5 (1926), 134–39; DHGE XIII, 748–49, VIII, 1326–35; M. Julien, La nouvelle mission de la Compagnie de Jésus en Syrie, 1831–95 (Tours 1898); J. Tagher, "Les rapports entre l'Égypte et le Vatican," Cahiers d'histoire égyptienne 2 (1949), 259–71; A. Martini, "La Santa Sede e la questione d'Oriente nel 1854," CivCatt (1958) IV, 169–81; Les PP. Ratisbonne et N.-D. de Sion (Paris 1928); J. Hajjar, L'apostolat des missionnaires latins dans le Proche-Orient selon les directives romaines (Jerusalem 1956); P. Médebielle, Le diocèse patriarchal latin de Jérusalem (Jerusalem 1963).

THE UNIATE PATRIARCHATES: Among the general works, see in addition to Aubert, Pie IX, 415–425, especially Hajjar, 263–309, and Hajjar in RHE 65 (1970), 423–55, 737–88.

ON THE ARMENIANS: de Clercq II, 503–42; DHGE III, 867–70, IV, 338–42; D. Urquart, Le patriarche Hassoun (Geneva 1872); T. Lamy in Revue catholique 38 (Louvain 1874), 153–75, 583–603, 39 (1875), 34–63; M. Ormanian, Le Vatican et les Arméniens (Rome 1873).

ON THE CHALDEANS: B. M. Goormachtigh, "Histoire de la mission dominicaine en Mésopotamie," AOP 3 (1897–98), 141–58, 197–214, 533–45; J. Vosté, Les actes du synode de Rabban Hormizd," S. Congr. per la Chiesa orientale. Cod. Can. Orient. Fonti II/17 (Vatican City 1942); de Clercq II, 543–61; DDC III, 375–85; DHGE V, 317–56; J. C. Panjikaran, Christianity in Malabar (Rome 1926).

ON THE SYRIANS: Mamarbashi, Les Syriens catholiques et leur patriarche Sambiri (Paris 1855); P. Bacel in ÉO 14 (1911), 293–98; de Clercq II, 570–98; DHGE IV, 676–81.

ON THE MELCHITES: J. Hajjar, Le patriarche Maximos III Mazloum (Harissa 1957); de Clercq I, 390–414, II, 562–66; DHGE III, 652–63; IV, 229–36.

ON THE MARONITES: DThC IX, 104–07; de Clercq II, 667–82; Churchill, The Druses and Maronites under the Turquish Rule from 1840 to 1860 (London 1862).

SECTION TWO

The Missions between 1840 and 1870

12. The Strengthening of the Gregorian Restoration

SOURCES AND LITERATURE

A. Brou, S.J., Les Jésuites missionnaires au XIX^e et XX^e siècles (Paris 1935); Collectanea S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide. II. (1867–1906) (=CPF); G. Goyau, La France missionnaire dans les cinq parties du monde, 2 vols. (Paris 1948); Juris Pontificii de Propaganda Fide VI/1, 2, VII (Rome 1884–87) (=JP); A. Launay, Mémorial de la Société des Missions-Étrangères II (Paris 1916); J. A. Otto, S.J., Gründung der neuen Jesuitenmission durch General P. Johann Philip Roothaan (Freiburg 1939) (=J. A. Otto, Roothaan); G. B. Tragella, Le Missioni Estere di Milano nel quadro degli avvenimenti contemporanei, 3 vols. (Milan 1950–63); G. B. Tragella, Italia Missionaria (Milan 1939).

13. The First Vatican Council and the Missions

SOURCES

Mansi, 49–53; ColLac VII (Freiburg 1892); Juris Pontificii de Propaganda Fide VI/2 (Rome 1895 = JP); Schema constitutionis super missionibus apostolicis (Rome 1870 = Schema).

LITERATURE

T. Grentrup, "Die Missionen auf dem Vatikanischen Konzil," ZMR 6 (1916); I. Ting Pong Lee, De jure missionario in Concilio Vaticano. Commentarium pro Religiosis et Missionariis 14 (Rome 1944–46), 107–37; P. de Mondreganes, "Las Misiones en las actas del Concilio Vaticano," ED 1 (1948), 231–43; A. Santos, S.J., Aspecto misional de concilio I. Estudios Eclesiasticos 45 (Madrid 1970), 491–532; P. Wanko, Kirche, Mission, Missionen. Eine Untersuchung der ekklesiologischen und missiologischen Aussagen vom 1. Vatikanum bis "Maximum illud" (theol. diss., Münster 1969); T. Granderath, Geschichte des Vatikanischen Konzils, 3 vols. (Freiburg 1903–06); Schmidlin, PG II, 255–92; R. Aubert, Le Pontificat de Pie IX (Paris 1952), 311–67; R. Aubert, Vaticanum I (Mainz 1965).

SECTION THREE

Light and Shadows of Catholic Vitality

14. Regular and Secular Clergy

ORDERS AND CONGREGATIONS

LITERATURE: Aubert, Pie IX, 456–61; Schmidlin, PG II, 309–13; C. Tyck, Notices historiques sur les congrégations et communeautés religieuses (Louvain 1892), 324–334.

ON THE SOCIETY OF JESUS: Burnichon III and VI (for France, 1845–80), Frías (for the Iberian Peninsula and Latin America), Galleti, Monti, Volpe, and Aldegheri (for Italy), Hughes (for the United States), all listed in the General Bibliography. Also K. Schoeters, P.J. Beckx en de "Jesuiten-politiek" van zijn tijd (Antwerp 1965); B. Duhr, Aktenstücke zur Geschichte der Jesuiten-Missionen in Deutschland 1848–1872 (Freiburg i. Br. 1903); A. Pina, Carlos Rademaker, Restaurador dos Jesuitas em Portugal (Porto 1967).

ON THE BENEDICTINES: P. Schmitz, Histoire de l'ordre de Saint Benoît (Maredsous 1948), 175–212.

ON THE DOMINICANS: Walz, 517–657; H. Cormier, Vie du R.P. Jandel (Paris 1890).

ON THE FRANCISCANS: H. Holzapfel, 331–34, 360–71; Frédégand (Callaey) d'Anvers, Le Tier Ordre de Saint François d'Assise (Paris 1923); on their restoration in France in 1851, see P. Sagues, El P.J. Areso (Madrid 1960).

ON THE REDEMPTORISTS: M. De Meulemeester, Histoire sommaire de la Congrégation du T.S. Rédempteur (Louvain 1958), 139–73.

ON THE SALESIANS: LThK IX, 263–64.

ON THE SCHOOLBROTHERS: G. Rigault, Histoire générale de l'Institu des Frères des Écoles chrétiennes V and VI, L'Ère du Frère Philippe (Paris 1945/48).

THE DIOCESAN CLERGY AND PASTORAL WORK

LITERATURE: Aubert, Pie IX, 451–56; C. Marcilhacy, Le diocèse d'Orléans sous l'épiscopat de Monseigneur Dupanloup (Paris 1962), 48–191; P. Broutin, "Pastorale épiscopale au XIX^e siècle," RAM 35 (1959), 60–77; Daniel-Rops, L'Église des révolutions I (Paris 1960), 882–97; P. Pierrard, Le prêtre français (Paris 1969), 101–28; Baunard, 133–44; C. Kempf, Die Heiligkeit der Kirche im 19. Jahrhundert (Einsiedeln 1928), 77–122. Several biographies of bishops contain details about the development of diocesan organizations and pastoral practice.

15. The Growth of Piety

LITERATURE

K. Kempf, Die Heiligkeit der Kirche im 19. Jahrhundert (Einsiedeln 1928); M. Nédoncelle, Les leçons spirituelles du XIX^e^ siècle (Paris 1936); J. Friedrich, Geschichte des Vaticanischen Concils I (Nördlingen 1877), chap. 15 (tendentious); Aubert, Pie IX, 461–76, 563; Baunard, 197–244, 486–508; Daniel-Rops I, 921–55; H. Pourrat, Histoire de la spiritualité IV (Paris 1930), 505–658; J. de Guibert, La spiritualité de la Compagnie de Jésus (Rome 1953), 459–522; R. Chapman, Father Faber (London 1961).

ON EUCHARISTIC PIETY: DSAM III, 1282–85, IV, 1614–53; M. de Hédouville, Monseigneur de Ségur (Paris 1957); J. Vaudon, L'œuvre des congrès eucharistique, ses débuts (Paris 1910); L. de Paladini, Die eucharistischen Kongresse. Ursprung und Geschichte (Paderborn 1912).

ON THE VENERATION OF THE SACRED HEART OF JESUS: A. Hamon, Histoire de la dévotion au Sacre-Cœur IV (Paris 1931); A. Hamon in DSAM II, 1037–42; Cor Jesu II Pars historica et pastoralis, ed. by A. Bea et al. (Rome 1959), especially H. Holstein (291–340), E. Bergh (457–98), and R. Tucci (538–71); F. Degli Esposti, La teologia del S. Cuore di Gesù (Rome 1967), 11–18.

ON DEVOTION TO MARY: Maria. Études sur la Sainte Vierge, ed. by H. du Manoir, 7 vols. (Paris 1949–64), especially III (1954); B. Saint-John, The Blessed Virgin in the XIXth Century: apparitions, revelations, graces (London 1903); B. Metzler, "Die Marien-Maiandacht in ihrer historischen Entwicklung und Ausbreitung," Der Katholik (1909) I, 100–125, 177–88, 262–82.

ON THE ORIGINS OF THE LITURGICAL MOVEMENT: P. W. Trapp, Vorgeschichte und Ursprung der liturgischen Bewegung (Regensburg 1940); O. Rousseau, Histoire du Movement liturgique (Paris 1945), 1–185; O. Rousseau, "L'œuvre liturgique de Monseigneur Van Caloen," QLP 17 (Louvain 1932), 79–91; Maurus Wolter, dem Gründer Beurons (Beuron 1945), 93–109.

16. The Backwardness of Religious Studies and the Controversy about the "German Theologians"

LITERATURE: Hocedez II; Aubert, Pie IX, 184–223, 526–31; J. Bellamy, La théologie catholique au XIX^e^ siècle (Paris 1904); Grabmann, G, part 3; Schmidlin, PG II, 315–30; F. Russo, "Cent années d'un dialogue difficile entre la science et la foi," Recherches et débats du C.C.I.F. 4 (1953), 7–30. Useful references in Hurter and Sommervogel.

ON THE RATIONALISTIC MOVEMENT: A. D. White, A History of the Warfare of Science and Theology, 2 vols. (London 1896); J. Maurain, "Le conflit de la science et de la croyance," Peuples et civilisations, ed. by L. Halphen and P. Sagnac, XVII (Paris 1939), 303–18; J. M. Robertson, A History of Free Thought in the XIXth Century, 2 vols. (London 1929); Weill, Idée laïque, 147–78; A. Della Torre, Il cristianesimo in Italia dai filosofisti ai modernisti (Palermo 1912); A. Schweitzer, Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (Tübingen 1913).

RELIGIOUS STUDIES OUTSIDE OF GERMANY

LITERATURE: L. Foucher, La philosophie catholique en France au XIX^e siècle (Paris 1955); E. Vacherot, "La théologie catholique en France," Revue des deux mondes 70 (1868), 294–318; C. Pouthas, L'Église et les questions religieuses en France de 1848 à 1877 (Cours de Sorbonne 1954), 223–60; A. Houtin, La question biblique chez les catholiques de France au XIX^e siècle (Paris 1902); DThC VIII, 235–42, Tables générales 2356–58 (for Italy); P. Barbaini, "Cultura teologica e cultura generale nell'epoca del Risorgimento," SC 89 (1961), 411–43; K. Werner, Die italienische Philosophie des 19. Jahrhunderts, 5 vols. (Vienna 1884–86), especially vol. I, Rosmini and His School; C. D. Fonseca, La formazione del clero a Napoli nel sec. XIX (diss., Naples and Posilippo 1955); E. Van Roey, Les sciences théologiques: Le mouvement scientifique en Belgique 1830/1905 II (Brussels 1908), 488–523.

ON CHRISTIAN ARCHEOLOGY: G. Ferretto, Note storico-bibliografiche di archeologia cristiana (Vatican City 1942); R. Fausti, Il P.G. Marchi e il rinnovamento degli studi di archeologia cristiana: Xenia Piana Pio XII dicata (Rome 1943), 445–514.

ON THE THEOLOGY AT THE ROMAN COLLEGE: L'Università Gregoriana del Collegio Romano (Rome 1925); H. Schauf, Carlo Passaglia and Clemens Schrader (Rome 1938); H. Kerkvoorde in EThL 22 (1946), 174–93; C. G. Arevalo, Some Aspects of . . . the Ecclesiology of Perrone, Passaglia and Schrader (Rome 1959); W. Kasper, Die Lehre von der Tradition in der Römischen Schule (Freiburg i. Br. 1962).

ON THE THOMIST RENASCENCE: A. Masnovo, Il neotomismo in Italia. Origini e prime vicende (Milan 1923); P. Dezza, Alle origini del neotomismo (Milan 1940); C. A. Walz, "Il tomismo dal 1800 al 1879", Angelicum 20 (1943), 300–326; Aubert-Martina, 808–11; G. Sanseverino nel 1. centenario della morte (Rome 1965); P. Orlando, Il tomismo a Napoli nel sec. XIX. La scuola del Sanseverino I (Rome 1968); F. Duranti, "La rinascita del tomismo a Perugia," Aguinas 2 (Rome 1962); 249–94; R. Pizzorni in Aquinas 8 (1965), 423–58.

SCHOLASTICS AND GERMANICS VS. THE "GERMAN THEOLOGIANS"

SOURCES: In addition to Döllinger's correspondence, among it Briefwechsel mit Lord Acton, ed. by V. Conzemius, I (Munich 1963), see A. Flir, Briefe aus Rom (Innsbruck 1864); Janssens Briefe, ed. by L. Pastor (Freiburg i. Br. 1920); Briefe von und an Ketteler, ed. by I. Raich (Mainz 1879); A. M. Weiß, Lebensweg und Lebenswerk (Freiburg i. Br. 1925), chaps. I. and II; G. von Hertling, Erinnerungen (Freiburg i. Br. 1919); J. F. von Schulte, Lebenserinnerungen I/II (Giessen 1908–09); F. X. Kraus, Tagebücher, ed. by H. Schiel (Cologne 1957), 1–276. Also the journals Der Katholik, Stimmen aus Maria Laach, Theologisches Literaturblatt, and La Civiltà cattolica, as well as the contemporary summaries by A. von Schmid, Wissenschaftliche Richtungen auf dem Gebiet des Katholizismus in der neuesten und gegenwärtigen Zeit (Munich 1862) and K. Werner, Geschichte der katholischen Theologie (Munich 1866), 342–642.

LITERATURE: Basic, even though partial, is the work of the Old Catholic J. Friedrich, Ignaz von Döllinger III (Munich 1901). Among the more recent works, there are Scheffczyk, XXXVI–IL, 261–522; F. von Bezold, Geschichte der rheinischen Friedrich-Wilhelm-Universität zu Bonn 1818–1918 (Bonn 1920); S. Merkle, "Die Vertretung der Kirchengeschichte in Würzburg bis zum Jahre 1879," Aus der Vergangenheit der Universität Würzburg (Berlin 1932), 146–214; T. Funk in ThQ 108 (1927), 209–20 (for Tübingen); G. B. Guzzetti, La perdita della fede nei cattolici (Venegono 1940), 75–175;

R. Lill, "Die deutschen Theologieprofessoren im Urteil des Münchener Nuntius," Reformata reformanda. Festgabe für Hubert Jedin II (Münster 1965), 483–508.

ON NEO-SCHOLASTICISM: F. Buuck in Scholastik 18 (1943), 54–77; M. Schmaus, Die Stellung Scheebens in der Theologie des XIX. Jahrhunderts: Matthias Joseph Scheeben. Der Erneuerer der katholischen Glaubenswissenschaft (Mainz 1935), 31–54; A. Kerkvoorde, Scheeben et son époque: Matthias Joseph Scheeben. Le Mystère de l'Église (Paris 1946); 5–34; B. Welte, "Zum Strukturwandel der katholischen Theologie im 19. Jahrhundert," Freiburger Dies Universitatis 2 (1953–54), 25–55; T. Schäfer, Die erkenntnistheoretische Kontroverse Kleutgen-Günther. Ein Beitrag zur Entstehungsgeschichte der Neuscholastik (Paderborn 1961); W. Bartz, Das Problem des Glaubens in der Auseinandersetzung mit Joseph Kleutgen (Trier 1950).

SECTION FOUR

The Altercation between Catholicism and Liberalism

17. The Roman Question

SOURCES

DIPLOMACY: B. Bastgen, Die Römische Frage, 3 vols. (Freiburg i. Br. 1917–19); I documenti diplomatici italiani, 1st ser. I–III/XIII, 2nd ser. I–II (Rome 1952–66); Carteggi di Cavour, 16 vols. (Bologna 1926–62); Les origines diplomatiques de la guerre de 1870–71, 28 vols. (Paris 1910–31); L. Thouvenel, Le secret de l'empereur, 1860–63, 2 vols. (Paris 1889); S. Jacini, Il tramonto del potere temporale nelle relazioni delgi ambasciatori austraci a Roma 1860–70 (Bari 1931); N. Blakiston, The Roman Question. Extracts from the Despatches of Odo Russell 1858–70 (London 1962); M. Gabriele, Il carteggio Antonelli-Sacconi 1858–60, 2 vols. (Rome 1962); G. Bandini, "Roma nel 1860, dalla corrispondenza diplomatica spagnuola," RStRis 24 (1937), 3–50, 194–230, 369–404; E. Brazão, A unificação de Italia vista pelos diplomatas portugueses 1848–70, 2 vols. (Coimbra 1963–66); E. Brazão, Relações diplomáticas de Portugal com a Santa Sé a queda de Roma 1870 (Lisbon 1970; August 1870 to July 1871); N. Miko, Das Ende des Kirchenstaates, 4 vols. (Vienna 1962–70; to September 1871).

CORRESPONDENCE: especially P. Pirri, Pio IX e Vittorio Emanuele II dal loro carteggio privato, 5 vols. (Rome 1944–60); La Questione Romana negli anni 1860–61, 2 vols. (Bologna 1930; to be complemented by Carteggio inedito fra M. d'Azeglio e D. Pantaleoni, ed. by G. Faldella [Rome 1888] and by A. Berselli in AstIt 113 [1955], 73–100); Carteggi del P. L. Taparelli d'Azeglio, ed. by P. Pirri (Turin 1933; valuable for the attitude of the "intransigenti" in the period 1850–1862); F. Quintavalle, La conciliazione fra l'Italia e il Papato nelle lettere di P. Tosti al senatore Casati (Milan 1907; valuable for the attitude of the "conciliatoristi"); Lettere e documenti del Barone B. Ricasoli, ed. by M. Tabarrini and A. Gotti, 11 vols. (Florence 1886–96), and Carteggi di Ricasoli, ed. by M. Nobili and S. Camerani, 23 vols. (Rome 1939–68; continuing); B. Ferrari, E. Rendu e M. d'Azeglio. Il Risorgimento italiano visto da un cattolico liberale francese 1849–65 (Santena 1967); on the correspondence of M. d'Azeglio, see A. M. Ghisalberti in RStRis 30 (1943), 398–403.

SPEECHES: C. de Cavour, Discorsi parlamentari, 11 vols. (Turin 1863–72; new edition by A. Omodeo and L. Russo, Florence 1932seqq.); Scritti e discorsi politici di M. d'Azeglio, ed. by M. De Rubris, 3 vols. (Florence 1931–38); Discorsi di U. Rattazzi, 8 vols. (Rome 1876–80).

MEMOIRS: G. Pasolini, Memorie (Turin 1887); M. Minghetti, I miei ricordi (Turin 1889; new edition by A. M. Ghisalberti, Turin 1948; see A. M. Ghisalberti in RStRis 34 [1947], 159–96); N. Roncalli, Diario dall'anno 1849 al 1870, ed. by A. De Magistris (Turin 1887); G. Margotti, Memorie per la storia dei nostri tempi 1856–63 (Turin 1863).

JOURNALS AND NEWSPAPERS: La Civiltà cattolica (1850seqq.) and L'Osservatore Romano (1861seqq.) from the Roman point of view; L'Univers and Le Monde from the French point of view; for Italy, L'Armonia (1846–66), L'Unità cattolica (1863seqq.), L'Osserva- tore cattolico (1864seqq.), and Il Veneto cattolico from the papal point of view, Gli annali cattolici (1862–66) and La Rivista Universale (1866–79) from the liberal Catholic point of view, and La Gazzetta del Popolo (1848seqq.) and La Nuova Antologia (1860seqq.) from the liberal point of view.

LITERATURE

Many bibliographic references are in B. Bastgen, op. cit. III, 841–64, Mollat passim, and Nuove questioni di storia del Risorgimento (Milan 1961), 377–80. Mollat's work, the standard for a long time, must be supplemented with P. Pirri, op. cit. II–1, III–1; J. Maurain, La politique ecclésiastique du Second Empire (Paris 1930), L. Case, Franco-Italian Relations 1860–65 (Philadelphia 1932), Engel-Janosi I, 61–197, R. Mori, La Questione Romana 1861–65 (Florence 1963), and Il tramonto del potere temporale 1866–70 (Rome 1967).

MONOGRAPHS: "Il problema religioso del Risorgimento," RStRis 43 (1956), 191–345, 411–589 (=Congress of Messina in 1954); "L'unità d'Italia e i cattolici italiani," Vita e pensiero 42 (1959), 858–1010; I cattolici e il Risorgimento (Rome 1963); L. Salvatorelli, "Roma e la Questione Romana nella politica europea del sec. XIX," Il Risorgimento e l'Europa (Rome 1964), 39–134; on Cavour and the Roman Question, literature in Il Diritto ecclesiastico 75 (1964), 415, n. 18; W. Hancock, Ricasoli and the Risorgimento in Tuscany (London 1926; also C. Pischeda in RSIt 68 [1956], 37–81); L. Lipparini, Minghetti, 2 vols. (Bologna 1942–47); R. Aubert, "Pio IX et le Risorgimento," Ris 4 (1961), 51–74; R. Aubert, "La chute de Monseigneur de Merode en 1865," RSTI 9 (1955), 331–92; R. Aubert, "La Chiesa cattolica in Italia e la questione dell'unità politica," Humanitas 16 (Brescia 1961), 682–709; G. De Rosa, "Il 'non expedit' e lo Stato unitario italiana," Humanitas 16 (Brescia 1961), 709–32; F. Fonzi, "Echi e reazioni del mondo cattolico all'unificazione italiana," RStT 6 (1960), 247–71; N. Miko, "Österreich-Ungarn und der Untergang des Kirchenstaates im Jahre 1870," RömHM 1 (1958), 130–76; J. M. Goñi Gastambide, "El reconocimiento de Italia y monseñor Claret, confesor de Isabel II," Anthologica annua, 17 (1970), 369–462; A. Graham, The Rise of the Dual Diplomatic Corps in Rome 1870–75 (The Hague 1952); L. P. Wallace, The Papacy and European Diplomacy 1869–78 (Chapel Hill 1948); A. Vigevano, La fine dell'Esercito pontificio (Rome 1920); D. McElrath in RHE 65 (1970), 86–113.

18. The Offensive of the Liberal Governments in the Non-German-Speaking Countries

THE SECULARIZATION POLICY IN ITALY

SOURCES: G. D'Amelio, Stato e Chiesa. La legislazione ecclesiastica fino al 1867 (Milan 1961); ColLac VI (provincial councils); Memorie biografiche di S. Giov. Bosco I–IX, ed. by G. B. Lemoyne (Turin 1898–1917), X–XX, ed. by E. Ceria (Turin 1940–48); Silvino da Nadro, Sinodi diocesani italiani (Vatican City 1960); for pastoral letters, see Aubert-Martina, 14–15. A good anthology is P. Scoppola, ed., Chiesa e Stato nella storia d'Italia. Storia documentaria (Bari 1967), 3–138.

LITERATURE: There is an especially rich bibliography. A good start can be made with F. Fausti, I cattolici e la società italiana dopo l'Unità (Rome 1960), 111–18 and Stato e Chiesa: Nuove questioni di storia del Risorgimento (Milan 1961), II, 325–35.

GENERAL: Aubert-Martina, 119–33, 163–82, 563–73, 761–838; Jemolo, 13–264; Jemolo, La questione della proprietà ecclesiasticha 1848–88 (Turin 1911); S. Jacini, La politica ecclesiastica italiana da Villafranca a Porta Pia (Bari 1938); the files of the congresses of Messina in 1954, Il problema religioso nel Risorgimento (Rome 1958) and of Castiglioncello in 1958, "Il problema politico del cattolicesimo nel Risorgimento (=RStT 4 [1958], 213–407); A Della Torre, Il cristianesimo in Italia dai filosofisti ai modernisti (Milan 1912); G. Spini, Risorgimento e protestanti (Naples 1958), 257–369; A. Luzio, La massoneria e il Risorgimento italiano (Bologna 1925).

THE CONFLICT BETWEEN THE HOLY SEE AND PIEDMONT: C. Magni, I Subalpini e il concordato. Studio storico-giuridico sulla formazione delle leggi Siccardi (Padua 1967; also, Humanitas 17 [1962], 686–89 and RSIt 82 [1970], 256–59); V. Gorresio, La lotta per lo stato laico: Saggi storici sul liberalismo italiano (Perugia 1953), 373–458; F. J. Coppa in CHR 54 (1969), 579–612; A. M. Ghisalberti, M. d'Azeglio, un moderato realisatore (Rome 1953), especially 187–92, 199–223; A. C. Jemolo, Scritti vari (Milan 1965), 277–395; B. Ferrari in Aevum 32 (1958), 262–70; M. F. Mellano, Il caso Fransoni e la politica ecclesiastica piemontese 1848–50 (Rome 1964; also G. Griseri in BStBiS 64 [1966], 375–492); A. Bozzola and T. Buttini in Il Risorgimento italiano 13 (1920), 217ff., 14 (1921), 81ff.; G. Biagio Furiozzi, "P. di Santa Rosa e il cattolicesimo liberale in Piemonte, 1850," RStRis 58 (1971), 21–47; M. Hudry in ChStato I, 327–54; M. Hudry, "Charvaz e Cavour 1852–61," Miscellanea Cavouriana (Turin 1964), 117–208; V. Eligio, Il tentativo di introdurre il matrimonio civile in Piemonte (Rome 1951); G. Ferroglio, "Per la storia della legge del 29.5.1855," Il Diritto ecclesiastico 63 (1952), 3–42; E. Borghese, "La crisi calabiana [1855] sec. nuovi documenti," BStBiS 55 (1957), 425–81; C. Pischeda, "Documenti sulla questione ecclesiastica in Piemonte, 1857," Critica storica 3 (1964), 764–91.

ON THE OTHER ITALIAN STATES: I Arcuno, Il Regno delle Due Sicilie nei rapporti con lo Stato pontificio 1846–50 (Naples 1933); G. Martina, Pio IX e Leopoldo II (Rome 1967; see also A. Salvestrini in Studi storici 6 [1965], 55–98); G. Ferroglio, "I provvedimenti in materia ecclesiastica dei governi provvisori parmensi 1859," Raccolta di scritti in onore di C.A. Jemolo I (Milan 1963), 489–519; L. Briguglio, "Patriarcato di Venezia e governo austriaco," Nova historia 13 (Verona 1961), 3–30; L. Briguglio, "Lo spirito religioso nel Veneto durante la terza dominazione austriaca," RStRis 42 (1955), 22–57; G. De Rosa, "La crisi della parrochia nel Veneto dopo il 1866," Fonti e ricerche di storia ecclesiastica padovana (Padua 1967), 205–21; A. Gambasin, "Orientamenti spirituali e stati d'animo di cattolici intransigenti veneti," ChStato I, 243–96; G. Mantese, "La cultura religiosa a Vicenza negli anni dell'unificazione italiana," ChStato II, 391–419; A. Agazzi, "E. Tazzoli e il clero del Lombardo-Veneto," Bergomum 28 (1954), 25–47.

ON THE CLERGY: Aubert-Martina, 761–807; S. Bruno, Ordini religiosi e clero in Basilicata 1861–70 (Matera 1964); X. Toscani, "Indicazioni sul clero bergamasco," RSTI 21 (1967), 411–53; A. Gambasin, Il clero padovano 1859–66 (Rome 1967); B. Bertoli, Il clero veneziano dopo il 1848; Rassegna di politica e di storia (1964), 7–25.

BIOGRAPHIES: (one of the most neglected areas of ecclesiastical historiography in Italy). G. Russo, Il cardinale S. Riario Sforza e l'unità d'Italia (Naples 1962; also, G. Russo in Asprenas 11 [Naples 1964], 225–319, 14 [1967], 66–162, 324–90); A. Fermi, Monsignor A. Ranza, vescovo di Piacenza, 2 vols. (Piacenza 1956–66); C. Castiglione, Gaysruck e Romilli arcivescovi di Milano (Milan 1938); C. Castiglione, Vita di Monsignor Nazari di Calabiana (Milan 1952); T. Lecisotti, Il cardinale Dusmet (Catania 1962); M. Maccarrone, Il Concilio Vaticano I (Padua 1966), 3–132 (on Archbishop Arrigoni). Other references in Aubert-Martina, 18–20.

ON THE ORIGINS OF THE CATHOLIC MOVEMENT: L. Bedeschi, Le origini della gioventù cattolica (Bologna 1959); G. De Rosa, Storia del Movimento cattolico in Italia I (Bari 1966), 39–120; G. De Rosa, Le Associazioni cattoliche dal Neoguelfismo all' Unità: I cattolici italiani dall 800 ad oggi I (Brescia 1964), 95–150; A. Berselli, Alle origini del movimento cattolico intransigente (Livorno 1954); B. Bertoli, Le origini del movimento cattolico a Venezia (Brescia 1965); G. Griseri in BStBiS 11 (1963), 257–97 (on Piedmont between 1849 and 1861); S. Sciortino: La Sicilia e l'unità d'Italia (Milan 1962), 562–92; C. Marsilli in Aurea Parma 47 (1963), 127–45; M. Stranghellini in RStRis 43 (1956), 547–56 (on Lucca); P. Borzomati, Aspetti religiosi e storia del movimento cattolico in Calabria 1860–1919 (Rome 1967), 7–182. See also Aubert-Martina, 563–64.

ANTICLERICALISM IN BELGIUM AND IN THE NETHERLANDS

BELGIUM: In addition to pastoral letters of bishops and A. Simon, Réunions des évêques de Belgique. Procès verbaux, 2 vols. (Louvain 1960–61), see information in the files of the congresses of Mechelen (=Assemblée générale des catholiques en Belgique, 1864, 1865, and 1867), in the Journal historique et littéraire (to 1867), the Revue catholique (1843–84), the Revue générale (1865seqq.), and the two most important daily newspapers, Le Journal de Bruxelles (1840seqq.) and Le Bien public (1853seqq.). See also C. Woeste, Mémoires (from 1859) I (Brussels 1927), 53–144; M. Becqué and A. Louant, "Le dossier 'Rome et Louvain' de Charles Périn," RHE 50 (1955), 36–124; and the documents published by A. Simon in Catholicisme et politique (Wetteren 1955) and L'hypothèse libérale en Belgique (Wetteren 1956); D. De Haerne, Tableau de la charité chrétienne en Belgique (Brussels 1857); E. Banning, L'épiscopat et l'instruction publique de 1830 à 1879 (Brussels 1879); E. Banning, Exposé historique des rapports entre le gouvernement belge et le Saint-Siège de 1830 à 1880 (Brussels 1881); A. Simon, ed., Instructions aux nonces de Bruxelles 1835–1889 (Brussels 1961); K. van Isacker, Werkelijk en wettelijk land 1863–84 (Antwerp 1955; see Revue nouvelle 23 [1956], 250–57 and A. Simon in RHE 51 [1956], 231–34); A. Simon, Le parti catholique belge (Brussels 1958); S. Balau, 70 ans d'histoire contemporaine de Belgique (Brussels 1889), 89–376; A. Erba, L'esprit laïque en Belgique 1857–70 (Louvain 1967); M. Defourny, Les congrès catholiques en Belgique (Louvain 1908; to be complemented with A. Delmer in Revue générale 90 [1909], 317–52); A. Rubbens, "De bezorgdheid van de Belgische Katholieken voor het onderwijs vanaf het Mechels Congres van 1863 tot aan de schoolwet van 1879," Collationes brugenses et gandavenses 13 (1967), 518–33, 14 (1968), 103–29, 243–69; P. Gérin, 150 Jaar katholieke Arbeidersbeweging in Belgie, ed. by S. Scholl, I (Brussels 1963), 245–319; A. Verhaegen, J. Lammens et les œuvres catholiques (Ghent 1909); J. Daris, Le diocèse de Liège sous Monseigneur de Montpellier (Liège 1892). In addition to the biographies of cardinals Sterckx and Dechamps (General Bibliography) and of bishops Van Bommel and Ad. Dechamps, see also H. de Trannoy, Jean-Baptiste Malou (Brussels 1905; to be complemented with the articles by the same author in Revue générale 115 [1926], 513–22, 141 [1939], 1–18); J. Garsou, Frère-Orban de 1857 à 1878 (Brussels 1946); E. Rubbens, E. Ducpétiaux, 2 vols. (Louvain 1922–34); R. Warlomont, F. Laurent (Brussels 1948).

NETHERLANDS: D. Langedijk, De schoolstrijd in de eerste jaren na de wet van 1857 (Kampen 1937); C. Brok, Openbaar en bijzonder onderwijs in Breda (Tilburg 1964); J. M. Gysen, J.A. Paredis, bischop van Roermond (Assen 1968); 399–431.

THE CONFUSED SITUATION IN THE IBERIAN PENINSULA

SPAIN: J. López Órtiz, Los cien años de la vida del concordato de 1851: El concordato de 1953 (Madrid 1956), 41–64; J. M. Cuenca Toribio, La Iglesia española ante la revolución liberal (Madrid 1970), 197–290; J. M. Cuenca Toribio in HS 22 (1969), 129–285; V. Cacho Vía, La Institución Libre de Enseñanza I: Origenes (Madrid 1962; on Sanz del Río and the progress of positivism); C. J. Bartlett, "The Question of Religious Toleration in Spain in the XIXth Century," JEH 8 (1957), 205–16 (on the difficult entrance of Protestantism, supported by English diplomacy); G. Barberini, "El article 11 de la Constitución de 1876. Controversia diplomática entre España y la Santa Sede," Anthologica annua 9 (1961), 279–409 (on freedom of religion); M. Menéndez y Pelayo, Los heterodoxos españoles (Edition BAC, Madrid 1956) II, 946–1119.

PORTUGAL: X. Coutinho, "A descritianização de Portugal no seculo XIX," Miscellanea historiae ecclesiasticae III (Louvain 1970), 359–79.

REGALISTIC LIBERALS AND FREEMASONS IN LATIN AMERICA

MEXICO: W. H. Callcott, Church and State in Mexico 1822–57 (New York 1926); W. H. Callcott, Liberalism in Mexico 1857–1929 (Stanford 1931); G. García Cantú, El pensamiento de la revolución, historia documental, 1810–62 (Mexico City 1966); W. V. Scholes, Mexican Politics during the Juarez Regime 1855–72 (Columbia 1957); cf. CHR 51 (1965), 509–28; M. A. Cleven, "The Ecclesiastical Policy of Maximilian," HAHR 9 (1929), 317–60; G. Martina, "La corrispondenza tra Pio IX e Massimiliano," AHPont 5 (1967), 373–91; De Cosío Villegas, ed., La historia moderna de México, I (Mexico City 1956; from 1867); L. Zea, Apogeo y decadencia del positivismo en Méjico (Mexico City 1944).

COLOMBIA: A. Pérez Aguirre, 25 años de historia colombiana 1853 a 1878 (Bogotá 1959); J. Jaramillo Uribe, "Romanticismo, utopismo y positivismo en el pensamiento social y político colombiano del seculo XIX," Revista Bolivar 13 (1960), 117–44.

VENEZUELA: J. Nava in HAHR 45 (1965), 527–43.

BRAZIL: M. C. Thornton, The Church and Free Masonry in Brazil, 1872–75. A Study in Regalism (Washington 1943); R. D. Oliveira, O Conflicto maçonico-religioso de 1872 (Petropolis 1952).

19. Preliminary Phases of the Kulturkampf in Austria, Bavaria, Baden, and Switzerland

LITERATURE

G. Franz, Kulturkampf, Staat und katholische Kirche in Mitteleuropa von der Säkularisation bis zum Abschluß des preußischen Kulturkampfes (Munich 1954); G. Franz-Willing, Kulturkampf gestern und heute. Eine Säkularbetrachtung (Munich 1971).

AUSTRIA: M. Hussarek, "Die Krise und die Lösung des Konkordats vom 18. August 1855," AÖG 112 (1932); K. Eder, Der Liberalismus in Alt-Österreich (Vienna 1955); N. Miko, "Der Untergang des Kirchenstaates und Österreich-Ungarn im Jahre 1870," Römische Historische Mitteilungen 1 ((1956–57); Karl Eder, "Die katholische Kirche in Österreich-Ungarn um 1870," Festschrift für Karl Eder (Innsbruck 1959); Engel-Janosi, Österreich und der Vatikan 1846–1918 I (Graz, Vienna and Cologne 1958), 143–97; F. Engel-Janosi, Die politische Korrespondenz der Päpste mit den österreichischen Kaisern 1804–1918 (Vienna and Munich 1964), 35–46, nos. 124–42; Weinzierl-Fischer, Die österreichischen Konkordate von 1855 und 1933 (Vienna and Munich 1960), 112–24; E. Sauer, Die politischen Aspekte der österreichischen Bischofsernennungen 1867–1903 (Vienna and Munich 1968).

BAVARIA: J. Grisar, "Die Circulardepesche des Fürsten Hohenlohe vom 9. April 1869 über das bevorstehende Vatikanische Konzil," Bayern. Staat und Kirche, Land und Reich, Gedenkschrift für Wilhelm Winkler (Munich 1961); D. Albrecht, "Döllinger, die bayerische Regierung und das erste Vatikanische Konzil," Spiegel der Geschichte. Festgabe für Max Braubach (Münster 1964); Franz-Willing, Die bayerische Vatikangesandschaft 1803–1934 (Munich 1965), 52–68; W. Brandmüller, "Die Publikation des I. Vatikanischen Konzils in Bayern. Aus den Anfängen des bayerischen Kulturkampfes," ZBLG 31 (1968); M. Weber, Das I. Vatikanische Konzil im Spiegel der bayerischen Politik (Miscellanea Bavarica Monacensia no. 28 [Munich 1970]).

BADEN: E. Friedberg, Der Staat und die katholische Kirche im Großherzogtum Baden seit dem Jahre 1860 (Leipzig 1874); J. Becker, "Staat und Kirche in Baden in der 2. Hälfte des 19. Jahrhunderts. Bericht über den Stand der Vorarbeiten an einer geplanten Quellenpublikation," ZGObrh 111 (1963); L. Gall, "Die partei- und sozialgeschichtliche Problematik des badischen Kulturkampfes," ZGObrh 113 (1965); L. Gall, Der Liberalismus als regierende Partei. Das Großherzogtum Baden zwischen Restauration und Reichsgründung (Wiesbaden 1968); M. Stadelhofer, Der Abbau der Kulturkampfgesetzgebung im Großherzogtum Baden 1878–1918 (Mainz 1969).

SWITZERLAND: P. Gschwind, Geschichte der Entstehung der christkatholischen Kirche der Schweiz, 2 vols. (Solothurn 1904–10); V. Conzemius, "Eugène Michaud, ein katholischer Reformator des 19. Jahrhunderts?" ZSKG 58 (1964); V. Conzemius, "Der schweizerische Bundesrat und das erste Vatikanische Konzil," SZG 15 (1965).

20. Internal Catholic Controversies in Connection with Liberalism

LITERATURE

FRANCE: Aubert, Pie IX, 224–61, 531–37; C. de Montalembert, Catholicisme et liberté. Correspondance inédite 1852–1870 (Paris 1970); Weill, Cath. lib., 91–202; Gurian, 210–38; M. Prelot, Le libéralisme catholique (Paris 1969), 14–33, 190–237; J. Maurain, La politique ecclésiastique du Second Empire (Paris 1930); J. Gadille, La pensée et l'action politique des évêques français au début de la troisième République (Paris 1967) I, 46–142; J. Fèvre, Histoire critique du catholicisme libéral en France jusqu'au pontificat de Léon XIII (Paris 1897; a partisan, but well-informed indictment); and the biographies (see General Bibliography) of Montalembert, Veuillot, Dupanloup, Pie, Maret, Guéranger, and Lacordaire; DHGE XIV, 1117–19 (on Dupanloup); L. de Lanzac de Laborie, Le comte de Falloux (Paris 1912; see also DHGE XVI, 1499–1513); H. Boissard, T. Foisset (Paris 1891; see also DHGE XVII, 1392–96); J. de Pange in Le Correspondant 317 (1929), 113–37 (on the years 1855–64); J. Lecler: Études 291 (1956), 196–211 (concerning the Jesuits).

ITALY: Carteggi di L. Taparelli d'Azeglio e di B. Ricasoli; the files of the council of Castiglioncello, "Il problema politico dei cattolici nel XIX secolo," RStT 4 (1949), 215–407; G. Martina, Il liberalismo cattolico ed il Sillabo (Rome 1959); Jemolo, 87–264; Jemolo, Scritti vari (Milan 1965), 397–454; E. Passerin in RSTI 20 (1966), 500–506; G. Spadolini, "L'intransigentismo cattolico dalla 'Civiltà cattolica' al 'Sillabo,' " RStT 4

(1956), 309–32; F. Fonzi in Itinerari 4 (Genoa 1956), 603–23; E. Passerin d'Entrèves, Nuove Questioni di storia del Risorgimento (Milan 1961), 565–606.

BELGIUM: A. Simon, L'hypothèse libérale en Belgique (Wetteren 1956); A. Simon, Catholicisme et politique (Wetteren 1955); A. Simon, Le cardinal Sterckx I (Wetteren 1950), 209–56; E. de Moreau, A. Dechamps (Brussels 1911), 423–78; K. van Isacker, Werkelijk en wettelijk Land (Antwerp 1955), 1–85.

GERMANY: In addition to the general works by Goyau, Schnabel, Brück, and Kißling, and the biographies of Döllinger and Ketteler (see General Bibliography), see J. Rovan, Le catholicisme politique en Allemagne (Paris 1956), 46–78.

ENGLAND: In addition to the general works by W. Ward, W.G. Ward and the Catholic Revival (London 1893), 130–210, and M. Ward, The W. Wards and the Transition (London 1934), 1–53, and the biographies of Manning, Newman, and Ullathorne (cited in the General Bibliography), see J. Altholz, The Liberal Catholic Movement in England (London 1962); H. MacDougall, Acton-Newman Relations (New York 1962); A. Gasquet, Lord Acton and his Circle (London 1906; see also Cambridge Historical Journal 10 [1950], 77–105, where attention is drawn to grave gaps in the edition of the letters).

ON THE SYLLABUS: C. G. Rinaldi, Il valore del Sillabo (Rome 1888); DThC XIV, 2877–2923; G. Martina, "Osservazioni sulle varie redazioni del "Sillabo," ChStato II, 419–523; G. Martina, "Nuovi documenti sulla genesi del Sillabo," AHPont 6 (1968), 319–69; R. Aubert in Revue Nouvelle 40 (Brussels 1964), 369–85, 481–99; R. Aubert, "Monseigneur Dupanloup et le Syllabus," RHE 51 (1956), 79–142, 471–512, 837–915; R. Aubert, Scrinium Lovaniense (Louvain 1961), 543–60 (on the reaction in Belgium); R. Aubert, Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Kulturgeschichte Spaniens 19 (Münster 1962), 291–304 (on the reaction in Spain); E. Papa, Il Sillabo di Pio IX e la stampa francese, inglese e italiana (Rome 1968); D. McElrath, The Syllabus of Pius IX. Some reactions in England (Louvain 1964); B. Schneider, "Der Syllabus und die deutschen Jesuiten," AHPont 6 (1968), 371–92.

ANTILIBERALISM AND SOCIAL CATHOLICISM: General description and bibliography in Die Katholische Arbeiterbewegung in Westeuropa, ed. by S. Scholl and G. Mees (Bonn 1966). Useful information in R. Kothen, La pensée e l'action sociale des catholiques (Louvain 1945).

BELGIUM: R. Rezsohazy, Origines et formation du catholicisme social en Belgique (Louvain 1958), 1–98; P. Gérin in 150 Jaar Katholieke Arbeidersbeweging in Belgie, ed. by S. Scholl, I (Brussels 1963), 223–319.—Germany: M Moennig, Die Stellung der deutschen katholischen Sozialpolitiker des 19. Jahrhunderts zur Staatsintervention in der sozialen Frage (Münster 1927); E. Ritter, Die katholische soziale Bewegung Deutschlands im 19. Jahrhundert und der Volksverein (Cologne 1954).

SECTION FIVE

The Victory of Ultramontanism

21. Ultramontane Progress and Final Gallican Resistance

LITERATURE

ON THE MOVEMENT IN GENERAL: Aubert, Pie IX, 262–310, 537–41; R. Aubert, La géographie ecclésiastique au XIX^e^ siècle: L'ecclésiologie au XIX^e^ siècle, 36–55; C. Butler, The Vatican Council I (London 1930), 23–78; J. Friedrich, Geschichte des Vaticanischen Concils I: Vorgeschichte (Nördlingen 1877); W. Ward, W. G. Ward and the Catholic Revival (London 1893), chap. V.

FRANCE: See in addition to the biographies of Maret, Guéranger, Veuillot, Clausel, Sibour, Gousset, Mathieu, and Darboy (General Bibliography), J. Maurain, Le Saint-Siège et la France de décembre 1851 à avril 1853 (Paris 1930); J. Maurain, La politique ecclésiastique du Second Empire (Paris 1930), chaps. III, V, IX, XVI, XVIII, XXI, XXII, XXIV, XXVII; P. de Quirielle, "Pie IX et l'Église de France," Annales de l'École des sciences politiques 5 (1890), 490–514, 6 (1891), 111–48; A. Houtin, Un dernier gallican, H. Bernier (Paris 1904); A. Houtin, Le P. Hyacinthe dans l'Église romaine (Paris 1920); A. Ricard, L'abbé Combalot (Paris 1891); M. de Hédouville, Monseigneur de Ségur (Paris 1957), 174–227, 485–534; de Montclos, 107–33, 200–321, 405; J. Gadille, "Autour de Louis Veuillot et de l'Univers," Cahiers d'histoire 14 (1969), 275–88; "Monseigneur Darboy et le Saint-Siège," RHLR 12 (1907), 240–81 (also R. Durand in Bulletin de la Société d'histoire moderne 7 [1907–08], 6–10); P. Mabile, Vie de Monseigneur Mabile (Paris 1926); J. -R. Palanque, Catholiques libéraux et gallicans en France face au concile du Vatican (Aix 1962), 5–32.

GERMANY: In addition to the biographies of Geissel, Ketteler, and Döllinger (General Bibliography), see Goyau IV, 201–90; V. Conzemius, "Aspects ecclésiologiques de l'évolution de Döllinger et du vieux-catholicisme," L'ecclésiologie au XIX^e^ siècle, 247–79; S. Loesch, Döllinger und Frankreich (Munich 1955).

ENGLAND: See the biographies of Wiseman and Ullathorne (General Bibliography), W. G. Ward (see above), Newman, and Manning.

22. The Vatican Council

SOURCES

The majority of the official files were published by L. Petit and J. -B. Martin in Mansi XLIX–LIII. Concerning the reliability of the stenographic records of the debates, see the diary by Dehon (below), 5–10, 60f., and C. Mirbt in HZ 101 (1908), 546–48. But in order to write a history of the council, the official files must be complemented by other categories of sources still partly unpublished. Nearly six hundred documents (newspaper articles, manifestoes, diplomatic telegrams, letters of bishops, etc.) were printed in the second part (Documenta historica) of Volume VII of the Collectio Lacensis (Freiburg i. Br. 1892). E. Cecconi, Storia del Concilio Vaticano, 4 vols. (Florence 1872–79) contains 308 documents dealing with the preparation of the council. A number of polemical writings were reprinted in J. Friedrich, Documenta ad illustrandum Concilium Vaticanum, 2 vols. (Nördlingen 1872) and E. Friedberg, Sammlung der Aktenstücke zum I. Vatikanischen Konzil, 2 vols. (Tübingen 1872–76).

MEMOIRS AND COLLECTIONS OF CORRESPONDENCE: L. Pásztor, "Il Concilio Vaticano I nel diario del cardinale Capalti," AHPont 7 (1969), 401–90; J. Friedrich, Tagebuch während des Vaticanischen Concils (Nördlingen 1873); E. Donckel, ed., Reise nach Rom zum I. Vatikanischen Konzil. Tagebuch von Monsignor Adames (Luxemburg 1963); V. Carbone, Diario del Concilio Vaticano di L. Dehon (Rome 1962); L. Veuillot, Rome pendant le concile, 2 vols. (Paris 1872); V. Conzemius, ed., Ignaz von Döllinger - Lord Acton, Briefwechsel II (Munich 1965); H. J. Browne, "Letters of Bishop McQaid," CHR 41 (1956), 408–41; L. Lenhart in AMrhKG 4 (1952), 307–29, 6 (1954), 208–29 (letters of Ketteler and his secretary Raich); F. Guédon in Les Lettres (1928) II, 19–34, 190–206, 314–31 (letters of Monsignor Foulon); P. Batiffol in RHEF 13 (1927), 199–213 (letters of Monsignor Devoucoux); J. Nasrallah, "Monseigneur Grégoire 'Ata et le concile du Vatican," PrOrChr 11 (1961), 297–330, 12 (1962), 97–122; R. Aubert, "Documents concernant le Tiers Parti au concile du Vatican," Abhandlungen über Theologie und Kirche (Düsseldorf 1952), 241–59; S. Jacini, Il tramonto del potere temporale nelle relazioni degli ambasciatori austriaci a Roma (Bari 1931); N. Blakiston, The Roman Question. Extracts from the Despatches of Odo Russell from Rome (London 1962); V. Conzemius in ThQ 140 (1960), 427–62 (letters of the Bavarian diplomat Arco Valley); A. Tamborra, Imbro I. Tkalac e l'Italia (Rome 1966), 123–44, 225–338; R. Aubert and J. -R. Palanque, "Lettres de Lady Blennerhasset au lendemain du concile du Vatican," RHE 58 (1963), 82–135.

LITERATURE

The best treatment is that by C. Butler, The Vatican Council. The Story told from inside in Bishop Ullathorne's Letters, 2 vols. (London 1930, 1965); the most recent treatment is by R. Aubert, Vatican I (Paris 1964); the most comprehensive treatment from the Catholic point of view is that by T. Granderath, Geschichte des Vatikanischen Konzils, 3 vols. (Freiburg i. Br. 1903–06, too apologetic); the best treatment from the point of view of the Old Catholics is by J. Friedrich, Geschichte des Vaticanischen Concils, 3 vols. (Nördlingen 1877–87, partisan); E. Mourret, Le concile du Vatican (Paris 1919) is of lasting value because of its use of the diary of M. Icard; H. Rondet, Vatican I (Paris 1962) concerns itself chiefly with the neglected aspects (preparation of the schemata, working methods, unimplemented projects). For the diplomatic aspects and impressions, see É. Ollivier, L'Église et l'État au concile du Vatican, 2 vols. (Paris 1877). From the Protestant point of view, C. Mirbt in HZ 101 (1908), 529–600.

ON NATIONALITIES: J. J. Hennesey, The First Council of the Vatican. The American Experience (New York 1963); F. J. Cwiekowski, The English Bishops and the First Vatican Council (Louvain 1971); M. Maccarrone, Il Concilio Vaticano e il "Giornale di Monsignor Arrigoni," 2 vols. (Padua 1966), on the Italian episcopate; J. -R. Palanque, Catholiques libéraux et gallicans en France face au Concile du Vatican (Aix-en-Provence 1962; see also RHEF 48 [1962], 54–79); M. Martin Tejedor, "España y el Concilio Vaticano," HS 20 (1967), 99–175; J. Hajjar, "L'épiscopat catholique oriental et le I^er^ Concile du Vatican," RHE 65 (1970), 423–55, 737–88; M. Mac Suibhne, "Ireland at the Vatican Council,"

Irish Ecclesiastical Records 93 (1960), 209–22, 295–307; U. Betti, "I Frati minori al Concilio Vaticano," Antonianum 32 (1957), 17–26.

ON THE DOGMATIC CONSTITUTIONS: J. P. Torrell, La théologie de l'épiscopat au I^er^ concile du Vatican (Paris 1961); G. Dejaifve, Pape et évêques au I^er^ concile du Vatican (Bruges and Paris 1961); G. Dejaifve in NRTh 82 (1960), 787–802; G. Dejaifve, L'épiscopat et l'Église universelle (Paris 1962), 639–736; R. Aubert, "L'ecclésiologie au concile du Vatican," Le concile et les conciles (Paris and Chevetogne 1960), 245–84; R. Aubert in Lumière et Vie (St. Alban) 14 (1954), 21–52; A. Alsteen in EThL 38 (1962), 461–503; W. Dewan in EThL 36 (1960), 23–56. A number of historio-systematic works were reprinted thanks to the efforts of the Vatican Library in De doctrina Concilii Vaticani Primi (Vatican City 1969).

SPECIAL ASPECTS: J. Gadille, Albert Du Boÿs. Ses "Souvenirs du Concile du Vatican". L'intervention du gouvernement impérial à Vatican I (Louvain 1968); F. Engel-Janosi in MÖSTA 8 (1955), 223–35; L. Pásztor in RSTI 23 (1969), 441–66; H. J. Pottmeyer in Annuarium Historiae Conciliorum 2 (1970), 87–111 (on the method in the constitution Dei Filius); A. Hagen in ThQ 123 (1942), 223–52, 124 (1943), 1–40, 148 (1968), 403–28 (on Hefele's attitude); T. Freudenberger, Die Universität Würzburg und das erste Vatikanische Konzil I (Neustadt 1969); R. Lill, "Zur Verkündigung des Unfehlbarkeitsdogmas in Deutschland," GWU (1963), 469–83.

23. The Rise of the Old Catholic Community

LITERATURE

J. F. von Schulte, Der Altkatholizismus (Gießen 1887, reprint Hildesheim 1965); J. F. von Schulte, Lebenserinnerungen I (Gießen 1908); J. Troxler, Die neuere Entwicklung des Altkatholizismus (Cologne 1908); P. Gschwind, Geschichte der Entstehung der christkatholischen Kirche der Schweiz, 2 vols. (Solothurn 1904–10); M. Kopp, Der Altkatholizismus in Deutschland 1871–1912 (Berne and Kempten 1913); K. Algermissen, Konfessionskunde (Celle 1957), 745–63; C. B. Moss, The Old Catholic movement, its origins and history (London 1964); U. Küry, Die altkatholische Kirche (Die Kirchen der Welt 3 [Stuttgart 1966]); Conzemius, Katholizismus ohne Rom. Die altkatholische Kirchengemeinschaft (Zurich, Einsiedeln and Cologne 1969); A. Lauscher, Die katholisch-theologische Fakultät der Universität zu Bonn (Düsseldorf 1920); P. Wenzel, Der Freundeskreis um Anton Günther (Essen 1965); E. Kleineidam, Die Katholisch-Theologische Fakultät der Universität Breslau (Cologne 1961).

INDIVIDUALS: Baltzer: A. Franz (Breslau 1873); Döllinger: Friedrich, Döllinger III (Munich 1901); Friedrich: F. H. Hacker (Kempten 1918); Reinkens: F. Nippold (Leipzig 1896); J. M. Reinkens (Gotha 1906); B. Poll in AHVNrh 155/56 (1954), 392–410; V. Conzemius: Rheinische Lebensbilder 4 (Düsseldorf 1970), 209–33; Reusch: L. K. Goetz (Gotha 1901); Schulte: R. von Scherer (Vienna 1915); N. Hilling in AkathKR 95 (1915), 519—27.

INDEX

Abdul Mejid, sultan 169
Abel, Carl August von 110
Academic freedom 291f, 304
Achterfeld, J. A. 32, 35
Acquaderni, G. 260f
Acton, John Emmerick Edward 124, 293, 320, 325
Ad limina visits 308
Affre, Denis Auguste, archbishop of Paris 6, 15, 49, 66, 68, 103
Africa mission 196ff
Agnosticism, English 235
Alacoque, Marguerite Marie 222, 224
Al-Bashir 170
Alberdingk Thijm, Joseph 79
Albertario 290
Alcántara Herrán 270
Aleppo, national council of Melchites (1866) 173
Alexander II, tsar of Russia 155, 162
Alimonda, Cajetan, cardinal 261
Allemand, J. J. 25
Allgemeine Zeitung (Augsburg) 326
Allioli, Joseph Franz von 42
Altar sacrament, form of veneration 221f
Alzog, Johann Baptist 245
Alzon, Emmanuel d' 104, 157, 158, 167, 215
Amberger, J. 22
America, see Latin America, United States of America
American College in Rome 133
Amicizie 176
Amorim Pessoa, John Chrysostom d', archbishop of Goa 181, 182
Ancaroni, master general O.P. 11
Andlaw-Birseck, Heinrich Bernhard von 7, 71
André, abbé 305
Andrea, d', cardinal 234
Anglicans and First Vatican Council 315f
Annales de philosophie chrétienne 50, 55
Annali cattolici 291
Annam, see Indochina
Anticlericalism 214
—in Baden 278ff
—in Belgium 262ff, 265, 289
—in Colombia 270
—in France 68f, 93, 100f
—in Italy 289
—in Latin America 269ff
—in Mexico 269
—in Netherlands 265ff
—in Portugal 148, 267
—in Prussia 280
—in Spain 144f, 148
Antiliberalism and social Catholicism 299ff
Antonelli, Giacomo, cardinal 61, 63, 64, 87, 88, 127, 180, 221, 248, 250, 251, 252, 254, 257, 295, 308, 327
Antonin of Florence 328
Antonio di S. Giacomo, general superior of the Passionists 211
Antonites 171
Apologetics 234ff
Apostolate 215
—methods 217
Apostolic Union of Secular Priests 214
April Movement (Netherlands 1853) 78
Araujo, M. de 154
Arbues 313
Archeology, Christian 229
Arendt, W. 44
Argentina 150f, 152, 271
Armenian Uniate Church 160, 171, 309
Arqus, Philipp, Syrian patriarch 173
Asia, reorganization of missions 178ff
Association of Sons of Mary the Immaculate 24
Associatio perseverantiae sacerdotalis 214
Association for the Support of Schools in the Near East 202
Association of Ladies of the Children of Mary 25
Association of the Immaculate Conception of Mary for the Support of the Catholics in the Ottoman Empire 157
Association of the Sacred Heart of Jesus 177
Assumptionists 98, 157, 167
—in Turkey 170
Aeterni Patris, bull (1868) 199f, 316

Atonement, pilgrimages of 222
Audo, Joseph, Chaldean patriarch 172
Auersperg, Austrian minister 275
Augustinians (Hermits, Recollects) 11
—in Micronesia 196
—in the Philippines 193
Aulike, Matthias 107
Australia 89
—clergy 142
—education 143
—episcopate 142
—establishment of hierarchy 142
—immigration 142
—progress of Catholicism in 19th century 142f
Austria
—all-Austrian bishops' conference at Vienna (1849) 76f
—and Near Eastern Churches 157
—and orthodoxy 156
—antiliberalism 108
—catechesis 17
—Catholic association movement 76, 309
—Christian Socialist Party 276, 161, 166f, 273f, 310
—concordat (1855) 17, 76, 91, 108f
—defeat at Königgrätz (1866) 254
—ecclesiastical development 1848–70 108ff
—ecclesiastical laws (1874) 274f
—education 109
—expulsion from the German Confederation (1866) 116
—National Elementary School Law (1869) 274
—people's missions 23
—State and Church 272ff
—ultramontanism 310f
Austria-Hungary
—Slavs in Austria-Hungary 165ff
Avendaño, Diego de, S. J. 204
Away-from-Rome Movement 334
Azarian, Stephen, Armenian patriarch 172
Azeglio, Cesare d' 26
Azeglio, Massimo d' 59, 257

Baader, Franz von 38
Baden, grand duchy 119
—Catholic People's Party 280
—Church regulation (1868—76) 278
—civil marriage law (1869) 279
—concordat (1859) 91, 112
—Kulturkampf 277ff
—law on foundations (1870) 279
—law on religious orders (1872) 279
—liberal anticlericalism 278ff
—Old Catholics Law (1874) 279
—religious development after 1848 112f
—school dispute 278
—school regulation (1876) 278
—nondenominational schools 278, 280
Badischer Beobachter 280
Bahut, Clement, Melchite patriarch 173
Bailly, E. 306
Balabin, P. 156
Balbo, Cesare 290
Balmes, Jaime 45, 145, 148, 269
Baltzer, Johann Baptist 37f, 238, 330
Baraga, A. F. 135
Barat, Madeleine Sophie 223
Barberi, Dominicus 24
Barnabites
—in Burma 184
Barnabo, Alessandro, cardinal 88, 158, 175f, 200f, 202, 204, 309
Baudry, C. 49, 233
Bauerband 72
Baur, Ferdinand Christian 238
Bautain, Louis Eugène Marie 32, 33, 47ff 102, 232
Bavaria 276ff
—concordat (1871) 277
—creeping Kulturkampf 277f
—first bishops' conference at Freising (1850) 110
—movement of Catholic associations 277
—Patriotic People's Party 277
—religious policy after 1848 110
—secularization 276ff
Beckx, Petrus, general superior, S. J. 203, 211
Beelen, T. 44
Belgium 25, 91, 286
—and Syllabus 297
—anticlericalism 262ff, 265, 289
—Catholic congresses (1863, 1864, 1867), 264
—Catholic publications 55, 265
—Catholic social movement 301
—education policy 263f
—episcopate and liberalism 263
—moral theology 31
—ultramontanism and Catholics loyal to constitution 264
Bellarmine 312, 319
Benedict XIV, pope 174, 309
Benedictines 9, 12f, 209, 210
—in Australia 142f, 196
—in Spain 144
—liturgical renewal 227f
Bergier, Nicolas Sylvestre 51
Berlage, Anton 40
Bernetti, Tommaso, cardinal 57, 248
Bertier, Ferdinand de 26
Bertier, G. de 158
Bettachini, Orazio, vicar apostolic of Jaffna 183
Beuron, abbey 210
Beust, Friedrich Ferdinand von 109, 274f, 276
Bible 21
—in catechesis 17ff
Bigandet, A. T., vicar apostolic in Burma 184
Bigelmair, Andreas 243
Bilio, L., cardinal 88, 296, 327
Binterim, Anton Josef 7, 32, 75
Bishops' conferences at Rome (1854, 1862, 1867) 308
Bismarck, Otto von 117, 276, 280, 333

Bisping, August 238
Biunde, F. X. 34
Bizzarri, cardinal 200, 208, 212, 323
Bkerke, national council of Maronites (1856) 174
Black and White Penitents 24
Blaj, synod (1868) 167
Blanchet, vicar apostolic in the United States 131
Blanco, Guzmán, president of Venezuela 271
Blondel, Maurice 236
Bludov, Russian minister 159
Blum, Peter Joseph, bishop of Limburg 112
Bluntschli, Johann Caspar 278
Bofondi, secretary of state 88
Bolivia 150, 151, 152, 270
—concordat (1851) 91
Bollandists 44, 51, 220
Bolletino di archeologia cristiana 229f
Bolzano, Bernhard 36
Bommel, C. van, bishop of Liège 77, 264, 266
Bonald, Louis Gabriel Ambroise de 284
Bonald, Louis Jacques Maurice de, cardinal 14, 94
Boniface Association 114
Bonjean, E. C., archbishop of Colombo 184
Bonnand, Clement, vicar apostolic of Pondicherry 181, 182, 184, 201
Bonnechose, Henri Marie Gaston de, cardinal 94
Bonn union conferences of Old Catholic, Russian Orthodox, and Anglican theologians (1874–75) 334
Bonnetty, Augustin 50, 232
Borret, Theodor 79
Borromeo 86
Bosnia 169
Bossuet, Jacques Bénigne 6, 231, 311, 314, 320
Bourbons 61
Bourget, bishop of Montreal 139, 221
Bouvier, J. B. 30
Brazil
—celibacy and marriages of priests 153
—church and state 271
—clergy 153f
—concordat (1862) 91
—ecclesiastical situation and stagnation under Pedro II 153f
—liberalism and ultramontanism 271
—people's missions 153
Braun, G. 27
Braun, Johann Wilhelm Joseph 34, 35, 54
Bravi, Giuseppe 183
Brentano, Clemens 220
Brière, Y. de la 153
Broglie, Jacques Victor Albert de, duke 103, 286
Broere, C. 266
Brother institutes 212
Brotherhood of Sts. Cyril and Methodius 156
Brotherhood of the Sacred Childhood of Jesus 24
Brothers of Christian Schools, see Christian Brothers
Brothers of Our Lady of Mercy (Belgium) 13
Brothers of Our Lady of Mercy (Netherlands) 13
Brothers of the Immaculate Conception 13
Brownson, Orestes 137
Brownson's Quarterly 137
Bruckner, Anton 105
Bruguière, Bartholomew, vicar apostolic in Korea 191
Brunner, Franz Sales 23
Brunner, Sebastian 76
Bruno, Fra di 261
Brunoni, Paolo, vicar apostolic 167, 200
Buchner, A. 41
Büchner, Ludwig 235
Buck, V. de 232
Buddhism in Siam 185
Bufalo, Gaspare del 23
Bühlmann, W., O.F.M.Cap. 180
Bulgaria 162
—mission to 162
—union attempts 167
Bunsen, Christian Karl von 35, 239
Buß, Franz Josef von 7, 26, 71, 72, 73, 302
Butler, C. 87, 296, 312, 329

Canada 89
—Catholicism (1840–70) 138ff
—clergy and training of priests 139f
—clericalism 140
—founding of dioceses 138f
—immigration 138
—school dispute (1871–74) 141
—Union Act (1840) 138
Caloen, Gérard van 228
Canovas del Castillo 268
Cantù, Cesare 231, 291
Capaccini, Francesco, cardinal 35, 149
Capecelatro, cardinal 291
Capes, John Moore, 124
Capitanio, B. 13
Capponi, Gino 290
Capuchins 178
—in Africa 197
—in India 181
—in Poland 164
—in Spain 144
Carbonelle 235
Cardinals, college of, under Pius IX 87f
Carol I, King of Rumania 168
Carmelites
—in India 181
—in Spain 144
Carmelites, female congregations
—in Cochinchina 187
Carolus Franciscus a Breno, O.F.M. 203
Carrera, Rafael 151

Carroll, John, S. J., bishop 133
Cartesianism 234
Casaretto, abbot of Subiaco 209
Casolani, A., vicar apostolic in Central Africa 196
Casoni, lawyer 260
Cassino Congregation, O.S.B. 209
Castelfidardo, defeat of papal army (1860) 251
Castiglioni, Francesco Saverio, see Pius VIII
Castilla, R. 152f
Casuistry 27f, 29
Catacombs 229
Catholic associations 332
Catholic Association of Germany 74
Catholic Club 72
Catholic faction (in Prussia) 107f
Catholic labor organizations 114
Catholic Organization (Ireland) 74
Catholicism
—and ecclesiastical (Roman) authority 310
—and liberalism after 1848 283ff
—internal Catholic controversies regarding liberalism 283–303
Cavaignac, Eugène Louis 67
Cavour, Camillo Benso 245, 249, 251, 253, 257
—Italian policy 257
—separation of church and state 258
Cerna, president of Venezuela 271
Ceylon 183
Chaignon, Pierre, S. J. 219
Chaldeans, Uniate 172
Chamard, O.S.B. 231
Chambord, Count 103, 288
Chaminade, Guilleaume Joseph 26
Charbonneaux, Étienne, vicar apostolic of Mysore 181, 201
Charbonnel, Armand François M. de, bishop of Toronto 141f
Charvaz 261, 291
Chastan, J. H. 191
Chateaubriand, François René de 41
Chevalier, J. 177
Chevrier, P. 20
Chiaramonti, Luigi Barnaba, see Pius VII
Childhood of Jesus Association 201
Chile 151, 152, 271
China 93
—bloodbath of Tientsin (1870) 188f
—establishment of vicariates apostolic 189
—missionary and ecclesiastical development 187ff
—persecution of foreigners and Christians 188f
—religious freedom 187f
China mission, at First Vatican Council 204ff
Christian Brothers 178, 210
—in Cochinchina 187
—in Ottoman Empire 169
Christian Catholic Church of Switzerland 282, 333
Church, established 273
Church history 220, 231f
—in France 231f
—in Germany 238
—in Italy 231
—in Spain 231
Cistercians 144, 210
Claret, Antonio-Maria 147
Clausel de Montals, bishop of Chartres 68
Clemens, Franz Jakob 38, 241, 243
Clercs de St. Viateur 140
Clericalism 214
Clergy 14f, 86
—diocesan clergy and its pastoral activity in 19th century 213ff
—regular and secular clergy 214
Cochin, A. 88, 286, 297, 301
Cochin China, mission and Church 186
Cohen, Hermann, S. J. 221
Colin, J. U., superior general of Marists 195
Collegiality 134
Collegio Pio latino-americano in Rome 150
Collegium Germanicum, Rome 242
Collegium Romanum 45f, 230, 242, 244
Cologne, provincial synod (1860) 235
Cologne dispute 33, 73
Colombia 152, 270
—clergy 270
—liberalism 269, 270
—secularization 270
—separation of church and state 270
Combalot, Théodore 4, 14
Comboni, Daniel, vicar apostolic in Central Africa 176f, 196, 206, 261
Commissione di archeologia sacra 229
Commissio pro Ecclesia Orientali et pro Missionibus at the First Vatican Council 200ff
Comte, Auguste 235
Congregatio cassiniana primitivae observantiae 209
Congregatio Sacrorum Cordium Jesu et Mariae, see Picpus Society
Congregation of St. Peter 11, 30
Congregation of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (Missionaries of Scheut/Brussels) 177
Congregatio super statu regularium 208
Concordat policy 91
Congregations, religious 212f
—dedicated to the Heart of Jesus 222
—dedicated to the Virgin Mary 225
—for education and care of the sick 13f
—in Italy 261
Consalvi, Ercole, cardinal, secretary of state 258
Constantinople, council (1869) 172
Coventuals, in Moldavia 168f
Conzemius, V. 320, 326
Corboli-Bussi, adviser to Pius IX 58, 60, 65, 154, 159
Cornelius, C. A. von 331
Cornoldi, Johann Maria, S. J. 234
"Correspondance de France" 317
Corsi, Cardinal 256
Cortés, Juan Donoso 26, 45, 145, 148, 284

Costa Rica 271
—concordat (1852) 91, 151
Counterrevolution 301
Cousin, Victor 47, 69, 231
Coux, Charles de 43
Cox, E. 3
Cramer, J. W. 266
Crimean War 169f
Croatia, unionist striving 165
Croke, archbishop of Cashel 129
Crolly, George 129
Cullen, Paul, cardinal 123, 125, 127ff
Cum ecclesiastica disciplina, constitution (1869) 172
Curci, Carlo Maria, S. J. 65, 290
Customs Parliament
—and infallibility 280f
Czartoryski, prince 158

Dalgairns, Bernard (John Dobree) 221, 226
Dalwigk 112
Daniel-Rops, Henri 215
Darboy, Georges, archbishop of Paris 297, 314, 328
Darras, Abbé 232
Darwin, Charles Robert 235
Daughters of Charity of Montreal 140
Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul 13, 24, 170, 268
Daughters of the Immaculate Heart of Mary 212
Dechamps, A. 298
Dechamps, Victor, cardinal 236, 317, 325, 327f
Dechristianization, urban 217
Deharbe, Joseph, S. J. 18
Dei Filius, constitution (1870) 324
Deinlein, Michael, archbishop of Bamberg 277
Deism 243
De Katholiek 55, 79
Democracy 67
Denzinger, Heinrich, S. J. 243f
Der Katholik (Mainz) 7, 32, 54, 71, 105, 241, 243
Derré, J. R. 52
Desmet, P., S.J. 135
De Tijd 55, 266, 267
Deutinger, Martin 29
Deutsches Volksblatt (Stuttgart) 71
Devie, bishop of Belley 20, 30
De Wachter 79
Diepenbrock, Melchior von, Prince-bishop of Breslau 37, 72, 76f, 106
Dieringer, Franz Xaver 38, 39, 54, 247
Dogma 235, 237, 239
—and morals 27f
Dogmatics 37, 235, 246
Dogmas, history of 237, 238
Döllinger, Ignaz von 42f, 50, 54, 72, 73f, 75, 110, 114, 115, 116, 118, 124, 228, 239ff, 243, 244ff, 292, 295, 297, 313, 317, 320f, 326, 330, 332, 334
Domenec, bishop 134
Dominicans 9, 11f, 144, 172, 209
—in China 189
—in Formosa 189
—in France 286
—in Philippines 193
Don Bosco, Giovanni 25, 176, 215, 221, 257
Don Carlos 144
Donnet, suffragan bishop of Nancy 48
Dostoevski, F. M. 161
Doutreloux, bishop of Liège 222
Drey, Johann Sebastian 29, 40, 242
Droste zu Vischering, Clemens August von, archbishop of Cologne 33f
Druffel, A. von 331
Dublin, Catholic university 128f
Dublin Review 56, 293, 311
Dubois, H. 22
Ducpétiaux, E. 264, 301
Dum acerbissimas, brief (1835) 33ff
Dumont, C. 167
Dupanloup, Félix 19, 68f, 69f, 94f, 102, 103, 141, 157, 216, 248, 286, 297f, 306, 314, 319, 322, 325f
Duparquet, C. 197
Dupin, André 5
Dupont des Loges, bishop of Metz 99
Duruy, Victor 96

Eastern missions at Vatican I 200ff
Eastern patriarchates 171ff
Eastern Question 154
Ecclesiastical Titles Bill (1851) 121
Ecclesiology 237, 323
Economic liberalism 300, 301f
Ecuador 152, 271
—concordat (1862) 91, 151
Edes, Miss 136
Education Bill (1870) 123
Education League (Belgium) 264
Education, religious 16ff
Einsiedeln, abbey 120
El Diario 286
Electoral Hesse 111
Elgin, Lord 138
El Pensamiento de la Nacion 56
Elvenich, P. J. 27, 33f, 35
Émery, Jacques-André 19
Emmerick, Anna Katharina 220
Empiricism, English 235
England, see Great Britain
English Historical Review 124
Eötvös, J. 286
Epigraphy, Christian 229
Episcopalism 320
Episcopate 14ff, 304, 324
—and clergy 14f
—and council preparation 315ff
—and infallibility 319f
—and training of priests 214
Erdeli, bishop of Grosswardein 166
Errazuriz, president of Chile 271

Errington, George 122
Espartero, Spanish general 145, 147, 268
Estrada, José Manuel 153
Etsi multa luctuosa, encyclical (1873) 282
Études de théologie, de philosophie et d'histoire 156, 286
Eucharistic congresses 222
Europe, continuation of Catholic renewal 3–56
Eternal veneration 221
Exauvillez, P. d' 55
Exegesis 238f, 243
Eximiam tuam, brief 39
"Extra Ecclesiam nulla salus" 311
Eyraud, B. 195

Faber, Frederick William 219, 221, 226
Faillon, Sulpician 19, 231
Faith and natural sciences 235
Falloux, Alfred de 67f, 286, 305
Falloux Law (1850) 69, 94, 95, 141, 286
Fani, M. 260
Fathers of the Holy Cross 140, 181
Faurie, Louis, vicar apostolic in Kweichow 200, 204f
Fausti, P. 229
Febronius, Justinus 307
Félix, P., S.J. 236
Felicians 164
Fenian Movement 127
Ferdinand VII, king of Spain 147
Ferréol, J., bishop of Macao 191
Ferretti, secretary of state 88
Fessler, Josef, bishop of St. Pölten 274, 310, 319
Feuerbach, Ludwig 36, 235
Feye, Henri 232
Fideism 32, 33
First communion 20, 24, 221
Fleury, Claude 4
Flir, A. 244
Florentini, Theodosius, O.F.M.Cap. 120
Flórez 231
Fornari, R., cardinal 5, 44, 305
Foucher, L. 236
Foulon, bishop of Nancy 94
Fourier, François Charles 300
France 4, 31, 285, 305
—academic freedom 5
—and Near Eastern Churches 156f
—and Roman Question 250ff
—and Syllabus 297
—apostolicity of Gallican Church 231
—Catholic Church during Second Republic 65ff, 69
— — apparent successes of the Church during Second Empire and "Moral Order" 92–104 — — ambivalence of actual religious situation 98ff
—Catholic press 55
—Catholic social movement 299f
—Catholic universities 97, 102
—Catholicism and anticlericalism 104
—care of the poor and hospitals 96
—charitable works 96
—Church and industrial workers 100f
—clergy 92ff
—clerical intolerance 288f
—concordat between Napoleon I and Pius VII (1801) 14f
—coup d'état (1851) 67
—debates over Christian society 286
—education 69, 95
—episcopate 305f
—industrialization and proletariat 100f
—intellectual defects of Catholicism 102
—internal contradictions of Catholicism 102ff
—mission institutes 175f
—mission works 97
—missions to the people 23f
—moral theology 29f
—neo-Gallicans 287
—neo-ultramontanism 102, 314f
—oratory 102
—pastoral theology and practice 22
—pastoral and catechesis 19
—piety 96ff
—priest training 49
—priests, supply of 94
—provincial councils 69, 305
—rationalism and positivism 101
—renewal of philosophical and theological thought during July monarchy 47 —results of 1848 revolution 66–70
—revolution (1848) 66ff
—romanticism 101f
—Second Republic 66ff
—social question 100
—splitting of Catholics 285ff
—ultramontanism 3ff, 94, 305, 311f, 313
Franchi, cardinal 88
Francis de Sales 226
Franciscans 11, 144, 210
—in China 189
—in California 269
—in Croatia 169
—in Philippines 193
—in USA 131
Frankfurt National Assembly (1848) 70ff
—ecclesiastical demands and satisfaction 72ff
Fransoni, archbishop of Turin 257f
Fransoni case 257
Franz II (I), emperor of Austria 76f
Franzelin, Johannes B., S.J. 47, 227, 230f, 242
Franz Joseph I, emperor of Austria 108, 156
—and Austrian Catholicism 273ff
—concordat policy 108
Frassinetti, Giuseppe 221, 261
Frayssinous, Denis 19
"Free church in a free state" 251, 258, 295
Free Press, Glasgow 125
Freemasonry 296
—in Belgium 263f
—in Brazil 154, 271
—in France 101

—in Italy 259
—in Latin America 153, 269ff
—in Portugal 148, 268
—in Spain 193
—in USA 131
Free Thought (Belgium) 265
French seminary in Rome 94, 311
Freiburg im Breisgau, department of theology 41
Freppel, Charles Émile 95, 231
Freidberg, Emil 273, 278
Friedrich I, grand duke of Baden 280
Friedrich, Johannes 118, 247, 330, 332
Frohschammer, Jakob 244
Fuchs, Bernhard 29

Gabet, Joseph 190f
Gadille, J. 287
Gaeta, conference (1849) 64
Gagarin, I. (J.X. S.J.) 156
Gagern, M. von 72
Gallicanism, Gallicans 4ff, 29, 94, 102, 296, 312
—and Roman Question 766
Galicia 165
Gallitzin, Amalie, princess 26, 33
Galura, Bernhard 17
Gambasin, A. 256
Gangauf, abbot, O.S.B. 455
García Moreno, Gabriel 152
Garibaldi, nuncio in France 5
Garibaldi, Giuseppe 251, 254, 255
Gasser, Vinzenz, bishop of Brixen 310, 329f
Gaude, cardinal 88
Gaultier, P. 4
Gaume, Abbé 70
Gautrelets, F.-X. 224
Gay, Charles 226
Geissel, Johannes von, archbishop of Cologne 8, 14, 15, 38f, 39, 71f, 74, 75f, 106, 107, 242, 302, 310
Genga, Annibale della, see Leo XII
Genoude, Antoine de 51
Gentili, L. 24
Gerbet, Philippe 50, 294f
—and the Syllabus 294
Geritz, bishop of Ermland 72
German bishops' conferences
—in Fulda (1867) 118
—in Fulda (1869; infallibility question) 281, 317
—in Würzburg (1848) 74f
German Catholic Conferences 113ff
—in Breslau (1849) 74
—in Cologne (1858) 115
—in Innsbruck (1867) 117
—in Mainz (1848) 73f
—in Regensburg (1849) 74
Germanics 242, 310
German National Association 115
German Roman Catholic Central Union 136
"German Theologians"
—Scholastics and Germanics vs. the "German Theologians" 237ff
Germany 3, 31, 89, 285
—academic freedom 292f
—associative Catholicism 115
—catechesis, catechetical instruction 16f, 18f
—Catholic activity after 1848 70ff
—Catholic association movement 71, 106, 114, 216
—Catholic movement 116
—Catholic press 54
—Catholic scholars and ultramontanism 313
—Catholic social movement 114, 300f
—Catholicism and liberalism 290ff
—Catholicism and ultramontanism 312f
—church and state 290ff
—civil marriage 73
—contrast between liberalism and Catholicism in middle of 19th century 105 —economic liberalism 105
—effects of 1848 revolution 70ff
—end of German Confederation 116f
—episcopate 106, 117f
— — and problem of laborers 114
—episcopalism 6
—integration of Catholicism in North German Confederation 117
—internal contrasts in Catholicism 115
—missions to the people 23
—moral theology 27ff
—national assembly at Frankfurt (1848) 70
—pastoral theology 20ff
—piety 106
—project of a Catholic university 115
—religious education 16, 73
—Romanization of German Catholicism 116
—striving toward a national church (1848) 75
—theologians and neo-scholasticism 313f
—theologians' congress at Munich (1863) 245ff, 295, 313
—ultramontanism 6f, 115, 311, 312f
Gertrud von Helfta 227
Ghisalberti, A. M. 64f
Gießen, department of theology 41
Ginoulhiac, Jacques Marie Achille 231
Gioberti, Vincenzo 10, 46, 61, 65
Girard, C. R. 157
Girard, P. 192
Gizzi, cardinal secretary of state 57ff, 88
Gladstone, William Ewart 128, 129f
Glaire, Abbé 55
Glorieux, Abbé 13
Gómez Farias, V. 269
Gonzalez, Z., O.P., cardinal 234
Gorham, J. C. 122
Gorham judgment (1851) 122
Görres, Johann Joseph von 26, 37, 41, 42, 227
Görres Society 115
Gousset, archbishop of Rheims 5f, 30, 305
Goyau, Georges 245
Goyeneche, J. S. 152
Graf, Anton 22, 40, 227f

Gratry, A. J. Alphonse 102, 226, 236, 286, 327
Gray Sisters of Ottawa 140
Gravissimas inter, brief (1862) 244
Gray, John 125
Great Britain 89, 91, 286, 293f, 305, 316
—and Pius IX 58
—and Syllabus 296
—Catholic press 56
—Catholicism after 1848 121ff
—education 123f
—Old Catholics group (Newman) and ultramontanism (Manning) 123
—Oratory in Birmingham 123
—provincial synods (1852, 1855, 1859) 122
—reestablishment of hierarchy (1850) 121f
—ultramontanism 3, 311
Greater German Party 115
Gregorian calender 173
Gregorian University in Rome 211
Gregory XVI (Bartolomeo Alberto Cappellari, Fra Mauro), Pope 3, 7f, 10f, 30, 31, 46, 51, 57, 59, 61, 64, 83, 87, 138, 144, 146, 148, 149f, 154, 158f, 163, 173, 180, 208, 216, 229, 267, 270, 285, 294, 304, 306
—and orders 9
—and Russian church policy 158ff
—and Tsar Nicholas I 159
Greith, K. J., bishop of St. Gallen 120
Griffith, Raymond, vicar apostolic 143
Grignion de Montfort, Louis Maria 225
Grou, Jean Nicolas, S.J. 226
Gruber, A., archbishop of Salzburg 17
Guatemala 151, 152
—concordat (1832) 91
—concordat (1852) 151
Guéranger, Prosper Louis Pascal 4, 6, 9, 12f, 51f, 210, 227f, 288, 294, 309, 311
Guerber, J. 29
Guerrier de Dumast 286
Guidi, O.P., cardinal 241, 328
Guizot, F. P. G. 45
Günther, Anton 31, 35, 36, 235, 237, 239, 243
Güntherianism 241, 243, 292
—rise and fall of Güntherianism 35ff
Gury, P., S.J. 30f

Haeckel, Ernst 235
Haffner, Paul Leopold 118, 241
Haiti, concordat (1860) 91
Hamon, A. J. M. 226
Haneberg, Daniel Bonifaz von, O.S.B., abbot 42, 118, 200, 238, 245
Häring, Bernhard 28
Hartmann, Anastasius, O.F.M.Cap., vicar apostolic of Bombay 178, 179ff, 181, 183
Hassun, Antonius, cardinal 171f, 309
Haxthausen, Werner von 155
Haynald, Ludwig, cardinal 326
Hecker, Isaac 84, 13f
Hefele, Karl Joseph von, bishop of Rottenburg 40, 113, 118, 238f, 322, 328, 330, 331
—and infallibility 281
Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich 36, 40, 235
Hegelianism 37
Heinrich, Johann Baptist 71, 105, 112, 118, 240, 241, 310
Hello, Ernest 226
Herbst, Johann Georg 40f
Hergenröther, Joseph, cardinal 118, 156, 243, 247
Hermes, Georg 7, 27, 31f, 35, 235
Hermesianism, Hermesians 48
Herrera, Bartolomé 153
Herzegovina 169
Herzog, Edward 282, 331, 332, 333
Heß, Johann Jakob 28
Hesse-Darmstadt 111
Hesse-Nassau 112
Hettinger, Franz 118, 243, 247
Hilgers, G. J. 330
Hirscher, Johann Baptist 18, 22, 28f, 40f, 75, 227f
Historical school of law 42
Historisch-politische Blätter für das katholische Deutschland 32, 38, 54, 105, 241
Hnogek, A. A. 227
Hofbauer, Clemens Maria 36
Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst, Gustav Adolf, prince, cardinal 86, 276f
Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst, Chlodwig, prince 276f, 318
Home and Foreign Review 293
Home Rule 129
Honduras, concordat (1861) 91, 151
Hovanyi, F. 310
Huber, Johann Nepomuk 247
Huc, E. 190
Hughes, G., archbishop of New York 132, 134, 135f, 138
Hugonin 233
Hulst, Maurice d' 223, 234
Hurter, Friedrich 22

Illuminism, illuminati 103
Il Mediatore 253
Imbert, L. J. M. vicar apostolic of Korea 191
Immaculate Conception of Mary, dogma (1854) 272, 307
Index of Forbidden Books, 287
Indian missions 131, 135
—dissolution 150
India
—lack of a native clergy 181
India mission 178ff
—and English colonial power 182
—papal visitation (1859–62) 181
Indifferentism 296
Indochina 93
—French-Spanish intervention (1858) 186
—mission and persecution of Christians 185ff
—occupation by France 186
Indonesia mission 194
Indulgences 219
Industrialization and problem of workers 299ff

Infallibility, papal 3, 6, 114, 125, 203, 245, 268, 274, 280f, 307, 312, 317ff, 319, 330
—at the First Vatican Council 325ff
—infallibilists and anti-infallibilists 318ff
—political resistance to dogma 276
Innsbruck, department of theology 118, 241
Institutes, religious 212f
In suprema Petri sede, encyclical (1848) 155
Inter multiples, encyclical (1853) 306, 311
Intermediate Education (Ireland) Act (1878) 128
Internationale kirchliche Zeitschrift 333
Intransigents (Italy) 57, 260, 290
Irish 136, 142
Irish Ecclesiastical Record 129, 218
Ireland 122
—Catholicism after 1848 126ff
—education and Catholic University at Dublin 128f
—Queen's Colleges 127f
Isabella II, Queen of Spain 144, 145, 147
Italy 31, 57, 274, 285, 289ff
—and Austria 57ff, 252
—and Papal States 117, 248
—and Pius IX 59
—and Syllabus 296
—anticlericalism 289
—Catholic movement 300
—Catholic press 56
—clergy 255, 263
— — and Roman Question 253
— — liberal tendencies 289
—ecclesiastical policy of the kingdom 258f
—first Catholic congress (1874) 260
—from establishment of kingdom to occupation of Rome 250ff
—mission institutes 175f
—missions to the people 23
—occupation of Rome (1870) 254
—secularization policy 255ff
—separation of church and state 291
Italian war (1859) 249

Jacobi, Friedrich Heinrich 27
Jacobini, Ludovico, nuncio in Vienna 275
Jandel, Alexander Vincent, master general O.P. 12, 209
Jansenism, Jansenists 311
Japan
—free exercise of religion for foreigners 192
—mission and persecution of Christians 192f
Jarcke, Carl Ernst 32, 38, 43, 54
Jaricot, Marie Pauline 26, 224
Jerusalem
—council of Malchites 174
Jesuits, see Society of Jesus
Jesuit law (1872) 277
Jews
—in Italy 256
—in Prussia 108
Jocham, Magnus 29
Jolly, Julius 113, 278, 280
Jörg, Joseph Edmund 105
Josephinism 108
Joseph, veneration of 219
Journal de Bruxelles 265
Journal des personnes pieuses 55
Journal historique et littéraire 55
Journeymen associations 25, 114, 302
Juárez, Benito 269
Jugan, Jeanne 13
Juilly, college 50

Kabylia mission 197
Kaiser, bishop of Mainz 73
Kampschulte, F. W. 331
Kasandschan, general superior of the Antonites 172
Katerkamp, Theodor 22
Katholische Zeitschrift für Wissenschaft und Kunst 39
Kenrick, P., archbishop of Baltimore 133, 138
Kersten, Pierre 55
Ketteler, Wilhelm Emmanuel von, bishop of Mainz 41, 72, 73, 106, 111f, 117, 240f, 286, 292, 295, 310, 313, 320
—and infallibility 281
—and social Catholicism 303
Kiernan 147
Kim, Andreas 191
Kingsley, Charles 124
Klee, Heinrich 6, 39
Kleutgen, Joseph, S.J. 118, 241, 243, 324
Knoodt, F. P. 37f, 330
Know-nothingism 131
Kohlmann, S.J. 32
Koller, R. 214
Kolping, Adolf 25, 114, 302
Kominski, Honorat 164
Kopitar, B. 158
Korea, mission and persecution of Christians 191
Kött, Christoph Florentius, bishop of Fulda 111
Kraus, Franz Xaver 75
Krausism 148
Kreuzlage, A. 33
Kübel, Lothar von, suffragan of Freiburg 280f
Kuhn, Johannes Evangelist 33, 40f, 118, 237, 239, 243, 244, 247
Kulturkampf 89, 332f
—preliminary stages 272–283
Kutschker, Johann Rudolf, cardinal 274f
Kuyper, A. 267

Labastida, P. A., archbishop of Mexico 270
Labor union movement 301
La Bouillerie, François A.R. de 221
Labouré, Catherine 24, 224
Lachat, Eugène, bishop of Basel 282
La ciencia cristiana 234
La Civilizacion 56
La Civiltà cattolica 65, 211, 234, 258, 284, 290, 294f, 300, 307, 312, 314, 317

Lacordaire, Henri Dominique 9, 11, 27, 48, 53, 66f, 70, 209, 226, 286
La Correspondance de Rome 305
Laity
—active in pastoral and charitable work 24ff
Lambruschini, Luigi, cardinal secretary of state 35, 57f, 159
Lambruschini, Raffaele 258
La Mennais (Lamennais), Hugo Félicité Robert 5, 7, 30, 32, 34, 43, 44, 49, 102, 232, 236, 266, 286, 294, 300
Lamennais, Jean Marie 30
Lamey, August 113, 278
L'ami de la religion et du roi 233
Lamorcière, general 251f
Langen, J. 330, 333
Languillat, A., S.J., vicar apostolic of Kiangnan 205
L'année liturgique 227f
Lanteri, Pio Brunoe 30
Laouënan, J. M., vicar apostolic of Pondicherry 201
L'Armonia della Religione colla Civiltà 258
Lartigue, bishop of Montreal 139
La Salette, pilgrimage 98, 225
Lasaulx, Peter Ernst von 72
La Scienza italiana 234
La Sociedad 56
Lassalle, Ferdinand 302
Latin America 89
—Catholicism in the 19th century 149ff, 152f
—clergy and lack of priests 149
—regalistic liberals and Freemasons 269ff
La Terre Sainte et les Églises orientales 157
La Tour du Pin 303
Latreille, A. 97, 104
L'Avenir 55, 286, 300, 311
Lavigerie, Charles, cardinal 94, 157, 177, 197, 314
Lay apostolate 26
Lazarists 170
—in China 188, 189
Lebanon 174
Lebeurier, V. 214
Le Bien Public 289
Le Bras, G. 98
Le Cocq d'Armandville, S.J. 194
Le Correspondant 55, 102, 233, 286f, 314
Ledóchoswki, Mieczyslaw Halka von, cardinal, 107
Lefebvre, P. C. 141
Lenhart, Ludwig 39
Lennig, Adam Franz 54, 71, 73, 112, 240
Leo XII (Annibale della Genga), pope 24, 30, 294
Leo XIII (Gioacchino Vincenzo Pecci), pope 83, 85, 89, 90, 125, 165, 172, 207, 223, 234, 237, 261, 283, 294, 298, 301
Leonrod, Franz von, bishop of Eichstätt 278
Le Pappe de Trévern, Jean François, bishop of Strasbourg 47f
Lepidi, Alban, O.P. 234
Le Play, Fréderic 301
Lequeux 306
Le Rappel 305
Lerdo de Tejada 270
L'Ère Nouvelle 66
Leroy-Beaulieu 321
Levant, Catholic missions 169ff
Levate, encyclical (1867) 163
Lewicki, M., cardinal 165
Liberalism 85, 89, 298, 331
—and infallibility dogma 276
—Catholic reaction to liberalism 83
—condemnation by the Syllabus 116
—in Baden 278
—in Germany 104f, 272
—in Italy 259
—in Netherlands 266ff
—in Portugal 267ff
—in Spain 144f, 267ff
—in Switzerland 119f, 272, 281
—in Venezuela 271
—increasing gravity of conflict of Catholic Church in German-speaking areas and Kulturkampf 272ff
—offensive by the liberal governments 255ff
—state church tendencies 273
—struggle between Catholicism and liberalism 248ff
Liberalism, Catholic 298f
—in Belgium 262ff, 289
—in Canada 140
—in England 293
—in France 69, 101ff, 286f
—in Germany 104, 291ff
—in Italy 289f
Liberatore, P. 234
Libermann, Franz Maria 197
Liebermann, Bruno Franz Leopold 6
Ligue française pour l'enseignement public 96
Liguori, Alphonsus Maria de 29ff, 219, 227, 319
Lincoln, Abraham 134
Linde, Justin T. B. 72
Lingard, J. 3
Lipp, Joseph, bishop of Rottenburg 112f
Litta, cardinal 173
Little Sisters of the Assumption 212
Little Sisters of the Poor 13
Liturgy 3, 4f, 21, 227, 311
Liturgical renewal 227
Liturgies, Eastern 309
Lombardy 61, 256, 281, 305
Louis Napoleon, see Napoleon III
Louis XIV, king of France 222
Louis-Philippe, king of France 60
Lourdes, pilgrimage 97, 98
Louvain, Catholic University 31, 43ff, 233
Löwe, professor 37
Luca, Antonio de, cardinal 167
Lucas, F. 56
Ludwig II, king of Bavaria 110, 277
Luna Pizzarro, F.X. de 152

L'Univers 5, 55, 70, 94, 232, 258, 289, 305, 311, 314
L'Université Catholique 50f, 55
Luquet, bishop 155
Lutterbeck, A. 41
Lutterbeck, J. 238
Lutz, Johann von, baron 277
Lydia, journal 38
Lynch, James, C.M. 126
Lynch, John Joseph, bishop of Toronto 134
Lyon, Association for the Propagation of the Faith 201
Lyon Missionaries 177

Maaß, F. 8
Maccarrone, M. 329
Macé, Jean 96
Macedo Costa, A. de, bishop of Para 272
MacHale, John, archbishop of Tuam 127
Madagascar mission 198
Mai, Angelo, cardinal 45, 229
Magisterial office of the Church 242, 292, 320
Maignen, Abbé 100
Mainzer Journal 71
Mainz Catechism 18
Mainz circle 7, 71, 118
—and Syllabus 297
Mainz seminary 41
Maistre, Joseph de 7, 155
Malabar 172
Malaya, mission and Church 185f
Mallinckrodt, Hermann von 108, 117
Malou, Jean Baptiste, bishop of Bruges 44, 226
Mañe y Flaqeur 286
Mann, Horace 135
Manning, Henry Edward, cardinal 87, 122ff, 124, 125, 214, 226, 293, 316, 317, 322, 325, 328
Manteuffel, Otto von 107
Manzoni, Alessandro 290
Maori 195
Marazán, president of Guatemala 151
Marc-Bonnet, H. 90
Marches 250, 251
Marchi, Giuseppe, S.J. 229
Marchilhacy 217
Maret, Henri Louis Charles 50, 231, 233, 287, 297, 314f, 328
Margotti 290
Maria II da Gloria, Queen of Portugal 148
María Cristina, regent of Spain 144f
Marian congregations 24, 224
Marilley, Étienne, bishop of Lausanne-Geneva 119f
Marion Brésillac, Melchior de 177
Marists, in Oceania 195
Maronites, Maronite Church 173f
Marrou, H. I. 229
Martin, K. 31
Martina, G. 61, 86, 214, 294
Martínez de la Rosa, Francisco 144
Martinov, J., S.J. 156, 200
Mary, appearances of 224
Mary, veneration of 24, 219, 224f
—in France 98
—in Poland 164
Masad, Paul, Maronite patriarch 174
Mastai-Ferretti, Giovanni Maria, see Pius IX
Mathieu, Adrien Jacques Marie, archbishop of Besançon 14
Matta, Jerome Joseph de, bishop of Macao 179
Maubant, Pierre Philibert 191
Maurain, J. 287
Maurists 52, 220, 311
Maximilian, emperor of Mexico 93, 270
Maximos III Mazlum, Melchite patriarch 173
Maynooth, seminary 129
May prayers 225
Mazzini, Giuseppe 64
Mazzuconi, G. 195
McCloskey, Cardinal 138
McMaster, J. 136
Meaux, count 571
Mechelen, congress of Belgian Catholics (1863) 295f, 301
Mechelen School 77
Meglia, nuncio in Mexico 270
Mélanges théologiques 218
Melchers, Paulus, cardinal 107
Melchites, Uniate 173
Melchite schism 173
Meletios, archbishop in Greece (1861) 168
Melun, Armand de 25f, 96, 300
Mendicant orders 9f, 10
—see also Dominicans, Franciscans
Mendizábal, Spanish minister 144
Menzel, A. 330
Mermillod, Gaspard 120, 222, 282, 312
Merode, Xavier de 86, 250
Mertel, cardinal 88
Messmer, J. A. 330
Metternich, Klemens, prince 8, 35, 59, 76
Mexico 93, 152, 269, 295
—Catholicism and liberalism 269f
—civil marriage 270
—clergy 269
—race problem 269
—secularization 269
Mey, Gustav 18
Michael Confraternity 116
Michelis, Friedrich 118, 331, 332f
Micronesia 196
Migne, Jacques-Paul 51f, 55
Miguel, Don M., king of Portugal 148f
Milan missionaries
—in Burma 185
—in China 189
—in India 181
—in Polynesia 195
Milan mission seminary 176
Milde, Vincenz, archbishop of Vienna 17, 76
Minh Mang, emperor of Tonkin 186
Minguetti 290
Mirari vos, encyclical (1832) 285

Missionaries of the Precious Blood 23
Missionaries of Mill Hill (London) 135, 177f
Missionaries of Scheut, in China 189
Missionari della Consolata 176
Mission(s) 91
—First Vatican Council and missions 199ff
—missions 1840–70 175–207
—under Pius IX 89f
Missions to the people, parish missions 211, 222
—in Austria 24
—in Brazil 153
—in England 122
—in France 23ff, 99
—in Germany 24, 106
—in Italy 23
—in USA 133
Mission directory 204
Mission Institute for Africa 176f
Mission works, in Belgium 262
Modena, duchy 256f
—concordat (1857) 91
Modernism 89
Möhler, Johann Adam 29, 40f, 41, 42, 48, 50, 230, 237
Moldavian monasteries 168f
Molé, Louis Mathieu 67
Moeller, J. 44
Mommsen, Theodor 229
Mönchen-Gladbach, movement 302
Mongkut, king of Siam 185
Mongolia mission 189
Montalembert, Charles René Forbes 5, 10, 26f, 52, 55, 67f, 69, 103, 141, 248, 264, 284, 286, 289, 295, 298
Montclos, X. de 49
Montigny, de, French consul 186
Moral theology, reaction to rationalism of the Enlightenment and rigorism 27ff
—and Holy Scripture 28f
Morel, Gall, O.S.B. 120
Moreno, García 271
Moreno, M., bishop of Ivrea 258
Mortara case 249
Mosquera, M. J., archbishop of Bogotá 270
Moufang, Franz Christoph 105, 112, 115, 118, 240, 310
Moy de Sons, Karl Ernst von 310
Müller, Johann Georg, bishop of Münster 72, 107
Multa praeclare, decree (1838) 180
Mun, Albert de 100
Munich, university 41ff
Munich circle, Görres circle 31, 41, 43
Munich School 50f, 235, 246f
—young Munich School 247
Murdoch, Dr. 125
Murialdo, Leonardo 257
Murray, Patrick 129

Naples, kingdom (of Two Sicilies) 61, 251, 255
Napoleon III (Louis Napoleon), emperor of France 64, 67, 87, 92, 103, 186, 194, 205, 249, 251, 253, 314, 327
Narváez 147, 268
National Catholic Almanac 136
National seminaries at Rome 307
Neminem latet, encyclical (1857) 208
Neo-Gothic 79
Neo-Guelfism 256, 289
—from neoguelf myth to Roman revolution 57ff
Neo-Scholasticism 18, 118, 233, 241ff, 313f
Neo-Thomism 45, 234
Nesselrode, Karl Robert 159ff
Netherlands 89, 91, 286
—and Indonesia 194
—and Syllabus 296
—anticlericalism 265ff
—Catholic association movement 79
—Catholicism in isolation 79
—Catholic press 55
—clergy, monasteries, and orders 79
—effects of revolution (1848) 77ff
—first provincial council (1865) 78
—free Catholic schools 266f
—Jansenist Church 78
—liberal education policy 266ff
—liberalism and Catholicism 265ff, 297
—religious freedom and equality of religion after 1848 77ff
—reestablishment of an episcopal organization 77f
Nève, F. 44
Newfoundland 138
New Granada, see Colombia
Newman, John Henry, cardinal 49, 123ff, 128, 129, 226, 236f, 293f, 311
Nicaragua, concordat (1861) 91, 151
Nickes, H. 37
Nicolas, Auguste 50
Nicholas I, tsar of Russia 59, 158
—religious policy 158ff
Niederbronn Sisters 13
North German Confederation 117
Notre-Dame de Lourdes 219
Nullis certi verbis, encyclical (1860) 250
Nunciatures, nuncios, papal 88, 308
Nuns
—in China 190f
—in Italy 261

Oblates of Mary Immaculate
—in Africa 197
—in Ceylon 183
Oblates of Mary of Turin, in Burma 184
Oblates of St. Charles 122
Oceania, mission 194ff
O'Connell, Daniel 26, 56, 74, 125, 127
Oehler, vicar general of Rottenburg 112
Old Catholicism 39, 119, 277, 330ff
—Old Catholic congresses (1870, 1872, 1873) 332f
—episcopal election (1873) 333

—first synod (1874) 333
—in Baden 279
—in Germany 330ff
—in Switzerland 281f, 333
—international congresses 334
—origin of Old Catholic Church community 330–34
Olier, J.-J. 19
Oliveira, V. de, O.F.M.Cap., bishop of Olinda 272
Ollé-Laprune, Léon 236
Ontologism 232f
Oratoire de France 236
Oratorians 286
Oratorians of Goa 183
Orders 89, 92, 296
—growth of large international orders 9ff
—in Austria 275
—in Baden 279
—in Belgium 262ff
—in Brazil 153
—in Canada 139
—in China 189f
—in Cochin China 187
—in England 122
—in France 69, 93, 95, 97
—in Germany 106, 113
—in Italy 261
—in Mexico 269
—in Philippines 193
—in Poland 164f
—in Portugal 148f
—in Russia 158, 162
—in Spain 144, 268
—in Switzerland 283
—in Turkey 169
—in USA 133, 135
— — pastoral care of blacks 135
—orders and congregations 208ff
—significance for Roman unity, centralization, and ultramontanism 9ff
Orders, women in
—in China 190f
—in Italy 261
Order, Moral 97
Organic Articles 5, 14, 16, 68, 92
Orthodox Christians at First Vatican Council 315f
Osterrath 72
Ottoman Empire, see Turkey
Oudinot, general 64
Oeuvre des cercles 100
Oeuvres des Ècoles d'Orient 157
Overberg, Bernard 117
Oxford Movement 316
Ozanam, Frédéric 25, 52f, 59, 66f

Pabst, J. H. 36
Pagan Mission, at First Vatican Council 200ff
Pagganuzzi, G. B. 260
Palafox y Mendoza, Juan de, bishop of Puebla 204
Palestine 171
Pallegoix, J. B., vicar apostolic in Siam 185
Pallotti, Vincenzo 26
Panikkar, K. M. 194
Pan-Slavism 165f
Pantheism 296
Pappalettere, Simplicio 38
Papp-Szilaggi, J. 167
Papacy, pope
—and collegiality 3
—and election of Eastern Uniate bishops 308
—and episcopate 328
—and growth of ultramontanism 9
—and Papal State 90, 244
—and secular power (Papal States) 248ff, 296
—attempts at union with Eastern Churches 156ff
—Austrian policy 273
—centralization policy 171, 304ff
—French "cult of papacy" 311f
—growing importance after middle of century 307
—reduction of prestige 250
—universal episcopate 310, 330
Papal elections 57f
Papal Seminary of Sts. Peter and Paul 176
Papal States 57f, 60, 87, 90, 101, 116
—from papal restoration to Italian War 248ff
—missions to the people 23
—restoration under Pius IX 64
—under Pius IX 57ff, 248f
Paraty, count 268
Paray-le-Monial, pilgrimage 98, 223
Paris congregation 92
Paris Congress (1856) 249
Parisis, Pierre Louis, bishop of Arras 5f, 99, 305
Paris missionaries
—in Burma 185
—in China 188, 189
—in India 181
—in Japan 192
—in Malaya 185
Parnell, Charles Stewart 129f
Passaglia, Carlo 47, 226, 242, 253, 307
Passionists 211
Pastoral theology
—and professional ethics 21
—and pastoral practice in 19th century 20ff
Pastor aeternus, constitution (1870) 328ff
Patrizi, Costantino, cardinal 88f
Patrizi, F. X. 46
Patronage, right of —French patronage in China 187f
—Portuguese 149
— — in China 187
— — in India 204
— — patronage priests in Malaya 185
— — reduction 178ff
—Spanish in Spanish America 149ff
Paulists 137
Pecci, Vincenzo Gioacchino, see Leo XIII
Pedro II, emperor of Brazil 153

Pedro IV, Don Pedro, king of Portugal 148
Peking, peace treaty (1860) 188
Pellerin, vicar apostolic of North Cochin China 186
Pelliot, Paul 190
Pensamiento español 148
People's Association, Catholic 302
Pérez Alhama 146
Périn, Charles 265, 301
Permaneder, Franz Michael 42
Perreyve, Henri 226
Perrone, Giovanni, S.J. 33, 46f, 223, 234
Perry, Matthew, admiral 192
Persico, Ignatius, cardinal 621
Persico, J., S.J. 180
Peru 151, 152f, 270
Petau, Dionysius, S.J. 230
Peter's Pence 116
Petitjean, T., vicar apostolic of Japan 192
Pfordten, Ludwig von der 110
Philaret, metropolitan of Moscow 155
Philippe, general superior of Christian Brothers 210
Philippines, missions and ecclesiastical development 193
Phillips, George 6, 42, 43, 54, 72, 310
Philosophy 232f
Pichler, Alois 247
Picpus Association 223
—in Polynesia 195
Pie, Louis, bishop of Poitiers 102, 230, 288, 294, 328
Piedmont 60f, 248, 249, 252, 256, 266, 285
—policy of secularization 256
—ultramontanism 3
Pierling, J. 156
Pietro Leopoldo, grand duke of Tuscany 256
Piety 304
—development of forms in 19th century 218–228
—Eucharistic 221
—in Belgium 262
—liturgical 227
Pitra, Jean-Baptiste, O.S.B., cardinal 51, 157, 229
Pitzipios, J. G. 157
Pius VI (Gianangelo Braschi), pope 294
Pius VII (Luigi Barnaba Chiaramonti), pope 3, 23, 30, 208, 258, 294
Pius VIII (Francesco Saverio Castiglioni), pope 30
Pius IX (Giovanni Maria Mastai-Ferretti), pope 9, 12, 24, 26, 35, 39, 47, 57ff, 60, 66, 75, 86, 103, 111, 117, 120, 121, 122, 133, 138, 146, 148, 150, 152, 155, 159, 163, 167, 172, 174, 179, 180, 195, 219, 221, 223, 229, 273, 244, 248, 262, 268, 270, 276, 281, 283, 285, 289, 297, 298, 300, 306f, 308, 309, 312, 326, 328f, 332
—and China mission 190f
—and Emperor Franz Joseph 274
—and German Congress of Theologians (1863) 245
—and Heart of Jesus piety 222f
—and Italian ecclesiastical policy 258ff
—and Josephinist religious policy in Austria 61
—and liberalism 255
—and missions at Vatican Council 200ff
—and papal sovereignty 252
—and Piedmontese religious policy 256f
—and Risorgimento 60
—and Russian ecclesiastical policy 162f
—and Siam mission 185
—and Switzerland 282
—and Syllabus 293ff
—and Uniate Churches in the East 155
—and union of Eastern Churches 156f
—and Vatican Council 315ff
—ascension and crisis of 1848 57–79
—activity after 1848 83–90
—bishops' meeting (1862) 252
—centralization policy 171
—characteristics of personality and activity 83ff
—concordat policy 258
—confirmation of Gregorian mission restoration 175–198
—first years of pontificate 57–65
—flight to Gaeta (1848) 62ff
—mission activity 175ff
—nadir of scholarly activity in Rome 228
—on tasks of theology 245f
—reorganization and centralization of the old orders and founding of new congregations 208ff
—Roman Question 250ff
—spiritual elevation of clergy 213f
Pius X, pope 261
Pius Associations 108, 115
Pius Association for Religious Freedom 71
Planchet, S.J. 172
Planque, Augustin 177
Placet, by the state 73, 76, 119, 146, 276f
Podcarpathia 166f
Poland 162, 295, 305
—Catholic Church under Russian domination 158ff
—rebellion (1863–64) 162
—religious awakening of Catholicism 164f
Polding, John Bede, O.S.B., archbishop of Sydney 142f
Polish College in Rome 162
Pombal, Marquis de 182
Popiel, Michael 163, 166
Portales, D., Chilean minister 151
Portugal
—and Africa mission 197f
—anticlericalism, dissolution of monasteries and suppression of Jesuits 148, 267ff
—concordat (1857) 91, 180f, 187
—development of religious situation during second third of the 19th century 148f —missions 178ff

—secularizations 268
Positivism 235, 271
—in Spain 268
Pouthas, C. 94, 262
Pouthas, M. 97
Powondra, T. 21
Praying Sisters of the Assumption (Orantes) 212
Press, publications, Catholic 32
—and apostolate 217
—growth 53ff
—in Belgium 262, 264
—in England 56
—in France 55
—in Germany 54
—in Italy 55, 259
—in the Netherlands 55
Press, freedom of 295f
Priests, congregations of 212
Primacy, papal 244, 307, 327
Probabiliorism 30f
Probabilism 27, 46
Probst, Ferdinand 29
Processions 219
Propagation of the Faith, Congregation for the 170ff
—and missions in China 187
—and Portuguese patronage in China 187
—and question of missions at Vatican Council 200ff
—and union of Eastern Churches 157ff
—centralizing Latinization policy in Eastern patriarchates 170ff
—dispute with Portugal over patronage in India 178ff
Protestantism
—and Vatican Council 316f
—in Spain 144
Provencher, Monsignor, missionary 139
Prussia 71, 73, 91, 254, 280
—and Austria 117
—constitutional conflict (1862–67) 108f
—ecclesiastical development after 1848 105ff
—free exercise of religion 72
—freedom of belief and conscience 72
—Raumer's decrees (1852) 107
—religious paragraphs of the constitution (1848–50) 73
—religious policy 280
Purcell, J. B., archbishop of Cincinnati 132

Quanta cura, encyclical (1864) 134, 296, 300
Quebec, bishopric 138f
Quélen, de, archbishop of Paris 19
Quin, M. 56
Qui pluribus, encyclical (1846) 35, 58

Radowitz, Josef Maria von 72
Ram, Xavier De 43
Ramazotti, patriarch of Venice 176, 261
Ramière, H. 224
Ranke, Leopold von 43
Rapin, René, S.J. 311
Räß, Andreas, bishop of Strasbourg 18, 49
Rationalism 268, 296, 324
Ratio studiorum of the Jesuits 10
Raumer, Friedrich von 107
Rauscher, Josef Otmar von, cardinal 38, 76f, 108f, 117, 241, 274f, 310, 313, 320, 322, 328, 333
Ravignan, P. de 286
Rayneval, de 249
Redemptorists 31, 209f
—in Austria 310
Reichensperger, August 72, 108, 114, 117
Reichensperger, Peter 72, 107, 117, 281
Reinkens, Joseph Hubert 37f, 330, 332f
Reisach, Karl August von, cardinal 8, 32, 39, 75, 88, 110, 112, 157, 241, 243, 310
Reithmayr, Franz Xaver 42, 238
Religion, freedom of 91, 296
Religion, history of 234
Reliquaries, veneration of 219
Renan, Ernest 44, 101, 231, 295
Rerum novarum, encyclical (1891) 301
Resurrectionists 162, 168
Retord, Pierre, vicar apostolic of West Tonkin 186
Reusch, Franz Heinrich 238, 330, 332f
Revelation 232, 237, 315
Reversurus, bull (1867) 172ff, 174, 309
Revista mensual 286
Revolution of 1848: effects in Germany, Austria, and the Netherlands 70–79
Revue catholique 44
Revue des questions scientifiques 236
Revue européenne 55
Revue générale (Belgium) 265
Revue Internationale de Théologie 333
Rheinische Volkshalle, Cologne 71
Rheinisches Kirchenblatt 54
Rhineland 25
Riachi, metropolitan of Beirut 173
Riancé, Henri de 50
Riario Sforza 261
Ricasoli, Bettino 258, 290
Ricci, Scipione de, bishop 86
Riegler, G. 27
Riess, Joseph Florian, S.J. 247
Riffel, Kaspar 71
Rigorism 30
Rio, Alexis-François 52
Rio de la Plata 152
Risorgimento 252
Ritter, Joseph Ignaz 35
Ritter, M. 331
Rivista Universale 291
"Robber synod of Chelm" 164
Rock, D. 3
Rogier-Frère Orban 263
Rohrbacher, René François 4, 50
Romagna 250

Romanticism
—in Spain 148
Romher, minister 254
Roman Question 248–255, 285, 287, 289ff
Roman congregations under Pius IX 88
Roman republic (1848) 64
"Roman School" of German theology 242ff
Roman College, see Collegium Romanum
Romo, P. P., archbishop of Seville 145
Roothaan, Philipp, general S.J. 9f, 23, 34, 156, 196, 211, 220, 233
Rosary, living 224
Rosas, Juan Manuel 152
Roscovany, bishop 201
Rosmini-Serbati, Antonio 13, 15, 45f, 62, 65, 233, 257, 261, 290
Rossi, Giovanni Battista De 229f
Rossi, Pellegrino 62, 65
Rouland, French minister 93, 96
Rozaven, P., S.J. 47f
Rudigier, Franz Joseph, bishop of Linz 273, 310
Rumania
—mission of Moldavian monasteries 168f
—reorganization of the Catholic Church 167f
Russell, C. W. 129
Russell, Odo 127, 325
Russia 154, 155
—agreement (concordat) with Rome (1847) 160
—and Bulgaria 167
—Catholic Church under Tsar Nicholas I 158ff
—religious policy after 1847 160ff
—return of the Uniate Greeks to Orthodoxy 164
Ryerson, Canadian superintendent 141
Ryllo, P., S.J. provicar 196

Sacconi, Carlo, cardinal 75, 92
Sacred Heart associations 223
Sacred Heart Messenger 224
Sacred Heart veneration 98, 219, 222ff
Sailer, Johann Michael 17, 21, 28f, 41f, 89, 218, 311
Sainte-Beuve, Charles Augustin de 311
Saint-Simon, Claude Henri de, count 300
Saint Sulpice 311, 94, 214, 218, 233, 311f
Saints, cult of 219
—in France 98
—legends of 220
Saint Joseph of Mill Hill, Fathers of 135, 177f
St. Peter's Association 155
Salat, Jakob 27
Salesians
—in England 124
—in India 181
Salesians of Annecy 177
—in India 181
Salle, Jean Baptiste de la 178
Samhiri, Antonius, Syrian patriarch 173
San Salvador, bishopric
—concordat (1862) 91, 151
Sanseverino, G. 234
Sarfeh, Council of (1853–54) 173
Sausen, Franz J. 71
Schaepman, Abbé 267
Scheeben, Matthias Joseph 118, 226f, 242, 247
Scheffczyk, L. 40, 242
Schegg, Peter Johann 238
Schenkl, Maurus von, O.S.B. 28
Scheppers, bishop 13
Scherer-Boccard, Theodor von, count 120
Scherr, Gregor von, archbishop of Munich-Freising 111, 277
Schleiermacher, Friedrich 28
Schmid, Christoph von 18
Schmid, Heinrich, abbot, O.S.B. 120
Schmid, L. 459
Schmidlin, Joseph 175
Schmidt, A. 247
Schmöger, K. E. 220
Schnabel, Franz 7
Scholasticism 37, 40, 566, 241
Scholz, P. 238
School of La Chênaie and Malestroit 47
School of Molsheim 47f
Schrader, Clemens, S.J. 230, 241, 298, 307, 310, 324
Schreiber, H. 27
Schrörs, Heinrich 34
Schüch, I. 22
Schulte, J. F. von 331, 333
Schuster, Ignaz 18
Schwarzenberg, Felix zu 76
Schwarzenberg, Freidrich zu, cardinal 37, 74, 76, 210, 275
Schwendimann, Ignaz, general superior of Holy Ghost Fathers 197
Schwetz, Johannes Baptist 38
Scientific Society of Brussels 235
Scienza e fede 234
Scitowsky, cardinal, primate of Hungary 108, 210
Scotland
—reestablishment of hierarchy 126
—rise of Catholicism after 1848 125f
Secchi, Angelo, S.J. 158
Secularization 215
Sedlag, bishop of Kulm 72
Segesser, Anton Philipp von 119
Ségur, Louis Gaston Adrien de 96, 219, 221, 222, 226, 311
Semaine religieuse (France) 218
Semaine religieuse (Tournai) 218f
Semeria, St., vicar apostolic of Jaffna 183
Senestréy, Ignatius von, bishop of Regensburg 277
Serbs, Serbia 166
Sermon 21f, 53
Sertillanges, Antonin Gilbert 236
Settele 229
Shaughnessy 130

Siam, mission and Church 185
Sibour, archbishop of Paris 15, 68, 306
Siccardi 257
Signay, bishop of Quebec 138
Signoriello, N. 234
Silesia 37
Sillani, Hilarion 184
Silva Torres, José Maria da 179, 182
Simeoni, Cardinal 164
Simon, Jules 97, 101
Simpson, Richard 124, 293
Sisters of Charity 13
Sisters of Joseph of Cluny 170
Sisters of Notre Dame of Zion 170
Sisters of Providence 13f
Sisters of the Good Shepherd 140
Sixtus V, pope 321
Slavery 133f, 198
Slomšek, A. M. bishop of Lavant 156
Slovenia 156
Smedt, Charles de, S.J. 232
Smyrna, regional council (1869) 169
Social Catholicism 299ff
Socialism 296, 300
Social doctrine, Catholic 303
Société d'économie charitable 96, 300
Société hagiographique 51
Society for the African Mission 177
Society of Italian Catholic Youth 260
Society of Jesus 9ff, 23, 44f, 46f, 62, 65, 107, 203, 211f, 233, 241, 284, 310
—and ultramontanism 307
—in Africa 196
—in Argentina 150
—in Austria 310
—in Belgium 262
—in Canada 139
—in Chile 150f
—in China 188, 189
—in Colombia 270
—in France 286
—in Germany 292
—in India 179, 181
—in Indonesia 194
—in Italy 261
—in Madagascar 198
—in New Granada 150
—in Philippines 193
—in Portugal 148
—in Spain 144, 268
—in Switzerland 283
—in Turkey 169, 171
—in USA 137
—instruction in piety 219f
—persecutions and expulsion from European countries (1830–48) 10f
—readmission under Pius VII and reestablishment of former provinces in Europe and overseas (1830–51) 9f
—sermons at retreats of priests 219
—Sacred Heart veneration 223
Society of Oceania 195
Society of St. Vincent de Paul 25, 96, 300
Society of White Fathers 177, 712
—in Africa 197
Society of Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus 223
Society of the Daughters of the Sacred Heart of Mary 212
Society of the Sons of the Sacred Heart 176f
Soglia, Giovanni, cardinal 88
Solesmes, abbey 112, 210, 231
Sophie, archduchess of Austria 275
Sorbonne 49f
Sorg, P., O.S.B. 38
Soubirous, Bernadette 225
South Africa 143
South America, establishment of new dioceses 150
South American republics
—clergy 270
—civil marriage 271
—freedom of religion for Protestants 271
—liberalism 270f
—separation of Church and state 270
Spadolini, G. 290
Spalding, Martin John, archbishop of Baltimore 132, 134, 137
Spain
—agreement with the Holy See (1859) 147
—anticlericalism 144f, 148, 268
—Carlist wars 144
—Catholic press 56
—Catholicism and liberalism 268f
—Church and state 143ff
—clergy 146
—clergy, training 147f
—concordat (1753) 144, 146f
—concordat (1851) 91, 146f
—dissolution of monasteries and orders 144
—ecclesiastical development after Ferdinand VII's death (1833) 143ff
—freedom of religion 268f
—hierarchy and liberalism 268
—liberals and intransigent Catholics 142
—nationalization of ecclesiastical estates 144
—revolution (1868) 268
—state and Church 268
—theological studies 45
Spelta, L. C., O.F.M., vicar apostolic of Hupei 190f
Spencer, George 235
Spiegel, Ferdinand August, archbishop of Cologne 32
State church, established church 273
Staniewski, administrator of Mogilev 163
Stapf, J. A. 28
Staudenmaier, Franz Anton 41
Stella 86
Sterckx, E., cardinal archbishop of Mechelen 14, 263f, 289
Stieve, F. 331

Stifter, Adalbert 105
Stimmen aus Maria Laach 247
Stöckl, Albert 247
Stolz, Alban 41, 114
Stösser, Franz Ludwig von 735
Strasbourg, School of 47
Strauß, David Friedrich 40
Stremayr, Austrian minister of religion 274
Strickland, G., S.J. 183
Stroßmayer, J. G., bishop of Diakovar 165, 324, 328, 330
Suarez, Francisco de, S.J. 234, 241
Sudan, missions 176, 197, 206
Sulpicians 47
Surin, Jean Joseph, S.J. 226
Sušil, F. 156
Swetchine, Madame 156
Switzerland 292
—antiultramontanes 119
—break in diplomatic relations with Rome 282
—Catholic association movement and charitable works 120
—federal constitution (1847) 282
—"Freethinking Catholic Associations" 282
—Kulturkampf 281f
—liberalism and Catholicism 281
—narrow ecclesiastical policy after 1848 119
—National Church-Old Catholic movement 283
—ultramontanism 281
—Wessenbergians 119f
Syllabus of Pius IX (1864) 65, 101, 104, 105, 118, 127, 134, 152, 265, 266, 269, 271f, 272, 282, 292, 294f, 301, 313f, 317, 321
—and its consequences 293ff
Syria 93
Syrian Uniate Church 173f

Taché, Alexander Antonin, O.M.I. 139
Taiping rebellion 188
Talamo, S. 234
Talbot de Malahide, George 86f, 124
Tamisier, E. 222
Taparelli d'Azeglio, Luigi, S.J. 46, 300
Taparelli d'Azeglio, Massimo, see Azeglio
Tarnoczy, cardinal 37
Textual criticism 242
Teysseyrre 19
Thailand, see Siam
Theiner, Augustin 155, 158, 229
The Lamp 56
Theocracy 310, 312
Theology 36, 245
—Anton Günther's 36
—backwardness of ecclesiastical studies and the controversy over the "German theologians" 228–247
—Catholic thought and the search for new ways 31–56
—ecclesiastical studies outside of Germany 228ff
—freedom, academic 245
—G. Hermes 31ff
—in France during Second Empire 230
—scholarly work in Rome 228ff
—scholastics and Germanics vs. "German theologians" 237ff
Theologisches Literaturblatt 246
Theologisch-praktische Quartalschrift 218
The Rambler 293, 311
The Tablet 56
Thiers, Louis Adolphe 67, 295
Thieu-Tri, emperor of Tonkin 186
Thomas a Jesu, Carmelite 203f
Thomas Aquinas 241, 319
Thomassin, Louis de 230
Thomism 234f
Thorbecke, Jan Rudolf 77
Thun, count 109
Tientsin, treaty (1858) 188
Tierney, M. A. 3
Timon-David 20, 25, 216
Tits, Arnould 44
Tocqueville, A. C. de 91
Tondini, P. 155
Tonello 259
Tongiorgio, F. 229
Tonkin, mission and Church 186f
Toronto Catholic Institute 141
Torre, P. dalla 249
Tosti, Luigi 231, 291
Traditionalism 47, 231ff, 287
Transylvania 166
—provincial council at Blaj (1872) 167
Transcendence of Christianity 235
Trévern, see Le Pappe
Trusteeism, trustees 132
Tuas libenter, brief (1863) 246f
Tübingen, faculty 48
Tübingen School 222, 31, 39f, 235, 237, 246f
Tübinger Theologische Quartalschrift 238
Turban, Ludwig Karl F. 280
Turkey, Turks
—Catholic presence 169ff
—religious freedom 169
Tuscany, grand duchy 60, 256
—concordat (1851) 91, 256

Ubaghs, Gerhard Casimir 43, 44, 233
Ukraine, Uniate Church 160
Ullathorne, William, bishop of Birmingham 124f
Ultramontanism 29, 31, 89, 118, 256, 272
—excesses of neo-ultramontanism and reaction in Germany and France 312ff —progress 3ff
— — and remaining Gallican resistance 304–315
—systematic activity by Rome 306ff
—ultramontane movement around 1850 304ff
—victory of ultramontanism 304ff

Umbria 250, 251
Unam sanctam, bull (1302) 321
Uniate Churches
—and papal jurisdiction 308
—Uniate Church of Chelm 163f
—Uniate Rumanians in Transylvania 166
Unita cattolica 290
United States of America 89, 91, 286
—Catholic isolation 135ff
—Catholicism and social questions 137
—Catholic parish schools 135
—Catholics and Civil War (1861–65) 133f
—clergy 132f
—education, question of 135ff
—episcopate 132
—founding of new dioceses 131f
—Irish and German immigration 130f
—plenary council of Baltimore (1852) 134f
—plenary council of Baltimore (1866) 132, 135
—priests, training of 133
—Provincial Council of Baltimore, Fourth (1841) 133
—race problem 135
—religious freedom 135
—rise of Catholicism during second third of 19th century 130ff
Upper Rhenish Bishops' Conference (1851) 111
Utrecht, Church 332, 334
Utrecht, union 334f

Valdivieso, R. V., archbishop of Chile 151
Valerga, Giuseppe, Latin patriarch of Jerusalem 170, 200, 202, 204, 309
Valerga, Leonardo di S. Giuseppe, O.Carm. 200
Vancea, Ioan 167
Vatican Council, First (1869–70) 315–330
—and the missions 199–207
—announcement by Pius IX (1868/69) and preparation 117f, 199, 315ff
—first council debates 322ff
— — catechism 324
— — church discipline and canon law 323
— — modern errors 322
—French episcopate and pagah missions 201, 206f
—lively actions concerning infallibility of the Pope 325ff
—opening and composition 318f
Vaughan, Herbert, cardinal 135, 177
Vaughan, Roger William, O.S.B., archbishop of Sydney 143
Vegezzi 259
Veith, Johann Emanuel 32, 36, 76
Vénard, Théophane 187f
Venetia 256
Venezuela 151, 152
—concordat (1862) 91, 151, 152
—constitution (1879) 271
—laicization policy 271
Venice, republic 257
—concordat (1855) 256
Ventura, Gioacchino 58, 59, 65, 229
Verbist, Theophil 177
Verboitte, musician 224
Vercellone, Barnabite 229
Vering, Friedrich 310
Verot, vicar apostolic of Florida 134
Verricelli, Angelo Maria 203f
Verrolles, E. J., mission bishop in China 190, 199
Veuillot, Louis 26f, 55, 67, 70, 94, 101f, 141, 226, 258, 264, 266, 286, 288f, 293, 297f, 306, 311, 326
Veuster, Damian de 195
Viale-Prela, Michele 8, 108
Vianney, Jean Marie (Curé d'Ars) 435
Vicari, Hermann von, archbishop of Freiburg 111, 279
Victor Emmanuel II, king of Italy 250, 251
Vietnam 186
Vigener, F. 320
Villanueva, Joaquin 231
Vincentian Brothers of Abbé Glorieux 13
Vincent associations, conferences 25f, 113f, 262
—in Belgium 262
Viollet-le-Duc 227
Virchow, Rudolf 272
Vogt, Karl 235
Volkonskaya, princess 154
Vows, simple 655
Vrau, Philibert 221

Wagner, bishop of St. Pölten 8
Waibel, A., O.F.M. 31
Walsh, William, archbishop of Dublin 129
Walter, Ferdinand 72
Ward, Wilfred P. 312
Ward, William George 124, 293
Warmond 77
Weber, Beda 72
Weber, T. 330, 332
Weis, Nikolaus, bishop of Speyer 8, 18, 111
Weninger, F. X., S.J. 24, 133
Wenzel, P. 36, 38
Werner, Franz 33f
Werner, Karl 29, 242, 247
Wessenberg, Ignaz Heinrich von 119, 736
William II, king of the Netherlands 502
Wilhelm I, king of Württemberg 113
Windischmann, Karl Joseph 32, 44, 110, 241
Windthorst, Ludwig 117, 281
Wiseman, Nicholas 3, 56, 121ff, 293
Witetschek, H. 36
Wolter, Maurus, O.S.B. 37, 210, 227
Wolter, Plazidus, O.S.B. 37, 210
Workers, problem of 299ff, 301
—pastoral care 114

Württemberg
—concordat (1857) 91, 112f
—ecclesiastical development after 1848 112f

Youth hostels 25
Yussef, Gregory, Melchite patriarch 173f

Zaccaro, L. 253
Zeitschrift für Philosophie und katholische Theologie 32, 54
Zukrigl 37
Zwerger, Johann Baptist, bishop of Seckau 274
Zwijsen, Johannes, bishop of Utrecht 77

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH

IX

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH

Edited by HUBERT JEDIN and JOHN DOLAN

Volume IX

THE CHURCH IN THE INDUSTRIAL AGE

by

Roger Aubert
Günter Bandmann
Jakob Baumgartner
Mario Bendiscioli
Jacques Gadille
Oskar Köhler
Rudolf Lill
Bernhard Stasiewski
Erika Weinzierl

Translated by Margit Resch

CROSSROAD • NEW YORK

1981
The Crossroad Publishing Company
18 East 41st Street, New York, NY 10017

Translated from the Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte
Vol. VI/2: Die Kirche in der Gegenwart: Die Kirche zwischen
Anpassung und Widerstand (1878 bis 1914)
© Verlag Herder KG Freiburg im Breisgau 1973

English translation © 1981 by The Crossroad Publishing Company

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the written permission of The Crossroad Publishing Company.

Printed in the United States of America

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Main entry under title:
The Church in the industrial age.
(History of the church; v. 9)
Translation of Die Kirche in der Gegenwart, part 2:
Die Kirche zwischen Anpassung und Widerstand (1878 bis 1914)
Bibliography: p.
Includes index.
1. Catholic Church—History—19th century.
2. Catholic Church—History—20th century. 3. Church history—19th century. 4. Church history—20th century. I. Aubert, Roger. II. Series: Jedin,
Hubert, 1900– ed. Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte.
English; v. 9.
BR145.2.J413 1980 vol. 9 [BX 1386] 270s [282'.09'034] 80-27313
ISBN 0-8245-0012-1 Previously: 0-8164-0448-8

CONTENTS

Preface ix

Preface to the English Edition xi

List of Abbreviations xiii

PART ONE: THE PROBLEM OF ADAPTING TO THE MODERN WORLD

Introduction: The World Plan of Leo XIII: Goals and Methods (Oskar Köhler) 3
  The Conclave 3
  The Career of Gioacchino Pecci 6
  The Pontificate 10

SECTION ONE: THE SITUATION IN THE VARIOUS COUNTRIES UNTIL 1914 (chs. 1, 3: Rudolf Lill; 2: Erika Weinzierl; 4, 7–10: Oskar Köhler; 5: Mario Bendiscioli; 6: Jacques Gadille; 11: Bernhard Stasiewski) 26

Chapter 1: The Kulturkampf in Prussia and in the German Empire until 1878 26

Chapter 2: Tensions in the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy (1878–1914) 45

Chapter 3: The Conclusion of the Kulturkampf in Prussia and in the German Empire 55

Chapter 4: The Development of Catholicism in Switzerland 76

Chapter 5: Italian Catholics between the Vatican and the Quirinal 84
  The Non expedit at the Time of Leo XIII 84

Chapter 6: The Failure to Reconcile Catholics and the Republic in France . . 96
  The Ecclesiastical Policy of the Republicans 96
  The Politics of Reconciliation (1878–92) 100
  The Pursuit and the Failure of Reconciliation (1892–99) 103

Chapter 7: On the Road to Conservatism: Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxemburg 107
  Belgium 107
  The Netherlands 115
  Luxemburg 118

Chapter 8: The Church of the Iberian World between Revolution and Reaction 119
Spain 119
Portugal 126
Latin America 127

Chapter 9: Catholic Self-Awareness in the British Empire 135
England and Scotland 135
Ireland 144
Canada 147
Australia 149

Chapter 10: The American Way 150

Chapter 11: Catholicism in the Slavic World until 1914 166
The Russian Empire 166
The Three Polish Territories 171
Austria-Hungary 181
Southeast Europe 186

SECTION TWO: THE DEVELOPMENT OF CATHOLICISM IN MODERN SOCIETY (Oskar Köhler) 190

Chapter 12: Catholicism in Society as a Whole 190
Between Total Revision and Reform 194
The Problem of Toleration 195
The Doctrine of Property 196
Social Theories 199
Marriage and Family 208
The School Question 209
Catholic Associations 212
The Catholic Press 215
The Enemy 216

Chapter 13: The Social Movements 219
Farmers 220
The "Middle Class" 221
The Socio-ethical Justification of the Workers' Movement 224
Industrial Workers 226

Chapter 14: The Relationship to the State and the Parties 233

Chapter 15: The Position of Catholicism in the Culture at the Turn of the Century 245

SECTION THREE: FORMS OF PIETY (chs. 16–18: Oskar Köhler; 19: Günter Bandmann) 257

Chapter 16: Externalization and Internalization of Nineteenth-Century Spirituality—Beginnings of the Eucharistic Congress Movement—Veneration of Saint Thérèse of Lisieux 257

Chapter 17: The Organization in the Old and New Orders—Inner Reform and the Power of Attraction 270

Chapter 18: The Dispute over Church Music 283

Chapter 19: Church Art in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries 288
Architecture 288
Church Interiors 296
New Art Forms 302

SECTION FOUR: TEACHING AND THEOLOGY (chs. 20–24: Oskar Köhler; 25: Bernhard Stasiewski)

Chapter 20: The Encyclical Aeterni Patris 307

Chapter 21: Neo-Thomism, Neo-Scholasticism, and the "New Philosophers" 311

Chapter 22: The Theory of Church History 318

Chapter 23: The Question of the Bible 324

Chapter 24: The Condemnation of "Americanism" 331

Chapter 25: Papal Hopes for Unification—The Independent Eastern Churches and the Uniates 335
- Papal Hopes for Unification 335
- The Independent Eastern Churches 346
- The Orthodox Church in Russia 347
- The Orthodox Churches in Austria-Hungary 353
- The Orthodox Churches in Southeast Europe 354
- The Four Old Orthodox Patriarchal Churches 358
- The Near Eastern National Churches 362
- The Uniate Eastern Churches 368
- The Byzantine Rite 369
- The Alexandrian Rite 373
- The Antioch Rite 374
- The Chaldean Rite 375
- The Armenian Rite 376

PART TWO: DEFENSIVE CONCENTRATION OF FORCES

Introduction: Pius X, a Conservative Reform Pope (Roger Aubert) 381

SECTION ONE: THE REFORM WORK OF PIUS X (Roger Aubert) 394

Chapter 26: Reorganization of the Roman Curia and Codification of Canon Law 394

Chapter 27: Eucharistic Decrees and Liturgical Renewal 403

Chapter 28: Concern for Pastoral Improvements: Seminaries, Catechetical Instruction, Catholic Action 413

SECTION TWO: THE MODERNIST CRISIS (Roger Aubert) 420

Chapter 29: Reform Catholicism in Germany 422

Chapter 30: The Beginning of the Crisis in France 431

Chapter 31: The Crisis in England 441

Chapter 32: The Crisis in Italy 448

Chapter 33: Intervention of Ecclesiastical Authority and the Integralist Reaction 455
- Roman Intervention 455
- Integralism 467

SECTION THREE: THE HOLY SEE AND THE EUROPEAN GOVERNMENTS (ch. 34: Mario Bendiscioli; 35: Rudolf Lill; 36: Jacques Gadille; 37: Roger Aubert) . . 481

Chapter 34: The Roman Question and Italian Catholicism—The Non expedit in the Pontificates of Pius X, Benedict XV, and Pius IX (until 1925) 481

Chapter 35: German Catholicism between Kulturkampf and World War I . . . 494

Chapter 36: Separation of Church and State in France 507
  Voting on the Separation Law (1899–1905) 507
  Execution of the Separation Law (1906–24) 511

Chapter 37: The Outbreak of World War I 517

PART THREE: THE EXPANSION OF CATHOLIC MISSIONS FROM THE TIME OF LEO XIII UNTIL WORLD WAR II

(Jakob Baumgartner)

Chapter 38: Missions in the Shadow of Colonialism 527
  Asia 531
  Africa 544

Chapter 39: The Development of New Churches 557

BIBLIOGRAPHY 577

  General Bibliography 579
  Bibliography to Individual Chapters 587

INDEX 625

PREFACE

This preface must begin with an apology or rather a justification. The pontificates of Leo XIII and Pius X, treated in this volume, were given much more attention than had originally been intended because they lead directly to the problems with which the Church of the twentieth century has had to struggle. The authors have attempted to trace the roots of today's problems to events and developments in the first half of the century. Unlike previous volumes, the following chapters include investigations of political parties, parliamentary governments, social trends, ecclesiastical alliances, and theological problems. Europe still exercises its spiritual leadership. Yet other continents are beginning to pose their problems. Although the secret archives of the Vatican generally do not allow access to the holdings pertaining to this era, documents are more abundant now than they used to be. Therefore a more thorough treatment is possible. Those readers who consider the studies of Leo XIII's encyclicals and the description of the dispute over modernism to be too extensive should bear in mind that these chapters deal with problems that are still keeping us in suspense today.

This work is not a history of Popes but of the Church. Even though the two pontificates are often said to be antitheses, their simultaneous investigation seemed to be appropriate. Likewise, it seemed appropriate to go beyond the period of the two pontificates in regard to topics such as the Roman question (chap. 34), the development of the Eastern Churches (chap. 25), and the missions (chaps. 38 and 39). Is the allegation of some critics true that there was a lack of necessary planning?

Between 1956 and 1959, we designed the master plan for the series. During several meetings arranged by the publishing house of Herder, the staff developed the basic guidelines, subject matter, and technical aspects of the work. At that time, the Second Vatican Council had not yet set in motion the tidal wave that was to seize, shake, and transform the Church. We planned to treat the history of the Church between the two World Wars as if it were a contemporary phenomenon in ecclesiastical terms: with the conciseness demanded by the lack of historical distance, with expedient constraint in judgment, and with confinement to the most important and urgent facts. Such an approach would have permitted us to master the subject matter within a relatively small space, i.e., within the framework of this volume. This is no longer possible. The events that took place between World War I and the death of Pope Pius XII have turned into history. The Church has left the calm waters in which it navigated for centuries, probably since the Council of Trent. It is heading toward the open sea and we do not know where it will land. Church history takes its course in longer intervals than political history. For the latter, the two World Wars, even the Third Reich, constitute events which are historically accessible. Information about them is available in open archives; they can, indeed, they must be assessed historically. Church history faces more difficulties. It does not gain historical perspective as quickly as political historiography and, unable to forego judgement entirely, has to practice restraint in regard to its evaluations. Therefore, it seemed prudent to dedicate a complete volume to the history of the Church from World War I to the Second Vatican Council.

Hubert Jedin

PREFACE TO THE ENGLISH EDITION

Insofar as the time period covered in this volume overlaps with the era known as the Victorian Age, there is a temptation to draw a comparison. For many even to this day it was the Golden Age of European Civilization. The Enlightenment of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries had then reached high noon. Science had triumphed for the benefit of humankind. Wealth and universal education were guaranteed for all. The age witnessed what is often called the last outbreak of imperialism as well as a phase of the industrial revolution that was scientific rather than technical. There were no major wars. From it all the Church drew consolation and confidence. The press and the tremendous strides in transportation by way of pilgrimages strengthened the image of a highly centralized Church. The Europeanization of the world through the cooperation between the industrial revolution and the Christian missionary enterprises had become a common goal.

While economic problems no longer solvable by traditional means appeared world wide, efforts to control them still centered on political institutions based on a system of independent states.

Yet Leo XIII's envisioned res publica Christiana was not the answer. His role as arbiter mundi and his efforts to revive medieval social and economic theories and the theology of Thomas Aquinas now appear unrealistic. To proclaim Joseph the Carpenter the model of the worker when the effort of the laboring masses to gain full membership in the community was the major political event of the generation reflects this lack of historical sense. Yet to their credit neither Leo nor Pius exercised their recently proclaimed infallibility. Their missionary efforts, laudable as they were, too often fall under Kipling's couplet: "By all you leave or do, the silent sullen peoples shall weigh your Gods and you."

While this volume presents a more objective view of the pontificates of Leo and Pius, it also sheds light on the problem of modernism and the decree Lamentabili and the encyclical Pascendi. Finally its account of Rome's effort toward reunion with the Eastern Churches and its diplomatic dealings with the three archaic empires are a valuable addition to European history on the eve of the First World War.

John P. Dolan

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS

Acta Leonis	Acta Leonis XIII. Allocutiones, epistolae, constitutiones, aliaque acta praecipua, 8 vols., Bruges 1887–1911.
Acta Pii	Acta Pii X Pontificis Maximi, Vol. V, Graz 1971.
AFrH	Archivum Franciscanum Historicum, Florence–Quaracchi 1908ff.
AHC	Annuarium Historiae Conciliorum, Paderborn 1969ff.
AHPont	Archivum historiae pontificiae, Rome 1963ff.
AHR	The American Historical Review, New York 1895ff.
AHVNrh	Annalen des Historischen Vereins für den Niederrhein, insbesondere das alte Erzbistum Köln, Cologne 1855ff.
AkathKR	Archiv für Katholisches Kirchenrecht, (Innsbruck) Mainz 1857ff.
AKG	Archiv für Kulturgeschichte, (Leipzig) Münster and Cologne 1903ff.
ALW	Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft (formerly: JLW), Regensburg 1950ff.
AMrhKG	Archiv für mittelrheinische Kirchengeschichte, Speyer 1949ff.
AnGr	Analecta Gregoriana cura Pontificiae Universitatis Gregorianae edita, Rome 1930ff.
Anthropos	Anthropos. Internationale Zeitschrift für Völker- und Sprachenkunde. Mödling 1906ff.
ArchSR	Archives de Sociologie des religions, Paris 1956ff.
ArSKG	Archiv für schlesische Kirchengeschichte, ed. K. Engelbert, I–VI Breslau 1936–41, VIIff. Hildesheim 1949ff.
ASS	Acta Sanctae Sedis, Rome 1865–1908.
Aubert, Pie IX	R. Aubert, Le pontificat de Pie IX (ed. A. Fliche and V. Martin, Histoire de l'Église depuis des origines jusqu'à nos jours, 21), Paris 1962.

BGPhMA	Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie (as of no. 27, 1928–30: und Theologie) des Mittelalters, ed. M. Grabmann, Münster 1891ff.
Bihlmeyer-Tüchle	K. Bihlmeyer and H. Tüchle, Kirchengeschichte I: Das christliche Altertum, Paderborn 1955, II: Das Mittelalter, Paderborn 1955, III: Die Neuzeit und die neueste Zeit, Paderborn 1956
BLE	Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique, Toulouse 1899ff.
BZThS	Bonner Zeitschrift für Theologie und Seelsorge, Düsseldorf 1924–31.

Catholicisme	Catholicisme. Hier–Aujourd'hui–Demain, ed. G. Jacquemet, Paris 1948ff.
CH	Church History, New York–Chicago 1932ff.
CHR	The Catholic Historical Review, Washington 1915ff.
CICfontes	P. Gasparri–I. Serédi, Codicis Iuris Canonici Fontes, 9 vols., Rome 1923–39.
CivCatt	La Civiltà Cattolica, Rome 1850ff. (1871–87 Florence).

D	H. Denzinger, Enchiridion Symbolorum, Definitionum et Declarationum de rebus fidei et morum, Freiburg i. Br. 1955.
DDC	Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. Naz, Paris 1935ff.
Delacroix	Histoire universelle des missions catholiques, ed. S. Delacroix, 4 vols., Paris–Monaco 1957–59.
DHGE	Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. Baudrillart et. al., Paris 1912ff.
DLZ	Deutsche Literaturzeitung, Berlin 1880ff.
DR	Downside Review, Stratton on the Fosse n. Bath 1880ff.
DSAM	Dictionnaire de Spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et Histoire, ed. M. Viller, Paris 1932ff.
DSP	DSAM
DThC	Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. Vacant and E. Mangenot, continued by É. Amann, Paris 1930ff.
DZKR	Deutsche Zeitschrift für Kirchenrecht, Tübingen 1861–1917.
ECatt	Enciclopedia Cattolica, Rome 1949ff.
ED	Euntes docete (Commentaria urbana), Rome 1948ff.
EE	Estudios eclesiásticos, Madrid 1922–36, 1942ff.
EHR	English Historical Review, London 1886ff.
ELit	Ephemerides Liturgicae, Rome 1887ff.
Engel-Janosi	F. Engel-Janosi, Österreich und der Vatikan, 2 vols., Graz 1958–60.
ÉO	Échos d'Orient, Paris 1897ff.
EThL	Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses, Bruges 1924ff.
Études	Études, Paris 1856ff. (until 1896: Études religieuses).
FreibThSt	Freiburger Theologische Studien, Freiburg i. Br. 1910ff.
Gebhardt-Grundmann	B. Gebhardt, Handbuch der deutschen Geschichte, 8th ed. by H. Grundmann, Stuttgart, I: 1954, II: 1955
GrabmannG	M. Grabmann, Die Geschichte der katholischen Theologie seit dem Ausgang der Väterzeit, Freiburg i. Br. 1933.
Heimbucher	M. Heimbucher, Die Orden und Kongregationen der katholischen Kirche, 3 vols., Paderborn 1907–8; in 2 vols., Paderborn 1932–34.
HistCathFr	A. Latreille, J. R. Palanque, É. Delaruelle and R. Rémond, Histoire du catholicisme en France III: La période contemporaine, Paris 1962.
HJ	Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft, (Cologne 1880ff.) Munich 1950ff.
HM	Historia Mundi, founded by F. Kern, 10 vols., Bern–Munich 1952ff.
Hocedez	E. Hocedez, Histoire de la Théologie au XIX^{e} siècle, Brussels–Paris, I: 1948, II: 1952, III: 1947.
Hochland	Hochland, Munich 1903ff.
HZ	Historische Zeitschrift, Munich 1859ff.
IKZ	Internationale Kirchliche Zeitschrift, Bern 1911ff.
Irénikon	Irénikon, Amay–Chevetogne 1926ff.
Jungmann MS	J. A. Jungmann, Missarum sollemnia. Eine genetische Erklärung der römischen Messe I–II, Vienna ^{5}1962.

Kißling	J. B. Kißling, Geschichte des Kulturkampfes, 3 vols., Freiburg i. Br. 1911–16.
KmJb	Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch (formerly: Cäcilienkalender), Cologne 1886ff.
KuD	Kerygma und Dogma, Göttingen 1955ff.
Kyrios	Kyrios. Vierteljahresschrift für Kirchen- und Geistesgeschichte Osteuropas, Königsberg–Berlin 1936–43: n.s. Berlin 1960ff.
LJ	Liturgisches Jahrbuch, Münster 1951ff.
LThK	Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, Freiburg 1957–68.
Mansi	J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 vols., Florence–Venice 1757–98; reprinted and continued by L. Petit and J. B. Martin in 60 vols., Paris 1899–1927.
Mercati	A. Mercati, Raccolta di Concordati su materie ecclesiastiche tra la Santa Sede e le autorità civili, 2 vols., Rome 1919–54.
MGG	Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. Blume, 10 vols., Basel–Kassel 1949ff.
MOP	Monumenta ordinis Fratrum Praedicatorum historica, ed. B. M. Reichert, 14 vols., Rome 1896–1904; Paris 1931ff.
MSR	Mélanges de science religieuse, Lille 1944ff.
MthSt(H)	Münchner theologische Studien, ed. F. X. Seppelt, J. Pascher, and K. Mörsdorf, Historische Abteilung, Munich 1950ff.
MThZ	Münchner Theologische Zeitschrift, Munich 1950ff.
NDB	Neue Deutsche Biographie, Berlin 1953ff.
NRTh	Nouvelle Revue Théologique, Tournai–Louvain–Paris 1879ff.
NZM	Neue Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft, Beckenried 1945ff.
ÖAKR	Österreichisches Archiv für Kirchenrecht, Vienna 1950ff.
OstkSt	Ostkirchliche Studien, Würzburg 1951ff.
PhJ	Philosophisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft, Fulda 1888ff.
QFIAB	Quellen und Forschungen aus italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken, Rome 1897ff.
QLP	Questions liturgiques et paroissiales, Louvain 1921ff.
RACHS	Records of the American Catholic Society, Philadelphia 1884ff.
RB	Revue biblique, Paris 1892ff. n.s. since 1904.
RevSR	Revue des Sciences Religieuses, Strasbourg 1921ff.
RGG	Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, Tübingen 1909–13; 1927–32; 1956ff.
RH	Revue historique, Paris 1876ff.
RHE	Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique, Louvain 1900ff.
RHÉF	Revue d'histoire de l'Église de France, Paris 1910ff.
RHM	Revue d'historie des missions, Paris 1924ff.
RHMC	Revue d'histoire moderne et contemporaine.
RicRel	Ricerche Religiose, Rome 1925ff.
RNPh	Revue néoscolastique de philosophie, Louvain 1894ff.
Rohrbasser	Heilslehre der Kirche. Dokumente von Pius IX bis Pius XII, ed. P. Cattin and H. T. Conus, trans. A. Rohrbasser, Fribourg 1953.

RPhL	Revue philosophique de Louvain, Louvain 1945ff.
RPol	Review of Politics, Notre Dame (Indiana) 1939ff.
RSPhTh	Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques, Paris 1907ff.
RSR	Recherches de science religieuse, Paris 1910ff.
RSTI	Rivista di storia della chiesa in Italia, Rome 1947ff.
RStRis	Rassegna storica del Risorgimento, Rome 1913ff.
Saeculum	Saeculum. Jahrbuch für Universalgeschichte, Freiburg i. Br. 1950ff.
SC	Scuola Cattolica, Milan 1873ff.
Schmidlin M	J. Schmidlin, Katholische Missionsgeschichte im Grundriß, Steyl 1925.
Schmidlin PG	J. Schmidlin, Papstgeschichte der neuesten Zeit I–IV, Munich 1933–39.
Schmitz	Ph. Schmitz, Histoire de l'ordre de saint Benoît I–VII, Maredsous 1948–56.
SM	Studien und Mitteilungen aus dem Benediktiner- und Zisterzienserorden bzw. zur Geschichte des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, Munich 1880ff. (n.s. since 1911).
SMB	Societas Missionum Exterarum de Bethlehem in Helvetia (Schweizer Missionsseminar Immensee).
SPM	Sacrum Poloniae Millennium, Rome 1954ff.
StdZ	Stimmen der Zeit (before 1914: Stimmen aus Maria-Laach), Freiburg i. Br. 1871ff.
StL	Staatslexikon, ed. H. Sacher, Freiburg i. Br. 1926–32; 1957ff.
Streit	Bibliotheca Missionum, started by R. Streit, continued by J. Dindinger (Münster, Aachen) Freiburg i. Br. 1916ff. (up to 1971: 28 vols.).
ThGl	Theologie und Glaube, Paderborn 1909ff.
ThPQ	Theologisch-praktische Quartalschrift, Linz a.d.D. 1848ff.
ThQ	Theologische Quartalschrift, Tübingen 1819ff.; Stuttgart 1946ff.
ThRv	Theologische Revue, Münster 1902ff.
ThSt	Theological Studies, Baltimore 1940ff.
TThZ	Trierer Theologische Zeitschrift (until 1944: Pastor Bonus), Trier 1888ff.
Wetzer-Welte	Wetzer und Welte's Kirchenlexikon, 12 vols. and 1 index vol., Freiburg i. Br. 1882.
WZ	Westfälische Zeitschrift. Zeitschrift für vaterländische Geschichte, Münster 1838ff.
ZAGV	Zeitschrift des Aachener Geschichtsvereins, Aachen 1879ff.
ZAM	Zeitschrift für Aszese und Mystik (since 1947: Geist und Leben) (Innsbruck, Munich) Würzburg 1926ff.
ZChK	Zeitschrift für christliche Kunst, founded and ed. by A. Schnütgen, continued by F. Witte, 34 vols., Düsseldorf 1888–1921.
ZGAE	Zeitschrift für Geschichte und Altertumskunde Ermlands, (Mainz, Leipzig, Braunsberg) Osnabrück 1858ff.
ZKG	Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, (Gotha) Stuttgart 1876ff.
ZKTh	Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie, (Innsbruck) Vienna 1877ff.
ZM	Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft 1–17, Münster 1911–27.

ZMR	Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft und Religionswissenschaft, vols. 34ff., Münster 1950ff.; Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft und Religionswissenschaft 18–25, Münster 1928–35; Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft 26–27, Münster 1935–37; Missionswissenschaft und Religionswissenschaft 28–33, Münster 1938–41, 1947–49.
ZSavRGkan	Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung, Weimar 1911ff.

PART ONE

The Problem of Adapting to the Modern World

INTRODUCTION

The World Plan of Leo XIII: Goals and Methods

The Conclave

The conclave after the death of Pius IX[1] meant a turning point in the history of papal elections because, for the first time, the head of the Catholic Church was to be elected after the factual loss of the Patrimonium Petri. The late Pope had explicitly indicated his choice as to the election site. A strong group of cardinals, especially Ledóchowski, Franzelin, and Manning, had spoken against the elections in Rome. Pius VII had been elected in Venice because in February 1798 French troops under General Berthier occupied Rome. But in the following eighty years the Christian world had changed dramatically and there was not a single place in Italy for refuge during the interim. The alternative was to meet in Rome or in a foreign country. During the first congregation (8 February 1878), a minority of only eight cardinals voted for Rome as the election site. The following day, Cardinal di Pietro indicated in a speech that, even though no foreign power had issued an invitation, Italy had been given a guarantee of nonintervention. The cardinal had been nuncio in Lisbon and belonged to the politically "liberal" group of the College of Cardinals. When the matter was put to the vote, five cardinals voted for Spain and thirty-two for Rome. Camerlengo (since 1877) Gioacchino Vincenzo Pecci, an experienced organizer, who prepared the election and shielded it diplomatically against Italy, had to undertake considerable renovations in the Vatican for the conclave.

Although Cardinal Pecci, who was well informed, had voted for an election outside of Italy on 8 February, it appears questionable at first glance whether such a far-reaching step, though discussed at length, was in fact pursued after the foreign powers had refused. Italy was not interested in it, despite radical efforts to expel the Pope from Rome. The guarantee was, therefore, trustworthy. The foreign powers had, for different reasons, an interest in a smooth transition and a politically obliging successor to the Holy See. Vienna seems to have agreed with Berlin that "a fanatical Jesuit pope" was not wanted. Despite the decrease of Republican representatives from 363 to 323, French President MacMahon had experienced the political defeat of the "conservative republic" after the Chamber was dissolved in 1877. And he had witnessed the effect of the slogan le cléricalisme, voilà l'ennemi. In Spain, the liberal-conservative politician Antonio Cánovas, who had revived the constitutional monarchy in 1876, was intent on good relations with the Moderados. Great Britain was occupied with the problems of Catholic Ireland, even though in 1874 the imperialist Disraeli succeeded Gladstone (until 1880), who was friendly toward Ireland. For Bismarck, the Kulturkampf had become burdensome for several reasons. Even Russia, in the middle of a successful war against Turkey, was interested in easing tensions, though it had brutally deprived Poland of all autonomy since the uprising of 1863 and employed the harshest measures against the Catholic Church (rupture of diplomatic relations between the Pope and Saint Petersburg in 1877). Imminent peace and the impending international conference in Berlin had priority in international politics. Therefore, the new situation of the Catholic Church was distinctive in world history because the conclave played a minor role this time in diplomatic correspondence.[2] A conciliatory Pope was wanted. Even the "Catholic powers," who stood in the background, would consider the idea of exercizing the right of exclusion only if a disciple of Pius IX's politics were to be elected.

---

[1] Engel-Janosi, Österreich und der Vatikan I, 200–14, including the preceding history since 1872.

Did the Curia assess the situation correctly when discussing whether the election should take place outside of Italy? Four years after his election and after the riots which occurred one night in 1881 during the transferal of Pius IX's body from Saint Peter's to S. Lorenzo fuori le Mura, the new Pope would discuss with a delegate from the court in Vienna whether Trent or Salzburg could offer him asylum. He received an invitation which implied, however, that he should not accept it (1882).[3] The alternative of having the papal elections in Rome or in a foreign country, which was apparently deemed serious on 8 February 1878, turned out to be no alternative. One could continue to reject the Italian guarantee law of 13 May 1871, but one had to live with it and worry that it was here to stay.

On 18 February sixty of the sixty-four cardinals moved into the Vatican for the conclave. Twenty-five of them were non-Italians, in accord with the ecclesiastical world plan of Pius IX. The preparatory congregation had decided on 10 February to elect an Italian; probably the only possible solution in this situation. The insinuation in Paris that a non-Italian, but certainly not a German, could be elected met with no support in Vienna. Pius IX had chosen the cardinals for the thirty-five positions created since 1868 mainly from the zealots. But even they tended to lean toward a man who would be capable of easing the political and theological tensions which had increased during the previous pontificate. Due to the efforts of Cardinal Bartolini, the conclave's leading member (since 1875 secretary for the Congregation of Rites), the conclave was able to focus quickly on one candidate. Gioacchino Vincenzo Pecci had been bishop in Perugia since 1846 (cardinal since 1853). During the lifetime of Pius IX, Pecci had moved up to a promising position within the papacy because he was regarded as the representative of the moderate line. However, he was not allowed to enter Rome until Antonelli died. Pecci's competitor, Cardinal Bilio, had been close to Pius IX and had participated in drafting the Syllabus. He had, apparently, been chosen by Pius to be his successor. But because of Bartolini's attitude, the intransigents were unable to agree upon a candidate from their midst, and Bilio was threatened with a French and Spanish veto. The candidate of the "liberal faction" was Cardinal Franchi. He had become a legate to Spain in 1850, nuncio in 1871, and was respected in matters related to Church policies. His side was taken by the Spanish cardinals, in accordance with their government. Bartolini was able to win their votes for Pecci (Franchi was appointed secretary of state on 5 March 1878, but he died that August).

---

[2] Schmidlin, PG II, 341; in reference to Schmidlin, see Engel-Janosi I, 212.

[3] Schmidlin, PG II, 414f., with documents against E. Soderini's presentation; Engel-Janosi I, 226–31; see also, ". . . how much the situation had changed [since 1870]" (Engel-Janosi I, 230).

At the first ballotting (the morning of 19 February 1878), which was declared invalid for technical reasons, Pecci received 19 votes, Bilio 6, and Franchi 4. But neither Bilio nor Franchi could claim the majority of the remaining fragmented votes. In the afternoon, Pecci's share increased to 26 votes, Bilio's to 7, while Franchi only received 2. On the morning of 20 February, Pecci was elected Pope with 44 votes, a two-thirds majority. So far, this was the shortest papal election, a few hours shorter than that of Pius IX. Among the cardinals who remained Pecci's rivals to the end were Flavio Chigi, the offspring of the old Sienese landed gentry (1850–61 nuncio in Munich, then in Paris until 1873), L. Oreglia, and the Tyrolese Jesuit Johann Baptist Franzelin (1850–76 professor at the Gregoriana). To the latter (since 1876 cardinal of the Curia) is attributed a considerable share in framing the constitution De fide catholica of Vatican I.

The new Pope chose his name after Leo XII (1823–29), to whom he was grateful for furthering his studies at the Roman seminary. Observers felt he indicated his program in the fact that he did not call himself Gregory or Pius.[4]

Leo XIII did not deliver the benediction urbi et orbi from the outer loggia toward the Saint Peter's Square but toward the Basilica. There were indications that the problem of relations between the Church and the postrevolutionary world articulated itself most strongly in the Holy City: festive illuminations stood in contrast to protest demonstrations. This was true also during the coronation (3 March), held in the Sistine Chapel and not in St. Peter's because the Italian authorities could not or would not guarantee security. The Pope's choice of a name inspired the mockery, "Non è Pio, non è Clemente, Leone senza dente." Leo sent individual inaugural letters to Catholic as well as non-Catholic heads of state in which he indicated his desire to settle disputes. The Italian government was ignored and in turn did not recognize the new Pope officially.

---

[4] Schmidlin, PG II, 346; Schmidlin calls Leo XII especially "peaceful and moderate," while Tüchle-Bihlmeyer and other authors emphasize the reactionary policies of the Papal State.

Despite the strong positive response of the world to Leo XIII's election, it is questionable whether the Catholic Church really began "to develop into a great world power which politics had to take into account." Above all, Catholicism certainly had to incorporate domestic politics, especially as long as it was capable of establishing itself as a social group. But it was the goal of the Pope, sixty-eight years old at his coronation, to present the Catholic Church and the papacy to all of mankind as the "great world power" with an intellectual and spiritual mission.

The Career of Gioacchino Pecci

In March 1814 the four-year-old Gioacchino Pecci was able to witness the triumphal inauguration of Pius VII after the end of the Napoleonic era. His aristocratic family temporarily had to leave their residence in Carpineto, a small town in the rocky mountains south of Rome, because of insurgent activities. Gioacchino was born on 2 March 1810, the son of Colonel Lodovico Pecci. The bishop of Anagni was his godfather. Together with his older brother Giuseppe, he attended the Jesuit school in Viterbo from 1818 on. After his graduation with honors in 1824, he studied rhetoric, philosophy, and theology at the Roman seminary which Leo XII had just returned to the Jesuits (among his teachers were Perrone and Patrizi). His brother entered the Society of Jesus the same year.[5] It was in accord with his talents that Gioacchino Pecci, during the jubilee in 1825, was allowed to head a delegation to the protector Leo

---

[5] G. Pecci, professor of philosophy, came to blows with the order which opposed the Thomistic revival for some time to come, and consequently resigned in 1848. He collaborated with his papal brother, who appointed him cardinal in 1879, in the development of a program to renew the "Christian philosophy" which had been ushered in by the encyclical Aeternis Patris (see chap. 20). Two years before his death (1890), he was reinstated by the Society of Jesus.

XII and deliver a Latin address of gratitude.[6] As was in keeping with someone who had a church career in mind, Gioacchino Pecci studied law at the Accademia dei nobili. He concluded his doctoral studies in 1837 with the remarkable topic of appeals to the Pope. The same year, Cardinal Odescalchi ordained the promising young man to the priesthood. Pecci had found influential patrons in Cardinal J. A. Sala, who had distinguished himself as prelate in the politics of restoration under Pius VII, in Cardinal Bartolomeo Pacca, leader of the zealots, and in Secretary of State Lambruschini.

The year of his ordination, the twenty-seven-year-old Pecci was appointed domestic prelate by Gregory XVI and given three offices, one of which was consultant at the Congregation of the Council. In 1838, the very next year, Pecci was sent as a delegate to Benevento, an enclave of the Papal State in the Kingdom of Naples. The situation there, dominated by gangs of bandits and smugglers in the service of the landed gentry, was anarchistic. But Pecci ruled with an iron fist and organized the tariff system in such a way that the enclave lost its reputation as a smuggler's paradise. In June 1841 he was transferred to Spoleto as a delegate and in July to Perugia where he also busily reformed the administration. The visit of Pope Gregory XVI to the Umbrian city was a great opportunity, of which the delegate Pecci took advantage. The Via Gregoriana was finished on time, and the reception proceeded so splendidly that the Pope promised to think of his delegate in Rome.[7] In January 1843 Pecci was appointed nuncio to Belgium. In later years, his career was attributed to the character of Leo XII, though Pecci himself certainly knew how skillfully to further it. Even though the tempo of his rise was above average, one has to bear in mind that the will to excel was a frequent phenomenon in young Roman prelates, which is only particularly striking when one becomes historically significant.

The nunciature in Belgium was Gioacchino Pecci's first failure

---

[6] Gioacchino Pecci began his Carmina in Viterbo. A humanistic eduation had determined his way of thinking (Dante, Cicero, Virgil, Horace, Tacitus, and Sallust were considered proper reading). In his letter to Cardinal Parocchi (20 May 1885) concerning the education of the clergy in Rome, he urged them to study Thomas Aquinas and to develop a good style, ". . . nihil est fere ad iuvandam intelligentiam maius, quam scribendi virtus et urbanitas. Nativo quippe et eleganti genere dicendi mire invitantur homines ad audiendum, ad legendum" (Acta Leonis V, 62). In his encyclicals, Leo XIII had enjoyed eloquent rhetoric, since he had so ardently participated in writing them. The Romans, who valued a humanistic education, talked about the pontificato dei dotti (L. Teste, Léon XIII et le Vatican [Paris 1880], 103).

[7] See Schmidlin, PG II, 334, with quotations from other biographers.

(1843–46).[8] The task demanded too much from the scarcely thirty-three-year-old man, despite his efforts to adjust to the situation he faced. After all, he had acquired his experience under totally different circumstances. In Belgium, the understanding, developed since the nation's founding between so-called Liberals, the liberal Catholics, and the moderate ultramontanes, began to crumble. Pecci's predecessor, who had been transferred to Paris, knew very well how to maneuver in this terrain and had been on good terms with Prime Minister Nothomb. When Nothomb was overthrown by the Conservatives in 1845, he blamed the new nuncio. Pecci's generally fine relationship with Leopold I and the royal family had its drawbacks because the conservative attitude of the monarch was not the only one in the web of political forces. This prompted the ultramontane clergy to accuse the nuncio of opportunism. The fact that Pecci did not avoid Vincenzo Gioberti, who was living in Brussels at the time, pleased neither the liberals nor the clergy. It was even more difficult for the nuncio to get along with the University of Louvain, which was Catholic but not papal. During this time, the confrontation of the ontologists and the representatives of philosophical traditionalism with the Scholastic renaissance began to develop at the university, and its leading publication was opposed by the Jesuits. By demand of the royal court, Archbishop Pecci was recalled in 1846 because he had supported the episcopate against the King in the question of the university's examination commission.

One had to have a great deal of imagination to predict the tiara for the failing nuncio.[9] In January 1846 he was given the bishopric of Perugia, located "in remote tranquility" (Schmidlin). He was honored with the cardinalate in petto in 1853. It is not without reason that we call Gioacchino Pecci an outstanding bishop who was especially concerned with the education of his clergy (which includes the founding of the Academy of Saint Thomas). He intensified pastoral work through the establishment of missions and he furthered charitable institutions through his strong administrative talents. As a result of such activities, he would hardly have received emphasis in Italian Church history. His decisive opposition to the revolutionary movement (1848, destruction of the papal castle) and to the Piedmontese regime (established 1860 in Perugia) shows a dedicated bishop, who had the same experiences as his fellow bishops. Pecci simply expressed the general ecclesiastical conviction in his pastoral letter of 12 February 1860, when he wrote that the time before Constantine the Great was a legitimate epoch, "because the highest spiritual power of the papacy carried the seed of secular power from its inception."[10] Though he did not even enjoy the favor of Pius IX, Bishop Pecci was also instrumental in the efforts which brought about the Syllabus. A characteristic new tone, however, was sounded in the pastoral letters of 1874–77, which maintain that a reconciliation between the Church and modern culture, provided modern culture is understood correctly, is possible and desirable. The letters spoke of human progress, e.g., relaxation of the penal code, and they praised technological accomplishments in a very poetic language,[11] which the Pope did not employ once he had become familiar with the reality of industrialism through the social sciences. He also omitted poetic prose from his new and not at all reactionary cultural critique.

---

[8] In addition to the general literature, see Lettres de Pecci 1843–46 (Brussels 1959); in reference to V. Gioberti: Schmidlin, PG II, 334f.

[9] According to Narfon, cited in Schmidlin, PG II, 335, n. 10.—It is a difficult question to answer whether Pecci's future concepts were "decisively influenced by the entirely new and unfamiliar environment" into which the Italian was placed after "having lived in the traditional atmosphere of the Papal State" (Schmidlin, PG II, 334). This break in his career may have possibly been a shock for G. Pecci. R. Aubert (LThK VI/2, 953) points out that Pecci's visit of Belgian industrial works, a journey to the Rhineland, and sojourns in London and Paris while returning to Rome "were the future Pope's only contacts ever with industrial and parliamentary Europe".

Long before such demonstration of insight, however, Cardinal Giacomo Antonelli, secretary of state since 1850, had put the bishop of Perugia on the list of men within the hierarchy who seemed suspect to him. Antonelli did not even allow Pecci to venture to suburbanized Albano. His attempt to do so indicated that he did not possess the kind of nature which would be satisfied with the ecclesiastical duties facing him in Perugia. On the other hand, one can conclude from Antonelli's opposition that he sensed in Pecci an important personality and opponent of his politics. After Antonelli's death, Pius IX, who had to reckon with his own death, appointed Cardinal Pecci camerlengo on 21 September 1877. Through this gesture, the Pope documented his evaluation of the man from Perugia and his confidence that Pecci possessed the skills necessary to meet the danger of the interregnum. The appointment somewhat diminished the feasibility of Pecci becoming Pope because, traditionally, the camerlengo has virtually no chance in the conclave. Gioacchino Pecci lived in Umbria more than thirty-one years.

---

[10] Cited from Tischleder, Staatslehre, 346f. Leo XIII expressed his convictions somewhat differently in a letter to Rampolla of 15 June 1887 (after the persecutions, "a particular situation arose from the convergence of circumstances, shepherded by destiny itself, which resulted in the establishment of temporal authority"); but it is hardly justified to see here, as Tischleder does (p. 349), a corrected image of the seed of the Pope's temporal power.

[11] Schmidlin, PG II, 337, n. 16: the inventor of the lightning rod "seems majestic"; the telephone is the "messenger of man's desire" across oceans and mountains; man harnessed steam so it "may carry him across land and sea with the speed of the wind." Technology is seen as liberation from the hardest of labor; creativity of man as "a spark from the Creator himself."

The Pontificate

Pope Leo XIII led the Catholic Church into a world which had risen from revolution. With an attitude which can only adequately be termed "optimistic," he attempted to reconcile an uncompromised tradition with the modern spirit. One may say that he opened up a new epoch in the history of the Catholic Church and set a precedent with courage deeply rooted in faith, without which his successors to the see of Saint Peter would not have been conceivable. An interpretation today faces the understandable danger of misjudging the greatness of this Pope after almost a century, of even blaming him for the failure of the courageous plan for reconciliation which was to embrace the whole world, of overlooking the fact that it had to fail because each period in history makes its own imprint. We might add that even the achievements of this pontificate (i.e., the formation of Catholicism into autonomous groups within a society which was growing increasingly secular) have been discredited for a long time by the term "ghetto Catholicism." But such a sweeping judgment does not grasp the historical accomplishments relative to the pontificate itself and to society as a whole.

On the other hand, it should be noted that the image of Leo XIII in Catholicism, as it was passed on in popular and in scholarly history, was instilled with success by some sort of pressure, which may be informative about the situation and historical self-awareness of Catholics after this pontificate. "Peace Pope" and "Pope of the Workers" are the two most significant appositions crystallizing the tradition of his image. The twenty-fifth anniversary of German Emperor Wilhelm II in 1913 compelled Sebastian Merkle, understandably, to impose a certain style on his essay about the Catholic Church which was proper for the event. It was, however, more than style when he called the Emperor's visit to the Vatican in the fall of 1888 "a dialogue between the representatives of the sacerdotium and the imperium," or when he labeled as a "thoughtful present" the glass painting which Wilhelm II donated to the Cathedral of Münster (it shows Charlemagne and Leo IX meeting in Paderborn in 799).[12] Placed between Pius IX, Pope of the Syllabus, and Pius X, Pope of the Borromeo encyclical, Leo XIII is historically illuminated in a fashion which does not correspond to the reality of the concluding Kulturkampf. Josef Schmidlin characterized this pontificate more comprehensively in 1934. After "the harmony between the two spheres [Church and culture] dissipated, and after both were alienated from each other because of the polemical attitude toward modern philosophical accomplishments under the papacy of Pius and Gregory, the progressive peace Pope considered it his foremost task to restore a close union and understanding to the realm of ideas" and to re-build a "Christian Weltanschauung" based on speculative reason and positive history. In his scholarly writings, he was supposed to have developed in a unique way "the governmental program of gain and conciliation, which means Christianization of modern life and modernization of Christian life," a program which he outlined in his inaugural encyclical. "With inner ties he chained the modern world again to the tiara" and strengthened the moral greatness and authority of the papacy even more "than the medieval dominium temporale had been able to do" and more than the "anti-revolutionary reactive faction" was intending to do. J. Schmidlin speaks about the "indestructible accomplishment of Leo's pontificate," which "was to imprint upon the twentieth century his domination of modern man and mankind's reconciliation with the Church."[13] Fernand Hayward, in 1937, considered the reconciliation of Catholicism with the age, without the abandonment of Catholic teachings, to be the hallmark of this pontificate. According to Hayward, even in France, the echo of Leo's teachings finally effected an inner balance and some sort of neutralization within the secular state, despite the failure of ralliement and the continuation of Catholicism's inner conflicts.[14] Such evaluations, like most others from the first half of the twentieth century, have their roots in the obvious need of a group to escape isolation while remaining true to itself and while having to live within the confines of a society to which it belongs but to which, in the final analysis, it cannot belong. Leo XIII appeared to be the Pope who had created this possibility which seemed so vital that, to a large extent, its realization had to be historically verified. There are also considerations, however, usually presented as qualifications, which delve deeply into the problems of this pontificate. Wilhelm Schwer, who dealt with the social teachings of Leo XIII, noted that the Pope, for quite some time, tended "to attribute all material progress to Christian and ecclesiastical influences, more than a precise analysis of the participating forces will permit."[15] This insinuates more than an incidental error in historical interpretation.

---

[12] In Deutschland unter Kaiser Wilhelm II II, 61, 64 (biblio., chap. 12).

Leo XIII was a political Pope and it is, therefore, correct to say that he enjoys a position among the "masters of politics." To be sure, he was fortunate that Bismarck himself had an interest in terminating the Kulturkampf in Germany. The political chance had to be taken advantage of and had to be pursued to its very end with determination and skill. In so doing, papal politics could not deal exclusively with Bismarck but also had to take into account the ideas of the German episcopate and those of the Center Party, the latter not seeing itself as an extension of the Curia. There is no question about the personal credit due to Leo XIII for the termination of the Kulturkampf. In Switzerland, the relatively limited Kulturkampf was essentially ended at the onset of the pontificate, thanks to the election victories of the Conservatives and the cooperation of moderate Liberals. After 1883, only the Geneva question and the nomination to the bishopric of Basel-Solothurn had to be settled; but even that was not possible without compromise. In Belgium, however, at the beginning of his administration, Leo XIII had to face the severe school conflict, and as a result of his intention to avoid intensification, differences with the Belgian episcopate emerged. In this case, success was due, first of all, to the Belgian Catholics, who, strengthened by their devotion to the Pope, brought about a devastating defeat for the Liberals in the elections of 1884. But the style in which diplomatic relations were resumed in 1885, after they had been discontinued in 1880, was typical for the polite ways of Leo XIII. Much more difficult was the task facing the Pope in Spain. The problem was not so much the various governments during the era of the Spanish "restoration," which vacillated between liberal-conservative and moderate left; nor the tensions which resulted from the censorship of text books, and the admission of religious who had been expelled from France. The problem was rather a group who believed themselves to be more papal than the Pope and who fought their political enemies as if they were traitors. With political perspicacity, the Pope recognized that the constitution of 1876 provided the Church with relatively optimal operating possibilities. Papal politics also avoided unnecessary aggravation in Portugal, the land of Pombal, while negotiating the new circumscription of the dioceses (1881) and the rights of patronage in the Indian mission (1886). From the central-European perspective, Leo XIII's success with his stance toward the changing conditions in the Latin American republics was generally underestimated. It was the prerequisite for the possible success of the pastoral plans of the plenary council of 1899.

---

[13] Schmidlin, PG II, 393, 352, 589.—"The peace Pope" is the repeated synonym for Leo XIII. In reference to Schmidlin's criticism of this pontificate, see the following.

[14] F. Hayward, op. cit., 322f.

[15] W. Schwer (biblio., chap. 12), 16.

It was in keeping with the confessional, ethnic, and political situation in the Slavic world that the politics of Leo XIII could only obtain slight relief for the Catholic population there. But it is probable that the arrangement with Russia, which the Austro-Hungarian ambassador to the Vatican, Revertera, called a "Midsummer Night's Dream," was all that could be achieved. In this matter Leo XIII also had to deal with the concerns in Vienna, where the strengthening of Pan-Slavism and additional tensions were feared. The situation was most delicate in areas where the Pope collided with the union of national and Catholic consciousness, especially in the Russian and Prussian parts of Poland. The clergy and the population believed themselves betrayed by the Pope to Russification, particularly because Leo XIII encountered very little understanding for his cooperation in Petersburg. The case is similar for the Prussian area: The German archbishop of Gnesen-Posen, Julius Dinder, who had been appointed in 1886 by Leo XIII after the resignation of Lédochowski, wanted a settlement between Berlin's ruthless policy of Germanization and the historical identification of Polish culture and Catholic faith; but he was unsuccessful. In view of the serious differences between Czechs and Germans in Bohemia and Moravia, the Pope had hardly a choice but to admonish the episcopate, in 1901, to keep the Catholic faith out of those differences. Like the Poles, the Slovenes and the Croatians had found their historical identity within the Slavic world in a union of confessionality and nationality. The idea of a Catholic Greater Croatia was completely contradictory to the Pope's intentions. He wanted the Croatian College in Rome, which was just being changed and renamed, to be a center for the movement to unify the Church. Aside from the confessional questions in Hungary, which had been increasing since 1886, the policy of Magyarization was a difficult component of Leo XIII's religious policy in Eastern Europe.

One can compare the attitude of Leo XIII toward Polish Catholicism under Russian influence with his attitude toward the Irish, who were suppressed by Great Britain. In both instances, there was a revolutionary situation. The difference was that Britain had Gladstone, which gave the Pope a chance to pursue an effective pro-Irish policy. Thus the question should be asked as to which the Pope better understood: the principles according to which every revolution needs to be rejected or the terribly violent resistance of the Irish toward the injustices inflicted upon them. In view of the French Revolution, Leo himself later said that it is difficult from the beginning for such changes to occur within the framework of justice. The relations of Leo XIII with Great Britain were even better when the liberal de-anglicanization of public life provided greater freedom for Catholics. The reputation of the papacy in the Anglo-Saxon world grew remarkably during this pontificate; and it was more than just an act of courtesy when Cleveland, then president of the United States of America, sent a copy of the Constitution to Leo XIII for the anniversary of his ordination in 1887. The Know-Nothing Party and the Ku Klux Klan were to fight Catholicism publicly and secretly for a long time to come, but their influence on public opinion was counterbalanced by the prestige of Leo XIII.

At the jubilees in 1883, 1887, 1893, and 1903, the Pope could enjoy the Catholics' demonstrations of loyalty and the good wishes of almost all other nations. However, it characterizes the historical situation that the original countries of the Christian West, France and Italy, could not be listed in the index of success, even though Leo XIII considered these countries especially important in the perspective of his world design.

Perhaps the central question in the historical evaluation of this pontificate deals with the opportunism which even benevolent historians denote as a characteristic of Leo XIII. Léon Gambetta was filled with hatred for the clergy. But although hate can sharpen the eye, this alone is not sufficient for the appropriate assessment of his charge that Leo was an "opportuniste sacré." Walter Goetz also supported this judgment in his sympathetic analysis. However, he distinguished such opportunism from "ordinary" opportunism, which marks the commonplace politician, noting Leo XIII's magnificent political personality, "political instinct and true leadership," especially in regard to social questions, and, last but not least, to the limits the Pope placed on his activities where demanded by his position. This question can only be answered in the context of Leo XIII's total concept. Is it correct to say that his policies and his ecclesiastical leadership were solely determined by the desire to restore the Papal State? No doubt this was a legitimate goal, and even those who considered it anachronistic had no right to call Leo XIII a "Tantalus who yearned after a small Italian principality which was to be cut from the body of the dynasty of Savoy."[16] But if this had been the ultimate goal of Leo XIII, according to which his devotion to modern society is to be judged, then he would have been neither a "master of politics" nor an important Pope.

It is obvious that the Italian question is a primary motif which, with extreme fluctuations from cautious hope to inscrutable resignation, ran through the life of Gioacchino Pecci after he was enthroned on the chair of Saint Peter. It would be misleading to see his advances toward Bismarck from this perspective only. From an agreement with the "great conservative statesman," this "ingenious, courageous, strong-willed man, who knows how to procure obedience,"[17] Leo XIII expected the establishment of a bastion against the revolutionary tendencies in Europe. But the papal words finis impositus, from his address on the termination of the German question (23 May 1887), were spoken in the fatal year when, after many disappointments for the Pope, the end of a greater alliance had come. After the shameful events of 13 July 1881 (see p. 0), Austria as well as other powers refused the expected help against Italy; and in October King Umberto was a celebrated guest in Vienna. What other hope had he placed on Bismarck, a Protestant, yet an admired politician? At first, the Pope was not alone in his opinion of the weakness of the House of Savoy. But just when the Pope spoke of an asylum in the Habsburg Monarchy with the Austrian special emissary (1882), the Triple Alliance between Germany, Austria, and Italy was about to be ratified. The support of the House of Savoy—a child of the revolution to Leo XIII—was presented to the Pope as an act of conservative politics,[18] and Austria pressured the Vatican to settle the German question. The Pope's reliance on Bismarck grew considerably when the latter asked him to mediate the negotiations with Spain concerning the Caroline Islands, one of Leo XIII's most important functions in the last phase of the Kulturkampf. Its conclusion was announced in a papal address of 23 May 1887, ending with the expression of hope that "harmony" could now also be restored to Italy stressing the condition that the Pope's authority should be subject to no one else's.[19] Obviously, the Pope felt, at that moment, that the time for such a solution to the "Roman question" had come: crowning the peace with Germany. However, Crispi refused immediately. In October the Italian prime minister was Bismarck's welcome guest, and the Triple Alliance was renewed. The Pope, though "abandoned by the powers,"[20] returned to his old demands. But with what political power could they be realized? On 2 June 1887 Mariano Rampolla[21] was appointed secretary of state. On 4 October 1887 the French ambassador reported to the Vatican that the Cardinal had spoken with France d'une entente cordiale. At the end of the year Pope Leo XIII himself called France sa fille privilegiée in the presence of the ambassador. As early as 1884, the letter Nobilissima Gallorum gens had intonated such language. In the year 1888, when Wilhelm II visited the Pope, the Pope called Bismarck a great revolutionary during an audience with the French ambassador. After the report of the Austrian special emissary (6 August 1888), Leo XIII told him, "If the government cannot dispatch any troops for my protection, they should at least hoist their flags on the walls of the Vatican when danger is imminent." In connection with a war feared at that time, the Pope advised Vienna and Paris that an alliance with the Vatican would be to their advantage.[22] In 1890 the policy of ralliement began: reconciliation with the French Republic. Rampolla explained to the French delegate that the establishment of an Italian republic might clear the situation for the Vatican because the Pope would not have to reckon with a monarch next to him in Rome.[23] The second political alliance failed with the ralliement.[24] That it had little to do with a trend toward democracy as such can be deduced from the report by Revertera, the Austrian ambassador to the Vatican, according to which the Pope, two weeks after the encyclical Au milieu des sollicitudes (1892), declared his principal support for a "monarchical restoration in France," were it at all possible.[25] [16] H. Hermelink, Das Christentum in der Menschheitsgeschichte III (1955), 92. This remark is not only "too harsh" (G. Maron, op. cit., 205), but also evidence of surprising historical ignorance.

---

[17] Engel-Janosi I, 215–323; here: 220f. According to the topic of this book, Austrian affairs are given preference. Nevertheless, based on unpublished documents, this book is fundamental for the assessment of this pontificate's policies. For Leo XIII's appraisal of Bismarck, see chap. 3.

---

[18] At the Catholic Convention in Freiburg, 1888, Windthorst interpreted the Triple Alliance, renewed in 1887, as a situation favorable to the Pope; as a result, the German and Austrian Catholics could exert more influence on Italy (Kißling II, 234f.).

[19] Acta Leonis VII, 112–16; here: 115.

[20] Engel-Janosi I, 251: Leo XIII's words to the Austrian ambassador to the Vatican.

[21] On Rampolla, see bibliography and the appraisals of diplomats in Engel-Janosi I, 245, 257ff.

During the New Year's reception in 1897 at Count Revertera's, Leo XIII expressed two hopes: before the end of his days, he wanted to see the dawn, at least, of a unification with the Christian peoples outside of the Church and the beginning of a solution to the Roman question. So as not to diminish the political problems of the Papal State or to cloud one's view of the greatness of the Pope by isolating the problem from his total portfolio,[26] it is necessary to see both hopes as one. Naturally, one must understand the Pope's hope for unification from the perspective of what was then historically feasible. The Pope did not expect mutual sympathy from the separated Christians, but rather a mass movement toward conversion. The movement was the horizon on which the validity of the Anglican ordinations was discussed. After he received reports from the Balkans in 1887, Leo XIII believed he could count on the movement. He had oriented his policies toward Russia according to his expectations.[27] Even without calling Leo XIII a "mortal enemy of Protestants,"[28] one could reject such a perception of Christian ecumenism. But given the Catholic self-concept, the city of Saint Peter was the essential component of a Christian unification. However Leo XIII may have envisioned the solution to the Roman question at different times, in detailed or in general terms, it was not only a matter of a "small principality," but of the Holy City as the center of the world Church and the episcopal see of its sovereign, subject to no other power. Rome of Saint Peter's successor and Christ's deputy—or Rome of the Freemason "plague"; that was the question. "La Roma nostra," Leo XIII used to say. And when the Pope spoke about finding asylum in Austria or Spain, he repeatedly used Ambrose's words "Ubi Papa, ibi ecclesia"; however, he thought primarily of a future triumphant return to Rome.[29]

---

[22] Engel-Janosi I, 256, 266.

[23] Ibid., 256.

[24] Toward the end of the year 1895, when the law against congregations became an issue, Nuncio Ferrata tried to combine the two alliances by reminding the French president of the cooperation with the monarchies (Mémoires III, 306f.).

[25] Leo XIII to Count Revertera, "I would like to tell you confidentially what I can, naturally, only confide to few people: I regret that a monarchal restoration in France is impossible under present circumstances. . . . The future of the monarchy there depends on the predominance due to the Catholics within the state" (Engel-Janosi I, 272f.). For a description of Revertera ("honest nobleman"), see ibid., 257.—Cf. chap. 2.—On the change of course: Ward, 60.

[26] Walter Goetz (op. cit., 397f.) also considers this aspect most problematic in view of the question of opportunism. He emphasizes how seriously the Pope took the restoration of the Papal State, unbelievable as this may seem. He wanted to hold Rampolla responsible for the " scrupulous attempts to restore Europe" after 1887. "One cannot simultaneously assent to democracy in France and forbid participation in elections in Italy" (von Aretin, op. cit., 166), since this is based on a relationship to democracy which did not exist; similarly, Fülöp-Miller, op. cit., 130—The papal relations to the American episcopate of Cardinal Gibbons and its development must be seen in this context. From the beginning, there were basic differences, since this episcopate consisted of confirmed democrats.—Whatever could be reconciled by most of the didactic letters which Leo XIII was undoubtedly responsible for, did not preclude conflicts in a certain historical situation (cf. chaps. 10 and 24). The personal sacrifices which the Pope demanded in his policies, during the Kulturkampf as well as the Ralliement, are aspects of the general problem of political power. Cardinal of the Curia (since 1875) Ledóchowski had to renounce the archbishopric of Gnesen in 1886. Archbishop Melchers of Cologne, imprisoned during the Kulturkampf, had to resign in 1885 when promoted to cardinal of the Curia. Bishop Lachat of Basel-Solothurn was demoted when transferred to Ticino as apostolic administrator. The often bitter reactions in the French episcopate are rather understandable.—Bismarck was satisfied with Leo XIII's mediation in the question of the Caroline Islands and he thanked him by addressing him with "sire" in the letter of 31 January 1886 (which the Pope considered significant in reference to the Roman question). Pragmatism and his high opinion of Bismarck, in spite of disillusionments, compelled Leo XIII to award this statesman, whom he later called a revolutionary, the Medal of Christ.

---

[27] Cf. chaps. 9, 11, and 25. For his expectations as to conversions in the East, see Engel-Janosi I, 222f., 248f., 268ff., 321f.

[28] R. Seeberg, Aus Religion und Geschichte I (1906), 332–51.—In several encyclicals, Leo XIII declared the Enlightenment and the Revolution a result of the Reformation. On 1 August 1897, the three hundredth anniversary of Peter Canisius's death, Leo XIII sent the encyclical Militantis Ecclesiae to the Austrian, German, and Swiss episcopates. He compared the situation of Canisius, when the corruption of morals was followed by the "craze for innovations," with the present and spoke of the rebellio lutherana (Acta Leonis XVII, 248–59; here: 248f.).

[29] The idea of finding asylum for the papacy outside of Italy came up four times: 1881–82 when Austrian Trent was considered; 1888 (again looking toward Austria), when the Crispi government played its intrigues and the Pope found his hopes for a conclusion of the Kulturkampf disappointed because the visit of Emperor Wilhelm II had gone badly, primarily because of Prince Henry; 1889, after the demonstrations at the unveiling ceremonies of the Giordano Bruno memorial, this time with Spain in mind; in the summer of 1891, when Emperor Franz Joseph discouraged the Pope (Schmidlin, PG, 414f., 417, 421; Engel-Janosi I, 226–31, 255, 266f.).

If one wants to understand all aspects of this pontificate, it seems necessary to start with Leo XIII's very pronounced awareness of the history of the papacy. This awareness did not have a trace of historicism. He repeated, again and again, in his encyclicals that the papacy formed the Christian West, and what the nations, especially Italy, owed to the papacy.[30] It is self-evident that the Popes Leo the Great and Gregory the Great were especially mentioned, and, likewise, that Leo's predecessors since the French Revolution occupy the most space in the list. Upon examination of the actual content of the frequent traditional mentioning of predecessors,[31] one might find it worthy of note that quotes by Innocent III abound, almost all of which show the personal handwriting of Leo XIII. In the encyclical Inscrutabili Dei (28 May 1878), Innocent III appears together with Leo the Great, Alexander III, and Pius V as models for the new pontificate. Leo XIII, referring to Innocent III and other popes in connection with his unification plans for Eastern Churches, provokes historical comparisons which were, of course, not intended. Nobilissima Gallorum gens (1884), written after the conclusion of the Triple Alliance, anticipates subsequent French policy (in the introduction, the Gesta Dei per Francos is mentioned). Interestingly, Innocent (together with Gregory IX) is cited in a quotation from the letter to the archbishop of Rheims. In it he speaks of the preferential love of France and her obedience to the Apostolic See, which outdoes all other empires.[32] In 1892 Leo XIII had the remains of Innocent III transferred from Perugia to the oldest and most sacred church in Rome, the Lateran Basilica, which he had been restoring and expanding in grand style since 1881. In the same year, the ralliement, the second big attempt to solve the Roman question, was in progress, as well as the creation of a papacy which would, in this revolution-ridden world, resume the universal historic task from which it had profited during the Middle Ages. With the appropriate adjustments, the papacy could win back "moral-religious hegemony in a new Christian world empire."[33] In 1892, on the anniversary of his coronation (3 March 1878), Leo XIII justified the transfer of the remains of his great predecessor, Innocent III, in a speech to the cardinals.[34] During his episcopate in Perugia, his favorite idea had been to honor the memory of this man, and he realized the idea that year, so that his voice might be heard from the Lateran Basilica, the "symbol of Christian unity." Immediately afterwards, he mentioned the great goals of Innocent's pontificate: the "conquest of the Holy Land and the independence of the Church." Under the "freedom of the papacy," he said, the Christian faith, "like our blood, revitalized the social and political organism" and tied the "peoples" to the authority of the Church, the "moral center of the world." Is not "a strong faith, verified in the conscience of the peoples, rather than the restoration of medieval institutions," the way to achieve final victory? The differentiation of medieval and contemporary conditions reflects the discussions about the guilds which were conducted in socialist circles and paid attention to in Rerum novarum (1891). It seems especially important that, in these instances, peoples rather than nation states were referred to. This was in line with hopes placed on the "Catholic masses" since 1887 and with a remark by Rampolla on the "clearly democratic trend of an era, which the Church should not face with animosity.[35] Rampolla's opinion was supported by the worker pilgrimages. We do not know, specifically, what Leo XIII knew about the pontificate of Innocent III, whose great universal goal it had been to lift the papacy "in the realm of christianitas to a sacerdotal-royal position," with himself "as head of the super-national populus christianus, which would be his direct responsibility."[36] It would be misleading to single out Innocent III merely on the basis of the quotations from Leo's predecessors. But Innocent III's memory accompanied Leo XIII from his birth (Anagni was the native bishopric of Gioacchino Pecci) to Perugia, to a dramatic turning point, the transfer of Innocent III's body to the Lateran Basilica (1892), to Leo's own burial (on the right side of the Basilica opposite the tomb of Innocent III).[37] Thus, Innocent III offers access to the universal conception of Leo XIII, who felt that another personality from the Middle Ages, Thomas Aquinas, had completed "Christian philosophy," a return to which would be the way to cure modern society. Perhaps this explains Leo XIII's "temptation to theocracy."

---

[30] Cf. chap. 22.

[31] Gregory XIII is mentioned often, which is only important because of the calendar reform in connection with outfitting the observatory (Acta Leonis XI, 62).

[32] Acta Leonis IV, 11.

[33] Schmidlin, PG II, 353.

[34] Acta Leonis XII, 383–85.

From this background it is understandable that, in an age of imperialism, against all political reality, Leo XIII highly valued the prospects of an international office for arbitration. Such an office he claimed principally for the papacy. Already, in Diuturnum illud (1881), one is reminded that, at the time of the Holy Roman Empire, the Church as conciliatrix had tamed the political passions of peoples partly through clemency, partly by exerting authority.[38] Bismarck's offer of papal mediation (1885) in the dispute between Germany and Spain over the Caroline Islands was, naturally, significant for Leo XIII, mostly because he interpreted the gesture of the Chancellor as recognition of his temporal sovereignty. The Pope, who tended to attach high hopes to the offer, underwent the experience of Spain's refusing his arbitration under international law and conceding merely to mediation.[39] In his letter of 29 May 1899, Leo XIII referred specifically to this diplomatic action. He was answering a letter from the Dutch Queen Wilhelmina, who, at the initiative of the Tsar, had wanted to include the Pope in the peace negotiations in the Hague, and had asked him for "moral support."[40] Leo XIII explained in his letter that it was the duty of the papal office not only to provide the conference with moral support, but also to "play an effective and active part in it." This, he wrote, was in keeping with the tradition of the papacy, whose authority transcended all national borders. Despite opposition, he was going to pursue this duty and not seek any fame other than "de servir la cause sacrée de la civilisation chrétienne." The invitation failed because of Italy. Other countries were also perplexed over this view of papal duties. They believed it to be limited to arbitration. Confirmation of the papal mission had been drawn into demonstrations of loyalty by Catholic congregations, yet it would lead to complications if it was to be applied to a concrete situation.[41] It was a delusion to project this political world onto a "Christian civilization" and to want to redesign it as a union of nations unified in the Christian faith.[42] [35] Engel-Janosi I, 259f.—Rampolla's remark was directed to Count Revertera, the Austrian ambassador.

---

[36] F. Kempf, LThK V, 688.

[37] Two other Popes were buried in the Cathedral of Perugia (Urban IV [1261–64] and Martin IV [1281–85]). To Friedrich Kempf I owe the information that "at some time, the remains of all three Popes were buried together"; thus, it was a remarkable act to transfer the remains of the most important Pope (after all, the Romans forced Martin IV to be crowned in Orvieto). On the transfer (the remains are supposed to have been taken to Rome by a prelate; he carried them in a box and traveled by railway), see Schmidlin, PG II, 405.—Leo XIII pointed to Anagni, in 1897, as the birthplace of Innocent III and Gregory IX.

---

[38] Acta Leonis II, 282.

[39] Leo XIII appointed a commission of cardinals. Their proposal of 22 October 1885 to acknowledge Spain's sovereignty over the islands, but to grant Germany free trade, was accepted by the political powers (1899, after the Spanish-American War, Germany bought the islands from Spain as a protectorate). U. Stutz (op. cit., 60) speaks of a "diplomatic masterpiece" by Bismarck; E. Born (Gebhardt-Grundmann III, 236), emphasizes that this step signifies "the recognition of the Pope's worldly sovereignty, which has not happened since the occupation of the Papal State in 1870"; on the critical assessment of the papal expectations by the Austrian embassy to the Vatican, see Engel-Janosi I, 240; on Spain, R. Konetzke (biblio., chap. 8), 521. On a malicious German caricature, showing the Pope holding a sword and trying to destroy the inscription "Honor-Profit—he is scornfully looking at a Spanish woman to his left; on the right, massively, the triumphant Bismarck—see von Aretin, op. cit., 127.

[40] Acta Leonis XIX, 83–85.

[41] In 1890, at the Catholic Convention in Coblenz, Windthorst pleaded for recognition (Kißling II, 246). At the Catholic Convention in Munich in 1895, another motion by Prince Löwenstein was defeated (Siebertz, op. cit., 203–9).

The significance of the encyclical Rerum novarum (1891)[43] is correctly evaluated and not in the least diminished if placed in the context of Leo XIII's great world design. Certainly the experiences the Pope had with the conservative monarchies, specifically in the years 1887/88, play a role. The monarchies did not want to assist him against the Italian upstart. And Leo XIII, despite his general utterances in reference to political philosophy, was adverse to democracy. Likewise, the change in tone after 1901 toward Graves de communi is evident. The negative turn of events exposes the overall goal: a cure for the social and political disruptions in the modern world, which was plunging into a state of deep resignation around the end of the nineteenth century. The cure was hoped to be the recognition of the moral authority of the vicarius Christi. It involved the inevitable liberation of the proletarii from oppression by classes dirigeantes as well as their right to unionize. The "question of the workers" is only one part of the general renovation of society based on Neo-Scholastic social philosophy. For Leo, renovation was feasible only if the authority of the Church would be respected again by everyone. As much as the workers' pilgrimages to Rome[44] meant to the Pope in view of the Piedmontese sovereignty, it is absurd to interpret the patriarchal papal involvement in the workers' question as a mere means of pragmatic politics in the "Roman question."[45]

Leo XIII was not only a political but also a seigneurial Pope.[46] His first secretary of state, Alexander Franchi,[47] whose appointment may have had something to do with the papal elections, was the most distinguished secretary of state before Rampolla. In 1880, two years after Franchi's death, Lorenzo Nina, who also belonged to the intransigents, incurred displeasure and was in office only a short time.[48] Secretary of State Ludovico Jacobini (1880–87), formerly nuncio to Vienna, had a cautious nature and "his personality could neither succeed in the Vatican nor with the Pope himself" (Engel-Janosi). He had to follow the changing initiatives of the Pope in his policy toward Bismarck. Leo XIII also expected that his nuncios would be recognized as executive representatives of his authority, through which he ruled the world Church in a centralized manner.[49] To strengthen his position toward the ecclesiastical opponents of the Spanish constitution, the Pope stated the point clearly in a letter on 15 April 1885, delivered by Secretary of State Jacobini to Rampolla, nuncio to Madrid since 1882.[50] "In respect to the faithful in the country and their ecclesiastical affairs," the nuncios have an "authoritative mission," whose extent is determined by the Pope—the constitution Pastor aeternus is referred to. Domenico Ferrata, one of Leo XIII's outstanding diplomats, became nuncio to Paris after his duties in Switzerland and Belgium (1891–96). In 1894 he declared to French President Périer that the nuncio represents the Pope as the "true spiritual sovereign of the Catholics in the respective country," and that he, the nuncio, differed fundamentally from other ambassadors.[51] Another man especially favored by the Pope was the diplomat Luigi Galimberti. As special emissary of the Pope, he played a major role in the conclusion of the Kulturkampf, and his behavior toward Windthorst, which he could not have afforded at his own expense, documented the individual style of government of this pontificate.[52] That his rival Rampolla became secretary of state in 1887 and that he himself had to go to [42] Tischleder, Staatslehre, 404ff.—H. Hermelink (op. cit., 107) remarked that it was too late "to subjugate liberated peoples to the centralistic leadership of a celibate international priesthood"; this remark, made in 1955, shows a curious Protestant feeling of resentment.

---

[43] Rightfully, K. O. von Aretin (op. cit., 158) calls this encyclical "a great deed" which is directed against the paternalistic slander of the Christian social movement.

[44] French pilgrimages 1887, 1888, 1889, 1891 (the words "vive le Pape!" resulted in disturbances during which a picture of the Pope was burned). In 1892, a medallion was issued displaying a picture of the Pope and a figure, symbolic of religion, carrying the encyclical of 1891 in the right hand and the cross in the left, while smashing the head of the hydra (greed). A poor woman and her child are sitting at the feet of this female figure. A strong workman with his tools is looking up to her, while wealthy gentlemen approaching from the other side bring presents (Schmidlin, PG II, 378). One has to consider here the popular taste of the time.

[45] Cf. chaps. 12 and 13.

[46] It would be presumptuous to undertake even a sketch of Gioacchino Pecci's portrait. The reports of people who met him are contradictory (cf. Engel-Janosi I, 217, 231, 263). Optimism, naturally greater at the beginning of his office than at the end, seems to have been intertwined with scepticism, something rather unexpected in view of Leo XIII's expansive concepts. Emotional features were, probably, not foreign to this strong, humanistic rationalist ("cool and sober": Schmidlin, PG II, 587). According to a report by the Austrian delegate, Leo XIII interrupted Secretary of State Jacobini while the latter was voicing objections concerning an administrative question, saying, "Ego sum Petrus!" Leo XIII's mood, prompted by Emperor Franz Joseph's evasive reply (1881), was characterized by Jacobini as follows, "J'en ai été navré." Naturally, the physical strength of the Pope, born in 1810, had diminished. But caution should be exercised over talk about his "senility." In 1901 the Austrian ambassador found the Pope to be more energetic and fresher than twelve years earlier.

---

[47] Cf. chap. 3, n. 3.

[48] Cf. chap. 3, n. 12.

[49] Leo XIII asserted "the weight of his authority even in nonecclesiastical matters" and thus practiced the potestas directa indirectly (Schmidlin, PG , 583).

[50] ASS, 17, 561ff.; cf. cit., chap. 8, n. 5.

[51] Mémoires II, 455.

[52] Cf. chap. 3, n. 43.

Vienna as nuncio (until 1893) were the result of the major policy changes in papal politics.[53] As long as the Vatican archives until 1903 are not generally accessible, it cannot be determined accurately, among other matters, which position Secretary of State Rampolla took toward Leo XIII.[54] It is possible that he had great influence on Leo XIII's activities during the final years.

With this diplomatic apparatus, Leo XIII sought to assert the power of his moral authority. In the beginning of the 1880s, he had to realize that the conditions for such assertion were not present because the conservative forces did not consider this authority indispensable to their survival in the face of revolutionary tendencies. Not even the Habsburg Monarchy wanted to or could face the consequences in reality. After the nineties Leo XIII noticed that turning directly to the people could strengthen his authority over Catholicism. But his hopes for the expansion to turn into conversion movements were not fulfilled, much less his expectation that he would be respected as the moral authority by all men. It was one of his favorite plans to establish diplomatic relations with China. He had already designated Antonio Agliardi, later nuncio to Vienna, as the apostolic delegate when his letter to the Emperor of China (1 February 1885) received a positive response. His immediate motive had been the protection of the Catholic missionaries. But the ultimate goal was the inclusion of this world culture into his universal concept.[55] The plan failed because France, the only power generally recognized to protect the Christians in the Orient, saw her interests endangered and threatened the Vatican with a break in diplomatic relations.

One must see the consecration of the entire human race to the Sacred Heart, on the occasion of the jubilee in 1900, in the perspective of Leo's world plan. Even though Leo XIII was a "political Pope" and as such subjugated to the conditions of politics, this pontiff cannot be understood if his goal is defined as "the domination of all of mankind by the Catholic Church,"[56] unless one understands "domination" as the kind of mutual permeation of religious and political concepts which characterized the political theory of the West before it dissolved in the later medieval period. One cannot say that his pontificate distinguished itself through the creative forces of spirituality,[57] even though Leo XIII's deep religious piety is proven beyond doubt. Traditional forms, which Marie-Thérèse of Lisieux picked up and internalized during her life of suffering, were developed further and incorporated in the service of public worship. But the character of this pontificate is distorted if one misunderstands the "politicization" as an ideological manipulation of religiosity. This is contradicted by the astonishing attraction which most religious orders and congregations exerted, so that they were able to keep winning many young people for extensive social work with religious motivation.

---

[53] On Galimberti, see Engel-Janosi I, 261f. The "mysterious" diplomat was considered a supporter of a rapprochement with Italy. This is contradicted by a report of the French ambassador in Vienna. It says that Galimberti supported an aggressive liquidation of the Non Expedit and would have liked to see the Pope leave the Vatican together with his cardinals in order to prove the alleged fallacy of the freedom of the Pope.

[54] On Rampolla, see this chap., n. 21.

[55] Acta Leonis V, 10–12. On Leo XIII's relations to the missions, ibid., III.

[56] W. Goetz, op. cit., 403. Engel-Janosi I, 264, maintains that "Leo XIII wanted to be and was more than the 'Pope of diplomacy.' " Ward, 61: great as a Pope, not as a politician.

The world design of Leo XIII found its most magnificent expression, revealing its innermost moments, in the apostolic letter Praeclara gratulationis of June 1894.[58] It is one of those utopias without which historical greatness is not possible. The end is marked by the bitter letter Annum ingressi sumus of 19 March 1902,[59] in which Leo XIII bemoans the insults inflicted upon the Church. But it was not just the fanatic hatred of individual Freemasons and the animosity of the whole organization toward the Catholic Church. Reconciliation of the modern world with tradition was no longer in anyone's power. The so-called "tragic failure"[60] of Leo stood under a world signature. His successes were fewer than he had hoped. But that he had hoped for much was the basis for his achievements. To the faithful "he gave a new feeling of inner security toward the world."[61] This constitutes his historical significance. "Though his reign, in retrospect, may not appear to be as unique as it was presented elsewhere, Leo XIII is unquestionably the most important Pope of his century and the most important Pope between Benedict XIV and Pius XI" (G. Schwaiger).[62] His policies and the changes in his policies, his political and social encyclicals, his reclaiming the great philosophy of Thomas Aquinas, his centralized orientation of Catholicism and the Church toward Rome, his involvement in the world mission, his hopes for a great conversion movement: all these were testimony to his grandiose desire for restauratio; no longer by way of political restoration as at the beginning of the century, but by turning to the modern world because of his basic concern for the salvation of mankind. The fact that the election of the new Pope after Leo's death on 20 July 1903 stirred the political powers much more than those in the year 1878 was a result of the respect which Leo XIII had gained in the world for the papacy.

---

[57] Cf. chap. 16.

[58] Acta Leonis XIV, 195–214; A. Harnack calls this letter "the testimonial of Leo XIII": Reden und Aufsätze II (2nd ed., 1906), 267–93; one cannot expect "any concessions (toward the non-Catholics), other than a friendly tone."

[59] Acta Leonis XXII, 52–80.

[60] Fülöp-Miller, op. cit., 152.

[61] W. Goetz, op. cit., 402—W. von Loewenich, (Moderner Katholizismus [Witten a.d. Ruhr 1955], 69f.) speaks of the "disunity of modern Catholicism" becoming evident in Leo XIII, whom he portrays very objectively. On this "disunity," see chaps. 12–14. The real problem is not "abundant authoritative preliminary decisions." The problem is much more complex and not confined to Catholicism.

[62] G. Schwaiger, op. cit., 49.

SECTION ONE

The Situation in the Various Countries until 1914

CHAPTER 1

The Kulturkampf in Prussia and in the German Empire until 1878

Nowhere in Europe was the struggle between Church and state fought as vigorously as in the German Empire of 1871. This battle considerably impeded inner consolidation for the next two decades. Since most of the controversial issues continued to be subject to the legislation of the individual states, the struggle took place on their terrain, and most vigorously in Prussia, the dominating power in the new Empire. There were two momentous determining factors: ideological contrast between the ultramontane Catholic Church and liberalism, which was controlling spiritual and political life, peaking in the years of the Syllabus; and the continued disparity within the Prussian state. The confessional disputes had further increased; the Prussian bureaucracy, partly Protestant, partly liberal, had only reluctantly executed an ecclesiastical policy of parity, as defined by the constitutions of 1848 and 1850.[1] The strengthening of Catholicism as a social force awakened old and new adversaries. In the late sixties, attacks against confessional schools, cloisters, and other Church institutions occurred more and more often. Mutual misunderstandings due to insufficient knowledge of the opponent and the German lack of flexibility and moderation were contributing factors.

One direct cause of the conflict was the creation of the Center Party, which Bismarck falsely regarded as a conglomerate of the Empire's adversaries. Other causes were the dispute over the dogma of infallibility, the alliance with the National Liberals, designed by the chancellor to consolidate the Empire, and his fear of an anti-German coalition of Catholic states.

---

[1] V. Conzemius, Die Briefe Aulikes an Döllinger. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der "Katholischen Abteilung" im preußischen Kultusministerium (Rome, Freiburg, Vienna 1968), passim.—On occasion, Bismarck himself had reprimanded high Prussian civil servants for their animosity towards Catholics. Cf. his direct report of 30 September 1865: O. v. Bismarck, Die gesammelten Werke V (Berlin 1928), no. 185. In regard to tensions in Prussia after 1866, see K. Bachem, Zentrumspartei III, 26–47; R. Morsey, Probleme der Kulturkampfforschung, 221–24.

The political tensions within the Church increased and were nurtured continuously since the end of 1869 by news from the Council in Rome.[2] These tensions and the fear of more severe anti-Catholic measures, as demanded by the Liberals, seemed to necessitate the political consolidation of Catholics in Prussia as well. The movement seeking to found a party since the summer of 1870 was headed by Hermann von Mallinckrodt and Peter Reichensperger. Against the opposition of integralistic circles, they insisted on a political, not primarily a Catholic, party: a principle they had already defended in the fifties.[3] Nevertheless, in response to the particular initial situation, Church affairs took precedence in the first program of the Center Party: the immunity of the Church as defined in the Prussian constitution, the guarantee of confessional schools and freedom of instruction. Other, more important resolutions demanded the preservation of the federal constitution of the German Empire, governmental decentralization, protection of workers, and social welfare. On the basis of this program, fifty-eight deputies were elected to the Prussian Diet in November 1870.

The founding of the Center Party coincided with the Franco-Prussian War. Even the majority of the German Catholics and their leaders regarded this war as a legitimate opportunity to ward off ever increasing threatening pressures. In a similar vein was the pastoral letter of the episcopal conference in Fulda in the summer of 1870, which was addressed particularly to the opponents of the dogma of infallibility. In contrast to the fraternal strife of 1866, the war against the "arch-enemy" was quite popular, especially in the Catholic west and southwest of Germany.

Those who had approved the war could not reject its predictable consequence, the founding of the Empire. Indeed, in 1871 the sentiments of most Catholics differed from those of most other Germans only by reason of an increasing fear of Church conflicts. They also wanted close contact between the Empire and Austria. At the Catholic Convention in Mainz (September 1871) its President Friedrich Baudri and Bishop Ketteler gave recognition to the Emperor and the Empire.[4] Urgently responding to the actual increase of controversies caused by the dogma of infallibility, which had already invaded imperial legal territory, they demanded from the state justice for the Church and protection from assaults by the Liberals. Similarly, Ketteler expressed himself in a political program written in 1871, but not published until 1873.[5] He welcomed the "partial unity of the German people," created by the founding of the Empire, "because it satisfied, partially, a right of the German people and it made amends for the injustice inflicted upon them."

---

[2] V. Conzemius, "Preußen und das 1. Vatikanische Konzil," AHC 2 (1970), 353–419.

[3] Concerning the founding of the Center Party, see K. Bachem, Zentrumspartei III, 99–151; L. Bergsträsser, Geschichte der politischen Parteien in Deutschland (Munich, 10th ed., 1960), 133–37; T. Nipperdey, Die Organisation der deutschen Parteien vor 1918 (Düsseldorf 1961), 265ff.; E. R. Huber, Verfassungsgeschichte IV, 50ff.; R. Morsey, StL VIII, 966f.

[4] F. Vigener, Ketteler, 653–58.

At the first session of the Reichstag (March 1871), the Center Party already represented the second strongest faction (with fifty-eight deputies). The program, which had not been substantially modified since the previous year,[6] and Ketteler's words mentioned above (in 1871/72 he was a member of the Reichstag) showed the reservations of the Center Party as it proceeded with its work. They were sufficient to create an almost irreconcilable opposition to the dominant National Liberals. This was clearly proven by the exclusion of the Center Party from the Presidium. The situation was intensified when the Center immediately accepted some Guelph guest listeners and, soon afterwards, supported other minorities as well (Poles, Alsatians). Continual controversies about the new dogma, about the ecclesiastical censure of orthodox adversaries, and about the growing Old Catholic Church were part of the efforts of the new Empire to gain a historical self-understanding. After 1866 National-Liberal, National-Protestant, and also Protestant-Conservative writers presented the results of 1870/71 as a victory for the social principles essential to Protestantism and a consequence of Protestant Prussian history.[7] The Habsburg dynasty, the papacy, the Jesuits, and the Counter Reformation were held responsible for actually or allegedly leading German history astray. Now and then, Catholics were advised to establish a National Church.

The Center Party itself had introduced these disputes over principles into the first session of the Reichstag. This was instigated by the problems of the Papal State, which stirred everyone's emotions, especially after the annexation of Rome (September 1870). The numerous demonstrations and pilgrimages of the Catholics were meant to assure the Pope of their solidarity and to ask their governments for support. The

---

[5] "Die Katholiken im neuen Reich. Entwurf zu einem politischen Programm" (Mainz 1873).

[6] Text: K. Bachem, Zentrumspartei III, 137f.

[7] T. Schieder, Das deutsche Kaiserreich von 1871 als Nationalstaat (Cologne, Opladen 1961), 22–26, 58f., 76–82, 125–30; K. G. Faber, Die nationalpolitische Publizistik Deutschlands von 1866 bis 1871 II (Düsseldorf 1963) nos. 883, 885, 890, 907–10, 913f., 921f., 930; E. Fehrenbach, Wandlungen des deutschen Kaisergedankens 1871–1918 (Munich, Vienna 1969), 23–40, 52–56, 60–65, 223–27, etc.

Liberals took this as a challenge, since they considered the completion of unity in Germany and Italy as a victory of the modern concept of the state.[8]

Since help could neither be expected from Austria, which tried to come to terms with Italy, nor from now Republican France, Pius IX had asked the King of Prussia for assistance in the fall of 1870. Archbishops Melchers and Ledóchowski had turned to Wilhelm I and Bismarck with the same request. In Berlin Queen Augusta (Empress since 1871) expressly supported the papal desires. She was guided by a conservative awareness of the law as well as the wish to integrate Catholics into the Prussian-German state. The conservative Minister of Religious Affairs Heinrich Mühler (1813–74) agreed with her, but intended to intervene only together with other political powers.[9] King Wilhelm I (Emperor since January 1871) was not disinclined toward the considerations of his spouse, but had to agree with Bismarck's arguments, who, during the persisting war with France, strictly refused any anti-Italian intervention. However, he was willing, if necessary, to grant asylum to the Pope.

In the Emperor's speech before the first Reichstag, Wilhelm disavowed any kind of intervention into the domestic affairs of other peoples. In the draft of a reply addressed to the Monarch, the National-Liberal majority formulated the principle of non-intervention, which was in accord with the national self-understanding and the needs of the Empire in regard to her foreign policies, but clearly oriented against the Pope and the Papal State.[10] The Center Party attempted a modification which would not fundamentally exclude intervention in favor of the Pope. Constitution-minded Ludwig Windthorst (1812–91), former cabinet minister of Hannover, stood out in this debate. In the following years, especially after Mallinckrodt's death in 1874, Windthorst became the great leader of the Center Party and Bismarck's most important parliamentary adversary in the Kulturkampf. Windthorst declared papal independence, as guaranteed by the Papal State which was created under Charlemagne, founder of the First German Empire, to be of vital interest to German Catholics. In the debate, arguments by politicians wishing for a united Germany excluding Austria were brought forth, sympathy for liberal Italy was declared, and impetuous invectives against the Catholic Church and its latest developments were voiced. The majority's address to the Monarch was approved with 243 to 63 votes. Although the failure of the Center Party's motion was predictable, the fact that it was pursued anyway was not only due to the antipapal tone of the majority draft. The deputies of the then strongest Catholic party seemed to believe that they could draw inopportune conclusions from the commitment of solidarity with the Pope, which had always been part of an ultramontane Church concept. Once again, more trenchantly than in 1866, did the Roman-Italian aspect of the decision of 1870 affect and burden German Catholics and their relations to the nation-state.

---

[8] Concerning the controversies of 1870/71, see E. Portner, Die Einigung Italiens im Urteil liberaler deutscher Zeitgenossen (Bonn 1959), 66ff., 111ff., 148ff.; K. Buchheim, Ultramontanismus und Demokratie, 213f., 237, 243f., 248ff., etc.; K.-G. Faber, op. cit.; K. O. von Aretin and R. Lill, La fine del potere temporale . . . Atti del XLV congresso di storia del risorgimento italiano (Rome 1972), 79–87, 291–301.

[9] The point of view of Augusta, Wilhelm I, and Mühler, see A. Constabel, Vorgeschichte, nos. 14, 16, 19, 21, 25, 32, 35, 43, 53, 68, 80, 84, 87, 91.

[10] Concerning the address debate, see T. Schieder, Kaiserreich, 80f. Cf. also K. Bachem, Zentrumspartei III, 193–98; G. Stoltenberg, Der deutsche Reichstag 1871 bis 1873 (Düsseldorf 1955), 39–43.

The debate on the address resulted in the isolation of the Center Party, which was immediately intensified during the deliberation about the constitution.[11] The faction reiterated demands for the inclusion of certain fundamental rights in the federal constitution, among them articles 15 and 18 of the Prussian constitution, guaranteeing immunity for the Church. As early as 1867, after the creation of the North German Confederation, several Catholic deputies had voiced these demands. The main supporters of the hopeless initiative were Ketteler and Peter Reichensperger. Mallinckrodt and Windthorst had dissuaded them in vain. They felt that it would be more profitable for the Church to assign responsibilities for religious policies to the individual states than to the liberally governed Empire.

The debates on the address and the constitution anticipated the parliamentary fronts of the Kulturkampf. Bismarck found his suspicions concerning the Catholic party verified. It seemed to him that the party's alleged "international" character and its first initiatives endangered the consolidation of national unity. He hated the "Guelph" Windthorst. He was particularly suspicious of the protection which the party provided the Poles who had been forced into total opposition since the founding of the Empire. Attempts to denounce the Center Party in Rome as conspirators of revolution and compel the Pope to chastise the party were only partially successful. After some ambiguous remarks, Cardinal Antonelli expressed his appreciation for the party in a letter which Ketteler had effected.[12] Bismarck thereupon fought an open battle, which was primarily motivated by political, not by religious reasons.[13] The Center Party did not suit Bismarck's plans; confessionally based on the masses, it was socially heterogeneous. It had also legitimized itself as a democratic body and was therefore intent on parliamentary rule, which Bismarck despised. The "ultramontane" party was the first which the Chancellor embellished with the term "foes of the Empire," fighting them with unreasonable vehemence. Bismarck's opposition to these groups was responsible for the integration of the other parties in accordance with his governmental policies.

---

[11] K. Bachem, Zentrumspartei III, 198–201; G. Stoltenberg, Reichstag, 43–46.

[12] F. Vigener, Ketteler, 650f. The demarches in the Vatican were carried out by the Bavarian delegate Count Tauffkirchen, who was also representing the Empire there for a while. G. Franz-Willing, Die bayrische Vatikangesandtschaft 1803–1934 (Munich 1965), 63ff.; O. von Bismarck, Gesammelte Werke, VIc, no. 9, cf. also ibid., no. 3.

The Prussian government, especially Bismarck and the conservative Minister of Religious Affairs Heinrich Mühler, regarded the Vatican Council and its resolutions as domestic affairs of the Catholic Church. A position was not taken until the bishops began inflicting penalties upon opponents to the impairment of their civil or social status. Mühler completely avoided conflict, regretted the recent internal developments within Catholicism and sided with the reprimanded professors in Bonn and Breslau and the other clerical teachers.[14] Prince-Bishop Förster of Breslau[15] had acted especially harshly, though he had been a vehement opponent of the dogma of infallibility himself. He had submitted, finally, and expected the same from his clergy.

Bishop Krementz of Ermland[16] took steps not only against Professor

---

[13] "Declarations of war" by the Chancellor were his letter to Count Frankenberg (19 June 1871), published a few days later in the Nationalzeitung, and an article against the "clerical faction" inspired by Bismarck, published in the Kreuzzeitung (also 19 June 1871). Frankenberg belonged to a minority of the Catholic nobility, predominantly represented in Silesia, which was very close to the Prussian state.

[14] Concerning the controversies about the professors, see A. Constable, Vorgeschichte, nos. 2f., 7f., 10–13, 15ff., 22f., 26, 28–31, 33f., 36–42, 45, 47, 51, 54–57, 63f., 77, 81, 83.

[15] Heinrich Förster, cathedral vicar and chaplain since 1837, a leading figure in the ecclesiastical liberation movement, continued as bishop (since 1853) the restoration efforts of his predecessor Diepenbrock. Because of his resistance to the May laws, Förster was dismissed in October 1875. In order to avoid arrest, he moved to the Austrian part of his bishopric, where he was able to perform the duties of his office. (A. Nowack, ArSKG 2 [1937], 207–18; K. Engelbert, ibid. 7 [1949], 147–88; H. Hoffmann, ibid. 12 [1954], 257–62; V. Schurr, *LThK*² IV, 218f; a study by T. Lissek soon to be published.

[16] Philippus Krementz (1819–99), 1848: priest in Koblenz, 1867: bishop in Ermland. His conflict with the government intensified in 1872 until his income was withheld (suspension of temporalities). In the subsequent struggle, Krementz stayed in the background. Therefore, and because of protection by Empress Augusta, he was able to remain in office and to succeed Melchers as archbishop of Cologne in 1885, and as cardinal in 1893. "Philippus Krementz. Ein Lebensbild," Festschrift zur Kardinalserhebung (Cologne 1893); Atlpreußische Biographie, ed. by C. Krollmann (Königsberg 1941–44), 364; B. M. Rosenberg, ZGAE, 30 (1960), 191–97; F. Lauchert, *LThK*¹ VI, 237.

Michelis of Braunsberg, but also against all the teachers of the local Catholic high school. The principal and Wollmann, the religion teacher, were excommunicated. Students subsequently boycotted religious instruction and were forced by the government to leave the school.[17]

The government used the controversy for its first administrative maneuver of far-reaching consequences. On 8 July 1871 the Catholic department of the Ministry of Religious Affairs was dissolved and combined with the Protestant department to form a department for ecclesiastical affairs.[18] Bismarck and the liberal press accused the functionaries of the Catholic department, vainly defended by Mühler, of two offenses: in the latest controversy they did not adequately represent the position of the state and they did not energetically combat the expansion of the Polish clerical influence in the schools of the eastern provinces.

In the meantime, Bismarck's alliance with the National Liberals had solidified because the Conservatives had taken a reserved stand toward his domestic policies, fearing a diminution of Prussian autonomy. The radical political program directed against the Church, which the Chancellor explained to Mühler in August 1871, a few weeks after his official "declaration of war,"[19] was completely in accord with the new constellations. The program combined Bismarck's typical desire to restore the old Prussian sovereignty over the Church with the extensive adoption of the ecclesiastical maxims of liberalism. Bismarck wanted to combat the ultramontane party, especially in the eastern provinces. He was aiming at separation of church and state and of church and school. He wanted to transfer school inspections to nonclerical supervisors and abolish religious instruction in the schools. Henceforth, ecclesiastical affairs were to be administered by the Ministry of Justice.[20]

The Prussian bishops under the chairmanship of Paulus Melchers met again in September 1871 in Fulda. In a direct petition they tried to prove the legitimacy of their measures against the Old Catholics and to clarify the misunderstandings caused by dogma. But they were unable to accomplish anything against Bismarck's intentions.[21] His fight was not directed against the infallability of the Pope as much as against the Center Party and the ultramontane "conspiracy." To the Liberals, the dogma meant simply the ultimate confirmation of their ecclesiastical policies. Ketteler, after a conversation with Bismarck in November 1871, had to recognize that the conflict had become irreconcilable. The Chancellor seemed to be convinced that the Curia and the Center Party were conspiring against the Empire.[22]

---

[17] Concerning the Braunsberger controversy and the subsequent conflict with Krementz, see. A. Constabel, Vorgeschichte, no. 46ff., especially nos. 52, 62, 65–76, 78f., 90, 107, 117, 141f., 158ff., 166–71, 205f., 208ff., 213ff., 224ff., 240–58.

[18] Concerning the abolishment of the Catholic department, see A. Constabel, Vorgeschichte, nos. 85f., 89, 92ff., Cf. O. von Bismarck, Gesammelte Werke, VIc, no. 10.

[19] See n. 13.

[20] W. Reichle, Mühler, 333.

[21] A. Constabel, Vorgeschichte, nos. 106, 109, 112f., 115; R. Lill, Die ersten deutschen Bischofskonferenzen (Freiburg, Basel, Vienna 1964), 112–18.

A legal strategical initiative had meanwhile emanated from Bavaria. In October 1871 the Reichstag opened its second session. Minister Johann Lutz presented a bill introducing a pulpit paragraph which was ratified 10 December 1871 (ARTICLE 130a of the penal code). The clergy was forbidden, when in office, to deal with public affairs "in a way which would endanger the peace of public life."[23] In previous passionate debates, Windthorst, Peter Reichensperger, and Ketteler had justified the opposition of the Center Party. Lutz had explained that it was a question of who was in command: the state or the Roman Church. Almost all National Liberals agreed. Their chairman, Rudolf von Bennigsen, admitted in confidential consultation that he wanted to provoke the clerical faction to act with more rigor.

Meanwhile, Bismarck and his colleagues had proceeded to realize their program in Prussia. Only with reservations did the Emperor join in. But Bismarck was able to convince him that the interests of the state left no choice. Augusta's numerous and well-founded warnings of the conflict accomplished nothing.[24] Mühler resisted Bismarck consistently. He wanted to introduce the law on school supervision by the state, which Bismarck desired so urgently, only under the provision that a general school law be passed which would preserve the Christian character of the school system. Mühler had to resign in January 1872. He was succeeded by Adalbert Falk (1827–1900), a disciple of the liberal political concept. He had strong support from the National Liberal Party and was the driving force next to Bismarck in the Kulturkampf. On 11 March 1872, the school supervision law was passed. Now, the state had the right to supervise all public and private schools and to appoint school inspectors (ART. 2), who had previously been employed by the Church.[25] This law, like the Baden school law of 1868, was not so much a result of the Kulturkampf as of the liberal desire to remove all ecclesiastical influence from public affairs. It was discriminatory because of the circumstances under which it was passed. Bismarck, Falk, and the liberal press left no doubt that they wanted to strike out against the Catholic Church and the Polish population of Prussia. Nevertheless, this law caused the break with the Conservatives which embittered the Chancellor. The Conservative majority rejected the new dogmatic developments within Catholicism. But they also rejected a conflict knowing that it would turn against the Protestant Church and, generally, against the alliance of throne and altar.

---

[22] F. Vigener, Ketteler, 662ff.

[23] Text: J. B. Kißling, Kulturkampf, II, 460.—Concerning the previous debate, see G. Stoltenberg, Reichstag, 101–14.

[24] Concerning Augusta's warnings, see. A. Constabel, Vorgeschichte, nos. 68, 80, 91, 108, 156, 172, 177, 183, 188, 202, 220, 252, 258.

[25] Text: J. B. Kißling, Kulturkampf II, 460f.

In the following months, the government increased antiecclesiastical administrative measures introduced under Mühler. Prominent victims were Bishop Krementz, whose salary was withheld in spite of the Emperor's reluctance, and Bishop Namszanowski, military ordinary to the armed forces.[26] Namszanowski had discontinued services in the garrison's church, St. Pantaleon in Cologne, which the state had allowed to the Old Catholics. He had also forbidden a curate, who opposed the dogma, to perform the duties of his office. The Defense Department did not understand the clerical responsibilities of the military ordinary and considered his actions illegal transgressions from his area of competence. When Namszanowski participated in the episcopal conference in Fulda (April 1872), the Department charged him with leaving Berlin without permission "on unofficial business."[27] The government suspended the bishop, but the disciplinary court did not confirm it. The appeal was decided by the Ministry of State itself. On 26 June 1873, the Bishop was placed under suspension, after the cabinet decree of 15 March 1873 had already dissolved the military ordinariate. A diplomatic protest by the Vatican (Antonelli's letter of 28 August 1872), with whom the establishment of the ordinariate to the armed forces had been arranged, received no answer. This diplomatic insult of the Vatican had been preceded by a worse one in the spring of 1872. Bismarck had tried to force Cardinal Hohenlohe as ambassador upon the Pope, though in 1870 he had fallen out of favor with Rome.[28] After papal rejection of the cardinal, only a chargé d'affaires remained in the Vatican. By the end of 1872, he was also recalled because of Pius IX's vehement protests against the unrelenting execution of the Jesuit laws. In 1875, at the peak of the Kulturkampf, funds for the embassy to the Vatican were stricken from the state budget.

---

[26] Franz Adolf Namszanowski (1820–1900), provost in Königsberg, in 1868 titular bishop and military ordinary to the Prussian armed forces, after his provisional retirement he resided in Frauenburg (Ermland), where he became cathedral vicar. H. Pohl, Die katholische Militärfürsorge Preußens 1797–1888 (Stuttgart 1926, reprint Amsterdam 1962), 209ff., 229, 236–39, 250–344, 363, 369–72, 387; Altpreußische Biographie (see n. 16), 455; B. M. Rosenberg, ibid., 197f.

[27] Concerning the controversy over Namszanowski and the military ordinariate, see H. Pohl, op. cit., 250–344; A. Constabel, Vorgeschichte, no. 105, 148, 152, 161f., 165, 168, 173f., 179–82, 184f., 187f., 191ff., 196ff., 201, 207, 236, 261.

[28] E. Deuerlein, "Bismarck und die Reichsvertretung beim Heiligen Stuhl," StdZ 164 (1959), 203–19, 256–66; H. Philippi, "Beiträge zur Geschichte der diplomatischen Beziehungen zwischen dem Deutschen Reich und dem Heiligen Stuhl," HJ 82 (1963), 219–62, see esp. 219–39.

Intensification of the already tense situation in 1872, painfully felt by the Vatican and the majority of the German Catholics, brought about the Jesuit law, the second federal law of the Kulturkampf (4 July 1872).[29] The Society of Jesus and related orders (Redemptorists, Lazarists) were forbidden in the Empire and existing foundations were dissolved (ART. 1). The members were subjected to residence restrictions, and the foreigners among them faced expulsion from the country. This was precipitated by a storm of petitions by Old Catholics, the Association of Protestants, and many National Liberal groups. The Jesuits were charged with responsibility for the Syllabus and for the dogma of infallibility, and they were exposed as opponents of the modern state and civil liberties. The leaders of south German liberalism, Lutz and his predecessor Hohenlohe, launched concrete initiatives in opposition to the law, but confined them to residence restrictions for the Jesuits. In spite of the strong resistance by the Center and some Conservatives, the National Liberal majority of the Reichstag pushed through a law of prohibition without any time limitations. Like the Socialist law, passed in 1878, the Jesuit law was an exceptive law which violated the constitutional principles of liberalism. Nevertheless, only a few National Liberals advised against it, e.g., Ludwig Bamberger, Eduard Lasker,[30] Johannes von Miquel, and the majority of the leftist-liberal Progressive Party. The fact that the majority of the National Liberals voted for the exceptive laws damaged their credibility and prepared the party's crisis, facilitating the conclusion of the Kulturkampf.

The Catholic reactions to the Jesuit law were sharp. Shortly before its passage, Pius IX, in an address to the German Catholics, urged resistance to the "persecution of the Church."[31] In June 1872 Felix von Loë (1825–96) founded the "Society of German Catholics" in Mainz. He declared as his primary task the defense against a liberal state-church policy.[32] The most important protest was contained in a memorandum

[29] Text: J. B. Kißling, Kulturkampf II, 461; E. R. Huber, Dokumente zur deutschen Verfassungsgeschichte II, 363.—Concerning the previous debate, see K. Bachem, Zentrumspartei III, 252–57; G. Stoltenberg, Reichstag, 144–52.—B. Duhr, Das Jesuitengesetz (Freiburg 1919).

[30] The reference to Bamberger and Lasker contradicts the generalization by many Catholics that "the Jews" were responsible for the Kulturkampf. About the participation of many Jews, see K. Bachem, Zentrumspartei III, 417f.

[31] Text: N. Siegfried, Aktenstücke, 132f.

[32] K. Buchheim, Ultramontanismus und Demokratie, 255–70.

drafted by Ketteler and accepted by the entire German episcopate in Fulda in September.[33] The memorandum called the recent measures of Prussia and the Empire violations of Church immunity, as defined by the constitution and international law, and highly detrimental to the current judicial system. In no uncertain terms the bishops brought to mind ARTS. 15–18 of the Prussian constitution, which guaranteed ecclesiastical autonomy. From the divine endowment of the Church the bishops derived the claim that the Church "existed within the integrity of its constitution and its very essence." The charge that the Church, Jesuits, and Center Party were enemies of the Empire, and therefore dangerous to the state, was rejected once and for all.

The Prussian government had to concede that its religious policies, practised since 1871, were in violation of the constitution. But since the government intended to adhere to its program, it answered the Fulda memorandum with the law which limited the guarantees of ARTS. 15–18 (5 April 1873).[34] ARTICLE 15 was amended to the effect that the autonomy of the churches recognized therein would remain "subject to the laws of the state and to its jurisdiction." The state's prerogative to regulate by law the rights of the Church regarding the training and employment of the clergy and its disciplinary authority restricted the Church's freedom to staff ecclesiastical offices (ART. 18).

Thereby the conditions for the actual laws of the struggle were set. They were passed in May 1873 after stormy debates in the Prussian Provincial Diet and in the House of Lords, imposing upon the Church a closed system of governmental supervision.[35] Since taking office, Falk had prepared these laws, diligently aided by Emil Friedberg, professor of civil and canon law, by Rudolf Gneist, Paul Hinschius, and Otto Mejer.

The law regarding training and appointment of the clergy (11 May 1873)[36] made the appointment to a clerical office dependent on German citizenship, on education at a German university, and on approval by the state (ARTS. 1–3). All clerical educational institutions were placed under the control of the state (ARTS. 6,7,9–14). Theology students had to pass an additional state examination in philosophy, history, and German literature (culture examination ART. 8). The bishops had to report each candidate for clerical office to the appropriate functionary (Notification Law). In case of objections, the appointment could not take place. Objections could be made on the basis of facts justifying the assumption that the candidate might violate the law or disturb the peace (ART. 15–17). Each vacant incumbency was to be filled within a year (ART. 18). Violations were punished with stiff fines (ARTS. 22–24).

---

[33] Text: N. Siegfried, Aktenstücke, 133ff. Cf. F. Vigener, Ketteler, 665ff.; R. Lill, Bischofskonferenzen, 119ff.

[34] Text: J. B. Kißling, Kulturkampf II, 461f.

[35] For the most thorough description of the Church laws enacted in 1873–75, see E. R. Huber, Verfassungsgeschichte IV, 709–20, 723–31, 733–42. Concerning liberal justification of the May laws, see P. Hinschius, Die preußischen Kirchengesetze des Jahres 1873 (Berlin 1873).

[36] Text: J. B. Kißling, Kulturkampf II, 462–67.

The law regarding both ecclesiastical disciplinary power and the establishment of a Royal Tribunal of Ecclesiastical Affairs[37] (12 May 1873) excluded all non-German Church institutions, primarily the Pope and the Curia, from disciplinary power over the German clergy (ART. 1). Consequently, all ecclesiastical disciplinary measures could be made subject to the control of the state (ARTS. 5–9). Those affected by such measures had the right to appeal to the newly created Tribunal of Ecclesiastical Affairs, which could declare the appealed decisions void (ART. 10–23). The Tribunal could also dismiss clergymen who had violated the law or a civil regulation to such a degree that their activity appeared incompatible with law and order (ARTS. 24–31).

Above all, the state veto of clerical appointments and the right to remove clergy from office were severe attacks on the constitution of the Church as well as freedom of belief and conscience. Both the National Liberals, whose animosity toward the Church had been strengthened by the dogma of infallibility, and the bureaucracy, which was still adhering to the common provincial law, cooperated in reimposing a historically obsolete state church in an expanded fashion, enabled to do so by the political power of the modern state. The Church was of course compelled to oppose these measures, and thus these first two May laws kindled a long and passionate fight. Less trenchant was the law limiting the right to use ecclesiastical disciplinary and penal means (13 May 1873).[38] It prohibited punishing violations of the civil honor code, which, after 1870, included the extensive excommunication of the opponents of the new dogma. Also less incisive was the law regarding secession from the Church (14 May 1873),[39] which became valid by simply declaring secession to a civil judge.

The Prussian bishops decided quickly, justified by the memorandum of Fulda in 1872, to practice passive resistance to the May laws. They rejected and forbade any kind of cooperation in their enforcement.[40] With the exception of a small minority (so-called state priests, state

---

[37] Text: ibid., 467–73.

[38] Text: ibid., 473f.

[39] Text: ibid., 474f.

[40] Collective petition by the Prussian bishops, 26 May 1873. Text: N. Siegfried, Aktenstücke, 188f.

Catholics), the clergy and the laity followed these directives. Directors of seminaries refused state supervision, theology students rejected the culture examination. The bishops themselves appointed priests, ignoring the provisions of the May laws. The state reacted by closing most clerical seminaries. In December 1873 a new oath was ordered for bishops and episcopal functionaries, which required absolute submission to all laws.[41] Soon indictments began against bishops and clergymen who had been appointed illegally. According to the May laws, they were liable to punishment for just saying Mass or administering sacraments. Prohibition of appointments turned into termination of office.[42] Falk, the liberal lawyers supporting him, and the Prussian bureaucracy enforced these laws relentlessly and without constraint. As they wanted to gain the Church's submission to the supremacy of the state, they agreed completely with Bismarck's intentions, despite some of his statements. The Chancellor also appreciated the useful aid of many journalists who, contrary to Bismarck's political goals, brought the ideological struggle into the limelight, and who advocated the supremacy of the national state and the superiority of the "German mentality" against the "Rome-serving" Catholics.[43] Many aberrations in recent German history partially stem from this period.

Bismarck, Falk, and their aides completely misjudged the Church's will and strength to resist. Under the concentric pressure by the state, Catholics from all walks of life flocked around their bishops and the Center Party, which was able to increase its mandate considerably (Reichstag 1871: 58; 1874: 91 deputies; Prussian Diet 1870: 58; 1873: 90 deputies). Under Windthorst's leadership, the Center became the primary opponent to the Chancellor, fighting him uncompromisingly on constitutional grounds. The Vatican persistently supported the Prussian Catholics. Pius IX and Antonelli, finally forced into the defensive by 1870, confined themselves to fruitless protests, hardly adequate in view of their opponents' arguments. They refused to recognize that their intransigence had contributed to the intensification of the differences. The Pope acted very unwisely, when, in a letter to Wilhelm I, he justified his right to criticize the May laws with the questionable identification of Papal Church and Christianity: "Everyone who has been baptized belongs in some way to the Pope."[44] This hurt the Emperor, who personally did not exactly favor the Kulturkampf, and the conservative Protestants, who felt likewise but remained silent because of their deeply rooted loyalty to the Prussian state. They were forced into the camp that was fighting the Kulturkampf and trying everything to exploit the confessional differences.

---

[41] Text of the new and the old oath: AkathKR, 31 (1874), 345ff.

[42] Falk's decree of 24 October 1873, addressed to the presiding judges, demanded criminal procedures be taken against active clergymen who had been illegally employed and therefore prosecuted previously. Text: J. B. Kißling, Kulturkampf II, 241f.

[43] One among many typical documents: In the Preußische Jahrbücher (II [1873], 596), the Kulturkampf was praised as a "double battle . . . the fight of modern freedom of thought against the last spiritual heritage of the Middle Ages, the papal subjugation of faith; and the fight of the modern state against the last judicial vestige of the Middle Ages, the immunity of the Roman Church."

In order to break the Catholic resistance, the May laws were intensified in 1874. However, this step was unsuccessful. Since the penal sanctions of the law of 11 May 1873 had proven insufficient, the Prussian government passed an expatriation law for the whole Empire (4 May 1874),[45] which violated the bill of rights severely. Clergymen who continued practicing in office after their dismissal by the state were threatened with expulsion from certain places or areas. In case of extreme insolence or contravention, they would be threatened with exile or loss of citizenship. On 20 May 1874, the Prussian Diet passed a law concerning the administration of suspended bishoprics.[46] According to this law, an episcopal administrator (capitulary vicar) could only operate until the state-approved appointment of a bishop, provided he could document his qualifications according to the law of 11 May 1873, and provided he swore an oath of obedience to all laws. If no capitulary vicar was elected by the chapter, a state commissioner had to administer the bishopric. Since no chapter was willing to execute the law, such commissioners had to be appointed for all vacant dioceses. Immediately, the law concerning the declaration of the law of 11 May 1873 (21 May 1874)[47] followed. It placed the burden of proof on the clergymen who had been charged with illegally taking office, and threatened to confiscate all property if an office was filled against the provisions of the May laws. The judicial and administrative struggle against the Church seemed complete.

The National Liberals used the intensification of the conflict to realize an old postulate of their social doctrine. By law (9 March 1874), civil marriage became obligatory in Prussia. Wilhelm I approved, with serious reservations.[48] A year later, civil marriage became an imperial law—the culmination of the Kulturkampf (6 February 1875).

---

[44] Pius IX to Wilhelm I, 7 August 1873. Text: N. Siegfried, Aktenstücke, 197f. Ibid., 198f., the Emperor's response (3 September 1873), in which the May laws are attributed to the "intrigues against the state" by a political party supported by the clergy, and in which the papal claims towards the non-Catholics are rejected with reference to the Evangelical faith.

[45] Text: J. B. Kißling, Kulturkampf II, 475ff.

[46] Text: ibid., 477–81.

[47] Text: ibid., 481ff.

In the meantime, prosecution of the bishops and priests in violation of the laws was continued. Since bishops were fined whether they did or did not fill an office illegally, the sum of fines reached proportions which could neither be paid through compulsory auctions nor with voluntary contributions from the faithful. In this situation, the Prussian bureaucracy did not refrain from employing imprisonment. In 1874/75, five out of eleven Prussian bishops[49] spent several months in prison: Archbishops Ledóchowski and Melchers, Bishops Eberhard (Trier), Martin (Paderborn), and Brinkmann (Münster).[50] Förster avoided imprisonment by moving to the Austrian part of his bishopric. The imprisoned bishops were worshipped as martyrs. However, since the summer of 1874, Catholic demonstrations, societies, and newspapers were subject to strict police control.[51]

The Catholics' political convictions suffered disillusionment, and they grew increasingly bitter when the government decided to apply even the most extreme May laws, forcing the royal tribunal, created in 1873, to dismiss the bishops who were still practising resistance. Dismissals began with Ledóchowski in 1874. In the next three years, Melchers, Martin, Förster, Brinkmann, and Blum (Limburg) were dismissed. Eberhard died during the trial. In 1878, only Bishops Krementz (Ermland), von der Marwitz (Kulm), and Sommerwerck (Hildesheim) were still in office. The episcopates of Fulda, Osnabrück, and Trier had been vacant since the death of their incumbents. According to Church law, the six dismissed bishops remained in office, but they could not administer officially and, thus, went into exile,[52] where they tried to rule over their dioceses with the help of secret delegates.[53]

---

[48] H. Conrad, "Zur Einführung der Zwangszivilehe in Preußen und im Reich 1874/75," Das deutsche Privatrecht . . . Festschrift für H. Lehmann (Berlin 1956).

[49] The bishopric of Fulda was vacant since the death of Bishop Kött (1873).

[50] Ledóchowski was imprisoned for two years, which was by far the longest time. During his imprisonment he was appointed cardinal. It was characteristic of the particular severity of the Kulturkampf in the provinces of Poland that Ledóchowski's suffragans Janiszewski (Posen) and Cybichowski (Gnesen) were sentenced to prison in 1875 and later expelled from their dioceses. Janiszewski was also officially dismissed in 1877.

[51] The Catholic Society in Mainz was forbidden (see above, p. 39). An assassination attempt on Bismarck in July 1874 served as a pretext to intensify the control of the press and societies. The assassin acted on his own, because, contrary to premature statements by the Chancellor, collaboration with backers could not be verified.

[52] Aside from Förster, Blum had also gone to Austria. Ledóchowski found asylum in the Vatican. Melchers, Brinkmann, and Martin lived in Holland and Belgium, close to their dioceses.

[53] In three canonically vacant dioceses, such delegates were active by papal decree. The police searched for them in vain.

The final phase of the Kulturkampf was ushered in, at the end of 1874, during the trial of former ambassador and Bismarck opponent Count Arnim,[54] when the text of a "papal election telegram" became known. It was sent by the Chancellor in May 1872. Bismarck therein suggested to the European governments an agreement regarding conditions for the recognition of a new Pope. He justified his initiative by stating that, since the Vatican Council, the bishops of all countries were merely functionaries of the Pope. In February 1875, the German episcopate responded with a declaration based on a thorough analysis of the Vatican decrees. It stressed the direct authority of each bishop within his diocese, justified by apostolic succession, and was, soon thereafter, approved by Pius IX.[55] Shortly before, the Pope had used the sharpest means at his disposal against the Prussian religious policies. The encyclical Quod numquam (5 February 1875)[56] declared the May laws invalid, insofar as they contradicted the divine constitution of the Church, and decreed excommunication of everyone who participated in their creation and execution. At the same time, Pius rejected any kind of dissent against the authorities in secular matters.

Prussia answered with a new series of penal laws. The so-called breadbasket law (22 April 1875)[57] decreed discontinuation of all state funds to the Catholic Church (ART. 1). It provided the possibility of resumption in individual dioceses only in the case of a written assurance by the responsible bishop or episcopal administrator that the laws would be obeyed (ART. 2). Individual clergymen also could only receive the state funds due to them if they provided such declarations (ART. 6). Few state priests were willing to make such promises, and, therefore, an almost total cessation in state payments occurred, welcomed by the Liberals as an important step in the separation of church and state.

The law concerning religious orders of 31 May 1875[58] hurt the

---

[54] F. Hartung, "Bismarck und Graf Harry Arnim," HZ 171 (1951), 47–77.

[55] Text of the collective declaration: N. Siegfried, Aktenstücke, 264–67; D 3112–16. Cf. R. Lill, Bischofskonferenzen, 121f. The papal approval (12 March 1875): N. Siegfried, Aktenstücke, 270f.; D 3117. In the discussions concerning the primate and the episcopate (begun by the Second Vatican Council), the declaration of the German bishops approved by Pius IX was rightfully used as an important document of the ecclesiastical self-understanding of 1870. However, it must be added that Pius IX himself did not attempt to interpret the dogma of infallibility in such a moderate and clarifying manner. Had he done so, he might have avoided or alleviated many a controversy after 1870. (cf. Constitutio dogmatica de Ecclesia [21 November 1964], chap. III, ART. 27, no. 95: *LThK*². "The Second Vatican Council," I, 246f.—J. Ratzinger, K. Rahner–J. Ratzinger, Episkopat und Primat [Freiburg 1961], 29f.; W. Kasper, "Primat und Episkopat nach dem Vatikanum I," ThQ 142 [1962], 48f.).

[56] Text: N. Siegfried, Aktenstücke, 267ff.

[57] Text: J. B. Kißling, Kulturkampf III, 438ff.

[58] Text: ibid., 440f.

Catholics most. It excluded orders and congregations from Prussian state territory. Existing settlements were not allowed to accept new members and were to be dissolved within six months. In case of orders whose members were teaching, the deadline could be extended up to four years (ART. 1). Exempted from the decree were hospital orders, whose place of residence, however, could be seized at any time and placed under state control (ART. 3). This brought restoration, proceeding rapidly since the 1850s, to a standstill. The members of male orders with pastoral duties, who had survived the Jesuit laws, went either to the United States or to Belgium and Holland,[59] where they could, at least, maintain contact with their home country. For many of the female orders remaining in Prussia, Empress Augusta effected some relief.

On 18 June 1875, ARTS. 15 and 18 of the Prussian constitution were abolished. On 20 June, a comprehensive law regarding the administration of the estate of Catholic parishes was passed.[60] Its aim was to debilitate the hierarchic system of the Church and extensively adopt evangelical parish principles. The administration of Church estates was democratized (ART. 1) and turned over to a vestry board consisting of the pastor and elected members (ARTS. 5–8). Important decisions were dependent on the approval of a board of local representatives (ART. 21). The Church could tolerate this law, since most elected mayors tried to cooperate with the ecclesiastical authorities.

The final law dealt with the ecclesiastical property of the Old Catholic parishes (4 July 1875). It assured the Old Catholics the use of property and churches belonging to the Catholic parishes wherever they had gained a "considerable number" of new members (ARTS. 1,2). Priests who had become Old Catholic could keep their benefices (ART. 3).[61] Since the Catholics continued to reject the use of their churches by the seceded minority, and since the bureaucracy usually interpreted the law in favor of the Old Catholics, serious controversies occurred. Catholic services were discontinued in churches given to the Old Catholics.

The year 1876 brought only amendments to the pulpit paragraph and to the law regarding the administration of diocesan property.[62] Also, a ministerial order was issued by Falk, subjecting religious instruction in elementary schools to state supervision (18 February 1876).[63]

---

[59] Arnold Janssen also founded and developed the first German mission in Holland (Steyl, S. V. D., 1875). F. Bornemann, Arnold Janssen, der Gründer des Steyler Missionswerkes 1837–1909 (Steyl 1969).—Since the Jesuit laws survived the Kulturkampf, the German Jesuits moved their study center, after their escape to Ditton Hall, England (in 1872), to Valkenburg, Holland, in 1894.

[60] Text: J. B. Kißling, Kulturkampf III, 441–52.

[61] Text: ibid., 452f.

[62] Federal law of 26 February 1876, Prussian law of 7 June 1876. Texts: J. B. Kißling, Kulturkampf III, 454–57.

Otherwise, the struggle began to stagnate. The Catholic Church organization in Prussia was demolished, more than one thousand parishes were without pastors. But the passive resistance of the Catholic population, their cooperation with the clergy and the hierarchy, and the active resistance of the Center Party remained unbroken. These were not the only reasons why, in the middle of the 1870s, the Kulturkampf turned out to be a failure. Liberal ideology and bureaucratic perfection had given the Kulturkampf an edge, originally not intended by Bismarck, which deeply affected internal peace and forced Catholics and other minorities into a ghetto, to the disadvantage of the Empire. The struggle against the Catholic Church furthered de-Christianization of society, which did not suit Bismarck's authoritarian concept. Favored by the Kulturkampf, a new and dangerous adversary appeared—social democracy.[64] The warnings of the Empress, the doubts of the Emperor and many Conservatives had been fully confirmed. In addition, Prussia had lost its reputation as a tolerant state, a reputation twice as valuable in the impending age of public opinion. The arrests and expulsions of bishops, clergymen, and members of orders deepened the mistrust toward Bismarck outside of Germany, even in anticlerical circles. The Napoleonic methods of his "founding the Empire from above" had had the same effect.

Slowly and strategically motivated, the Chancellor, therefore, turned away from the Kulturkampf. It is yet to be proven that he intended to keep the more important positions obtained during the Kulturkampf, and that he merely changed his methods, especially in dealing with the Center Party. If the Party could not be conquered in open battle, then he had to try to integrate it into government politics or separate it from its roots among the masses either via political concessions or agreements with the Vatican.[65]

Bismarck's experiences, resulting from the Kulturkampf, contributed greatly to his estrangement from the National Liberals, which was further determined by the renewed disagreements over parliament, constitutionalism, and economic policies. Another contributing factor was the crisis of the liberal system, beginning in the middle of the seventies, the cause of which cannot be discussed here. At any rate, the Chancellor was preparing a conservative turn of events which would determine his domestic policies from 1878/79 on. He did not take an initiative for a compromise in religious policies because he wanted to avoid, at any cost, the impression of a pilgrimage to Canossa, and because a settlement under Pius IX seemed impossible to him (and to other politicians). Both sides strengthened their positions.

---

[63] Text: N. Siegfried, Aktenstücke, 315ff., excerpt: J. B. Kißling, Kulturkampf III, 138ff.

[64] When he fought this second mass movement of the opposition, starting in 1878, with means similar to but more ruthless than those employed by the Catholics, he proved his inability to draw the correct conclusions from the failure of the Kulturkampf. Combatting "the foes of the Empire" was part of his domestic policies because he hoped it would result in a greater cohesiveness within the other groups and a further consensus regarding his politics.

[65] Cf. chap. 3, pp. 57, 62, 71, 74.

The political failure was completed by the fact that Bismarck had not succeeded in involving foreign countries in the Kulturkampf. Bismarck had placed high hopes on the leading statesmen of Austria and Italy because of local disputes involving religious policies.[66] But they were too realistic and too familiar with the nature and the strength of the Catholic Church to agree to a bureaucratic persecution in the Prussian fashion.

During the liberal five years after the founding of the Empire, the Kulturkampf was able to spread to other federal states, however with characteristic differences. Most similar to the Prussian development, though less consequential, was the one in Baden. Its school, marriage, and Church laws of 1868–74[67] were fashioned after the Prussian laws or followed them verbatim.—In Bavaria, "a covert Kulturkampf" had begun already before 1870, rooted in the tradition of a liberal-Catholic regalism. It was led by Lutz's ministry (1870–90) with consistency and the intent to avoid open conflict.[68] He did not go beyond restoration of previous state supervision (1873). Bavarian parishes and seminaries accepted clergymen and theology students who had to leave Prussia. Only because they were vacant for several years did the bishoprics of Speyer and Würzburg attract some attention. Pius IX had rejected the appointment of candidates for these sees who were nominated by the King and leaned toward the state-church concept.—Following Prussia's example, Hesse-Darmstadt and Saxony passed liberal religious laws in the years 1874–76.[69]

The two other German states with a large Catholic population, Württemberg and Oldenburg, refused to become involved in the Kulturkampf. In Württemberg, within the boundaries set by the Church law of 1862, there existed an exceedingly good relationship between Church and state, cultivated carefully by King Karl I (1864–91) and

---

[66] Austria: see below, chap. 2.

[67] Cf. Bachem, Zentrumspartei IV, 357–418.

[68] Cf. Bachem, op. cit., 316–46.

[69] Hessen-Darmstadt: Kißling, III, 406–15; Vigener, Ketteler, 612–722; Bachem, op. cit., 419–37. Saxony: Kißling, III, 418–22; W. Rittenbach, LThK^{2} IX, 201f.

Bishop Hefele. In Alsace-Lorraine, whose very difficult integration into the Empire would have been complicated even more by the Kulturkampf, the administration, dependent on Berlin, backed away from sharp measures.

CHAPTER 2

Tensions in the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy (1878–1914)

After the denominational laws of May 1874 came into force, all further attempts by the Liberals to design the Cisleithan legislation concerning religious policies according to their concepts failed. The bill to regulate the exterior judicial system of the monastic societies miscarried. It had been passed by both the House of Representatives and the House of Lords but was not sanctioned by Emperor Franz Joseph. The marriage clause, passed by the House of Representatives in 1876, also miscarried. It failed because it was vetoed by the House of Lords. The Confessional Committee of the House of Representatives began once again, in February 1877, to draft a marriage law. This led to a debate, early in 1878, about the draft of a bill introducing obligatory civil marriage.[1] But such projects were tabled in favor of other legislative tasks and the occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. All other attempts by the Liberals to achieve a change in legislation regarding religious policy came to nothing.

The Catholics, on the contrary, had considerable success concerning the school question. On 5 February 1880, Prince Aloys Liechtenstein, deputy of the Conservatives (but a decade later a member of the Christian Socialists), introduced a school resolution in the House of Representatives requesting the government to revise the elementary school law. The goals of Liechtenstein's reform plan were: decrease of expenditures, increase of the individual states' influence on the school system, and consideration of the population's religious, moral, and national needs. These goals were further specified by a motion proposed the same day by the Catholic deputy Georg Lienbacher. Both motions urged the government's draft of a school law. Participating in the draft was the original designer of the elementary school law of 1869, Section Chairman Alois Hermann. A friend of Adalbert Stifter, he was a disciple of the parochial school.[2] The government bill was finally passed by Parliament in April 1883 and ratified by the Emperor in the following month.[3] The amendment was significant for the organization of the school system and gave particular consideration to the religious denomination of the students. However, Prince Liechtenstein's second school bill of 28 January 1888, which was supported by a memorandum from the Austrian episcopate and which demanded that the schools be placed under the supervision of the Church, was unsuccessful.[4] The government's attitude of rejection was emphatically reinforced by the Austrian Social Democrats, who were then on their way to unification.[5] Until the decline of the Monarchy under the presidency of Count Kasimir Badeni (1895–97), the demand for denominational schools had only one chance to be at least partially realized. However, the Christian Socialists, heeding their voters from the German-speaking parts of Czechoslovakia, denied Badeni their support for his attempt to oblige the Czechs with his language ordinances. Thus, the Christian Socialists contributed to Badeni's overthrow.[6] Their leader, Dr. Karl Lueger (1844–1910), had meanwhile become mayor of Vienna despite the resistance of the upper clergy and the royal court. This did not prevent the radical German Nationalists under the leadership of Georg Ritter von Schönerer from exploiting the sympathies of the Alpine Catholic People's Party for the Slavs' desire to propagate the Away-from-Rome movement.[7] Thus, for the Liberals, the desired elaboration of the denominational legislation became unattainable. According to the judgement of a liberal historian, they remained "unrealized and were, in reality, hardly worth the paper on which they were written."[8] Even if this assessment is not entirely correct, there is no doubt that the Emperor and, finally, both the government and the bureaucracy respected the feelings of the enraged Catholics who had decided seriously to resist the state. The denominational appeasement is partially due to the understanding which Cardinal Rauscher and his successors, the Viennese Archbishops Kutschker, Ganglbauer, and Gruscha, had offered to the state even after the repeal of the concordat of 1870. In addition, the Liberals suffered an almost total loss of their nearly omnipotent position after Auersperg's ministry was overthrown in 1879.

---

[1] G. Kolmer, Parlament und Verfassung in Österreich von 1848–1904 II (Vienna, Leipzig 1903), 339.

---

[2] W. Goldinger, "Das Verhältnis von Staat und Kirche in Österreich nach Aufhebung des Konkordates von 1855," Religion, Wissenschaft, Kultur 9 (1957/III), 144.

[3] Reichsgesetzblatt 1883, no. 53.

[4] Beilagen zu den Stenographischen Protokollen des Abgeordnetenhauses 1883, no. 490.

[5] P. M. Zulehner, Kirche und Automarxismus (Vienna, Freiburg, Basel 1967), 38f.

[6] B. Sutter, Die Badenischen Sprachverordnungen von 1897 I (Vienna 1960), 247.

[7] J. Wodka, Kirche in Österreich (Vienna 1959), 350.

[8] G. Kolmer, op cit. II, 343.

The neutral conservative cabinet of Eduard Taaffe maintained good relations with the conservative Right in the Parliament and had mostly Christian social reformers such as Count Egbert Belcredi and Aloys Liechtenstein work out the social legislation set in motion by Taaffe. This legislation was compatible both with the previously mentioned clause regarding the elementary school law of 1883 and the Catholics' school demands. In July 1883, the endowments of Gleink and Garsten, which had been taken away from Bishop Rudigier of Linz by the liberal government during the Kulturkampf, were reinstated. During Taaffe's era (1885) there followed provisionary legislation by the Congruists to improve the poor material condition of the clergy.[9]

This spirit of conciliation marks the ecclesiastical legislation of all Cisleithan governments after Taaffe. In this area, laws were only enacted when it was absolutely necessary for practical reasons or to avoid hardships,[10] and as such included the amendment to the law regarding religion teachers (1888),[11] the so-called Forensen law (1894),[12] and the Congruist law (1898),[13] which still did not quite fulfill the wishes of the lower clergy and was therefore improved in 1902 and 1907 through amendments.[14] Both amendments were the work of Max Hussarek, a specialist in canon law, later a historian dealing specifically with the concordat of 1855. Beginning in 1897, he was head of the Department for Affairs of Catholic Worship.[15] Until the collapse of the Monarchy, the Austrian religious legislation was essentially based on the denominational laws of 1868 and 1874, whose moderation and generally benevolent execution by the government finally compelled the Catholics to be more or less content with them. The episcopate of the German-speaking states, coming, with few exceptions, from the bourgeoisie,[16] distinguished itself by its loyalty to the Emperor. In 1891, on the occasion of the elections, the bishops issued a pastoral letter to the faithful advising them "to vote for an electorate which would be loyal to the Emperor."[17]

---

[9] Reichsgesetzblatt 1885, no. 47.

[10] R. Höslinger, "Das Kultuswesen in der Zeit von 1867–1948," 100 Jahre Unterrichtsministerium 1848–1948 (Vienna n.d.), 429.

[11] Reichsgesetzblatt 1888, no. 99.

[12] Landed proprietors who are not members of the parish, but whose property is completely or partially located in this parish are, according to canon law, obligated to contribute toward the church building fund. This obligation was not recognized until the enactment of the law of 31 December 1894. Reichsgesetzblatt 1895, no. 7.

[13] Reichsgesetzblatt 1896, no. 176.

[14] Reichsgesetzblatt 1902, no. 48.

[15] W. Plöchl, "Max von Hussarek als akademischer Lehrer," ÖAKR 5 (1954), 82f.

[16] E. Saurer, Die politischen Aspekte der österreichischen Bischofsernennungen 1867–1903 (Vienna, Munich 1968), 230.

In the ensuing open controversy between the Conservatives and the Christian Socialist Party, as it was called since 1889, almost all of the bishops—as well as the Emperor—faced the new Catholic party with utter mistrust, if not animosity. Since the beginning of the 1890s, the upper clergy, represented by Cardinal Schönborn of Prague, together with the Emperor's diplomats, continually brought charges against the Christian Socialists in Rome. However, thanks to the mediation of the Viennese Nuncio Agliardi and the good will of Secretary of State Cardinal Rampolla, these accusations had no disadvantageous consequences, but resulted in Rampolla's explicit approval of the Christian Socialist program, provided, to be sure, that the radical anti-Semitism propagated by the party during its rise and endorsed by many priests[18] be alleviated.[19] Nevertheless, Cardinal Gruscha probably gave moral support to Franz Joseph, with whom he got along splendidly, when the Emperor tenaciously refused to confirm Lueger's election as mayor of Vienna. Gruscha bitterly opposed the Christian Socialists, because to him "democracy for the price of Christianity appeared to be the great ensuing danger."[20] Lueger, in turn, at a campaign meeting in 1901, did not refrain from severely criticizing the "obedient" attitude of the Austrian episcopate regarding religious policies.[21] Only under Archbishops Nagl and, above all, Piffl, did the relations of the episcopate to the party substantially improve. After all, the party had started out representing the middle classes; then it won over the farmers, united with the Conservatives in 1907 and was finally the only representative of Church interests in the Republic. Of course, these were also advocated by the Catholic organizations springing up in the last two decades of the nineteenth century (Catholic University Society 1884, Catholic School Society 1886, Christian Workers Movement 1892). In 1905, through the initiative of Viktor Kolb, S. J., the Pius Society was founded to protect the Catholic press, which, after the First World War, joined the Catholic People's Union (founded in 1909).[22] Around the turn of the century, Catholic farmers' unions were organized. In 1917, several Catholic youth groups from the prewar years were combined in the Imperial Union of Catholic German Youth of Austria.[23] Also the Austrian Catholic conventions, taking place at irregular intervals after 1877, served from the beginning as a platform to declare ecclesiastical (specifically Catholic) demands, even though they might not coincide with the government's policy, for reasons relating to foreign politics. This was the case in 1889, when the second Catholic convention made the need of freedom for the Holy See the subject of a memorandum directed against Italy, a member of the Triple Alliance. The convention even incited President Taaffe to declare in the House of Representatives that the foreign policies of the Monarchy were determined by the close friendly relations with the Kingdom of Italy and its vital interests.[24]

---

[17] W. Goldinger, op. cit., 145.

[18] Kirche und Synagoge, Handbuch zur Geschichte von Christen und Juden, ed. by K. H. Rengstorf and S. von Kortzfleisch, II (Stuttgart 1970), 499ff.; also: I. A. Hellwing, Der konfessionelle Antisemitismus im 19. Jahrhundert in Österreich (Vienna, Freiburg, Basel 1972).

[19] F. Funder, Vom Gestern ins Heute (Vienna 1952), 138ff.

[20] O. Posch, "Anton Josef Gruscha und der österreichische Katholizismus 1820–1911" (unpub. diss., Vienna 1947), 185, 208.

[21] R. Sieghart, Die letzten Jahrzehnte einer Großmacht (Berlin 1932), 318.

[22] J. Wodka, op. cit., 345f.

The Habsburg Monarchy's position regarding Italy and its problem of nationalities was the dominant question arising in the discussions between Austria-Hungary and the Vatican during the pontificate of Leo XIII. According to information from the Austrian Legate Johannes von Montel (1831–1910),[25] Cardinal Manning and Cardinal Simor, primate of Hungary, were instrumental in the election of Leo XIII.[26] The newly elected Pope soon complained in his first political letter to Franz Joseph about "the constantly increasing hostility" of Italy against the Holy See; he asked the Emperor to intervene on behalf of the threatened papacy.[27] The Emperor responded favorably but without committing himself. Since it was decided in Vienna to include Italy—arisen from revolution—in the circle of conservative powers, Austria, among others, refrained from condemning the scandal occasioned by the transport of Pius IX's body in July 1882. In the spring of 1882, through his special legate, Baron Hübner, the Emperor offered the deeply disappointed Pope the Monarchy's hospitality in case of need. However, Hübner was also to prevent the Pope from making use of the offer for asylum.[28] This difficult assignment was successful enough for Leo XIII to say to Hübner: "My hopes, my love, and my trust I place, next to God, in his Majesty, the Emperor of Austria."[29]

---

[23] G. Schultes, Der Reichsbund der katholischen deutschen Jugend Österreichs (Vienna 1967) 132ff.

[24] A. Hudal, Die österreichische Vatikanbotschaft 1806–1918 (Munich 1952), 234.

[25] Concerning Montel, see primarily A. Hudal, op. cit., 250ff.

[26] L. Freiherr von Pastor, Tagebücher, Briefe, Erinnerungen (Heidelberg 1950), 374.

[27] Die politische Korrespondenz der Päpste mit den österreichischen Kaisern 1804–1918, ed. by F. Engel-Janosi in cooperation with R. Blaas and E. Weinzierl (Vienna, Munich 1964), no. 145.

[28] F. Engel-Janosi, Österreich und der Vatikan 1846–1918 I (Vienna, Graz, Cologne 1958), 230.

As a matter of fact, within the Triple Alliance Austria refused to guarantee Italy the possession of Rome.[30] In 1888, the Emperor, through Hübner, again offered the Pope, who was being pressured by the Crispi government, asylum in Austria. Once again, quite in line with Austria's expectations, Leo XIII did not accept, but he gave serious thought to Salzburg in 1882 while still considering Trent as his place of asylum.[31]

Under Secretary of State Rampolla, however, relations between the Monarchy and the Vatican cooled down considerably. The Vatican's pro-French and pro-Slavic politics had been noted with dismay in Vienna.[32] Aside from that, there were continuous frictions with the Curia over a series of questions regarding the Monarchy's ecclesiastical policies, as, for instance, in the case of appointments of bishops. The Emperor's right to nominate was largely claimed by the royal and imperial bureaucracy. The Emperor nearly always agreed with its political leanings and, after 1880, was more and more oriented toward the problem of nationalities. Therefore, Italians and Slavs from the coastal areas and Dalmatia, unpopular Ruthenians in Galicia, but mainly men whose loyalty to the government was believed to be absolute were nominated bishops.[33] Above all, the Curia created difficulties when bishoprics in Hungary and in the coastal areas were to be filled. Compromises were often reached only after exhaustive negotiations and mutual rejection of the candidates, as in the case of Hungarian Primate Simor's succession in 1891 and the occupation of Zagreb (1894)[34] or Zadar (1902).[35] In Zadar, there was a question of the imperial right of transfer of bishops, a matter which was energetically defended by Catholics as ardent as Max von Hussarek, who functioned as adviser to the Division of Religious Affairs in the Department of Education.[36] Occasionally, there were also tough battles about the appointment of cardinals, as in the case of Archbishop Dr. Josef Samassa of Erlau, who had been nominated by the government. Samassa, in the opinion of the Vatican, had not appropriately opposed the Hungarian bill about civil marriage. He had also come out in favor of the imperial veto regarding the papal election to the Hungarian delegation in 1894. Therefore, Samassa was not granted the honor of cardinal until Pius X's pontificate.[37] The efforts of Foreign Secretaries Aehrenthal and Berchtold to raise the number of cardinals in the Monarchy from six (four in the Austrian and two in the Hungarian part of the Empire) to seven were not successful.[38]

---

[29] Die politische Korrespondenz, op. cit., 48f.

[30] F. Engel-Janosi, op. cit. I, 232.

[31] Ibid., 255f.

[32] Ibid., 268ff.

[33] E. Saurer, op. cit., 235ff.

[34] F. Engel-Janosi, op. cit. I, 278ff.

[35] G. Adriányi, "Friedrich Graf Revertera, Erinnerungen (1888–1901)," AHPont 10 (1972), 326f.

[36] W. Goldinger, "Eine Auseinandersetzung Österreich-Ungarns mit der Kurie über das kaiserliche Nominationsrecht für Bischofsstühle," ÖAKR 6 (1955), 213.

On the other hand, those bishops of the Monarchy, "whose voices were gladly heard in the Vatican,"[39] did not enjoy the sympathies of the Austrian government. Among them were Bishop Stadler of Sarajevo and Bishop Stroßmayer of Djakovo, both spokesmen and protectors of the Croatians. Important was the question of the national liturgical languages, especially of the Slavic language in the Croatian-Dalmatian dioceses with Latin rites. The government considered it a means, intentionally employed by many bishops (e.g., Stroßmayer), to unite the Slavs or at least the southern Slavs on a national level "through the bond of the Catholic Church."[40]

Another source of political and scholarly controversies between the Vatican and Vienna was the use of Hungarian as the liturgical language in the Greek dioceses of Munkács and Epirus by Magyarized Ruthenians. The Vatican finally forbade the use of the Hungarian liturgy.[41] This did not prevent Rome from quietly tolerating its usage in the bishopric which was established in 1912 for the Greek-Catholic Hungarians in Hajdudorog, although the successor to the throne, Franz Ferdinand,[42] had explicitly disapproved of it.[43]

The Austrians also reacted sensitively to the Monarchy's right to protect the Christians of the Balkans and the Middle East. The Vatican's negotiations with Turkey about the conclusion of a concordat for Albania failed because of Austro-Hungarian opposition. Austria-Hungary saw a violation of its protectoral rights in such an agreement.[44]

All these differences lose their importance when compared with the most consequential controversy the Monarchy had with the Holy See during the pontificates of Leo XIII and Pius X: the fight over Hungary's legislation regarding religious policy. It goes back to 1890, to the so-called decree of abatement of former religion through baptism.[45] Its goal was to obtain obedience to the law of 1868 pertaining to the religious denomination of children from denominationally mixed marriages. According to this law, children were to follow by sex their father's or mother's denomination; but it became common practice for the Catholic priest to "abate" the denomination through baptism. Already at that time, Rome had refused the transfer of baptismal records to the appropriate clergymen as was required by the state. This stand was evident in 1891, when the demands for civil marriage, civil matriculation, and general religious freedom were recapitulated in the Hungarian Parliament. Secretary of Religious Affairs in the Wekerle cabinet, Albin Count Csáky, also adopted this program. Following its first resignation and subsequent reinstatement without Csáky, the government succeeded at the end of 1894 in pushing through both houses of Parliament civil marriage, civil matriculation, and an amendment to the law of 1868. The Emperor ratified the new laws. Subsequently, Wekerle resigned for good, having lost the Emperor's confidence in the success of another anticipated judicial reform. In contrast to the radical-conservative Hungarian People's Party (founded in November 1894) and to many tendencies of the liberal Bánffy government, both Secretary of Foreign Affairs Count Kálnoky and the Austrian Ambassador to Rome Count Revertera tried to prevent an open quarrel with the Holy See.[46] When Nuncio Agliardi of Vienna came to Hungary in April 1895 for an official visit, he pleaded with the Catholic leaders of Hungary in several speeches to side with the clergy in the ensuing fight with the government. This was followed by an interpellation in the Hungarian House of Representatives. In his answer, President Bánffy declared that the nuncio had overstepped his authority and that Kálnoky was of the same opinion and had already protested to the Curia. Since this was not the case, Kálnoky hotly denied Bánffy's statements in a telegram and resigned. Still, in a letter to Bánffy, he termed the nuncio's behavior "tactless." Rome, on the other hand, refused to recall Agliardi, "provided that the insult inflicted upon the Holy Father in the person of His deputy be compensated," as Secretary of State Cardinal Rampolla explained to Revertera.[47] Even though Rome disregarded an expressed apology by Vienna, it was not until 1896 that Agliardi was appointed cardinal and thus recalled from Vienna. Meanwhile in Hungary, the laws concerning the acceptance of Judaism and general freedom of religion had been enacted and, at the end of 1896, ratified by the Emperor. One could argue whether the changes in the Hungarian legislation regarding religious policy from 1894 to 1895 should be assessed as a Kulturkampf or a reform.[48] Without a doubt, however, the long and at times dramatic controversy between Church and state could have been at least alleviated. Its acuteness was probably rooted in the fact that the Church was not only interested in defending the sacrament of matrimony and Catholic education, but also its dominant position in the Empire of Saint Stephen, which, according to Rampolla, "was never to be relinquished to the Calvinists and Jews."[49]

---

[37] F. Engel-Janosi, op. cit. II (Graz, Vienna, Cologne 1960), 79ff.

[38] E. Weinzierl-Fischer, "Die letzten Ernennungen österreichisch-ungarischer Kardinäle", Östterreich und Europa (Festgabe für Hugo Hantsch) (Graz, Vienna, Cologne 1965), 411ff.

[39] F. Engel-Janosi, op. cit. I, 296.

[40] Kálnoky to Revertera in 1881, VII, 23; F. Revertera, Erinnerungen, op cit., 260, n. 17.

[41] Ibid., 264.

[42] F. Engel-Janosi II, 122, 156f.

[43] F. Revertera, Erinnerungen, op. cit., 266.

[44] A. H. Benna, "Studien zum Kultusprotektorat Österreich-Ungarns in Albanien im Zeitalter des Imperialismus (1888–1918)," Mitteilungen des österreichischen Staatsarchivs 7 (1954), 28f.

---

[45] M. Csáky, Der Kulturkampf in Ungarn (Graz, Vienna, Cologne 1967), 41ff.

[46] F. Engel-Janosi, op. cit. I, 287.

[47] Ibid., 292.

The longer Leo XIII's pontificate lasted, the more powerful the secretary of state became. In Vienna, he grew more and more unpopular, not to say hated. Even the Imperial Ambassador Revertera, extremely loyal to church and Vatican, differed with him again and again.[50] It was certainly not easy to get along with the proud and sensitive Sicilian. The animosities of the Austrian diplomatic corps seem to have originated in the burden imposed upon the Monarchy's domestic policy by the problem of nationalities, which was constantly increasing, especially during Leo XIII's pontificate, and reached a climax during the Badeni crisis of 1897. Rampolla sympathized with the Slavs, the Italians, the Christian-Socialists, and the respective Catholic democratic parties within Austria and Hungary. He granted France and Russia an important role in the foreign policies of the Vatican. Therefore, he had to be persona ingrata not only with the conservative and liberal politicians and with several Austrian bishops, but also with the Emperor himself. It remains to be decided whether, through the years, the Emperor remembered the cardinal's initial refusal to give his son Rudolf a church funeral.[51] One thing is certain: never before had there been such accord on the use of the imperial veto as during the papal elections of 1903. As of the evening of 1 August, Rampolla was ahead with twenty-nine out of sixty-two votes,[52] and was already greeted as the new Pope. One has to assume, then, that the Austrian veto announced by Cardinal Puzyna of Cracow on 2 August[53] deprived him of the tiara. Giuseppe Sarto, patriarch of Venice, was finally elected Pope on 4 August 1903. He quickly fulfilled several of Austria's long-standing wishes; for instance, the promotion of Archbishop Samassa to cardinal. Yet more quickly (in January 1904, through the constitution Commissum Nobis), Pius X declared invalid the right of veto which France, Spain, and Austria had traditionally claimed, and imposed extremely harsh penalties upon participation in such an act.[54]

---

[48] M. Csáky, op. cit., 103ff.

[49] Ibid., 110.

[50] For example, F. Revertera, Erinnerungen, op. cit., 309.

[51] A. Hudal, op. cit., 250, and F. Engel-Janosi II, 2.

[52] Ibid. II, 37.

[53] Ibid. II, 38.

The battle against "modernism," which Pius X fought so passionately within the Church, "was of no great consequence for the relations of this pontificate to the Habsburg Monarchy."[55] Indeed, there was a "literary battle" in Austria; there were people who were accused of "modernism" and suffered harm because of it, e.g., writers like Enrica von Handel-Mazzetti, scientists like Albert Ehrhard, priests like Josef Scheicher, who was a representative of Lower Austria, and Franz Martin Schindler, the theoretician of the Christian Social Party. Ehrhard[56] had to leave the University of Vienna; Schindler was not promoted to bishop because of his friendship with Ehrhard.[57] Even the Viennese Archbishop Gustav Piffl was denounced in Rome as a modernist by integralists from the Viennese Commer-Kralik group. He had opposed the establishment of a Viennese subsidiary of Benigni's infamous organization Correspondance de Rome, whose purpose was denunciation.[58] The tempest over modernism which, in regard to Austria, is just now being researched,[59] never reached the dimensions it did in France, Germany, or Italy. However, the Austrian public took an enormous interest in a case which was supposedly dramatized by the unauthorized and certainly undiplomatic action of Granito Pignatelli di Belmonte, nuncio to Vienna. Professor Ludwig Wahrmund, specialist in canon law from Innsbruck,[60] who had published a study about the veto right of the Catholic powers in 1888, interceded in favor of reform Catholics Ehrhard and Schell in his lectures of 1902. On 18 January 1908, he gave a "scientific" speech for the general public in Innsbruck about the "Catholic world view and free scholarship," which was directed against the Syllabus and Pius X's encyclical Pascendi and was a masterpiece of massive anticlericalism. Moreover, Wahrmund published this speech in Munich after it was confiscated in Austria. Consequently, Nuncio Belmonte did not just call on Foreign Secretary Aehrenthal, but also announced to several newspapers that he had asked Aehrenthal to remove Wahrmund from his teaching position. He insisted on the truth of this statement even after Aehrenthal's official denial. As a result, Wahrmund became the hero of an enraged liberal public, and the Department of Education could not afford to dismiss Wahrmund had it wished to do so.[61] Aehrenthal, in turn, demanded that Belmonte be recalled. Even Legate Montel, always attempting to mediate, asked the Pope "imploringly" to recall Belmonte. Pius X, apparently feeling offended himself, pounded the table and declared: "I am not a diplomat, but I am immovable. I cannot allow Monsignor Belmonte to leave Vienna now. If his mother were on her deathbed, I would not give him leave at this time." Then he deplored the Josephinism which continued to exist in the Habsburg Monarchy.[62] In 1911, when it was his turn, Belmonte became cardinal and was thus officially recalled from Vienna, though he was not received any longer by the Austrian foreign secretary. Nevertheless, Pius X generally expressed himself with benevolence towards the Monarchy, giving it his unequivocal sympathy at the outbreak of the world war he had feared for many years.[63]

---

[54] Ibid. II, 52.

[55] Ibid. II, 142.

[56] A. Dempf, Albert Ehrhard. Der Mann und sein Werk (Colmar 1944).

[57] F. Funder, Aufbruch zur christlichen Sozialreform (Vienna, Munich 1953), 126ff.

[58] A. Hudal, op. cit., 289.

[59] O. Schroeder, Aufbruch und Mißverständnis. Zur Geschichte der reformkatholischen Bewegung (Graz, Vienna, Cologne 1969), 392–411ff., and Der Modernismus. Beiträge zu seiner Erforschung, ed. by E. Weinzierl (Thomas-Michels commemorative ed.) (Graz, Vienna, Cologne 1973).

[60] M. Höttinger, "Der Fall Wahrmund" (unpub. diss., Vienna 1950), and F. Engel-Janosi II, 86ff.

On the Austrian side, in those "last years of a great power," when the bishops of the Monarchy paid homage to Franz Joseph on the occasion of his sixtieth anniversary of government in 1908, the Emperor once more emphatically acknowledged the alliance of throne and altar which he had strived for since the beginning of his reign. The aging Emperor concluded his avowal with the words: "You can be assured of the protection of the state while teaching your faith and administering your duties. I myself am a loyal son of the Church which taught me humility in difficult hours, offered me consolation in bad times, and guided me and my House loyally through all paths of life."[64]

---

[61] In tedious negotiations, Wahrmund was therefore forced to take leave for several semesters. He was finally transferred to Prague.

[62] F. Engel-Janosi II, 96.

[63] Ibid. II, 151.

[64] O. Posch, op. cit., 208f.

CHAPTER 3

The Conclusion of the Kulturkampf in Prussia and in the German Empire

Leo XIII[1] considered himself to be a political Pope and wanted to break the isolation of his predecessor as quickly as possible. Considering his foremost task to be the conclusion of the German Kulturkampf, then the most pressing political burden of the Church, he initiated immediate action. On the day of his election (20 February 1878), he wrote a letter to Emperor Wilhelm I and other princes of states struggling with tensions concerning religious policy in which he suggested mutual attempts to restore the previously good relations.[2] Berlin's unwillingness to compromise did not deter him. Supported by a few trusted men, such as Secretary of State Cardinal Franchi[3] and Monsignor Czacki,[4] he hurriedly drafted his program. The Pope and his advisers appreciated Bismarck's anti-revolutionary policies and were convinced that only a statesman of his caliber was capable of ending the Kulturkampf, which he himself had started.

---

[1] Concerning the personality and the program of Leo XIII, see pp. 6–25 above.

The Pope's immediate and constant goal was to restore his freedom of movement, which the Church needed for its spiritual mission. If necessary, he was willing to grant the state concessions consistent with the Church constitution. An equally legitimate task, in his opinion, was the preservation and strengthening of the conservative social order. In an alliance between the papacy and a monarchal power such as Prussia and the Empire, Leo saw the most effective defense against socialism and revolution. He hoped for a comprehensive contractual agreement. Convinced of the state's need for peace, he prematurely expected that Bismarck would more or less share his views and meet a conciliatory Pope halfway in these urgent controversies.[5] The self-conception of the modern state, the complex political structure of Prussia and Germany, and the numerous psychological obstacles in the way of appeasement found little consideration in the Vatican. Neither the nuncios in Vienna and Munich who were fairly informed about the situation in Germany, nor the Prussian bishops were consulted. The politicians of the Center Party who were carrying the main burden of the struggle were not consulted either. The Pope considered himself, and only himself, the appointed guardian of ecclesiastical rights, believing that he alone was competent to conduct negotiations and make decisions in a struggle of such fundamental significance as the Kulturkampf. This proves the centralistic-autocratic tendency of Leo's pontificate, which is a direct continuation of the Curia's development in the nineteenth century. This tendency is often overlooked in view of Leo's relative intellectual openness and his ability to adjust. From a treaty between papacy and Empire, Leo also expected a strengthening of his claim to sovereignty, which he decided to cultivate more rigorously than his predecessor, who tended to give way to resignation. In addition, an agreement with the strongest European powers could facilitate the conclusion of the conflicts with other states.

---

[2] Concerning the first exchange of letters between Leo XIII and Wilhelm, see Siegfried, Aktenstücke, no. 183f.

[3] Alessandro Franchi (1819–78), 1856: nuncio to Florence, 1860: secretary of the Congregation for Special Ecclesiastical Affairs (AES), 1868: nuncio to Madrid, 1873: cardinal, 1874: prefect for propaganda; in 1877, Franchi had already participated in attempts to initiate talks with Germany. ECatt V, 1622 (biblio.); R. Lill, Vatikanische Akten (henceforth: V.A.) 3, n. 1.

[4] Wladimir Czacki (1834–88), 1877: secretary of the Congregation of the AES, 1879: nuncio in Paris, 1882: cardinal. Czacki, a Pole, was often suspected by the German Kulturkampf fighters of being an "enemy of the Empire". He was of firm convictions and he collaborated in the peace politics of the new Pope. He was particularly interested in France; aside from the Pope, he was the true initiator of the policy of understanding toward the Republic (U. Stutz, Die päpstliche Diplomatie unter Leo XIII . . . . [AAB (1925), nos. 3–4], 7ff., 62–67, etc.; V.A., 116, n. 1).

[5] Concerning programmatic statements by Leo XIII and his close advisers, see V.A., nos. 12, 33, 58, 61, 75, 85, 90, 94, 103, 127, 130, 142a, 144, 147, 152, 180, 187, 207, 215, 225.

The strength of Leo XIII's program lay in his insight that the Church should not be permitted to be content with the belligerent situation which it had inherited from Pius IX. Its weaknesses were the exaggerated assessment of his own possibilities and his insufficient knowledge of the situation in the various states, such as Germany. Only after setbacks which could have been avoided had the situation been analyzed in time and with realism did the Vatican come to the understanding that political reverses had to be accepted. The Pope, attributing greatest significance to appeasement, was more willing in a tight situation to compromise than his collaborators. Only in the last phase of the development described in this chapter did the Pope find a close coworker in Monsignor Luigi Galimberti, who was far more compliant than the Pope himself.

Of the reasons which compelled Bismarck not to reject Rome's peace attempts, only one partially agreed with the Pope's motives: the weakening of the monarchal state system through the Kulturkampf was increasing and filled the imperial court and many conservative circles with concern. More important for the Chancellor were the failure of the Kulturkampf, the changed situation as a whole, and his new domestic plans.[6] The change of course from free trade to protective tariffs, which he initially thought necessary, could only be enforced against the will of the liberal allies in the Kulturkampf and required new alliances. Bismarck was used to discarding partners who had done their duties. He was already reapproaching the Conservatives. Now he planned to either attract the Center Party or to pass them over through negotiations with the Pope and to separate them from their ecclesiastically motivated mass base. Since the change of pontificate, the conditions for this move seemed more favorable than previously. His speculations on the Center Party and his consideration of the Conservatives indicate the larger framework of domestic politics primarily determined by the growth of social democracy. The change of economic policy was only part of the conservative turn and consolidation of the Empire's structures which were introduced by the Chancellor in the spring of 1878. Included are the socialist law and the repression of all efforts to parliamentarize the Empire.[7] A modus vivendi with the papacy and the Catholic Church suited this new domestic turn, as did the simultaneous new direction in foreign policy taken through the Dual Alliance with Austria-Hungary. However, Bismarck and the Prussian bureaucracy did not intend to yield in regard to ecclesiastical matters as much as Leo XIII had hoped. The open struggle was to be ended, but the state's supervision over the Church was to remain. The harshest features of the May laws were to be eliminated; this was to be done, however, through unilateral laws. Bismarck never contemplated the treaty which the Pope envisioned.

---

[6] Concerning programmatic statements by the Chancellor, see Bismarck, GW VIc, nos. 120, 143, 174, 178, 183f, 217, 220, 222ff., 229, 231, 241, 243f., 259, 261ff., 267, 279, 290f., 301, 306, 306, 322, 324f., 328ff., 332–35, 338, 347–53, 355, 357, 360, 367; XII, 11f., 299–305; XIII, 181–92, 194–202, 282–315. V.A. nos. 6a, 13, 19, 24, 49–52, 62, 70, 99, 112, 152f., 155, 198, 218, 222, 229, 233, 237, 244, 255.

The problem-ridden conclusion of the Kulturkampf took place in three stages: in the first, through negotiations between the Holy See and Prussia (1878–80); in the second, through discretionary mitigation laws (1881, 1882, 1883); in the third through the two Peace Laws (1886, 1887).

1. Bismarck reacted to the signals from the Vatican with utmost dispatch as he did not have to fear giving the impression of a pilgrimage to Canossa. He knew how to keep the Pope in the dark about his true intentions for a long time and entice him down the path of concessions through harmless advances, as for example the Roman question. Leo's obvious desire for peace put the trumps in the hands of the adversary.

Nuncio Aloisi Masella of Munich,[8] the Prussian delegate Count Werthern, and Bismarck's Bavarian adviser Count Holnstein established the first contacts, expressing the Chancellor's wish for an honorable peace. Crown Prince Friedrich Wilhelm, representing his father, who had been hurt in an assassination attempt, wrote a letter which led to the main negotiations. It also contained Bismarck's program in its entirety, the implications of which were at first not understood in the Vatican. The Crown Prince explained that the laws of the state could not be adjusted to the Catholic dogmas and that a fight over principles was out of the question. He suggested, however, solving practical controversies together.[9] In the summer of 1878, a meeting between Bismarck and Aloisi Masella was arranged in Kissingen, where the incompatibility of the two viewpoints became clear for the first time.[10] The nuncio asked for the return to the status quo of 1871, which was characterized by the legal rule of the state Church. The Chancellor demanded papal recognition of the May laws regarding the duty to announce to the state candidates for clerical office and, in turn, offered restoration of diplomatic representation to the Holy See in order to conduct further negotiations about practical solutions. The prospect of a nunciature in Berlin was also held out. Though Leo XIII was very interested in diplomatic relations with Berlin,[11] he could not agree to this offer because it preserved the entire legislation of the Kulturkampf. In addition, his peace policy had at that moment, in the days of the meeting in Kissingen, lost its strongest supporter when Franchi suddenly died. Therefore, Aloisi's talks led to an atmospheric improvement. In place of negotiations, intentionally dilatory letters by Bismarck were exchanged between the new Secretary of State Cardinal Nina[12] and the Chancellor until the summer of 1879. By order of the Pope, Nina demanded contractual guarantees for the autonomy of the Church, especially a free exercise of their ministry for bishops and clergy and the return of those who were expelled including religious as well as clergy. He also asked the state to waive its claim to interfere in the education of the clergy and religious instruction in schools.

---

[7] Concerning the conservative turn of German domestic politics 1878–80, see especially N. Böhme, Deutschlands Weg zur Großmacht . . . 1848–1881 (Cologne 1966), 446–579; H.-U. Wehler, Bismarck und der Imperialismus (Cologne, 1969), 101–11, 127–35, 139–51, 168–93; E. R. Huber, Verfassungsgeschichte IV, 67f., 104, 146f., 152–57, 772f., 882f., 1044–49, 1063ff., 1068, 1153–64; R. Lill, Wende im Kulturkampf, 232ff., 245f., etc.

[8] Gaetano Aloisi Masella (1826–1902), 1877: nuncio in Munich, 1879: in Lisbon, 1883: cardinal of the Curia. ECatt I, 916 (biblio.).

While Bismarck's anti-Polish attacks were skillfully handled by the Vatican,[13] the Chancellor's hopes for papal influence on the Center Party seemed to have a chance of being fulfilled.[14] Leo XIII's program left no room for independent action by the party. It was to perform secondary services. Above all, so the Vatican soon indicated, the party was to oblige Bismarck politically in order to facilitate the negotiations between Rome and Berlin. Only if these negotiations should stagnate was the party to exert pressure on the Chancellor. The first differences between the Curia and the Center Party occurred in the summer of 1878, when the party, against Rome's wish, refused to approve the socialist law and was derided as a conspirator of the revolution by the government press. Matters did not improve when the Cathedral Canon Moufang of Mainz,[15] a respected man in Rome, explained the motives of the Center to the Curia. He said that the party wanted to keep political and ecclesiastical questions separate, that it was willing to appropriately fend off the socialistic danger, but that it did not want to approve Bismarck's exception laws because of its constitutional principles. At the end of 1878, Windthorst himself approached the Curia several times through the Viennese Nuncio Jacobini,[16] who was rather open-minded toward the party, and suggested parliamentary procedures to revise the May laws. He believed that the cooperation between Center Party and the Conservatives favoring Bismarck's new economic policies had created propitious conditions. He concluded that, in a constitutional state, a party, with its influence on the parliament and the public, was able to offer better guarantees for the Catholic minority than treaties between the Vatican and the government could. To Windthorst, the time for a separation of Church and state seemed to be right.[17] He and his friends did not expect much from Bismarck. Such proposals were not in keeping with Leo's wish to come to terms about the question of sovereignty. From the improved parliamentary constellations, the Vatican drew the opposite conclusion. The Center was urged to form a close coalition with the Chancellor. This was the first climax in the attempts to influence the party, but they were as unsuccessful as the fight over the septennate eight years later. The leadership of the party, supported by the episcopate,[18] insisted on its political independence.[19]

---

[9] Crown Prince Friedrich Wilhelm to Leo XIII, 10 June 1878, text: Siegfried, Aktenstücke, no. 185.

[10] The meeting in Kissingen: Bismarck, GW, VIc, no. 124; V.A., nos. 47–58.

[11] Under Pius IX, the Holy See had just been increasingly isolated diplomatically. In 1878, only four embassies and nine legations were accredited there; he entertained six nunciatures, two internunciatures, and four delegatures.

[12] Lorenzo Nina (1812–85), associate of the Holy Office, 1877: cardinal, 1878: secretary of state, 1880: prefect of propaganda. V.A., 115, n. 4.

[13] V.A. nos. 19, 24, 26, 32, 37, 44, 47, 52.

[14] V.A. nos. 18, 13f., 17, 19f., 22, 25, 27, 34, 40, 45, 49, 52, 55ff., 62ff., 72.

---

[15] Moufang was deputy for the Center Party in the Reichstag during 1871–77 and 1878–90. For his letters for the Curia from 1878–79, see V.A. nos. 54, 73, 78, 88, 110f., 122, 129, 145, 160a, and appendix no. 1.

[16] Lodovico Jacobini (1832–87), undersecretary of state of the First Vatican Council, 1874: nuncio to Vienna, 1879: cardinal and pronuncio, 1880: secretary of state; due to illness, his influence decreased in the last two years of his life. V.A. 9, n. 1; Weber, Kirchliche Politik, 29ff., 39–45, 48–51, 115–18, 128–31, 135–38, 149–58.

[17] V.A. nos. 83, 86, 100 (n. 3), 106–09, 116, 123, 143, 162, 164f., 167, 169f., 177, 185, 259, 261f.

[18] The Prussian bishops, lead by Archbishop Melchers of Cologne, repeatedly warned of concessions to Bismarck, see V.A. nos. 63, 77–81, 97f., 117–21, 156, 181, 184a, 212, 249.

[19] V.A. nos. 111, 116, 122 (incl. n. 4), 129, 143.

As a result, Leo XIII agreed to negotiate details as Bismarck had demanded since Kissingen. New hopes were raised when Falk, Minister of Religious Affairs and the embodiment of the Kulturkampf, resigned and was replaced by highly conservative Robert von Puttkamer (1828–1900),[20] who disliked the Kulturkampf. Falk's resignation was primarily caused by his differences with the orthodox faction of the Protestant Church, which was influential at the imperial court.[21] In the negotiations conducted since the summer of 1879 in Vienna by Jacobini, the German Ambassador Prince Reuß, and canonical experts, both positions regarding the resolutions of the May laws were formulated. Both standpoints continued to be essentially irreconcilable, Jacobini maintained in a meeting with Bismarck (Gastein, September 1879). The Chancellor, however, did openly declare his sympathy for the papal claim of sovereignty.[22] Henceforth, several concessions were announced during the talks in the following months. The ecclesiastical tribunal was to be abolished, the state was to resume payments, the extradition law was not to be enforced any longer, the oath for administrators of bishoprics was to be eliminated. Under state supervision, convents and seminaries were to be reopened. Denominational organization of elementary schools and teacher training were allowed, the prospect of assigning local school inspection to the pastors was held out.[23]

Before the Pope was able to make his objections, Bismarck broke off negotiations. Apparently, he had just wanted to ascertain the positions of his opponent. His pretext was the opposition of the Center to several bills proposed by the government. Bismarck and his aides, among them Secretary of State Hohenlohe, exaggerated this resistance by claiming it to be a fundamental opposition to state and Empire. In order to save some portions of his concept, Leo XIII went so far as to concede his duty to announce clerical appointments in advance and thus to make the very concession which both the Prussian bishops and the Center feared would result in the subjugation of the entire ecclesiastical life to the state bureaucracy.[24]

---

[20] Puttkamer, as minister of the interior (1881–88), supported the consolidation of the conservative system of government with all the means at his disposal; E. Kehr, Das soziale System der Reaktion in Preußen unter dem Ministerium Puttkamer, now in: E. Kehr, Der Primat der Innenpolitik, Ges. Aufsätze . . . , ed. by H.-U. Wehler (2nd ed., Cologne 1970), 64–86; Weber, Kirchl. Politik, 67f.

[21] Bismarck, GW VIc, nos. 137, 139, 161f.; Förster, Falk, 553–652.

[22] Concerning the meeting in Gastein, see Bismarck, GW VIc, no. 167; V.A. nos. 152f.

[23] Concerning the negotiations in Vienna, see V.A nos. 136, 141f., 155–90; Heckel, Beilegung, 243–63.

[24] Concerning the papal announcement of this concession and the reaction of government, episcopate and Center, see V.A. nos. 201f., 207, 212ff., 218–26, 229, 231. When Bismarck did not concede, Leo retracted his announcement: V.A. nos. 245, 254.

2. Meanwhile, the Chancellor decided to move ahead unilaterally. Even his close advisers were surprised about his about-face. In March 1880, discretionary legislation was announced, which was to empower the government to apply several resolutions of the May laws with moderation. It determined the development of the next five years. Placing the enforcement of the existing laws within the discretion of the Ministry violated fundamental legal principles and was as injurious to the constitutional awareness in Germany as were the exceptive laws of the Kulturkampf themselves. But this was not atypical for Bismarck's style of government. To the Curia and the Center, the discretionary powers of authority seemed unacceptable because they aimed at regulating pending controversies without cooperation from the Church and substituted the arbitrary decisions of the bureaucracy for the severity of the current laws.[25] Over the joint reactions to Bismarck's new plan there arose a relatively good collaboration between the Vatican and the party. Now the party could begin to struggle for ecclesiastical interests in the Provincial Diet, which was once again responsible for the Kulturkampf.

The bill, introduced in May 1880, was to make possible the state-controlled organizational reconstruction of the Catholic Church. The most important enabling acts proposed by Bismarck and Puttkamer pertaining to new regulations of the culture examinations and the readmission of dismissed bishops had to be stricken because the National Liberals believed that they went too far, and the Center, upon instructions from Rome, continued to reject them. The first moderation law, passed on 19 June 1880 by a four-vote majority,[26] authorized the government (until the end of 1881) to employ episcopal administrators and bishops without an oath of obedience, to terminate the state's administration of the property belonging to newly filled dioceses, and to resume financial support by the state. The time limitation was proposed by the Conservatives, who wanted to characterize the discretionary legislation as a temporary arrangement. The law enabled state-approved clergymen to perform office as substitutes in vacant parishes and reinstated nursing orders without a time limit.

Concessions in social politics, announced during talks in Vienna, had meanwhile been decreed by Puttkamer. After his transfer to the Department of the Interior (1881), the new Minister of Religious Affairs, conservative Gustav Goßler (1838–1902), continued the strategy of gradual concessions. However, against the Center's wishes, he insisted on the state's authority in all matters concerning schools. In 1891, Goßler became the highest civil official of West Prussia. But only in the eastern provinces did Goßler proceed with his usual harshness. The second moderation law (31 May 1882)[27] was prepared by Goßler and through agreements between the Center and the Conservatives. It was also approved by the Catholic deputies. This law extended the enabling acts of the summer of 1880 to 1 April 1884 and contained the concessions which had earlier failed because of Liberal opposition.

---

[25] Concerning Bismarck's move toward discretionary legislation and his renewed polemics against the Center, see V.A. nos. 196, 198, 206, 222, 233ff., 237–44, 246–70.
[26] Text: Kißling III, 457f.

The definite revision of the Kulturkampf laws demanded by Rome and the Prussian Catholics was postponed again. The government required complete realization of the May laws appertaining to the announcement of clerical candidates before it would consider revisions. Several initiatives by the Center were unsuccessful. In April 1883 Winthorst received the majority in the Provincial Diet for a resolution which demanded the "organic revision of the May laws." It was more than a moral victory because it proved that the majority in Parliament had grown tired of Bismarck's policy of obstruction. Bismarck and Goßler, however, succeeded in parrying the effects of the resolution by quickly enacting the third moderation law (11 July 1883).[28] According to this law, conferring of clerical offices whose incumbents could be recalled and the arrangements for a substitution were no longer subject to report to the bureaucracy, and the state's right to veto the nomination was abolished. This was a rather remarkable accomplishment toward progress. The temporary filling of vacant parishes was now possible without time limitations. The Church had to be content with having to apply for the candidate's dispensation from the culture examination demanded by the May laws. The law was passed by an overwhelming majority, opposed only by part of the Liberal Conservatives and the National Liberals, who were weakened by the turn of domestic politics. The Progressive Party continued to be viewed with suspicion in Church-related circles. Nonetheless, the party voted for this as well as other moderation laws, delineating once again the principles it had adhered to since the seventies: it welcomed the Kulturkampf laws insofar as they had a liberal motive; but the Progressives rejected repressive measures.

The first moderation law rendered possible the filling of the bishoprics of Fulda, Osnabrück, Paderborn, Trier, and Breslau,[29] which, through the death of their incumbents, were canonically vacant. This required new negotiations between Berlin and the Vatican. Leo XIII was still disappointed about Bismarck's change of course. He agreed to negotiate only after some hesitation and upon the advice of the Center's leadership. The party pleaded for constructive use of the present accomplishments while reiterating further demands from the state. In the summer of 1881, Kurd von Schlözer (1822–94), then the Empire's envoy in Washington, negotiated with Cardinal Jacobini, who had meanwhile become Leo XIII's secretary of state. In December of the same year, Clemens August Busch (1834–95),[30] under secretary of state in the Foreign Office, conducted the negotiations. Schlözer, liberal and well versed in history, had been legation secretary in Rome (1864–69), where he acquired a thorough knowledge of the Church's situation in Rome and Italy[31] and of Catholicism, which he basically despised. This was exceptional for a Protestant from Northern Germany. Schlözer knew how to deal with the prelates, and therefore Bismarck wanted him in Rome at all times. As the first head of the Prussian Legation to the Holy See, reopened in February 1882, he energetically participated in negotiations for the following five years. The restoration of diplomatic relations was a clear step toward normalization, though Leo XIII had hoped for more in this important area: he had hoped that the Empire would establish an embassy.[32] The Chancellor tried to appease the Liberal opposition in the Provincial Diet by stressing that the function of the legation to the Vatican was simply one of concern with Church matters and, thus, with domestic affairs. At the same time, he had to convince the Vatican that the legation did indeed mean recognition of papal sovereignty. To stress this point, Bismarck avoided, as did his Austrian colleague Kálnoky, giving Italy a formal guarantee of her territorial claims, which had been requested during the negotiations for the Triple Alliance in the spring of 1882. This would have meant a direct recognition of the annexation of the Papal State.[33] Nevertheless, the treaty of the two imperial powers with Italy deeply disappointed the Pope, because it consolidated Italy and raised her political value. Now the Pope could not expect from Bismarck effective help on the question of the Papal State.

---

[27] Text: Kißling III, 458f.

[28] Text: Kißling III, 459f.

[29] Breslau only became vacant after Förster's death on 20 October 1881.

---

[30] Aside from Hohenlohe, Busch was one of the very few Catholics among the leading civil servants of the Foreign Office. Here, as in other high administrative offices of the Empire, the Catholics, in the Bismarck period and later (cf. chap. 35), only had a chance for promotion if they belonged to the governmental minority generally tending toward the Free Conservative Party, and if they kept a distance from "ultramontanism" and the Center (R. Morsey, Die oberste Reichsverwaltung unter Bismarck 1867–1890 [Münster 1957], 116–22, 248f., 268f).

[31] This was documented by his "Roman letters" with the impressive description of papal Rome and its leading personalities in the last years of the Papal State (ed. by K. v. Schlözer [Suttgart, Berlin 1913]). In German-speaking countries, these letters can only be compared to the historical passages in The Years of Travel in Italy by F. Gregorovius (last ed. by H.-W. Kruft [Munich 1967]).

[32] This accreditation was in keeping with the competence, pertaining to Church politics, of the German federal states. Of these states, Bavaria maintained a legation to the Holy See because she was interested in continuous relations with the Vatican. The creation of a nunciature in Berlin, discussed several times during the negotiations of 1878–79, failed because of the opposition of the Emperor and influential Evangelical circles. However, the Center politicians and the Prussian bishops were clearly against this project. They feared that a nunciature would become a tool for Berlin's Church politics and that it would hinder the independent actions of the episcopate and the Center (V.A. nos. 19, 47, 49ff., 57, 62, 114 [incl. n. 2], 116 [n. 4], 152, 168, 183, 233, 237, 239 [n. 4], 240 [n. 1], 262 [n. 11]; cf. also Bismarck, GW VIc, nos. 176, 223).

The concrete goal of Schlözer's and Busch's mission was only reached gradually and with new difficulties. At first, the Holy See enabled only the cathedral chapters in Osnabrück and Paderborn to elect capitular vicars, who were able to assume office in February 1881 without state interference.[34] In Trier, where an election was subsequently ordered, Philipp de Lorenzi, who had been chosen by that chapter, was rejected by the government. The negotiations were difficult and complicated by the differences between the liberal, progovernment minority[35] and the ultramontane-intransigent majority.[36] But the government and the Curia agreed to appoint bishops in Trier and Fulda who were nominated by the Pope directly, circumventing the chapter's right of elections. In choosing the candidate, a momentous compromise was arrived at: in Trier the Curia insisted on the staunchly ultramontane Alsatian Michael [33] Factually, the Italian wishes were fulfilled. In the first treaty of the Triple Alliance (20 May 1882, ART. 2), Germany and Austria promised Italy their full military support in case of an unprovoked attack by France, probably the only power still interested in the restoration of the Papal State. Now, the Roman question was an affair exclusively between Italy and the Vatican (Italicus, Italiens Dreibundpolitik 1870–1896 [Munich 1928], 52–61; L. Salvatorelli, La Triplice Alleanza [Milan 1939], 62–72).

---

[34] In Osnabrück Bernhard Höting, in Paderborn Kaspar Drobe. In the fall of 1882, both took full responsibility of their dioceses as bishops. In Breslau, after Förster's death, Suffragan Bishop Hermann Gleich was elected capitulary vicar. Since the election of bishops did not take place because the government withdrew several candidates, the Pope, after negotiations with the government, appointed Prior Robert Herzog of Saint Hedwig in Berlin as prince bishop (March 1882).

[35] Their leaders were Cathedral Prior Karl Josef Holzer and his close friend Church historian Franz Xaver Kraus, professor in Freiburg. Kraus especially fought ultramontanism and the "political Catholicism" of the Center, accusing them of secularizing religious interests (cf. chap. 29; F. X. Kraus, Tagebücher, ed. by H. Schiel [Cologne 1957]; H. Schiel, Im Spannungsfeld von Kirche und Politik, Franz Xaver Kraus [Trier 1951]; H. Schiel, Trierer Bischofskandidatur von Korum und Kraus [Trier 1955]; on the same subject: Weber, Kirchl. Politik, 33–58; on Holzer: E. Hegel, Festschrift für Alois Thomas [Trier 1967], 151–62).

[36] It was endorsed by Windthorst; more importantly, it had direct contacts to Secretary of State Cardinal Jacobini through one of its members, Seminary Professor Peter Alexander Reuß.

Felix Korum;[37] in Fulda, the government insisted on compliant Georg Kopp.[38] Korum established close contacts with exiled Archbishop Melchers, with Bishop Krementz from Ermland, and with the Center Party. He also led the opposition of the episcopate's majority to Berlin's religious policy. Kopp, ready to make concessions, represented the other side of papal policy. He felt just as responsible to the state as he did to the Church. Reconciliation of state and Church was of great concern to him. But since he felt that considerable concessions were necessary to realize this goal, he soon found himself in opposition to his colleagues and to the Center, which he accused of sterile opposition.[39]

When these bishops were appointed, when Bishops Blum (Limburg) and Brinkmann (Münster) were pardoned and returned (in 1883–84), when government payments to the dioceses with state-approved bishops[40] were resumed, and when vacant parishes were filled temporarily, the restoration of the Catholic Church organization as desired by the government had indeed begun. After 1883 the shortage of priests was rapidly relieved. However, many important questions were still unresolved. The Kulturkampf continued to smolder, while the involvement of the faithful due to granted relief threatened to decrease in time. The gravest difficulties were caused by the state's continuous claim to the right of veto regarding the filling of offices, the training of the clergy, the question of religious orders, and the new appointments for the bishoprics of Cologne and Gnesen-Posen. According to the government, seminarians were to study only in the theology faculties of the state universities, a choice also preferred by liberal Catholics,[41] while the Curia and the majority of the bishops insisted on seminaries controlled by them. The state bureaucracy and the National Liberals resisted the return of the religious orders with a vehemence that had nothing in common with liberal principles. In Berlin reinstatement of Archbishops Melchers and Ledóchowski was felt to be a question of the state's prestige and was categorically refused, even though neither archbishop reacted any differently to the Kulturkampf laws and Leo XIII's concessions from the majority of his colleagues. In Gnesen the government wanted to name a German archbishop.

---

[37] Michael Felix Korum (1840–1921), 1865: seminary professor, 1872: cathedral preacher, 1880: cathedral vicar in Strasbourg, 1881: bishop in Trier; biography by J. Treitz (Munich 1925); Weber, Kirchl. Politik, passim.

[38] Georg Kopp (1837–1914), vicar general in Hildesheim, made efforts to achieve détente regarding the Kulturkampf; 1881: bishop of Fulda, 1884: member of the Prussian State Council, 1887: member of the House of Lords (for life), also prince bishop of Breslau, 1893: cardinal (Morsey, Probleme; Morsey, "Georg Kard. Kopp. Fürstbischof von Breslau, Kirchenfürst oder 'Staatsbischof'?," Wichmann-Jahrbuch für Kirchengeschichte im Bistum Berlin, XXI–XXIII (1967–69), 42–65; Weber, Kirchl. Politik, chap. IVff.; E. Gatz, Bischöfliche Einheitsfront . . . . [cf. chap. 1]).

[39] Cf. chap. 35.

[40] Only the archbishoprics of Cologne and Gnesen-Posen remained without state-approved bishops until 1885 and 1886, respectively, and therefore they had no official diocesan administration and no state funds.

[41] The example of the university and seminary education shows that liberal Catholics were dependent on the alliance with the state in order to assert at least some parts of their concept against ultramontanism (V.A. nos. 193[including n. 16], 231 [including n. 4], appendix no. 3 [including n. 8]).

For the time being, neither side was willing to give in. In 1883 and 1884, the Pope and Secretary of State Jacobini declared several times that freedom in the matter of ecclesiastical jurisdiction and the training of priests was essential. According to the old curial maxim that you should adhere to your principles and rather sacrifice the person, if necessary, the Pope and his advisers wanted to consent to the resignation of the archbishops only if the state would concede in those central questions. Essentially, Leo XIII took the same position in this matter that the majority of the episcopate, led by Melchers and Korum, and the Center faction under Windthorst maintained. In the summer of 1885, Rome still repudiated the fact that Bishop Drobe of Paderborn had given in to the state's regulations regarding the training and assignment of the clergy. But that was the last substantial victory the Prussian Catholic leaders who were averse to Bismarck could report to the Vatican.

3. In 1885 Leo XIII changed his mind, which led to the last phase of the conclusion of the Kulturkampf. Bishop Kopp had prepared the Pope diplomatically, corroborating his old notion that the Kulturkampf should be terminated as soon as possible in cooperation with rather than in opposition to Bismarck. He also declared the resignation of the archbishops a prerequisite for salvaging a situation that had run aground. He regarded preliminary concessions as inevitable, even as justifiable, since he trusted Bismarck. Just as important were the power shifts within the Vatican. As a result of his illness, Secretary of State Cardinal Jacobini, who tended toward the Center, had lost some of his influence. In 1885 the Pope was busy defending himself against severe criticism from intransigent Catholics,[42] and therefore decided to continue his strategy of negotiations with even more persistence. Last but not least, because of the intensification of Italy's anticlerical politics, the Pope desired more and more urgently immediate and evident successes.

---

[42] A great sensation was caused by the attacks of the French scholar, Cardinal of the Curia Jean-Baptiste Pitra, O.S.B. He charged Leo with having deviated from the tested path of his predecessors and with having furthered the liberal deterioration (C. Crispolti, G. Aurelia, La politica di Leone XIII, 87–90; Weber, Kirchl. Politik, 113–17; U. Engelmann, *LThK*² VIII, 527).

Monsignor Galimberti,[43] of Cardinal Franchi's school, had taken over the factual direction of the Congregation for Extraordinary Affairs in the summer of 1885. The Pope found in Galimberti an adviser who was as devoted as he was able, though it was difficult to see through his motives.[44] Monsignor Boccali, head of the papal secret cabinet, eagerly supported him. Both monsignors entertained close relations with the Prussian delegate, with Montel, Austrian Auditor of the Rota, who was also a friend of Schlözer's, frequently mediating.[45]

Strengthened by his advisers, the Pope made his old program more concrete. Like the leaders of the Center and the majority of the Prussian bishops, he feared only the continuation of the Kulturkampf. While the former deduced from this that one should continue to demand the status quo ante and that compromises would eventually end in the Church's submission to the state, the Pope drew the opposite conclusion. He did not believe, as Windthorst did, that time would work in favor of the Church. In order to prevent the incalculable "bogginess" of the conflict, he decided to make concessions in several areas. As soon as possible, he wanted to achieve a solution which would guarantee at least the more important ecclesiastical demands. On this level he met Bismarck, who was also interested in a speedy appeasement, considering the consolidated alliance with Austria and the impending international crisis in 1885.[46] Research today has confirmed that the policy of appeasement in the years 1885–87 was a personal achievement of the Pope and Bismarck.[47] Both had to overcome the resistance of the intransigents within their respective camps[48] and, therefore, used only the reliable aides mentioned above. Kopp especially, who was trusted by both sides and who in 1887 had been appointed to the Prussian House of Lords with the Pope's approval, henceforth mediated between Rome and Berlin, bypassing his colleagues and the Center.

---

[43] Luigi Galimberti (1836–96), professor at the College of Propaganda since 1860. As an enemy of the intransigents and the disciples of the Italian nation state, he was without influence for a long time. With the election of Leo XIII he became his political writer, in 1882 editor of the Moniteur de Rome, in 1885 pro-secretary, in 1886 secretary of the congregation of the AES, in 1887 nuncio in Vienna, and in 1893 cardinal and prefect of the Vatican archives (G. Grabinski, "Il Cardinale Galimberti," Rassegna Nazionale 89 (1896), 376–416; C. Crispolti and G. Aurelia, La politica di Leone XIII, passim; Weber, Kirchl. Politik, chap. VIff.; ECatt V, 1881).

[44] In the period of time between October 1886 and May 1887, which was decisive for the conclusion of the Kulturkampf and during which Galimberti was primarily responsible for papal politics, due to Jacobini's progressing illness and subsequent death (28 February 1887), Galimberti accepted payments from Bismarck's "reptile funds" (cf. above p. 22; R. Lucius von Ballhausen, Bismarckerinnerungen [4th and 6th eds., Suttgart 1921] 364; Staatssekretär Graf Herbert von Bismarck. Aus seiner politischen Privatkorrespondenz, ed by W. Bußmann [Göttingen 1964], 401f.).

[45] Johannes von Montel-Treuenfest (1831–1910), 1877: auditor, 1889: dean of the Rota, consultant to the Holy Office and other congregations, clerical adviser to the ambassador of the Austro-Hungarian Vatican Embassy, representative of various Austrian and German affairs in the Vatican, whose influence decreased when Rampolla was appointed secretary of state (V.A. no. 66, n. 2; biblio.); Weber, Kirchl. Politik, passim).

[46] The Bulgarian crisis of 1885 led to a catastrophic deterioration of Austro-Russian relations. At the same time, new German-French tensions occurred and a French-Russian alliance was under way. The crisis, to which Bismarck devoted most of his

The deadlock was overcome in the summer of 1885, when Leo called Melchers to Rome as a cardinal of the Curia and appointed Bishop Krementz his successor in Cologne, even though no satisfactory solution was in sight for Gnesen.[49] Krementz followed the principles of his predecessor, but that was not as relevant as the prestige the government had gained by removing the speaker of the episcopate in the years of struggle. Krementz was also weaker than Melchers. Nevertheless, the decisive impetus came from Bismarck a few months later, when he offered the Pope to mediate between Germany and Spain in the controversy over the Caroline Islands, an offer he accepted with alacrity. The "prisoner of the Vatican" was officially recognized thereby as sovereign, and, for the first time, Leo could perform the international office of arbitration in the service of peace, a function which he hoped to secure for the papacy for good by way of returning to politics.[50] The Pope thanked Bismarck for his help by awarding him the Order of energies in the following two years, could only be settled through a Mediterranean entente and a German-Russian guarantee-treaty (both 1887) (A. Hillgruber, Bismarcks Außenpolitik [Freiburg 1972], 175–93).

---

[47] Morsey, Probleme, 225–45; Weber, Kirchl. Politik, 107ff., 120–25, 138ff., 188ff., etc.; Morsey, Kopp, 46f.

[48] On the side of the state: the National Liberal Party, the sympathetic news media, and strong powers in the Prussian bureaucracy; on the Roman side: most cardinals of the Curia, among them Ledóchowski and Johann Bapt. Franzelin,S. J. (1816–86), who were especially familiar with Germany and endorsed the policies of the Center. Both belonged to the commission for Germany, established by Leo XII, which was, however, practically without any influence since Galimberti's rise. Nevertheless, the Pope appreciated the advice of the educated and sharp Franzelin, whose death, therefore, gave the pro-Prussian groups a lift. Melchers, called to Rome in 1885, was not able to replace him, in spite of identical views. He could not influence the Vatican's politics, which were meanwhile conducted by Galimberti (on Franzelin: V.A. no. 69, n. 1; M.-G. von Twickel, LThK^{2} IV, 272f.).

[49] Concerning the circumvention of the cathedral chapter, the appointment of Krementz and his cooperation with Korum (which the government did not want), see N. Trippen, Das Domkapitel und die Erzbischofswahlen in Köln 1821–1929 (Cologne, Vienna 1972), 257–66.

[50] This seems to have been the major interest of Leo XIII. He used it to begin a line of papal policies which goes back to Benedict XV and Pius XII (cf. p. 22f.).

Christ, an act that was interpreted, not only in governmental publications, as a demonstration of reconciliation.

During the following months, the foundations for the two decisive peace laws were laid in secret meetings, from which were excluded the Center Party, the majority of the Prussian bishops, Cardinal Jacobini, and the members of most of the duly qualified authorities of the Vatican. The original alternative of appeasement by treaty or law was replaced by a combination of both, as Bismarck had wanted. After consultation with the Vatican about what could be demanded from either side, the state enacted laws which legally validated the content of those consultations.

The draft of the first of these two laws[51] was debated from February until March 1886 and encountered reservations similar to the first moderation law six years earlier. For the National Liberals the concessions in this draft went too far; for the Center and the bishops (with the exception of Kopp) they did not go far enough. But now the changed constellation had its effect in the localities where the decisions had to be made. Contrary to parliamentary procedure the draft was initially not debated in the Provincial Diet, but in the House of Lords, where Kopp and some aristocratic "state Catholics" could appear and conservative governmental forces were in charge. Windthorst, Korum, and Krementz were ignored, even though they continued to be backed by the great majority of the Prussian Catholics. In previous years, visits and letters from Trier to the Curia had been welcomed, but now the attempt to send one of the bishops to the Vatican and convince the Pope to take a stricter stance failed. Bismarck and Leo XIII, Galimberti and Kopp succeeded and achieved a great deal: the law (21 May 1886)[52] disposed of the ecclesiastical tribunal and the culture examination for theology students. In most dioceses, seminaries and convents were allowed to reopen without the state supervision required by May law, thus widening the restricted work of the religious orders. Even before the law was published, Leo XIII assented to Bismarck's renewed request appertaining to the duty to report candidates for permanent positions in pastorates. In vain, Windthorst again warned against accepting this important requirement by the state.

---

[51] Concerning the first peace law, see Bachem, Zentrumspartei IV, 132–47; Heckel, Beilegung, 317–33; Schmidt-Volkmar, 300–16; Weber, Kirchl. Politik, 122–47. During the debate of the law, new intense controversies about the Polish question came up because the Center opposed the settlement law which furthered the Germanization of the Polish-speaking provinces (Bismarck, GW VIc, nos. 323, 325; XII, 166–78; J. Mai, Die preußisch-deutsche Polenpolitik 1885–1887 [Berlin 1962], 75–82, 115–32; H. Neubach, Die Ausweisungen von Polen und Juden aus Preußen 1885/1886 [Wiesbaden 1967], 92–112).

[52] Text: Kißling III, 460ff.

The fierce discussion over the second law was also encumbered by the septennate controversy.[53] Bismarck maneuvered the Center Party into this struggle, assisted by Leo XIII and his advisers, who critically transgressed the limits of their clerical competence. The Chancellor used the crisis in foreign policy to further enlarge the armed forces and, above all, to effect another septennate, i.e., the commitment of the military budget for seven years. As on similar former occasions, Bismarck wanted to limit the Reichstag's right to appropriate funds. The antiparliamentary course of 1878 was consistently pursued. Under the pretext that a Franco-German war was on the way, Bismarck persuaded the Pope to exert massive influence on the Center in favor of the septennate.[54] In this matter, as in the question of the Caroline Islands, Leo was guided by his exaggerated concept of the papal mission of order and peace. The Center, however, insisted upon its political independence. According to its constitutional fundamental concept, the party, along with the Freethinkers,[55] did not want to sanction more than a three-year military budget. Such a compromise did not satisfy Bismarck. The Reichstag was dissolved; the government presented the new elections (21 February 1887) as being a decision for or against Germany's defense preparedness. Through this demagogical tactic, the Chancellor accomplished the alliance of the National Liberals and the Conservatives, the so-called cartel. It was not difficult to accuse the two opposing parties of animosity toward the Empire. At the height of the election campaign, Bismarck published the Vatican's comments on the septennate, which Galimberti and Schlözer had delivered into his hands. The Center appeared to have been compromised by the Pope. Windthorst's superior tactics,[56] the determination of its active members, and the support by the Rhenish-Westphalian bishops helped the party to survive the crisis. It was in its favor that Nuncio Di Pietro[57] of Munich did not belong to Galimberti's but to Jacobini's group and that the Pope himself modified his earlier statements. The Pope did not wish a catastrophe for the party and was alarmed by the startling criticism on the part of Korum and Bishop Senestréy of Regensburg.[58] Therefore the Center endured but an insignificant defection, mostly noble Catholics from the right, who sympathized with Kopp's course in any case. Thanks to his solid voting block, he could return to the Reichstag with ninety-eight deputies (previously ninety-nine), while the Freethinkers, under pressure by governmental propaganda, lost half their mandate. In March 1887, the cartel parties, who had emerged from the election campaign with new strength, helped the septennate to victory.

---

[53] The septennate controversy, forming fronts which affected more than the Kulturkampf, and the subsequent negotiations about the second peace law have been researched more thoroughly than most phases of the Kulturkampf and its conclusion (see mainly Bachem, Zentrumspartei IV, 148–326; Heckel, Beilegung, 333–49; Morsey, Probleme, 225–35; Schmidt-Volkmar, 324–41; Weber, Kirchl. Politik, 148–71).

[54] The Pope and Galimberti conceived two decrees for Nuncio Di Pietro of Munich (3, 21 January 1887), which were signed by Jacobini, but which were supposed to have been sent to Baron Georg Arbogast von Franckenstein (MdR), who worked closely with Windthorst and had good contacts to the nunciature in Munich. The second decree had been initiated by a letter from Franckenstein in which he had extensively explained and justified the politics of the Center.

[55] The Progressive Party and other left Liberals. Groups which had defected from the National Liberals had joined the Freethinkers in 1884.

[56] He proved his tactic in his famous election speech in Cologne's Gürzenich (6 February 1887) two days after the unexpected announcement of the second Vatican decree, which was immediately exploited by the government press. He interpreted it completely in accord with Leo XIII's wish, expressed therein, for a strong continuation of the Center and his recognition of what the party had accomplished in the interest of the

The Pope directly intervened in the final preparations for the second law by sending Galimberti to Berlin,[59] where he also expressed the Pope's wider political desires. They ranged from the restoration of the Papal State to papal arbitration for the purpose of avoiding war. As had happened on former occasions, Bismarck's simple and polite approval awakened exaggerated hopes and further willingness to compromise in as yet unresolved controversies. The Pope did not realize that he was just playing the role which the Chancellor had designed for him in his political concept. Again, there were serious disputes over the next moves between Galimberti and Kopp, who were essentially satisfied with Bismarck's offers, and Windthorst and his faction, who wanted to continue fighting in order to gain more. By order of the Pope, whose competence to decide ecclesiastical matters was not questioned by the Catholic deputies, the Center finally supported the bill of the Chancellor, who took great efforts to overcome the resistance of the liberal advocates of the Kulturkampf. Minister of the Interior Puttkamer energetically supported this bill, but even Minister of Religious Affairs Goßler feared the sacrifice of too many state prerogatives. The law, enacted on 29 April 1887,[60] limited, as far as the state was concerned, the duty to report candidates and the government's right to veto the Church (Hüsgen, Windthorst, 288–301 [with the text of the speech]; Bachem, Zentrumspartei IV, 189–97 [with excerpts]).

---

[57] Angelo Di Pietro (1828–1914), 1877: delegate in Buenos Aires, 1879: internuncio in Rio de Janeiro, 1882: nuncio in Munich, 1887: in Madrid, 1893: cardinal of the Curia (De Marchi, Le Nunziature Apostoliche, 278 [index]).

[58] Senestréy (bishop of Regensburg since 1858) was very respected in Rome for his long-lasting efforts on behalf of the ultramontane principles.

[59] A welcome occasion was the festivities for Emperor Wilhelm I's ninetieth birthday (22 March 1887).

[60] Text: Kißling III, 462f.

permanent filling of pastorates. At the same time, it waived the obligation to fill them permanently. Seminaries and convents were allowed again in all German-speaking dioceses; most religious orders could return and were given back their property, which had been taken into custody by the state.

The state had thus abandoned most of the discriminatory measures of the Kulturkampf. Remaining from the Kulturkampf legislation, but in moderated form, were the state supervision of schools,[61] civil marriage, the pulpit paragraph, the Jesuit law (until 1917), and the duty to announce candidates, but in moderated form; the Church paragraphs of the constitution were not reinstated. The state's control over the Church was consequently preserved to a degree which went far beyond the situation of 1871, but Bismarck was not able to reinforce this control. His attempt proves that he still did not completely understand the vitality which the Church had been able to maintain. In similar fashion, he often failed to realize the importance of a historical evolution in terms of domestic politics, especially when dealing with opponents. One century of Church emancipation had passed over the Prussian claim for control over the Church. At the most, control could be enforced for a short period in an anachronistic struggle of attrition if all of the powers of the state were employed. The Church, relieved of the shackles of the Kulturkampf, could no longer be kept dependent through the remaining restrictions. In the following years, a status quo of balance between Church and state, acceptable to both sides, was reached. In that respect, Windthorst, Korum, and their disciples had been too pessimistic. Leo XIII handled the concrete controversies quite realistically. The relatively favorable conclusion of the Kulturkampf did indeed increase the Vatican's diplomatic prestige, which Leo was particularly interested in, since, in 1887, Francesco Crispi became the head of the Italian government. He was strongly anticlerical and desirous of further isolating the Vatican. The Pope rightfully called the second peace law an aditus ad pacem, expressing in this manner his hopes for further moves by the state. His hopes for such moves were fueled by the enforcement of his pro-Prussian politics of 1886–87 through important decisions pertaining to personnel. Circumventing the suffrage of the cathedral chapters, which primarily tended toward the Center's course, he appointed progovernment bishops in Limburg and Kulm.[62] In Gnesen-Posen, for the first time, he appointed a German archbishop in the person of Julius Dinder from Königsberg. Kopp, so bitterly opposed by the Center, was promoted to Prince-Bishop of Breslau a few months after the achievement of the compromised peace which he had supported so diligently. Following Cologne, Breslau was Prussia's most prestigious episcopal see. But Leo XIII's other wishes and far-reaching political expectations remained unfulfilled. The Chancellor had reached his goal and, therefore, did not think of further concessions. Thus, Leo's wishful thinking took its toll. So did the hastiness, entirely unnecessary after the relief in 1880–83, with which, at the end, Leo fulfilled the opponents' wishes, thus burdening German Catholicism with needless inner tensions which continued to have an effect for some time to come. The Pope made it easy for the Chancellor to deceive him. Nevertheless, Bismarck, in complete command of the current situation, did not sufficiently contemplate the long term effects of his actions. The Pope's final disappointment in Bismarck and German politics form the background for the pro-French reorientation, which Leo XIII and Jacobini's successor Rampolla launched soon after.

---

[61] Henceforth, the local state inspection of schools was usually assigned to the priests.

[62] In Limburg Karl Klein, who, in 1887, was the only Prussian bishop (aside from Kopp) to support the septennate; in Kulm Leo Redner.

Bismarck also did not succeed when he attempted for the last time, on the occasion of the septennate, to force the Center Party into submission and thus force a strong opponent out of the front which was pressing for parliamentarism. The party of the Catholics had supported the Chancellor on many issues, such as his fledgling policies of worker protection. In the eighties the party had already become an important and stable factor in German politics, which could only be hampered for a few years by the cartel of 1887.

Therefore, the Kulturkampf was one of Bismarck's worst mistakes in regard to domestic politics, aside from the persecutions of the Socialists. However, he was able partially to compensate for it through a skillful termination of the conflict. The Kulturkampf laws and the exceptive laws diminished the trustworthiness of the state and the ideas concerning law of the Germans. The timely evolution of state structures as well as the integration of the Catholics into the nation-state was delayed unnecessarily. The relations between the denominations as well as between the Germans and Poles were lastingly affected, especially as the fight in the eastern provinces was continued as a struggle between nationalities. Thanks to the mobilization of new political forces and Leo XIII's diplomacy, which was dependent on these forces, German Catholicism survived this test of strength. Nevertheless, militant liberalism reached a goal which it had pursued since the sixties: the Catholics had been completely isolated spiritually and socially in those years of struggle.[63]

---

[63] Cf. K. Erlinghagen, Katholisches Bildungsdefizit (Freiburg 1965), 17 etc.

As groups tend to do when pushed into a ghetto, they reacted by relying on their own strength and by refusing to recognize that some of the liberal initiatives merely corresponded to increasing secularization, which negation could not forestall in the long run. Henceforth, the Catholics tried harder than ever to expand the legal foundation, again assured since 1886–87, relative to various organizations. The most important new creations of the Kulturkampf period were the Görres-Gesellschaft and the Volksverein. That the defensive attitude of most Catholics was not unjustified was proven, last but not least, by the founding (1886) and activities of the Evangelischer Bund. It embraced those Protestants who felt the termination of the Kulturkampf to be a capitulation to the Catholic Church, and initially enkindled extreme denominational polemics.

The beginning of Baden's renunciation of the Kulturkampf and its motives have already been mentioned. In 1878 under the ministry of Turban-Stößer, appointed in 1876, the tedious reduction of Kulturkampf laws began. It was not concluded until 1918. The archbishopric of Freiburg, which, since 1868, had been administered by a capitulary vicar, was filled again in 1882 by Johann Baptist Orbin (1806–86)[64] from the irenic circle of J. B. Hirscher. Hessen-Darmstadt followed the Prussian example in the decade of the struggle as well as in its conclusion. Between 1880 and 1887, the Kulturkampf laws were largely revised. The conciliatory Paul Leopold Haffner (1829–99)[65] became bishop of Mainz in 1886. Moufang, who had been too exposed during the struggle and temporarily administered the bishopric after Ketteler's death (1877), had to withdraw. In Saxony, tensions also relaxed gradually, even though the law of 1876 pertaining to state supervision of churches remained in force. In Alsace-Lorraine, the conservative Governor Edwin Manteuffel after 1879 practiced a consistent policy of reconciliation.[66]

---

[64] Badische Biographien IV, 289–310; W. Müller, *LThK*² VII, 1196.

[65] L. Lenhart, Paul Leopold Haffner (1829–99). Der schwäbische Philosoph auf dem Mainzer Bischofsstuhl (1886–99). Sonderdruck aus dem Jahrbuch für das Bistum Mainz VIII (Mainz 1960); L. Lenhart, *LThK*² IV, 1312.

[66] In 1881 Manteuffel recommended Prebendary Korum of Strasbourg as candidate for bishop in Berlin.

CHAPTER 4

The Development of Catholicism in Switzerland

The defeat of the Catholic cantons in the War of 1847 significantly determined for generations to come not only the external but also the internal situation of Swiss Catholicism. The federal constitution of 1848 assigned the regulation of Church relations to the cantons on a federalistic basis, in spite of increased centralism. But in the elections, majority suffrage (election by proportional representation first in 1918), deliberate division of constituencies, and, last but not least, domestic differences among Catholics rather favored the Liberal candidates.[1] The occurrences after 1848 were especially radical in the canton of Fribourg. But the reaction of Catholics was just as resolute: in the parliamentary elections of 1856, the Conservatives were overwhelmingly victorious (sixty-four versus three radical representatives). Bishop Marilley of Lausanne-Geneva, expelled in 1848, was able to return. The development in the canton of Lucerne was similar. There, the teaching sisters of Baldegg had to be readmitted, and the Conservatives were successful in May 1871 despite the First Vatican Council. Special problems existed in Ticino because it belonged to the dioceses of Como and Milan. In the canton of Saint Gall, the future Bishop Karl Johann Greith[2] was the political leader in the school controversy (next to some prominent representatives of the laity). In 1861 a law regarding schools could be enacted which was favorable to the Catholics. In the 1859 elections in Unterwallis, the Conservatives were successful. It should be noted, however, that liberal cantons with Catholic minorities (e.g., Basel, Zurich, Winterthur, Berne, Lausanne, Geneva) practiced toleration (moderated, to be sure, by the ecclesiastical law of the state) even though the denominations were frequently financed through secularizations. These were the external conditions for intensive pastoral work in respect to the diaspora.

To find the pragmatic middle of the road between centralism and political federalism, essential to the Catholic cantons, was a difficult task for Swiss Catholicism in view of this cantonal situation. The Catholic

---

[1] Cf. K. Müller, op. cit., 169–99; T. Schwegler, op. cit., 213–27.

[2] K. J. Greith from Rapperswil (1807–88) had proved his worth in the battles of the thirties; but at the First Vatican Council (1834–36, he was in exile in Rome) he belonged to the group which opposed the dogmatization of the infallibility. He wrote (studied theology at the Sorbonne) a handbook of philosophy, was interested in Dominican mysticism and the Old Irish Church, and was bishop of the diocese of Saint Gall (1862–82) in existence since 1823 (Cf. K. Müller, op. cit. 194f).

Schweizerischer Studentenverein (Swiss Student Association), founded in 1841 in Schwyz, was the first organization to expand throughout all the cantons. Patrician Theodor Scherer-Boccard (1816–85) of Solothurn directed the editor's office of the Schweizerische Kirchenzeitung and became chairman of the Schweizerischer Pius-Verein (Swiss Pius Society),[3] founded in 1857 in Beckenried. The Benedictine monks transformed the cantonal school in Sarnen (Obwalden) into a reputable secondary school, and the monasteries at Einsiedeln and Engelberg enlarged their curriculums. In 1856 one of the leading personalities in this period of Swiss Catholicism, the enterprising friar of the Capuchin order, A. K. (Theodosius) Florentini,[4] restored the college of Maria-Hilf in Schwyz, which had been under the supervision of the bishops of Chur, Basel, and Saint Gall since 1884. Similar progress was made with Saint Michael in Fribourg. Florentini earned everlasting fame even outside of Switzerland when he founded the house of the Sisters of Mercy of the Holy Cross in Ingenbohl (Mother Superior Theresa Scherer, 1825–88). The house had separated from the Menzingen educational institute after one of the frequent controversies over congregations and had devoted itself (following Florentini's example) to caring for the sick.

The Kulturkampf,[5] occurring at the same time as the First Vatican Council, is closely related to the occurrences in Germany. Before it ended, Die katholische Stimme aus den Waldstätten (The Catholic Voice of Waldstätten) appeared in Lucerne, following Döllinger's argumentation. After 1873, professor J. H. Reinkens of Breslau, since 1873 bishop of the Old Catholics in Germany, founded in many cities in Switzerland "societies of free-thinking Catholics," from which sprung the Christian Catholic Church of Switzerland, founded in 1875–76 in Olten.[6] But one should consider the specific social differences within Swiss Catholicism itself, the resistance of Catholic patrician families to the constitution of 1848, and the differences between agrarian Catholic cantons and the predominently liberal urban bourgeoisie, whose Catholics, to a large extent, had rejected Pius IX's Syllabus. Eduard Herzog, professor of theology in Lucerne, born in Schongau, was a very devout representative of the Christian Catholics, but had hesitated to accept his election as bishop in Olten.[7] Local conflicts usually broke out because the Christian Catholics demanded the right to use the Catholic churches.

---

[3] T. Schwegler, op. cit., 223; a survey of the history of Catholic societies in K. Müller, op. cit., 299–312, and G. Beuret, op. cit., 13–59.

[4] Anton Krispin Florentini (1808–65), born in Müstair (Graubünden), in the monastery of Solothurn since 1830, was one of the heroes in the battle with the Liberals and vicar general in Chur (1859). Concerning his utopian industrial enterprises, cf. chap. 13; M. Künzle, Die schweizerische Kapuzinerprovinz (Einsiedeln 1928); T. Schwegler, op. cit., 221.

[5] K. Müller, op. cit., 231–94; T. Schwegler, op. cit., 227–37. The Kulturkampf in Switzerland renewed the animosity, "in which Catholicism and anti-Church radicalism—both, at that time, pressured into extreme positions—confronted each other for decades to come," even though Kulturkampf was forestalled in many parts of the country thanks to the restraint of the local episcopate (Hanno Helbling, Schweizer Geschichte (Zurich 1963), 141. This ecclesiastical restraint was in accord with the cantons' governments.

[6] Müller, op. cit., 286–94; O. Gilg, Christkatholizismus (Lucerne 1945).

While the cantonal governments in Zurich, Lucerne, and Saint Gall exercised restraint, severe conflicts flared up in Berne and in cantons belonging to the diocese of Basel-Solothurn, especially at the bishop's see of Solothurn, where, in 1870, Eugen Lachat was forced to accept the closing of the seminary (which had just been opened in 1858) by the "Diocesan Body" (representatives of the canton governments). On 29 January 1873 the "Body" dismissed Lachat because he refused to keep in office the clergy who opposed the dogma of infallibility. The cantons of Lucerne and Zug did not support his dismissal. In Aargau and Solothurn convents and monasteries were closed and the many developing Christian Catholic congregations were favored (especially in the canton of Aargau, where whole congregations often followed their priests on the path away from the Roman Catholic Church). The Benedictine monks from Maria-Stein who emigrated across the French border were able to continue to administer their parishes in the canton of Solothurn. The canton of Berne proceeded with severity against the priests in the Jura who were loyal to deposed Bishop Lachat (living in Lucerne). Eighty-four priests were expelled from Switzerland; others had to conduct services in secret hiding places.

Aside from Bishop Lachat of Basel-Solothurn, Gaspard Mermillod (1842–92) was also the object of harsh struggles regarding ecclesiastical policies. In Geneva, the overthrow of the patrician government by the Liberals turned out to be advantageous for the Catholics. Subsequently, the congregations, strengthened by immigrants, expanded quickly in the fifties. In Notre Dame, a church dedicated in 1859, Mermillod delivered moving sermons, and in 1864 Pius IX appointed him titular bishop of Hebron, suffragan bishop of the diocese of Lausanne, and vicar general of Geneva, replacing Bishop Marilley of Lucerne, who resigned in 1879. The cantonal government regarded this as a circumvention of the constitutional decree forbidding the establishment of new bishoprics. Oriented toward the leftist Liberals since 1870, the government dismissed Mermillod in September of 1872 as priest of Geneva's Notre

---

[7] T. Schwegler, op. cit., 232; insight into Swiss Old Catholicism, though prejudiced against the papacy in the biography by R. Dederen, Un réformateur catholique au 19ᵉ siècle - Eugène Michaud, 1839–1917 (Geneva 1963), also: Küppers, ZKG 75 (1964), 418f; and V. Conzemius, ZSKG 58 (1964), 177–204.

Dame. In January 1873 the Pope responded to this move by appointing Mermillod apostolic vicar in Geneva. In February 1873, the government, having already enacted a radical state-church law in 1872, expelled Mermillod from the country. He continued his activities, however, from Ferney, on the other side of the French border. The Federal Council immediately answered a papal letter to the Swiss Catholics of 21 November 1873 by severing diplomatic relations. A centralistic revision of the constitution in 1874 intensified the state's Church law.

The Kulturkampf in Switzerland did not last as long as in Germany. At the end of 1875, the Federal Council gave permission to the clergymen who had been expelled from the Berne Jura to return, and after 1878 they were allowed to perform their office without disturbance. The leftist liberal canton government in Geneva suffered several defeats in 1878. In Bellinzona (Ticino) a conservative government was formed in 1875. Thus Leo XIII's diplomat Domenico Ferrata[8] found a favorable situation when he came to Switzerland as a result of the Federal Council's appeal to the Vatican. The Geneva question had already been solved in 1883: when the successor of Bishop Mermillod (who had resigned) passed away, Leo XIII was able to appoint Mermillod bishop of Lausanne-Geneva, gaining approval of the Federal Council, but sacrificing Pius IX's Geneva plans (the apostolic vicariate was abolished). That Ferrata had difficulties later on adjusting to the local situation was due to internal affairs within the Catholic Church. The Basel and Ticino questions were resolved through pragmatic unification. At first, the person of Bishop Eugen Lachat presented a problem: the non-Catholic cantons of the diocese of Basel-Solothurn wanted peace, but rejected Lachat's return from exile in Lucerne. Gioacchino Pecci, as bishop of Perugia, had demonstrated his sympathy for papally loyal Lachat, and now, as Pope, he had to sacrifice Lachat for the sake of a political arrangement. Informally, Lachat showed willingness to submit, even though his position in Ticino was rather undefined; officially he declined. This produced a great deal of embarrassment for the Curia, which Ferrata was to alleviate. His investigative mission resulted in Lachat's being persuaded to resign. Ferrata's visit permitted the bishop to save face before the outraged members of the diocese. In Ticino, separated by the Provincial Diet from the dioceses of Como and Milan (in 1859, Austria had lost Ticino to Piedmont), the problem was that the Catholic conservatives of Bellinzona wanted their own bishopric, while the Federal Council insisted on annexation to the German-Swiss diocese of Basel-Solothurn. Ferrata and Swiss politicians, led by the Protestant Conservative deputy Emil Welti (of Aargau), agreed at a conference (12 August to 1 September 1884) that the Pope should appoint a persona grata (F. Fiala) to the bishopric of Basel-Solothurn, at least for the time being (the constitution of 1874 was ignored), and that Lachat should become apostolic administrator in Ticino with a temporary office in Balerna. The Ambrosian liturgy was to be preserved together with the Roman liturgy. After Bishop Lachat's death (1886) the Ticino question had to be renegotiated. In 1887 Ferrata (meanwhile named nuncio to Belgium) had to deal with two Freethinkers in Berne, discretely indicating to them that the administrator from Ticino could be expelled and possibly govern from Italy. It was agreed that the parish church of Saint Laurenz in Lugano be elevated to the Cathedral of Ticino, and that an apostolic administrator be appointed who had to be from Ticino (triple nomination) and required the approval of the bishop of Basel.

---

[8] Mémoires I U. Stutz, op. cit., 29–46.

In the eighties, a new generation of Swiss Catholics came to the forefront. They distinguished themselves politically from those men for whom Senator Philipp Anton Segesser (1817–88) from Lucerne was representative. He came from an old patrician family, was decidedly conservative and federalistic and, like Bishop Greith from Saint Gall, he had reservations about the definition of infallibility.[9] In 1888 three fellow students, Kaspar Decurtins from the Grisons (1855–1916), twenty-six years old and the youngest senator,[10] Ernst Feigenwinter, a lawyer from Basel (1853–1919),[11] and theologian Josef Beck (after 1891 professor in Fribourg) founded the Verband katholischer Männer- und Arbeitervereine der Schweiz. This group intentionally addressed itself to Swiss Catholicism as a whole, turning away from the Pius societies of the Catholic cantons with their traditional leadership. The first plenary meeting in 1889—held in Zurich—behaved as if it were a Catholic convention with an address by the Pope, so that the president of the Pius societies, A. Wirz, had occasion to complain. In the course of the growing conflict, Wirz pleaded for "the kind of prudent policy following conservative Catholic principles we inherited from our forefathers."[12] [9] T. Schwegler, op. cit., 214; G. Beuret, op. cit., 61.

---

[10] The Decurtins family is an interesting example of the political differences among the Swiss Catholics. The mother of Kaspar, daughter of the papal General K. A. T. de Latour, was a highly political lady. In Truns, she was the focal point of a liberal club. She was filled with resentment toward her father's former commander-in-chief, Pius IX, and toward the Jesuits. In the canton of Chur, she was the candidate opposing her own son Kaspar, who had been expelled from his liberal student fraternity because of obstinacy and had joined the radical clerical faction, probably out of opposition to his mother (K. Fry I, 17, 41) (G. Beuret, 62–64, an objective, positive assessment of this man who "was looking for allies wherever he could find them" in order to save Catholicism from isolation).

[11] Feigenwinter founded the Basler Volksblatt in 1874; T. Schwegler, 229.

[12] K. Fry, op. cit. II, 220.

This was an allusion to the fact that Decurtins and his friends had been founding members of the Schweizerischer Arbeiterbund[13] in Aarau, which had a large membership of Social Democrats. For Decurtins, Catholicism was a house with many mansions, and he lived in the "left" wing. Thus he said during the founding ceremonies: "I am ultramontane through and through, but in social questions . . . I am on your side; hunger is neither Catholic nor Protestant."[14] This was certainly intended as a polemic against the Conservatives, who, in social questions, usually joined the moderate liberal Center. (In 1891, the Catholic-Conservative faction was able to bring a Catholic member into the Federal Council, Dr. Joseph Zemp, born in 1834. He was a member until his death in 1908).

In the nineties, the competition between the Pius society, now calling itself Schweizerischer Katholikenverein, and Männer- und Arbeiterverband increased rapidly. A union of both organizations was rejected. The idea to direct the rural and the conservative urban population toward the Katholikenverein and the industrial areas toward the Männer- und Arbeiterverband[15] was utopian as well as characteristic. During the meeting of the Arbeiterverband in Schaffhausen in 1898, Decurtins presented the plan to transform the Catholic People's Party, established in 1894 in Lucerne, into a socially oriented Catholic Center Party patterned after the German Center Party. His attempt did not succeed. A new initiative emanated from Saint Gall, where, in 1899, Prebendary Johann B. Jung (1861–1922) founded the first Christlich-soziale Arbeiterverein and where the first Christliche Gewerkschaft was formed. Both organizations were combined in 1903 in the Zentralverband christlich-sozialer Organisationen, whose president was Dr. Alois Scheiwiler (1930 bishop of Saint Gall). The Christliche Gewerkschaften were interdenominational, though the Protestants were rather in low profile. Starting in 1903, the Christian-social Zentralverband spread from east Switzerland throughout the entire Swiss confederation. In 1904, upon Feigenwinter's proposal, the Katholikenverein and the Männer- und Arbeiterverband were combined. This move was introduced in September 1903 at the first "general" Catholic Convention in Lucerne. In 1905, the Katholikenverein counted 40,983 members. Kaspar Decurtins remained stubborn.[16] In a letter from the period of his audience with Pius X (1904)—Decurtins had gained a reputation in Rome for his involvement in the social-political Catholic Union de Fribourg—he said: "Reactionaries (by that I mean feudal lords of the large countries, great capitalists, the delegates of the Catholic political powers to the Vatican)" want the Pope "to disavow Christian democracy."[17] After 1906, the Christian social groups in various cantons began to form a political party which cooperated, in spite of differences, with the Conservative People's Party established throughout the cantons in 1912. The separation of church and state proceeded essentially without problems. In the city of Basel the Catholics were compensated with 200,000 francs. They received the status of an association under civil law; the Protestants and Old Catholics fell under the law applying to public bodies—a distinction that was generally made according to the individual cantonal situation. Bishops' conferences took place annually.

---

[13] H. Farner, Die Geschichte des schweizerischen Arbeiterbundes (diss., Zurich 1923).

[14] K. Fry, op. cit. II, 96ff.; Beuret classifies the Catholic movement in Switzerland within the total movement of social Catholicism (70–127).

[15] K. Fry, op. cit. II, 223; G. Beuret, op. cit., 128–4.

[16] The conflict within Catholicism was involved with the Swiss Workers' Union, whose existence Decurtins considered very important because he deeply mistrusted the ecclesiastical modus vivendi with the Liberals and expected coverage by the Social Democrats. He furiously defended himself against a vitriolic anticlerical article in the Arbeiterbund (K. Fry, op. cit. II, 231ff.). In 1899, in Lucerne, the political and religious

Even though the Katholische Volksverein in Switzerland was a relatively weak imitation of the German model, the Swiss Catholics accomplished a goal to which the Germans had aspired in vain: they created a Catholic university. It was established in spite of the misgivings of Bishop Mermillod of Lausanne-Geneva, who desired an independent institution designed after the French Institutes catholiques. It was also opposed by the Catholic federalists, except Augustin Egger (bishop of Saint Gall 1882–1906) who finally supported it. Even Leo XIII hesitated, as can be seen by his "cold and short" treatment of the intermediary on 6 June 1889.[18] His behavior was not based upon monetary demands. On 4 November 1889 statesman Georges Python succeeded in prevailing upon the cantonal government in Fribourg to found and finance a department of law and philosophy. Mermillod was absent during its creation. Behind his back, Decurtins traveled to Rome in December 1889 to solve the delicate matter of the theological faculty which Mermillod wanted to have established by the bishops. Python and Decurtins miraculously persuaded President Ruchonnet to have the Pope appoint neutrality of the union was once again affirmed, though it was constantly threatened by the Social Democrats' trade union, which had existed since 1888. On the other hand, the founding of the union in Saint Gall was now called a violation of neutrality. In vain, Decurtins declared at the convention of the union in 1903: "Capitalism does not rest on denominational grounds, it is the same everywhere." The Social Democrats grew more radical under the sign of the class struggle. Isolated from his own friends, Decurtins left the executive committee of the Workers' Union in 1910 (after the general strike of 1918, the Christian-social and Catholic groups separated from the Workers' Union and formed their own organization) (cf. G. Beuret, op. cit., 166–202).

---

[17] K. Fry, op. cit. II, 249.

[18] K. Fry, op. cit. II, 23.

the professors of the theological faculty from members of the Dominican Order (he was interested in preventing students from studying theology in foreign countries). On 21 January 1890 the Pope gave his approval and donated 100,000 francs and a golden chain for the president. Bishop Mermillod, though still resisting, was appointed cardinal to the Curia. It had not been easy to recruit professors for this university. After a fruitless attempt in Louvain, Decurtins concentrated his efforts especially in Germany, where Gustav Schnürer (a student of Grauert) accepted a position in history. This resulted in 1898 in the "German crisis" at the university: eight professors submitted a collective resignation because they felt encroached upon by Dominican censorship. Decurtins acted rather pompously in this matter and spoke about the German "royal gibberish."[19] The Dominicans' lust for power was proven by the fact that they demanded from the Swiss theology professor J. Beck that he propagate the order's mission. It was necessary to find a replacement in Austria. In 1906 Pius X had occasion to praise the university and the Dominican order for their theological position.

In the battle over reform Catholicism, one should not regard a man like Decurtins as representative of Switzerland, even though Merry del Val supported him and Umberto Benigni spent several weeks in the summer of 1910 in Truns.[20] However, it was no accident that Hochland failed to find a favorable climate within Swiss Catholicism. The publications Vaterland and Ostschweiz rejected Decurtins's efforts, partly because they had grown weary of this man. However, in the Neue Züricher Nachrichten, the talented writer Heinrich Federer, under the pseudonym "Senex," sharply condemned the extremely conservative contemporary Catholic literature. He made common cause with Bishop Schmid von Grüneck of Chur, who called Carl Muth a "modernist" when he visited the bishop on the advice of the prior of Einsiedeln.[21]

---

[19] K. Fry, op. cit. II, 68, 74.

[20] K. Fry, op. cit. II, 348. Decurtins, since 1905 professor of cultural history in Fribourg, wrote (during 1907–10) three "letters" against Fogazzaro, Handel-Mazzetti, and the Hochland, for which Pius X praised him on 15 September 1910 (K. Fry, op. cit. II, 331). He denounced (theology) Professor Zapletal in vain, because the general of the order intervened (Zapletal was elected president in Fribourg in 1910). When A. Gisler, dogmatics professor in Chur, whose book on Modernism was not acrimonious enough for the "lion from Truns," was publicly exposed in the Correspondance de Rome, even the arch-conservative Bishop Georgius Schmid of Grüneck was indignant.

[21] K. Fry, op. cit. II, 235ff. It is a surprising anachronism that Karl Fry in his otherwise deserving book places Albert Ehrhard in the "fifth column" emerging in the Catholic countries.

CHAPTER 5

Italian Catholics between the Vatican and the Quirinal

The Non expedit at the Time of Leo XIII

The political and sociological situation in unified Italy did not show any fundamental changes. Attempts were made to adjust to the new institutions, which were very liberal and lay oriented. Suffrage was rather limited: in 1871, of a total population of 25 million, only 600,000 were listed on the register of voters. The parliamentary deputies came from well-to-do social classes, where the different interests of the industrialized North and the rural South clashed. They also did not stand up, to the same extent, for the lay orientation as represented by the state. The Catholics, obedient to the hierarchy, maintained a critical distance from the unified state because it had annexed the Papal State and enacted anti-clerical laws (church marriage was not recognized by civil law; the orders were supressed and their properties confiscated; ecclesiastical welfare organizations were secularized; religious instruction in schools eliminated). In this manner, Catholics declared their solidarity with the protests of the Holy Father and the excommunications imposed by him on the "usurpers". These intransigent Catholics developed their ecclesiastical societies according to the uniform directives formulated by the Opera dei Congressi e dei Comitati Cattolici; but, obeying the Non expedit of the Vatican, they refrained from political life and election campaigns. With their newspapers, they wanted to be the spokesmen of the "real country," demanding, above all, freedom from want. This was quite in contrast to the "legal country" of the parliament, the government, and government-dependent authorities, which represented only 2 percent of the population due to the electoral system and which were under the influence of Masonic anti-clericalism. Therefore, the "obedient" Catholics were happy with the symptoms of weakness which the new state demonstrated, because they felt it was indicative of its decline. The political development of Italian society and the state, proceeding hand in hand with the economic development, brought about changes precipitated in the Catholic movement through new directives and several new structures.[1]

---

[1] The customary division into periods according to the pontificates of Leo XIII and Pius X is determined externally in respect to the Roman question and the Non expedit. The papal directives should be seen via the forces which were pushing up from below (from the movement) and which gained independence and self-awareness, first on the social level and then in the political field until, in 1919, the nondenominational Italian People's Party ("Partito popolare italiano") was founded.

But there were also the "liberal," "disobedient" Catholics, who disapproved of the lay principles of the state derived from the Risorgimento. However, they were of the opinion that this state represented the historical reality to which one needed to adjust. They therefore founded a conservative party in order to support the principles and institutions of the national Catholic traditions in the spirit of loyal cooperation with the official authorities.[2]

Some of the ways in which the open attitude of Pius IX's successor expressed itself were: the fact that he resumed and strengthened diplomatic relations with the states, that he approved and furthered Catholic initiatives in social and political areas, and that he used gestures and words to address the Italian people and their statesmen which were conciliatory or, at least, efforts toward easing the tensions. The Non expedit, strongly adhered to in 1886 (participation in political elections was not allowed), was gradually regarded as a tactic in the relations between conscientious Catholics and the national unified state. In 1880 the official Osservatore Romano (11 June) was already interpreting the Non expedit as an active element, as "preparazione nell'astensione" ("preparation with temperance"). Expanding voting rights to new segments of the population (1882) worried several bishops, such as Bonomelli of Cremona, who feared that the leftists, under the influence of the Freemasons, could be strengthened and that anticlerical politics could be radicalized, unless the voices of the Catholics, excluded through the Non expedit, were able to create a countermeasure for the purpose of defending the religious and social order. The Holy See used this as a means to force a solution to the Roman question according to its liking.

On 23 May 1887, Leo XIII chose conciliatory words when he expressed the wish: "May Heaven grant that the desire for peace among all nations which We hold dear to Our hearts will be of value . . . to Italy . . . . For a long time, We have desired security and peace for all Italians and We wished that the disastrous battle with the Roman papacy would finally be terminated without detriment to the legal claims and the dignity of the Apostolic See . . . . We mean to say that the path to harmony is subject to the condition that the Pope not be subjugated to any authority and enjoy absolute and true freedom, as is his right."[3] This declaration received enthusiastic praise and was followed by concrete proposals in the writings of the Benedictine Prior Tosti and ex-Jesuit C.

---

[2] Cf. C. M. Curci, Il moderno dissidio tra Chiesa e l'Italia considerato in occasione di un fatto recente (Florence 1878), and A. Stoppani, Gli intransigenti alla stregua dei fatti vecchi, nuovi e nuovissimi (Milan 1886).

[3] Acta Leonis XIII VII (Rome 1888), 115, quoted from H. Bastgen, Die Römische Frage. Dokumente and Stimmen III (Freiburg i. Br. 1919), 43f.

M. Curci. But Minister President Crispi rejected the offer to negotiate and claimed once again that, according to the guarantee law of 1871, a Roman question no longer existed. He was apparently under the influence of the anticlerical political forces, which held a majority in Parliament. Subsequently, Pope Leo returned to his rigid position and demanded the restoration of the temporal power of the Pope and, especially, the return of Rome (15 June 1887).[4] He also disapproved of mediating publications, particularly the "Pensieri d'un prelato italiano" by Bonomelli (1891), which, in March 1889, had appeared anonymously in the "Catholic-national" paper La rassegna italiana under the title "Roma, l'Italia e la realtà delle cose."[5]

The directive "preparation with temperance," which exceeded the rather passive and polemical motto "nè eletti nè elettori" ("neither the elected nor the voters"), expressed by the Osservatore cattolico of Milan, entertained the idea of prospects for political activities, however remote they might be, and created the division of militant Catholics into three groups: some concentrated on purely religious activities; others waited for an occasion to expand these activities to the political sector; while others turned to social areas. But the Holy See immediately expressed its preference, requesting action in the service of the defense and preservation of the faith, love for one's fellow man, and traditional Christian morality. The Pope adhered to the same opinion Pius IX had expressed in 1877: "The desire for political renovations is a bait cast out by the enemy to divide the Catholic front, because he is afraid of the unity in its intentions and the sanctity of its goals."[6] The arbitration proposals, intended at least partially to restore the Papal State and grant to the Kingdom of Italy the remaining territory, were rejected, even by less sectarian politicians, for instance R. Bonghi, who affirmed Italy's claim to all of Rome. The antiecclesiastical lay legislation also hurt the works of charity, emanating from faith and animated by it. It forced them to be absorbed in congregations of charity, which excluded the pastor and were administered by the community (1890). This happened at a time when Catholics increasingly concentrated their efforts on the administration of congregations for which the Non expedit was invalid.

Thus the Italian Catholics were called upon to apply their strength and abilities to religious social activities. For this purpose, the existing organizations were further developed, especially the Catholic youth society, certified in 1886, the Società della Gioventù cattolica italiana, which had been joined by the more polemically oriented Associazione Cattolica per la libertà della Chiesa of 1866. According to its motto "prayer, action, sacrifice," the association was especially active in the area of piety and edification, following a line which was soon considered "old-fashioned," meaning narrow-minded. Aside from this, Catholic parish committees (Comitati cattolici parrocchiali) sprang up (in the northern and central regions of Italy more than in the south), which were religiously active and often joined the traditional confraternities which were not affected by the suspension laws. They referred their members to new areas of activity and bound them more strictly to obedience toward the Pope and the bishops and to solidarity with the protests of the "prisoner of the Vatican." Soon, in Rome, Pavia, Genoa, Milan, and Pisa, Catholic university groups were formed (Circoli universitari cattolici), organizations which were to constitute the fertile soil for those whose enthusiasm put them in the forefront. In all these associations, a stronger social sensitivity—the new sign of loyalty to the Catholic faith—was combined with religious activities and strict adherence to ecclesiastical regulations regarding the observance of holidays and fast days. This expressed itself primarily in new institutions, like the "Vincent Conferences" which Ozanam also organized in Italy. A certain militant spirit was included; respect for religious practices and institutions was demanded and their reputation and traditional sphere of activity were defended.

---

[4] Acta Leonis XIII op. cit., 134–53.

[5] Cf. C. Bellò, Geremia Bonomelli (Brescia 1961), 101–17, and Dokumente, 288.

[6] In the letter Non sine moerore of 29 January 1877, addressed to the president and the council of the Catholic youth in Italy (Insegnamenti pontifici. 4. Il laicato, 78–81).

For the purpose of coordinating these parish and diocesan committees, the Opera dei Congressi e dei comitati cattolici was added in 1874. Soon this league became the driving and constructive force of the Catholic movement in Italy. In 1884 Leo XIII gave this organization, established under the pontificate of Pius IX, a new structure, which reflected its progress. It was divided into five sections: Organization and Catholic Action, Christian Social Economy, Instruction and Education, Press, Christian Art. Because of the industrial development, which caused the workers to demand social legislation, the second section (Dell'economia sociale cristiana) was of special importance. At first it was headed by the Bergamo nobleman Medolago Albani, who did research in social problems. Later on it was led by Giuseppe Toniolo from Veneto, professor at the University of Pisa. Both were active in overcoming the paternalistic orientation of love for one's fellow man and charity. In dealing with liberal and socialist economic theories, Toniolo designed a Christian social program in which he presented the medieval guilds of the Christian past as models of socioeconomic institutions. A Unione cattolica per gli studi sociale was responsible for developing and applying this theory according to the examples in France, Belgium, Germany, and Switzerland.

The Opera dei congressi—the name implied the annual meetings of the diocesan and regional committees—was supported by the more active parish clergy of northern and central Italy, which was receptive to the call for an organization to defend the faith. It was further aided by the "notables" who followed, according to family traditions and by conviction, the directives of the hierarchy and did not relate to the new political leadership class (landed proprietors, noblemen, independent professionals). The Opera dei congressi was also endorsed by the people, especially the rural population, who identified with the Church institutions which were affected by the suspension laws, because they did not see their standard of living improved by the new laws, particularly by the tax laws and the military draft. Therefore, they were willing to lend an open ear to the Pope's protests against the secular state and to agree with them. Thus the Opera dei congressi was able to pursue detailed action for the purpose of deepening the consciousness of faith and to inspire the activities of Catholic societies by enforcing and coordinating local diocesan and regional initiatives.

The Catholic movement, stimulated in this fashion, not only made use of the hostile press in the large metropolitan centers of Turin, Milan, Florence, Naples, and Venice, but also in provincial cities like Brescia and Bergamo. The polemics and ridicule of scandals, which resulted in confiscations and law suits, were followed by discussions of the actual problems and the possible solutions according to the principles of the Christian conscience and the institutions inspired by it. The Osservatore cattolico of Milan excelled in the critical examination of methods and goals. Its young editor, Filippo Meda, gained more and more influence over the boisterous editor Davide Albertario, who was bold enough to subject even bishops to public criticism.

Aside from Medolago Albani and Toniolo, the following leaders are worthy of mention: G. B. Paganuzzi, born in Veneto, G. Acquaderni of Bologna, G. Radini Tedeschi of Emilia (later bishop of Bergamo), L. Bottini of Lucca, N. Rezzara of Bergamo, G. B. Casoni of Bologna, G. Tovini of Brescia, Giovanni Grosoli of Emilia, and the Jesuit Gaetano Zocchi. They were all strong personalities, firmly rooted in their convictions. Therefore they often had differences of opinion regarding organizational questions, the interpretations of papal decrees, or the selection of the cadre. Most of all, they fought over merging the Catholic movement into the sociopolitical reality of the Italian state under the regime of the Non expedit. The new orientation took the sociopolitical efforts of the Catholics north of the Alps as a model and tried resolutely to promote Catholic action in the social and economic area (banks, companies, publishing houses, trade schools, etc.). The encyclical Rerum novarum of Leo XIII was cited. This group, however, encountered the opposition of the intransigent wing, which feared infection by the liberal spirit and compromises with the institutions of the secular state.[7] The area most likely to cause controversies between the two positions was the administration of communities and provinces which were open to Catholics. But, as was frequently the case, second ballots were necessary; their elections had to be assured by consultations with other parties. It was the task of the Catholics, voted into these administrations, to protect the primary schools, which were subject to the community, from sectarian and laic influences, to appoint as administrators of charitable institutions men who would respect their religious goals and arrangements regarding church services, and to make sure that the hospitals, especially psychiatric clinics (which were subordinate to the provinces), were staffed with members of religious orders. The need of gaining control in the communities and provinces by appropriate election preparations played an increasingly important role for the Catholic movement in Italy and created emotional tensions.[8]

Along with the intransigents, who strictly adhered to the papal decree forbidding cooperation with the secular state, there were the transigents, who, like the intransigents, relied upon their own religious conscience. They were, however, of the opinion that the interest and the duty of the Church demanded that they not seek refuge in the ghetto, so to speak, and flee the world and its progress in the socioeconomic and political institutions. Instead, they were to delve into the new realities and work from the inside out, in order to bring to bear the motives and forces of the Christian tradition and thus to shape these realities in the Christian spirit. These transigents were partly spiritual heirs of the "New Guelphs," of the first Gioberti, like Cantù and Tosti, and partly confirmed supporters of the liberal Catholicism in accord with the ideas of Montalembert, Lacordaire, Görres, Newman, and Lord Acton. Many of them had shared the patriotic enthusiasm of 1848. They had held political offices in the decade of 1848–59 and in the first years of the Italian kingdom and had thus participated in the Risorgimento movement. Some of them, e.g., Lambruschini and Capponi, identified spiritually with Jansenist circles of the early nineteenth century or they advocated the reform programs of A. Rosmini[9] (which were both religious and sociopolitical). They were members of the educated clergy, as for example the natural scientist A. Stoppani; personalities who had a reputation because of their education, their profession, or their wealth, like Alessandro Manzoni, Niccolò Tommaseo, Cesare Cantù; reputable members of one of the two chambers, like Senators Canonica, Lampertico, and Stefano Jacini, mostly Liberal Conservatives who had many supporters, particularly among the middle class. There were also personalities of the hierarchy among the transigents, such as Cardinal Capecelatro of Naples, Cardinal Svampa of Bologna, Bishop Bonomelli of Cremona, and the founder of the institution for the spiritual emigrants, Bishop Scalabrini of Piacenza.[10] The transigents had certain elements of the press at their disposal, among them respected daily papers, such as the Milanese La lega Lombarda. They were also heard by papers of the conservative right, like the Perseveranza, appearing also in Milan, where they could present the intentions and motives of their "moderate" position compared to the anticlerical radicalism of many proposed laws and several divisions of the state bureaucracy. The numerous faithful Catholics who held offices in the administration, in the military, and in the different branches of government were able to effect a moderate interpretation of the anticlerical laws and apply them appropriately. Moreover, these transigents were in the position of offering their services as arbitrators to the state authorities, to the politicians, and to the public administration. They were also able to negotiate formulas and procedures which made it possible for Vatican-appointed bishops, for instance, to maintain their sees and to receive the appropriate revenue without having to expressly submit to the statute of the guarantee law requiring the Exequatur by the government.

---

[7] Significant for this is the publication by the bishop of Fossano, E. Manacorda, Movimento cattolico, errori democratici e relativi doveri dei sacerdoti (Fossano 1897).

[8] Cf. M. Belardinelli, "Motivi religiosi nell' attività amministrativa dei cattolici organizzati," Spirito ed azione del laicato cattolico italiano I (Padua 1969), 177–214.

[9] Cf. E. Passerin d' Entrèves, "L'eredità della tradizione cattolica risorgimentale," Aspetti della cultura cattolica dell'età di Leone XIII (Rome 1961), 235–87.

There were also issues on which the transigents (liberal, middle-of-the-road Catholics) and the intransigents agreed: they both pointed to the necessity of public order; both fought socialism as a sociopolitical doctrine and as an organization devoted to class struggle. The majority of their "notables" came from the same circles, primarily in Piedmont and in certain areas in southern Italy. Both sides respected the monarchy and relations with the personalities of the House of Savoy. Beyond the polemics of the Roman question and the legal regulations, which were to be valid for the ecclesiastical institutions, these common features found expression in the election alliances between clerical and moderate groups. In the administrative elections, they seriously defeated the coalitions of radicals and Socialists and their lay program, for example in Venice, during Cardinal Sarto's patriarchate, and later on even in Rome itself.

During the last two decades of the nineteenth century, in a unified Italy, further crass economic and sociopolitical disparities appeared, not only between the north and the south, but also between the different social classes. The transition from an artisan to an industrial economy, which had to compete with the more productive branches of industry north of the Alps and was largely dependent on their finances, their machines, and their technicians, occasioned constant disquiet and anxiety. The organization of the working class under both the flag of Marxist socialism and the banner of the most radical revolutionary syndicalism, as represented by the anarchist Bakunin, took place even in the rural areas. Strikes, civil unrest, and suppressive measures followed one after another in all parts of the country and found a strong echo in the press. The expansion of suffrage, which in 1882 increased the number of eligible voters from 2 to 10 percent of the population, provided the Socialists, in coalition with the Radicals, representation in parliament. In 1891, the official founding of the Italian Socialist Party took place. Its program represented the demands of the workers, but also contained a lay anticlerical policy. All this favored the draft of a social legislation which was in line with the encyclical Rerum novarum and was therefore energetically promoted by the Catholic movement, especially by the Christian Social Economy section of the Opera dei congressi and by the Unione cattolica di Studi sociali, founded by Tonioli. With this kind of sponsorship, the Catholic societies, in accordance with the demands of the social-political situation, produced new institutions: workers' cafeterias, parish houses, employment agencies, trade schools, societies for mutual assistance, production, credit, and consumer agencies, banks for the support of various professions and institutions, and workers' associations with a union character, which competed with their efforts toward socialistic associations. On the theoretical level, the Unione cattolica di Studi sociali formulated in 1894 a "program of Catholics in regard to Socialism" which mirrored the demands and the experiences of the agricultural and industrial world of Lombardy, Emilia, and Tuscany.[11]

---

[10] Cf. chap. 10, n. 4.

All this had an effect on the Opera dei congressi, whose organization and program was severely criticized by the young. They insisted that the defensive attitude, the predominantly religious and devotional orientation, the nagging paternalism, and the gap between the secular state and the democratic organizational forms should be abandoned in favor of greater latitude regarding decisions and freedom of movement. Even the Non expedit was now open to various interpretations: distance from the secular state meant obligation to an autonomous social and political organization, which obviously had to agree completely with the principles of Christian morality. On the basis of the formula "preparation with temperance," this line was already being presented by the three most active centers of the Catholic movement: in Bergamo with Medolago Albani and the newspaper L'Eco di Bergamo, in Milan with Filippo Meda and the Osservatore cattolico, in Brescia with G. Tovini, G. Montini and the Cittadino di Brescia. This increased the demand for more extensive efforts in the political field. The motives were provided, on the one hand, by the need to insure the socioeconomic principles of the movement in legislation and to enforce social laws which would agree with the Christian maxims of cooperation between the various social classes. The other motive was the need to fight socialism and its associations on their own ground. The contentions between the young and the old (of which the one between the priest Romolo Murri from the Marches and the layman Filippo Meda from Milan stood out in particular) increasingly vitalized the Catholic congresses, with the result that the Vatican more and more emphatically demanded harmony and unity.

---

[11] D. Secco Suardo, Da Leone XIII a Pio X (Rome 1967), 20; cf. L. Gerevini, Democrazia socialista e democrazia cristiana (Treviso 1899).

In 1898 (the year of war between Spain and the United States) disturbances flared up here and there in Italy because of an increase in bread prices. In Milan, they were violently suppressed with the help of military forces dispatched solely for that purpose. Among other measures, the radical Socialist and Catholic opposition newspapers were suppressed and their editors imprisoned (e.g., Don Albertario, editor of the Osservatore cattolico, who was subsequently sentenced by a court in Milan). Thus the year 1898 put the Catholic movement to the test: personalities of the intransigent wing tried to keep their distance from the mass disturbances and their spokesmen and made efforts to restore the Church and Catholicism as guarantors of the existing social order. Therefore, the government in Rome took measures only against some Catholic organizations in the north, not, however, against the presidency of the Opera dei congressi, which was still dominated by such socially backward intransigents as Count Paganuzzi. This resulted in rapproachement between the conservative intransigents and the conservative governmental authorities. The young, however, saw in the need of the people an opportunity to attack the "secular hunger state" even more vehemently and were preoccupied with the idea that social action could serve as a springboard for seizing power for the benefit of the masses.

The Holy See took careful note of everything that was going on in the Catholic movement. It was obvious that the Curia harbored differing opinions. Some supported a trend which tolerated or even favored the expansion of Catholic action in the social field and, though with more constraint, even in the political arena. Among them were Cardinals Rampolla and Agliardi and the less eminent Monsignors Gasparri and della Chiesa, who pointed to the model and the accomplishments of the Catholic movement in Belgium, Germany, Austria, and the United States, and to whom Leo XIII gave ear. But there was also an opposition group (consisting of Cardinals Respighi, Vicar of Rome, and Vives of the Holy Office) which still regarded every political and social action employed to overcome the tensions present in Italy, every instance of cooperation with the existing authorities, and every exploitation of state laws as support of the "Italian revolution," a minimization of the problem of the Roman question, and an undermining of the Non expedit. According to their opinion, the Non expedit was to be strictly adhered to, so that the Vatican could exert pressure on the Quirinal. Particularly in view of the energetic demands from outside their ranks (meaning the laity), these opponents of the movement liked to point to the fact that quite a few bishops rejected it also. The Holy See and Pope Leo XIII himself were frequently asked by the activists of both persuasions, the conservatives and the progressives, to intervene. They were supposed to approve the program of one of the parties and to condemn the principles and proponents of the opposing party. This often caused embarrassment for the men in the Vatican. They preferred to confine themselves to the confirmation of general directives and to the admonishment to activity in the spirit of harmony.[12]

That very year, 1898, a new leader of the Catholic movement appeared with the publication Cultura sociale, which was intended to be for the Italian Catholics what the Neue Zeit represented for the German Socialists. This leader was Don Romolo Murri. Born in August 1870, he received his doctorate in theology from the Università Gregoriana in Rome and founded the Catholic university circle there in 1894. But soon he extended his activities to the social field. He remained intransigent in regard to the Roman question, considering it a symptom of the deep schism between the Christian and the modern "heathen and materialistic" concept of life and culture. The contrast between the dome of Saint Peter's Basilica and the tricolors upon the Quirinal were for him the "sign of conflict between two different and mutually antagonistic cultures," "the secret of the inner history and the future of the Church."[13] With this statement, he removed himself from Filippo Meda as well and he recommended fighting the liberal, secular state to the bitter end. The boycott of the ballot boxes was, therefore, not just an act of obedience toward the Pope, but also the conscious rejection of the freedom-persecuting state.

---

[12] D. Secco Suardo, op. cit., 72ff.

[13] "Cultura sociale," 16 September 1898. On the circumstances, cf. F. Fonzi, "Dall'intransigentismo alla democrazia cristiana," Aspetti della cultura . . ., op. cit., 323–88.

Murri's general promotion of social action was close to Toniolo's heart. Yet Murri's call for autonomy was more urgent and he demanded the expansion of social programs in the area of politics, suffrage, and legislation. Thus, the demands for autonomous action in the spirit of a "Christian democracy" were voiced more and more at the congresses of the Opera dei congressi in Milan (1897), Ferrara (1899), and Taranto (1901). It encountered vehement reactions by the individuals and currents which, in this ferment, were forced to reformulate their motives and forge new alliances, not only in the central, but also in the regional diocesan and local committees and related organizations. There were passionate controversies concerning the expansion of the Christian democratic action programs, the priority of political-religious questions versus the social question, the opportunism of preparing for a political life, the right of the Holy See to intervene in political and social matters, the question of whether it is prudent to separate the Catholic action, dependent on the hierarchy, from the political action of a Catholic party, and the autonomy of the democratic movement."[14]

At stake was the traditional domination of Paganuzzi, Medolago Albani, and both Scottons from Venetia, who were all in contact with militant groups in Venetia, Lombardy, Piedmont, Tuscany, and Rome. In 1899, a Christian democratic union (Fascio democratico cristiano) was formed in Milan, and in Turin an "action program" containing twelve points was formulated outside of the Opera dei congressi. They all referred to the papal decrees, the Rerum novarum and the subsequent "instructions." They interpreted them as they saw fit and mobilized their friends in high Vatican circles to have their program confirmed.

From within the Congregation for Special Church Affairs, Leo XIII appointed a "permanent commission to regulate the Catholic movement in Italy" and entrusted it with the task of examining the many documents pertaining to the presidency of the Opera dei congressi, to its various sections, the subgroups, and the numerous bishops who had expressed their need for help and had asked for directives. The main point of controversy was "Christian democracy" as a name and a program. It was typical for the methods of Leo XIII that he was able to assert his already clearly defined decision. Basically, he was siding with the young, in whom he saw vital energies of the Church. But even though he approved and recommended the social action arising from below, "he was intent on having the inspiration and coordination filter down from above, from his will."[15] With a view toward the German model of the Volksverein and the Catholic Center in the German Reichstag, Agliardi and Gasparri intervened with the Pope on behalf of Murri.

---

[14] A. Gambasin, Il movimento sociale nell'Opera dei Congressi (1874–1904) (Rome 1958), 467.

[15] D. Secco Suardo, op. cit., 126.

In this manner, Leo XIII prepared his intervention, followed by the encyclical Graves de communi (18 January 1901).[16] With reference to Rerum novarum, his circular letter insisted that the action of the Catholics proceed in unity, to the exclusion of all politics, in conjunction with a central organization, and in submission to the Pope and the bishops, who had the right to take practical measures "according to the local and personal situations." In the "fundamental theoretical and practical points", which were to be publicized among the people, the following was declared: "Christian democracy shall not have any political significance; it advocates the welfare of the lower classes, but also pays attention to the upper classes; it does not support plans for insubordination and opposition to public authority; rather, it proposes to put all its energies into easing the hard lot of the manual laborers, gradually enabling them to provide their own livelihood."[17]

One of the directives, which was enacted by the Congress of Taranto (1901), demanded the granting of greater latitude to the young and their inclusion in the social initiatives of men like Medolago Albani, Toniolo, Radini Tedeschi, and Rezzara. This demand alarmed the still powerful group of the older generation who took up a position behind the customary loyalty to the Pope and were opposed to innovations. The new statutes of 1901 still required abstinence from politics. Therefore, Murri's initiatives seemed at least inopportune and were deleted by Cardinals Vives y Tutó and Respighi, who were entrusted with formulating the program of the second section on Christian charity and social economics.

The success of the movement's social and religious action, which enforced the people's loyalty to the Pope, affected the people's conscience and procured more political impact for the movement. This provided the Vatican with greater influence on the Italian government. In December 1901, as a result of its concern for public order, the government proceeded toward a policy of exceptive laws, which both the socialist radicals and the younger members of the Catholic movement rejected with determination.

Leo XIII's attempts to mediate between the various factions of the Catholic movement in order to preserve unity and identity encountered difficulties. The customary compliancy toward the Pope was not able to break the opposition of the conservatively inclined older generation, who tried to justify the existing economic and social order by referring to the events of 1898. They alluded essentially to paternalistic motivations, since they were only concerned with love and charity. The boisterous younger generation, on the other hand, was reluctant to adhere to the institutions organized and ruled from above. Inspired by Murri, they undermined the homogeneous structure of the Opera dei congressi, which was less and less representative of the Catholic movement in Italy. Pius X was to experience this and to institute a change which would seal the demise of the congressional organization.

---

[16] Italian text in Insegnamenti pontifici. 4. Il laicato, 171–94.

[17] D. Secco Suardo, op. cit., 135–136.

CHAPTER 6

The Failure to Reconcile Catholics and the Republic in France

The Ecclesiastical Policy of the Republicans

During the enthronement of Leo XIII, everything indicated that the existence of the Republic in France, formed in 1875 under such tremendous difficulties, was secure. The elections of 1876 brought a Republican majority into parliament which held 64 percent of the seats in the Chamber of Deputies. Moreover, the failure of the coup de main of 16 May 1877, shortly before the papal elections, was a successful prologue to the take-over of the provincial diets and the offices of the mayors. These victories of Gambetta's friends were bound to be followed by the overthrow of the senate majority in January 1879 and by the massive invasion of a group of deputies who held, after the elections in the summer of 1881, 83.6 percent of the seats. In the following years, the government successfully survived an economic crisis and an attack by the Boulangists. But now, the Church leaders had to recognize that it would be prudent to come to an understanding with a Republic on whose demise they could not count.

The Republicans, in turn, were eager to secure their election victory through a "republicanization" of the upper administration (e.g., the State Council and the large institutions, the army and the judiciary). The Catholic Church was especially affected by this policy of the "Republican defensive" in view of the farspread social influence which it had gained through preaching and charity, through its schools and, most of all, through the religious orders. This impact was feared by the leaders of the Republican majority, and therefore they placed systematic secularization of public life at the top of their ideological and political program. During the budget debate of 1877, V. Guichard presented this plan in his report, and consequently a fund was provided to finance an investigation into the significance of the orders. This investigation was carried out in 1878. It showed that the total number of order members amounted to at least 30,000, among them 3,350 Jesuits. The congregations of women included about 128,000 persons who cared for approximately 16,500 girls schools. There were three times as many religious priests as secular ones, and it was discovered that this number approximated that of 1765, when the number of religious priests had peaked in the eighteenth century. Most of the congregations were not legally authorized.[1] This explains why, on 15 May 1879, the Minister of Education Jules Ferry supplemented his bill regarding the introduction of a generally obligatory, secular primary education with ARTICLE 7, which prohibited the nonauthorized congregations from any kind of instruction. It also explains why he enforced this prohibition through appropriate decrees, at first directed against the Jesuits, who were expelled in 1880, and then, in the following November, also directed against the other nonauthorized male congregations.

The struggle between the Republic and the Church erupted most vehemently over the issues of religious orders and schools. The bishops, in turn, waged a campaign against the laicization of elementary education, which was resolved on 28 March 1882, and against the cancellation of payment in connection with the abolition of official manuals for public instruction (Louis Capéran). But in many other areas, religious demonstrations in public were forbidden or strictly regulated. Processions, preaching, lay societies, courts, hospitals, and cemeteries were supervised, and the Magnet Law regarding divorce was finally passed after intensive debates (19 July 1884). The cardinals of Rouen and Paris declared in festive Observations (1 June 1882) "that more than twenty bills regarding the regulation of religion had been proposed." Bishop-Deputy Freppel before the Parliament defended the rights of the Church pertaining to this legislation, concluding with the exclamation: "Separation, that is your goal. Yesterday it was the separation of Church and school, today it is the separation of parish and congregation, tomorrow or the day after tomorrow it will be the separation of Church and state (enthusiastic applause on the left). Always and everywhere separations."[2]

The aim of such a policy was, in fact, the suspension of the concordat. Separation had already been the main theme of the election campaign in the summer of 1881, and, when the two chambers were combined, Paul Bert introduced a bill, reiterating the proposals of four deputies who had also demanded the dissolution of the concordat. Those responsible for Republican policies, however, hesitated to make this extreme move. Ferry especially adhered to a concordat policy which, in June 1879, he had called "a strict application of the treaty of 1801 and which was to satisfy everything and to secure a rigorous defense of the rights of the state."

---

[1] In September 1880, the Secretary of the treasury estimated the estates of the orders to be 628 million francs, which appears to be rather exaggerated.

[2] Chambre des Députés, meeting of 5 November 1883 (Journal Officiel, 6 November 1883).

This caution resulted from an analysis of the country's religious and political situation deduced from the three important series of reports[3] which were demanded by the prefects and the attorneys general in the years 1879, 1881, and 1888. They clarified the very obvious regional differences in the religious practices in urban areas, which, from the vicinity of Paris, extended toward the north up to Normandy and to the northern and northeastern region bordering the Central Mountains and which were characterized by increasing separation from the Church; as well as in the wooded and mountainous rural areas (Lyon and the eastern border of the Central Mountains, the Savoy Alps, etc.), where a general religious practice continued to dominate. In addition, the reports listed a stronger tendency for separation in the areas bordering the departements Yonne, Sâone-et-Loire, and, above all, in the Mediterranean region from Narbonne to Nice. This separation rarely affected the religious situation directly, and even in the most de-Christianized areas, as in Haute-Vienne, religious practices continued. Among the peasants, there was a general and widespread mistrust of the priests' meddling in the political and social arena, and of everything conventionally called the "government of priests." This mistrust existed even in the most devout areas. It increased according to the extent to which the clergy itself demonstrated through remarks and behavior that it was intransigent, generally in southern areas. In the vicinity of the bishops' sees, the reports often detected a social class with such intransigent and vehemently anti-Republican sentiments, where the lay dignitaries and society ladies were competing with each other. These groups were often under the leadership of the respective vicar general, who, simply on the basis of his age, often controlled large elements of the clergy. They were also able to make themselves heard in the Semaines religieuses,[4] and were intent on exerting direct influence on the leadership of the dioceses. The only authority which these circles obeyed and which was able to suppress the opposition of the clergy was the bishop, mainly through the full powers of authority which the concordat had bestowed upon him. This was the reason why the government had conceded special importance to the figure of the bishop and the role he could play as a mediating factor. The prefect emphatically pointed out the advantages of a direct agreement with the bishop in order to avoid unpleasant incidents. This was especially true in the southwest, Cahors, the territories with a strong Protestant minority (e.g., Nîmes), and in the mountain areas like the Hautes-Alpes, where Monsignor Guilbert had imposed on the clergy in Gap his views about the necessity of a religious activity free of any political claims (1876). For dioceses where the clerical opposition could possibly increase, the responsible agencies of the Republic systematically appointed bishops who were interested in a settlement, (e.g., Guilbert in Amiens, later in Bordeaux; Meignan in Arras, later in Tours). The reports finally showed that alongside the priests in Mayenne who were strongly influenced by the nobility, a new generation of priests was growing from among the lower clergy, mainly in the western parts of the country, who were conciliatory and Republican like Abbé Frémont, a well-known priest from Poitou, whose diary was then being published.[5] In the poorest areas, the intransigence of the clergy was moderated by the traditional high esteem for the ruling authority, which, in the eyes of the people, was the guarantor of an ordered life and of respect for the individual.

---

[3] The reports are preserved in the Archives Nationales (F 19. 5610). They were analyzed by L. Capéran, Histoire contemporaine de la laïcité française II (Paris 1959), 157, and by J. Gadille, La pensée and l'action politiques des évêques français . . . I (Paris 1967), 144 (cf. especially the map in this work).

[4] Cf. H. Sempér, "Propagande et action catholiques dans le seconde moitié du XIX^{e} s. et au debut du XX^{e} s., "La Semaine religieuse de Toulouse; coll.: Publications de l'Université de Toulouse-Le-Mirail (Toulouse 1973); H. Taine, Les Origines de la France contemporaine: Le regime moderne II (Paris 1894), 80.

Thus the concordat treaty continued to be firmly rooted in the political reality of the country, in the almost universal loyalty of the peasantry toward their religion, and in the desire of a certain segment of the upper and the lower clergy to be cooperative. The Republicans were aware of this fact, especially the prefects, who were much closer to the daily realities of life, and who condemned the radical candidates' demands for a separation as utopian. "One of our representatives, a confirmed advocate of the separation, explained to me that he had arrived at the conviction that the majority of his voters did not agree with the separation . . .," wrote the prefect of Jura in December 1885 to the minister. In response to Ernest Renan, who in November 1881 had developed the idea of a separation of the two powers in modern society, Paul Cambon wrote that the Republic should not deprive itself of this indispensable instrument of control which the decrees of the concordat provided: "Dominating or dominated—there is no middle of the road for the Catholic Church."[6]

---

[5] A. Siegfried, L'abbé Frémont (1852–1912), two vol. (Paris 1932).

[6] Prefect of Jura with the powers of a secretary, 31 December 1885 (Archives Nationales, F 19. 2576) (Renan, Corr. II [Paris 1924], 215–18, and Cambon, Corr. I [Paris 1905], 139–40).

This attitude was clearly expressed in the arguments which the government presented in May 1882 to the Concordat Commission formed under the chairmanship of Paul Bert. This commission was entrusted with the examination of all proposals by the extreme left regarding the suspension of the concordat. Paul Bert himself asked them to consider that the clergy, due to their influence on society, would regain their estates and means of action immediately after the separation, and that it would intensify their demands for support by the people, whose discontent could easily turn against the Republic. "Consequently, one would gain all the disadvantages of the separation, but none of the advantages." Thus, various reasons existed for the objections to the separation. The government, however, announced that it would reject every new demand for a reduction of the budget for cultural affairs. It even went so far as to disapprove of Paul Bert's plan for the future. The government wanted to preserve the concordat in letter and in spirit.[7]

Thus the French found themselves in the paradoxical situation of having to deal with two powers which, in theory, had opposing political and philosophical principles, but, in practice, made efforts to bring about a reconciliation. In spite of those representatives of the Republican state and the Church who regarded the separation as inevitable, both parties had one interest in common: preventing the break as long as possible. Thus this alliance was only a temporary endeavor based upon expediency and de facto situation, a weak base, which was threatened as soon as the conflicts were stronger than the desire to agree.[8]

The Politics of Reconciliation (1878–92)

The further development in the relations between the two powers was also subject to fluctuations which were based upon both French domestic politics and the opposing influences within the Curia which affected Leo XIII. In the first period, embracing the years 1878–90, politics was marked by mutual efforts to avoid alienation. The French government and especially the Foreign Office made attempts at the Vatican to diminish the significance of anticlerical pronouncements and the majority's legislation. The kind of politics which part of the Concordat Commission expressed in their definite rejection of the desire for separation asserted itself on every occasion. In the spring and summer of 1880, attempts were made to incite the congregations' political declaration of loyalty, which would have limited the application of ARTICLE 7 and thus allowed a reduction of expatriations. After the enactment of the law of March 1882, pertaining to obligatory and laicized elementary instruction, Jules Ferry's pronouncements defined the neutrality of schools in a way which paid respect to the freedom of conscience. The government tried to negotiate the cancellations of salaries which it had ratified after the incidents regarding the manuals for state instruction. Finally, the government seized every opportunity to emphasize that it was willing to pay a certain price to prove that its foreign policy served the defense of the Catholic interests. While Archbishop Charles de Lavigerie of Algeria, appointed cardinal in 1882, was working in Tunisia, the Near East, and in Africa, his activities were determined by this perspective. This also explains his equally great influence in the Vatican and at the Quai d'Orsay.

---

[7] Cf. L. Capéran, op. cit. III (Paris 1960), 135–41.

[8] Regarding Church politics between 1891 and 1902, cf. J.-M. Larkin, "The Church and the French Concordat, 1891 to 1902," EHR (Oct. 1966), 717–39.

The Holy See and the ecclesiastical hierarchy were intent on preventing the defense of the Church's rights against the anticlerical laws from developing into an open opposition to overall policies. In this respect, Leo XIII's efforts to keep the ultramontane press in check and to counterbalance it with the "liberal" press were of great importance. So was his attempt to tie the leadership of the Church once again closer to a responsible hierarchy. On every occasion, the Pope protected the Nuncios Czacki and di Rende against the attacks of the intransigent Catholics. He did the same for those bishops who championed the policy of reconciliation, for example, Monsignor Louis Édouard Pie and Henri Bellot des Minières,[9] the successor to Cardinal Pie in Poitiers. He advised the French Catholics to resist only when it was a question of conscience. In this manner, he created conditions for solving serious controversies by way of negotiations, as in the case of the conflict regarding education, which would have otherwise resulted in a break.

When the elections of October 1885 seemed to offer a favorable chance for the formation of a Catholic party, Leo XIII expressed himself negatively, because the well-known statements of its main advocate, Albert de Mun, would have, without doubt, stamped the party with an anti-Republican imprint. In 1889, the Pope, encouraged by French domestic politics and the international situation, believed that the time had come amicably to conclude his policy of reconciliation with France. To be sure, a law had been passed that same year which obligated the seminarians to serve one year of military duty. On the other hand, this was also the year of failure for Boulanger's politics and of a truce in the controversy. The philosophy of Henri Bergson, "Les données immédiates de la conscience," and the literary prose by E. M. de Vogüé and Paul Bourget had undergone a spiritual renaissance. Finally, the Holy See felt that the policy of coalition within the Triple Alliance made the need for close cooperation even more urgent. Leo XIII requested Monsignor Domenico Ferrata, whom he appointed nuncio to Paris in June 1891, to report to him personally about the state of these efforts. Called upon for comment, the cardinals of Paris, Lyon, and Rennes declared that they were not competent. It took no less than five appeals until Cardinal Charles de Lavigerie, in October 1890, was willing to deliver a declaration, ignoring the dangers which such an involvement entailed for his missionary work. When, on 12 November 1890, he received the officers of the Mediterranean fleet in Algeria, he proposed a toast to the French navy, suggesting to the French Catholics the "unconditional acceptance of the Republic," and added that "they would surely not have to experience the disapproval of any authority as a consequence." Rome endorsed this viewpoint only semiofficially, and Leo XIII let fifteen months pass before he expressed himself similarly in his encyclical Au milieu des sollicitudes of 17 February 1892, following a brief to the French cardinals on 3 May 1891. This hesitation can certainly be explained by the cool reception with which the leaders of French Catholicism responded to the papal attitude.

---

[9] J. B. Woodall, "Henri Bellot des Minières . . .", CHR (1952).

The term Ralliement had a different significance in the deliberations for Leo XIII and for the French Catholics. For the Pope, in line with his "political" encyclicals of 1881, 1885, and 1888, it was not at all a question of "baptizing" the Republic, but rather of accepting this government as a tool to re-Christianize legislation and the social institutions. For him, it was also not a question of founding a Catholic party, but rather of combining the Catholics of all persuasions and the Republicans in one comprehensive conservative union. This union, with the parliamentary power it represented, was to contribute to re-Christianization within its constituency. Such a concept, however, was difficult to accept for the majority of the bishops and the leading lay representatives of the Catholic public. The tradition of the "religious defensive," which they embraced, compelled them rather to form a Catholic party. In it, all were to come together who were concerned with the defense of the Church and who would not be readily willing to abandon the anti-Republican conviction from which they drew the strength to act. From this position arose the Union de la France chrétienne, which was founded in April 1891 by Charles Chesnelong, Lucien Brun, and Émile Keller and which refused the succession to Charles de Lavigerie, archbishop of Algeria.

In the Catholic public, however, the pressure in favor of the policy of the "toast" became more and more noticeable. Several bishops, e.g., Cardinal Adolphe Perraud, had already taken such a position; and some newspapers and individual groups from Paris and Bordeaux were working toward a reconciliation. The appearance of Rerum novarum, primarily, introduced a change in the political attitude of the Catholics. The existence of groups which had formed years ago and wanted to take the same path of social action accounts for the response which this encyclical encountered. Among them was the Association Catholique de la jeunesse française (ACJF), which, under the leadership of Albert de Mun, was able to fill even part of the aristocracy with enthusiasm and, above all, the committees which had been established by the newspaper La Croix since 1887. In Paris, almost seven hundred of these committees were combined under one general office (1891). With the help of these committees, Abbé Théodore Granier awakened the interest of the Catholic public to the fate of the workers and farmers, which created the foundation for a union which was constituted in 1892 as the Union Nationale. At this time, Catholics like Émile Duport and Louis Durand founded cooperative societies for farmers in the area of Lyon.

The Pursuit and the Failure of Reconciliation

(1892–99)

At the time when Leo XIII commented on the occurrences in France, the voices within the Catholic public, for the reasons already known, had become more conciliatory. The intransigent wing of the newspaper L'Univers defected and founded the paper La Vérité. On 12 May 1892 the Assemblée des Catholiques dissolved the Union de la France chrétienne. Two of their most important leaders, Albert de Mun and Armand Mackau, joined the Ralliement, ignoring the criticism of their friends from the monarchic right. The moderation of these men during the Panama crisis and during the anarchist crisis was received by the Republicans with satisfaction, and they gave their official approval to this policy. Everything seemed to indicate that the reconciliation would be confirmed by the people's vote at the elections in August 1893.

These elections, however, turned out to be a disappointment. Only about thirty advocates of Ralliement were elected, and not one of the Catholic leaders who had so courageously expressed their opinion was among them. The reason for this may lie in the fact that they had not succeeded in agreeing on a parliamentary level, which would have enabled them to form a "unified front" in the election campaign. Earlier Jacques Piou, a deputy from Anjou, had formulated the reconciliation in its most comprehensive form, terming it the "constitutional right." But Albert de Mun, leader of the Association Catholique de la jeunesse Française wanted primarily to stress the common denominator of Catholicism in regard to the constitutional engagement of the Ralliement, and he opposed the ACJF to the Catholic League. Another deputy, Étienne Lamy, supported by several liberal Catholics mainly from the southwest of the country, finally began paving the way to the moderate Republicans through the Catholic League. There was no election coalition between the two groups, and even after the election, no link could guarantee the cohesion between the various groups of the Ralliement. They divided and dispersed, joining the various factions of the Chamber, and (since their leader did not belong to the Chamber and they were without help) were finally absorbed by the moderate majority which, at the time of Minister Jules Meline, enjoyed relative stability. "We needed a French Windthorst," Lecanuet said.

After the failure of the attempt of 1893, there was no more hope for the success of a policy which aimed at a parliamentary coalition. Thus a second phase began, during which, in view of the impending elections of 1898, the reconciliation was to take place on the stage of public opinion. This phase was, indeed, the great time of the "second Christian democracy." Representative of this trend was a group of young clergymen who tried to create new possibilities for pastoral work (Abbé Charles Calippe; clergy congresses in Rheims in 1896 and Bourges in 1900). They recognized the political power of their apostolic involvement. Fruits of their work were the organization of congresses for the Christian Democrats, the first of which took place in May 1903 in Rheims, and the founding of newspapers like La Justice sociale by Abbé Paul Naudet in Bordeaux, Le Peuple française by Abbé Théodore Garnier, and La Démocratie chrétienne, which appeared until 1908 under the editorial leadership of Abbé Paul Six. In September 1893, in the northern area of Hazebrouck, one of these democratic clergymen, Jules Auguste Lemire, was elected in place of a respected Catholic. This election was an example of the awakening of the Republican consciousness of a large part of the clergy and the farmers of this area marked by Christian faith.[10] Through this mandate, Lemire became the leader of the Christian Democrats, even though this movement had emerged from a series of individual initiatives which were neither carried by a substantial desire for coordination nor by a strong support through the episcopate. Their centers were in the north, where there was a connection to the Belgian Catholic social movement, and in the area of Lyon close to the Chronique du Sud-Est (V. Berne, M. Gonin, L. Crétinon). The impact of this newspaper extended over the departements of Ain, Loire, and Ardèche and into the Mediterranean area, where Abbé Sahut founded a paper in Montpellier with the significant title La sociologie catholique.[11] Another active center existed in the area around Bordeaux. From 1894 until 1898, annual congresses took place in Rheims, Paris, and Lyon, where the representatives of the young clergy and the lower middle class met. Simultaneously, and often in connection with the Christian Democrats, the local boards of the newspaper La Croix, whose owners were Assumptionists, reached the peak of their development in the year 1895 with 3,000 local subsidiaries. The great number of local editions of La Croix (approximately 100 in 1897) and its wide circulation, which secured a total of almost 700,000 issues, made this press organ an important support of these committees. La Croix did also reach the middle classes, but mainly the lower middle class, the workers, and the rural population. Having the same basis as the Christian Democrats and the ACJF, the members of these committees insisted on a definite political engagement. At a congress held in 1895 an election committee of La Croix was formed under the name Comité Justice-Égalité.

---

[10] J.-M. Mayeur, Un prêtre démocrate, l'abbé Lemire (1853–1928) (Paris 1968), 133. This election has to be seen in connection with the election of Abbé Hippolyte Gayraud, who was elected in Brittany in 1897, another area determined by the Christian spirit. The election of Gayraud attracted even more attention because he competed with Msgr. Maurice d'Hulst, a member of the higher clergy. After being declared invalid, the election was finally confirmed.

Now the congresses of the Christian Democrats, in turn, founded an election federation in Rheims (1896) and Lyon (1897). It was actually a question of organizing all those groups, which had grown rapidly since 1890, and of placing them under a common leadership while preserving a certain autonomy. The man who took the leadership was Étienne Lamy. Cardinal Rampolla had asked him in March 1896 to take on this task. Unfortunately, the influence of the Comité Justice-Égalité and the Assumptionists' authority, which was in control of the Bonne Presse, was much stronger, and the election federation of the Christian Democrats was unable to bring the Catholics to back their plan of endorsing a promising moderate Republican. On the contrary, the various political factions of the Catholics often fought against each other, a fact which was finally put to good use by a radical candidate. Lamy himself refused the candidacy because he would not have been able to find a constituency. The elections of May 1898 resulted in the same failure of the Ralliement as the elections of 1893. To be sure, the number of elected representatives of the Ralliement was larger now (seventy-six), but the majority of the "moderates" decreased correspondingly. This fact was confirmed on 14 June of the following year, when they succeeded, with the help of a majority, to henceforth exclude the representatives of the Ralliement from the governing coalition. The following months brought the end for the federation and the decline of "Christian democracy" in France.

Very much to the disadvantage of the "new spirit," there continued to be considerable sources of tension between the Catholics and the Republicans. They were passionately nurtured by the readers of La Croix. Two points were of importance: the government of Alexandre Ribot had imposed additional taxes on the religious congregations, the so-called Abonnement, which had incited a wave of protest. Primarily, as Capéran demonstrated, it was anti-Semitism which provoked the Catholic masses against the Republic. Édouard Drumont charged the Republic with being in the grip of a "Jewish-Masonic" conspiracy, which was sneaking into the higher ranks of the military, thus threatening religious values and national integrity. This partly explains why the revision of the sentence for the Jewish Captain Dreyfus, attaché in the War Ministry, had drawn such attention from the public. Dreyfus had been falsely accused of delivering military secrets to Germany and, in 1894, had been sentenced to deportation for life. The episcopate did practice noteworthy constraint in this affair; but this cannot be said about the lower clergy and the masses of Catholics, among whom only a small minority courageously confessed to be "dreyfusards." Recent research has shown that Edouard Drumont's articles in the newspaper Libre Parole had found an undeniable echo in Catholic circles, and that the anti-Semitism of La Croix was indeed of a different nature, but nonetheless very real. The newspaper unconditionally took the side of the army when, in 1899, heated debate flared up about the trial of the Court of Justice of Rennes. Even among the Christian Democrats anti-Semitism was strongly represented. Also people like Abbé Hippolyte Gayraud confessed to it, and the agenda of the congresses carried the mark of an exaggerated assessment of the national beliefs and the condemnation of "anti-French and anti-Christian Jewish intrigues." This is proven by the fact that Cardinal Pierre Coullié, the archbishop of Lyon, on the occasion of the congresses in Lyon in 1896 and 1897, warned his clergy of such programmatic terminology, which he believed to be contradictory to the Christian spirit, and that he himself denounced any participation.

---

[11] G. Cholvy, Géographie religieuse de l'Hérault contemporain (Paris 1968), 386.

The nationalistic excesses in the spring of 1899 turned against the person of President Émile Loubet. That was not unexpected, since a coalition had been formed in Parliament whose anti-clerical program was directed against the religious congregations. It was the motto of the "Republican concentration" which achieved a majority for Pierre Waldeck-Rousseau on 26 June. Their Republican leaders did not hesitate to blame the Catholics' intrigues for the sentence which prevented Dreyfus' acquittal in August and resulted merely in a reduction of his punishment. In November, the houses of the Assumptionists in Paris and the offices of La Croix were subject to a police search. The suppression of the Assumptionists, following a trial in the District Court, and

Leo XIII's decision to deprive them of the direction of the Bonne Presse have to be seen in the context of the influence they had had in the previous ten years. The Assumptionists were the first religious congregation to be affected by the measures which finally led to the separation of Church and state.

Now the Republic returned to its policy of persecution, which, in the eyes of the general Catholic public, it had never completely given up. This poses the question of whether French Catholicism in its majority was ever really ready for reconciliation. The anti-Semitic wave and the corresponding press propaganda allow the conclusion that the Catholic population itself was, to a large extent, responsible for the failure of the reconciliatory efforts by causing an anticlerical feeling within the committees and the administration of the Republicans.

CHAPTER 7

On the Road to Conservatism: Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxemburg

Belgium

Around the turn of the century, thanks to the constitution of 1831, Belgian Catholicism had been able to flourish so intensely that Belgium was practically a Catholic country, at least in regard to the classical arena of struggle against liberalism: the school system. This constitutional reality, however, deviating from the liberal statutes, was endangered. The ecclesiastical circles, on the one hand, regarded the political status quo merely as an opportunity; and the Liberals, on the other hand, forgot the time of common resistance to the Dutch Monarchy and reacted with increasing anticlericalism. There were also indications of considerable differences between the agrarian and the early industrial areas, between the Flemish and the Walloon areas regarding religious practices. The radical-liberal government of Rogier and Frère-Orban (1857–70) was overthrown because the powerful Catholic congressional movement, organized by the laity, was also politically transformed, and the domestic differences within Catholicism pertaining to the question of the constitution could temporarily be settled.

But the conflict continued to intensify. The head of the Catholic constitutional opponents was economist Charles Périn (1815–1905) of Louvain, who, in the area of economics, represented a mixture of liberalism and moral patronage and strongly influenced the group around Bishop Freppel in Angers.[1] Van Humbeeck, who was the minister of Cultural Affairs in the radical-liberal government of Frère-Orban, which had come to power in 1878, coined the phrase: "Un cadavre est sur la terre, il barre la route au progrès . . . le cadavre du passé—c'est le catholicisme."[2] Pope Leo XIII, who was familiar with the Belgian circumstances through his nunciature (1843–46), believed, when taking office, that peace could be preserved in Belgium. After the June 1878 election victory of the Liberals, he still tried to prevent an intensification of the situation, while requesting respect for the constitution. The good wishes of Secretary of State Nina for the twenty-fifth anniversary of the newspaper Le Bien Public (published since 1853), which followed an intransigent ultramontane course, was played off against papal politics and had to be interpreted.[3] A pastoral letter by the Belgian episcopate in December, quite contrary to the intentions of Leo XIII, was composed in a sharp tone, which coincided with the belligerent attitude of Archbishop Victor-Auguste Dechamps of Mechelen (archbishop since 1867, cardinal since 1875), who had also intervened in the German Kulturkampf. On 10 July 1879 the law regarding nondenominational elementary schools was enacted, followed by a law pertaining to public secondary and high schools. The Belgian bishops excommunicated those parents who sent their children to public elementary schools and did the same to teachers who taught there. In vain the Pope attempted moderation. A papal letter to Dechamps of 2 April 1880 finally recognized the attitude of the episcopate, which Leo could not disavow. But since he had promised the Belgian ambassador to the Vatican a compromise, the government felt deceived and broke off diplomatic relations in June 1880.

The school laws were simply a failure, especially in Flanders. By the end of 1880, 580,680 children went to free Catholic schools and only 333,401 to public schools, which were being increased to no purpose. The ecclesiastical sanctions against the communal school system could usually anticipate religious obedience and willingness to make sacrifices (e.g., dismissal of civil servants). The people also complained about the financial burdens which were the consequence of the state's rather irrational school policies.[4] In the elections of 10 June 1884 the Liberals suffered a devastating defeat, which was to be a determining factor for a long time to come. On 20 September 1884 the minister of Cultural Affairs, Charles Woeste, tried to thoroughly revise the school law of 1879, but President Beernaert (1884–94) solved the controversy, which had badly shaken the Belgian public, through a compromise.[5]

---

[1] "The worker is a brother in Jesus Christ whom God has entrusted to the employer: C. Périn, Die Lehren der Nationalökonomie seit einem Jahrhundert (Freiburg 1882), 277.—M. Becqué, A. Louant, "Le dossier 'Rome et Louvain' de Charles Périn" (incl. a biographical sketch), RHE 50 (1955), 36–124.

[2] Quoted in F. Petri, op. cit., 476.

[3] Schmidlin, PG II, 437.

[4] F. Petri, op. cit., 477, incl. biblio.

In February 1885 the Belgian government sent a special delegate to the Vatican, and in May, Domenico Ferrata, who had earned diplomatic credits in Switzerland, came discretely to Brussels as nuncio. On 21 June, during the Te Deum on occasion of the jubilee of the Belgian kingdom, he was already able to function as the doyen of the diplomatic corps. He preluded Lavigerie's famous toast by a toast to the royal couple during the anniversary of the railroad, receiving the applause of the Liberals who had approved the budget for the Vatican Embassy in 1886.[6] The discussion of two questions pertaining to canon law during the nunciature of Ferrata (until 1889) is indicative of the Leonic pragmatism. The liberal government of Frère-Orban had suspended denominational cemeteries in 1879. Since Beernaert hesitated to change this, the Pope recommended to his nuncio to wait and see.[7] More crucial was the fact that in 1876 the Holy Office, via the French episcopate, had prohibited the Catholic judges in France from cooperating in divorces (legalized again in 1884) even if it required their resignation. Neighboring Belgium, where divorce had been legalized in 1809, was worried about this, and therefore Ferrata informed them that the decree was only binding for the French bishops, not for Belgium.[8]

In reference to Belgium it was noted that the difference between liberal and social Catholicism was not as general as it seemed. The delay in social activity was said to have to do with the Lamennais crisis of Catholic Liberalism in Belgium.[9] As a matter of fact, it was a political anti-Liberalist, Charles Périn, who had obscured the need for a reform with his morally moderate economic liberalism, which was only later attacked by the Catholic Democrats. The Catholic bourgeoisie was energetically involved in the enormous industrial growth going on since the sixties, which after 1880 could continue only with strict economic concentration because of the European protective tariff policies. Therefore King Leopold II, who had done much for the country, encountered strong resistance when he wanted to introduce compulsory military service within the framework of his military policy, because he did not anticipate again having the good fortune which had guided him in the war of 1870. The socio-political aspect amounted to the fact that everybody could free himself from military duty by financing a substitute, which was naturally not possible for a worker or a small craftsman. Interestingly, the bill of 1887 miscarried, mainly because of the Catholic Conservatives who were backed by the episcopate because it feared the suspension of the clergy's exemption from military service. In contrast to the question of the septennate dicussed in Berlin the same year, Leo XIII was reserved toward the Belgian king's plea for intervention, even though he did not share the opinion of the episcopate.[10] [5] The communal administrations were empowered to fully recognize the Catholic schools ("accepted schools") and to make decisions regarding religious instruction in public schools (however, the child's father was entitled to exempt his child from it). The teachers' training was no longer restricted to state seminaries.

---

[6] Stutz, 46–54.

[7] When Dechamps's (died 1883) successor, Archbishop Pierre-Lambert Goossens of Mechelen (cardinal since 1889) inquired in Rome about this matter, he was given a canonical answer, but was urged to practice tolerance.

[8] Ferrata, Mémoires I, 334ff.

[9] "Social Catholicism and liberal Catholicism are not so opposed to each other as they have often pretended to be"; Henri Haag: J. N. Moody (ed.), Church and Society (New York 1953), 294f.

Moreover, the gradual removal of the property qualification had to be accomplished in spite of the opposition of the Catholic Conservatives and their allies, the Liberals of Frère-Orban's persuasion. The pioneers in this struggle were the younger Liberals, but it was primarily the Socialists whose demonstrations forced the government, dominated by the Catholic party, to introduce general though still limited suffrage in 1893.[11] The Conservatives did not expect that the Catholics, rather than the Socialists, would profit from this law, especially in the Flemish-speaking areas.

The signal for a social reform which could no longer be ignored (unusually low wages, long working hours) was the general strike, starting in Liège on 18 March 1886 and commemorating the Parisian uprising of the commune in 1871. There was violence, and military forces were dispatched under General van der Smissen. The Beernaert government was now forced to design reform laws against the opposition of the extreme right, led by Charles Woeste, an intransigent convert. Liège became the center of the Catholic social movement which recognized that traditional paternalism, often enough just a phrase, was no longer adequate for the growing industrial society. An early attempt was made in 1871 by the Catholic industrialist Gustave de Jaer. But he could not assert himself in the politically dominating ranks of Belgian Catholicism.[12] In East Flemish Ghent in 1875 a group of young workers came together, from which the Anti-Socialist League emerged. By 1911 the organization had one hundred thirty-five staff members, its own daily paper, and productive social institutions. The Socialists felt that this organization was breaking class solidarity and consequently collisions occurred. Among the first of the Catholic labor leaders who belonged to the working classes themselves was the weaver Léon Bruggeman from Ghent, who, together with printers, founded a Christian-oriented union in 1882.[13] In 1886 and 1887, the first two socio-political congresses took place in Liège, endorsed by Bishop Doutreloux, who was a good-natured priest but not a fighter. Charles Woeste called these events "exaggerations,"[14] but he assessed them correctly as an opposition, since people were a great deal more realistic in Liège than in France. Abbé A. Pottier was the focal point there. He was a theoretician as well as a practioner, but in 1898 he turned his back on the internal conflicts and went to Rome.[15] The Liège Congress (1890) enjoyed sizable international participation and was quite lively. The discussions concentrated around the generally controversial state intervention, which Woeste exposed as "Césarisme," and the equally delicate question of whether employers and employees should form joint or separate organizations. It was this question which again divided Belgium's Catholics into two vehemently opposed groups. Without meaning to establish their own party, the approximately one hundred Catholic workers' societies combined to form the Ligue Démocratique Belge. The initiative came from Professor G. Helleputte of Louvain (1852–1925) and the engineer A. Verhaegen (1847–1917), who had collaborated with the Vincent Conferences. Charging Woeste with being interested only in an increase of the state budget for the Church's sake and the public support of the Catholic schools is probably a polemical exaggeration.[16] But there is no doubt that the power of the Parti Catholique was determined until World War I by the strong interests of the middle-class Catholics, against whom the Christian social forces had difficulties bringing their interests to bear, especially since they were often enough in disagreement and looked for a coalition with either the Conservatives or the Christian social movement on the left. It was also due to the abstract style of the encyclical Rerum novarum (1891) that it could become the object of particularly serious controversies in respect to its interpretation. Bishop Doutreloux had defined papal principles in a pastoral letter in the beginning of 1894. Leo XIII, in a letter to the Belgian episcopate of 10 July 1895 suggested a conference which took place in March 1896 in Mechelen and decided on a rather inappropriate compromise.[17] Meanwhile a group of young Catholic deputies had formed to the left of the Democratic League, indebted with respect to its definite social demands to the Dominican Rutten, one of the "social chaplains" of that era, later the first secretary general of the Confédération des Syndicats chrétiens, which had grown out of local groups between 1904 and 1912.[18] The small Flemish Christian People's Party faltered soon because Abbé Daens, charged with having endorsed ideas of class warfare, was suspended in 1897.[19] Significant for the existing insecurity was Cardinal (since 1889) Goossens's inquiry in Rome in connection with the Congress of Mechelen in 1896: did the employer commit a sin, and to what extent, if he preferred cheaper labor and did not pay family-adequate wages in the fight to compete on the market? It was the Belgian primate's inquiry, rather than this particular problem (widely discussed among western European Catholics), which was remarkable, as well as Cardinal Zigliara's answer that a "fair wage" was to be paid according to equity.

---

[10] Ferrata, Mémoires I, 334ff.; Stutz, 51ff.; H. Pirenne, Histoire de Belgique VII (1932), 221, 309f.; F. Petri, op. cit., 471f.

[11] This caused the number of eligible voters to increase from 137,000 to 1,370,000; F. Petri, op. cit., 478.

[12] M. Vaussard, Histoire de la Démocratie chrétienne (Paris 1956), 143; about paternalism in Belgium, see R. Reszohazy, op. cit., 47–98; about de Jaer, ibid., 70.

---

[13] M. P. Fogarty, Christian Democracy in Western Europe (London 1957, Freiburg i. Br. 1959), 218ff.

[14] Vaussard, 143; with a great amount of objectivity R. Reszohazy, op. cit. 201–86, describes the political differences within Belgian Catholicism from C. Woeste at the extreme right wing to A. Daens.

[15] C. Cardolle, Un précurseur, un docteur, un pionnier social: Msgr. Pottier (Brussels 1951).

[16] M. P. Fogarty, op. cit., 364.

Leo XIII in 1895 refused to receive Abbé Daens, and in a conversation with Duc d'Ursel, the cousin of Albert de Mun,[20] he is supposed to have said: "Quant à Daens, c'est fini, et s'il recommence, je le frappe."[21] But the ultraconservative Charles Woeste also was by no means persona grata. However, the Pope's chances of alleviating the extremes within Catholicism were even more limited in France than in Belgium. The Conservatives were in power and had the financial means, which the bishops used for ecclesiastical projects and did not intend to relinquish. This situation intensified critically in 1898 when A. Verhaegen implored the Church in Rome to authorize a political oath.[22] There he encountered the opposition of Woeste, but also the benevolence of Rampolla, who mediated his audience with the Pope. Leo XIII promised to send a letter on behalf of Verhaegen to the Belgian episcopate. But while Cardinal Goossens and the bishops again assured the Ligue Démocratique of their friendly disposition, they did not want to risk a public congress for the purpose of unification. As in the case of Abbé Daens, the Belgian episcopate in view of these tensions was chiefly interested in preserving the unity of the Parti Catholique and its majority in Parliament.

---

[17] Schmidlin, PG II, 439f; M. P. Fogarty, op. cit., 345f.

[18] M. P. Fogarty, op. cit., 345.

[19] H. Haag, op. cit., 297; for an objective view of the hearing by the Inquisition, see R. Reszohazy, op. cit., 223f., 231f., 239ff; 261–68, about the League's relations to the "Daensistes"; 279–85, about the decline of the movement (Abbé Daens submitted to his bishop).

[20] Cf. chap. 12, n. 45.

[21] According to C. Woeste in his memoirs, quoted in R. Reszohazy, op. cit., 240.

[22] R. Reszohazy, op. cit., 286–90.

The social differences within Belgian Catholicism were difficult to overcome because, in contrast to comparable parties in other countries, the Catholic party had the clear majority and external forces of integration were lacking. In 1905 a majority of Christian-Social and Socialist deputies carried through the Sunday-rest law in spite of the opposition by the Catholic chief of the cabinet, M. de Smet de Naeyer;[23] and in 1907 the government was defeated in the question of the eight-hour day for miners, which enraged the middle-class Catholic press.[24] Professor Helleputte, whose position in the Ligue Démocratique had been questionable, now joined the young conservative cabinet of de Trooz.[25] But Secretary of State Cardinal Merry del Val's influence provided new complications, which lasted until 1914. Verspeyen, editor of the Bien Public, received papal commendation in 1910. But the Conservatives were disappointed by Pius X, because the Pope had respected the independence of the league, provided, to be sure, that it would follow the directives of the bishops. While most of them remained reserved, Désiré Mercier favored the Christian Democrats, so that they were able to score a victory over Woeste at the Congress of Mechelen in 1904.

The Catholic societies developed slowly under the dominance of the Parti Catholique, which seemed to offer security for the Church. In 1903 the Association de la Jeunesse belge was founded in Louvain. At first it was a loose group, whose goals were not particularly directed toward the youth. A change was effected by young Abbé A. Brohée, a student of Cardinal Mercier. He sharply separated religious from political action, and at the congresses of 1911 and 1913 almost no one but young people gathered. The first beginnings of the Jeunesse ouvrière chrétienne, developed by J. Cardijn (1882–1967) in the vicinity of Brussels and itself an appeal to the youth, was interrupted by World War I.[26] In contrast to the societies, religious orders and congregations flourished, especially when the Belgian Congo offered them new tasks. In 1829, 4,791 religious were counted, as compared to 38,140 in 1910.[27] The Jesuits could do their work here undisturbed. The society of the Salvatorians, founded in 1881 by the Alemannian Johann Baptist Jordan and expanding rapidly, also took root in Belgium. A flourishing center of monastic life was the Benedictine priory in Maredsous (abbey since 1878), which Maurus Wolter had founded in 1872 with the help of the Desclée family (entrepreneurs from Tournai). The priory was closely associated with the abbey at Beuron, whose hindrance by the German Kulturkampf forced attention to foreign affairs. Abbot Maurus Wolter of Beuron (since 1875) appointed his brother Placidus abbot of Maredsous and became the instrument of the liturgical inspiration which he had during a sojourn in Solesmes (1862). In 1878 Gérard van Caloen published the first lay missal in Maredsous (Missel des fidèles).[28] At this time, Anselm Schott of Beuron resided in the Belgian abbey. In 1888 the abbey's church was consecrated by a cardinal legate in the presence of Nuncio Ferrata and the entire Belgian episcopate. When Maurus Wolter died (1890) and his brother Placidus succeeded him as archabbot of Beuron, Hildebrand de Hemptinne took over the direction of Maredsous. When he was consecrated abbot by Cardinal San Felice in Montecassino, he was also given a comprehensive papal commission.[29] In the same year, a priory was founded in Steenbrugge (1896, abbey). The priory of Mont-César in Louvain (1890) would later become, next to Maredsous, an important abbey in the Belgian congregation. From here emanated, in 1909, the liturgical movement inspired by Lambert Beauduin. The priory of Saint André in Bruges (1901) is related to the Brazilian congregation.[30]

---

[23] Vaussard, 148.

[24] M. P. Fogarty, op. cit., 345.

[25] R. Reszohazy, 359ff.

[26] R. Aubert, "Organisation et Caractère des mouvements de jeunesse cath. en Belgique," Politica e storia 28 (Rome 1972) especially 275–79, 287f.

[27] M. Dierickx, *LThK*² II, 157.

That the first eucharistic congress did not take place in Belgium was due to reservations Cardinal Dechamps had during the Frère-Orban government. But after the third congress, which took place in Liège in 1883, where E. Marie Tamisier had a protector in Bishop Doutreloux, Belgium and France became the main areas of this movement (after Antwerp, Brussels was the city where the congress took place in 1898 under Cardinal Goossens).[31]

The Catholic University of Louvain enjoyed the special benevolence of Leo XIII[32] and had a financial patron in Cardinal Goossens. In 1882, Désiré Mercier, who had studied theology there, became the first professor to hold the chair for Thomistic philosophy which had been established upon the Pope's request, and after the ontological crisis he inaugurated a new phase in the history of the institution, which, after 1899, under its president Monsignor Abbeloos, gained great significance in historical and biological studies as well. Between 1890 and 1905, the theological faculty received acclaim especially in the fields of biblical research and patristics.[33] As archbishop of Mechelen (cardinal, 1907), Mercier determined the ecclesiastical situation in Belgium on the basis of a neoscholastic interpretation of society. In 1909, Pius expressly praised the University of Louvain.

---

[28] W. Trapp, Vorgeschichte und Ursprung der liturgischen Bewegung (Regensburg 1940), 363; in 1884, van Caloen founded the periodical Messager des fidèles, since 1890 Revue bénédictine; cf. chap. 16.

[29] Cf. chap. 17.

[30] P. Weißenberger gives information about the development of the order in the form of excerpts from documents, Das benediktinische Mönchtum im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert (Beuron 1953).

[31] Cf. chap. 16.

[32] Schmidlin, PG II, 440 with documentation.

In spite of all this, an increasing de-Christianization of life in Belgium cannot be overlooked, even in rural areas, but mainly in the industrial regions, where only a few churches were built in the workers' quarters. Not only did the attendance of Sunday services decrease, but even birth, marriage, and death were often no longer included in ecclesiastical life.[34]

Amidst the mostly decadent spiritual literature of these decades, the poetry of the Flemish priest and poet Guido Gezelle (1830–90) shone like a star. Filled with the intimate experience of nature and an original religiosity, Gezelle broke with all conventions and kept aloof from all fashionable styles. It is significant that the poetic genius of Gezelle was only appreciated rather late.[35]

The Netherlands

Catholicism in the Netherlands, after the area's separation from Belgium, constituted a sizable minority of nearly 40 percent. The liberal circumstances permitted the development of religious orders and schools, and in the forties the establishment of a press. Next to these ecclesiastical issues, economic considerations were decisive for the coalition with the Liberals. The leading ranks of Dutch Catholicism were comprised of men from business and trade. Thus the Catholics had a remarkable share in the success of the Liberals under the leadership of Thorbecke and in the state's basic law of 18 September 1848, which fundamentally strengthened the power of Parliament and ended the [33] Cf. chaps. 21 and 23.—R. Aubert, Le grand tournant de la faculté de théologie de Louvain à la veille de 1900: Mélanges offerts à M.-D. Chenu (Paris 1967), 73–109.—About Mercier, 324f.

---

[34] Around 1910, 23 percent of the children in Seraing near Liège were not baptized, 46 percent of the marriages were only performed in civil ceremonies, and 64 percent of the funerals took place without a priest—an extreme case, but it shows the trend of the workers' alienation from the Church.

[35] A. Vermeylen, De Vlaamse letteren van Gezelle to heden (^{4}1949); Joris Taels, Lexikon der Weltliteratur I (Freiburg i. Br. 1960), 655.

Calvinistic character of the Netherlands. The Catholics profited from the freedom of association in all areas of life. In the Netherlands, as elsewhere, the question of schools was the key issue in the relationship of Catholics to modern society. As an alternative to the Calvinistic parochial school, a group of Catholic politicians endorsed the school law of 1857, which indicated a radical ideological neutralization. However, this resulted in the verzuiling,[36] which characterized Dutch society, because of a-Christian, even atheistic beliefs developing within liberalism, and because of the Calvinistic and Catholic orthodoxy's joint opposition. A letter drafted by both in 1868 requested the increase of free Catholic schools.

Shortly before the school conflict in Belgium, the left-liberal Kappeyne government enacted a law which was emphatically and successfully opposed by the Reformed clergyman Abraham Kuyper (he gathered 470,000 signatures).[37] In 1888, as leader of the Anti-Revolutionary Party, he established connections with the Catholic priest H. J. M. Schaepman (1844–1903), who had been voted into Parliament in 1880. The Kappeyne government was overthrown. This conservative coalition, rather than Leo XIII's[38] admonition directed toward the Dutch Catholics in April 1888, effected the school law of 1889, which placed the principle of free schools on a realistic foundation: free schools would receive state support and, after 1920, unconditional equality. The church-minded Protestants and Catholics, who were in agreement over the necessity of parochial schools, constituted a political cooperation which repeatedly resulted in formations of government. In 1896, Monsignor Schaepman founded the Katholieke Staatspartij, which developed into an exceedingly powerful factor in Dutch politics. Leo XIII made use of the now strong and pro-Rome Catholicism of the Netherlands for his fight in Italy (letter to the episcopate of 24 September 1895). His relations with the royal court were friendly, and neither the widowed Queen nor Leo are to blame for the failure to invite the Pope to the first general peace conference, which took place in The Hague in 1899 and was opposed by Italy.

Since industrialization, at that time, was much slower than in Belgium and socialism did not play as important a role there, social Catholicism lagged behind for a long time. This was not Monsignor Schaepman's fault, who had indeed recognized this growing problem, but the fault of the lobby within his party.[39] The occasion which led to the founding of the Catholic People's Union by W. J. Pastoors, later deputy to the Parliament, was trivial: the Catholic workers and the lower middle class were angered by the high price of tickets which the wealthy prominent Catholics had charged in 1888 for the celebrations in Amsterdam of the tenth anniversary of Leo's pontificate.[40] That same year the Catholic social priest A. Ariens organized a workers' league in the textile city of Enschede, whose goals were religious education, social gatherings, and financial assistance through a relief fund. The Socialist propaganda prompted him by means of a strike (1890) to transform the league into a denominational union. His alliance with the Protestant group of 1895 seemed to be the beginning of an interdenominational Christian union in the Netherlands, and for several years the union, with its joint executive board and treasury, had considerable success. But the denominational party structure as well as the ecclesiastical opposition, especially of the Catholic episcopate,[41] gave this attempt no chance. In 1895, a congress of the Catholic workers' movement combined forty-nine Catholic unions which had emerged locally since 1891. In 1910 Monsignor H. Poels, an exegete who had just returned from Washington, founded a Catholic workers' union in Limburg, a city which had recently been discovered by industry. Thanks to Poels, de-Christianization of the workers did not proceed as quickly in the Netherlands as in other countries.

---

[36] F. Petri, op. cit., 482–86.

[37] F. Petri, op. cit., 482f.; J. T. de Visser, Kerk en Staat III (1927), 387–479.

[38] Schmidlin, PG II, 486.

[39] M. P. Fogarty, op. cit., 348f.; Verluis, Beknopte Geschiedenis van de Katholieke Arbeidersbeweging (1949).

Compulsory elementary education was not enacted until 1900, which was partly due to the opposition of the conservative parties and their press, from which Monsignor Schaepman was completely isolated. In 1905, parochial high schools also received state subsidies.

Dutch Catholicism retained its conservative hallmark (developed since the middle of the nineteenth century) far beyond World War I. The Catholic Convention in Utrecht in 1889, where H. van de Wetering was archbishop from 1882 until 1928, strengthened the religious self-identity in connection with the political victory, which was little touched by the problems of the era. The awareness of unconditional dependence on the papacy increased during the pontificate of Pius X, who established a regular hierarchy in the Netherlands in 1908. The Maasbode represented an extreme integralism, and Pius X found himself able to praise the Dutch episcopate when, thanks to its alertness, the "modernistic plague" did not find a stronghold there. The Catholic University of Nijmegen, founded in 1923, is historically rooted in the educational system which was created by H. Moller at the beginning of the century. Its spiritual open-mindedness was along the lines of the publication Van onzen tijd, which had been founded by laymen, especially by the Klarenbeekse Club.

---

[40] M. P. Fogarty, op. cit., 218f.

[41] The "union struggle" in Germany was also carried across the border. In view of the directive of the Dutch episcopate which stated that it was only permissible to join Catholic unions, a Catholic union leader from Germany said at a conference in the Netherlands in 1908: "With all due respect for our spiritual fathers, the bishops, we must say: this far, but no farther" (quoted in M. P. Fogarty, 225; cf. P. H. Winkelmann in S. H. School [ed.], 150 ans de mouvement ouvrier chrétien en Europe de l'Ouest [Paris, Bonn 1966]).

In the history of the Catholic Church, the Netherlands enjoyed the reputation of being, at that time, a haven for the persecuted, who were of a different persuasion than those during the time of the Enlightenment. Arnold Janssen, born in the Lower Rhine area, founded the Societas Verbi Divini (Society of the Divine Word), which was to grow into the most important missionary institute. With the approval of Bishop J. A. Paredis of Roermond and Archbishop A. J. Schaepman of Utrecht, he transferred the institute across the Dutch-German border to Steijl (1874).[42] The Jesuits, who were absolutely forbidden in Germany from the conclusion of the Kulturkampf until 1904 and officially forbidden in Switzerland until just recently, could work in the Netherlands and Belgium without interference, and therefore they transferred their exile college in Ditton Hall, England, to Valkenswaard in 1894. The same year, during the Catholic Convention in Cologne, Schaepman praised Dutch liberty.[43]

Luxemburg

The Concordat of 1801 made Luxemburg part of the bishopric of Metz; but after its promotion to grand-duchy in union with the Netherlands in 1815, it was assigned to the bishopric of Namur (1823). Following the Belgian revolution, it lost its position as a diocese because King Willem I of the Netherlands did not want to divide Namur. Following a provisionary arrangement for the city of Luxemburg and after the surrender of the Walloon area to Belgium (1839), the rest of the country became an independent apostolic vicariate (1840). The appropriate desire to promote Luxemburg to a bishopric, which Willem II favored on account of the concession for free papal appointments, failed because the proposals of the concordat were not sanctioned by Rome.[44] Pius IX's unilateral move of 27 September 1870 encountered the opposition of the Luxemburg State Council. Not until 23 June 1873 was the establishment of a bishopric ratified through a royal grand-ducal resolution by Willem III. Vicar Apostolic N. Adames was the first bishop of Luxemburg (1870–83).[45] The school law of 1881 suspended the inspection in which the clergy participated, as well as the right of the local priest to supervise the teacher, and it authorized community commissions, including a priest, to supervise the schools. This law, which was revised in 1898 in favor of the Church, demonstrated the delayed development in Luxemburg. But the law of 1912, which Bishop J. J. Koppes (1883–1918) opposed, though it did respect the Christian faith, caused the separation of school and Church. Consequently, religious instruction was administered outside of the school.[46] According to the example of the neighboring countries, the Catholic organizations now developed.

---

[42] Chap. 17; see also J. M. Gijsen, Joh. Aug. Paredis 1795–1886 (Assen 1968).

[43] Kißling, Katholikentage II, 267.

[44] E. Donckel, op. cit., 132–34, 136f., 161f.

The desired course of the interdenominational Christian union in Luxemburg did not succeed. During World War I, however, the workers left the weak specialized sections of the workers' societies and joined neutral associations, which is why in 1920 independent but denominational Christian unions were founded.[47] The development of the iron industry in the region of Esch caused an increase in the membership of the Social Democratic Party, founded in 1900. The ecclesiastical alienation of large segments of the population was due less to the relatively moderate Luxemburg Liberals of the eighties than to the Socialists. But Luxemburg did not lose its Catholic character.

ARTICLE 26 of the Constitution of 1848 resolved that the religious societies needed a legal license. But the regulation was usually interpreted amicably, so that, during the Kulturkampf in Germany and in the wake of the laws of 1901 and 1904 in France, the faithful could find refuge in Luxemburg.

---

[45] E. Donckel, op. cit., 157–60, 165f.

[46] E. Donckel, 149, 170f., 194. The amendment of the law of 1921 caused the reintroduction of religious instruction in the schools (ibid., 173). About the law of 1912, see Schmidlin, PG III, 85.

[47] E. Donckel, 185f.

CHAPTER 8

The Church of the Iberian World between Revolution and Reaction

Spain

The leading ranks of Catholicism in Spain were preoccupied with waging war against each other, in spite of Leo XIII's constant admonitions. The descendents of the "Apostolic Party" and the Carlists, such as the journalist Nocedal in his Siglo futuro or the publication Ciencia Cris- tiana, charged the liberal conservative Catholics with betrayal of the faith. In 1881, under the aegis of Cardinal Moreno of Toledo, a national pilgrimage to Rome with many committees was organized. It was to serve as a demonstration of their own power rather than of their loyalty to the successor of Saint Peter. This caused Secretary of State Jacobini, on 13 February 1878, to request purely diocesan groups of pilgrims.[1] The rather reform-oriented Partido Socialista Obrero Español, founded in 1878 under the leadership of Pablo Iglesias, was not adequately assessed by the belligerents, at least not at first; but it flourished. So did the violent anarchism which had sympathizers and disciples especially among the totally impoverished farm hands on the large latifundia in Andalusia and in Catalonia. There were numerous assassinations and terrorism. The activities reached a climax on 7 June 1896 in Barcelona when, during a Corpus Christi procession, a bomb killed six people and seriously wounded forty-two.[2]

An indirect victim of this incident was a politician who, after the brief First Republic in Spain (1873–74), had restored the Bourbon Monarchy under Alphonso XII and given the period of restoration (1875–1902) its political and spiritual character: Antonio Cánovas del Castillo. He was murdered in 1897 for the tough trial regarding the assassination in Barcelona. Cánovas[3] was the representative of the liberal-conservative line, which was so passionately combatted by the intransigents. This was in agreement with the constitution of 1876, which recognized the basic laws and consequently endeavored to include the Liberals. In reference to religion, the constitution contained a compromise between the Catholic state religion and the freedom of religion, but in spite of this and despite the significant ecclesiastical rights regarding education, Pius IX and the Spanish clergy rejected it.[4] The governments between 1875 and 1902 were alternately formed by Cánovas's party and by the monarchal Liberals under the leadership of Sagasta. The censorship of books was either introduced or abolished, depending on the government. But both parties had their political base in the Bourbon monarchy and in the representative constitution.

---

[1] Schmidlin, PG II, 442; only the pilgrimages from Toledo and Saragossa took place.

[2] R. Konezke, Europäische Geschichte, 512. Concerning the failure of the Spanish hierarchy and the greater part of the clergy in the social question, see J. N. Moody, Church and Society (New York 1953), 721–807. The words of a Catalan poet are characteristic for the attitude of sympathetic intellectuals: "The bomb and blasphemy are the same thing, a destructive expression of rage in the face of the inability to be creative. The angel who wanted to be like God but could not slandered God; whoever hates society and doesn't feel strong enough to change it throws a bomb in the middle of the market place" (J. Vicens Vives, Cataluña en el Siglo XIX [1961], 436; F. Soldevila, Historia de España VIII [1959], 349, quoted according to R. Konetzke, op. cit., 512).

[3] R. Konetzke gives an impressive portrait, op. cit., 505. Cánovas intended a creative restoration which was to lead Spain out of this circulus vitiosus of anticlerical liberalism and reaction to it. He wanted to continue the development of the nation, which he considered the work of divine providence.

[4] ARTICLE 11 of the constitution says: "The Roman Catholic religion is a state religion. The nation is obligated to support the worship and its servants. Nobody on Spanish soil

A serious conflict between Church and state arose in 1899 when, in violation of the law of 1880, numerous members of the orders and congregations from France had immigrated to Spain because of persecution. The question of civil inscription of orders, which were not licensed as was required by the laws of 1867, was solved in 1901 through the conciliatory stance of Secretary of State Rampolla and the Spanish nuncio. The vitality of the Church in Spain during Leo XIII's pontificate was demonstrated by the exceedingly strong development of the female congregations.

The chief theme of Church history during this period in Spain involved the political differences within Catholicism itself. In January 1882, Rampolla occupied the nunciature in Spain, and on 8 December, Leo XIII, in an encyclical, implored the politically divided Spanish Catholics to make religious peace, and requested that they develop Catholic organizations under the direction of the bishops, as was done in other countries. But in 1884 and 1885, Rampolla was exposed to vicious attacks in the press by Nocedal, who could be called a Spanish Veuillot. A minister of the Cánovas government had given a speech in Parliament about the temporal sovereignty of the Pope, which complicated relations with the Italian government and upset the Vatican. In this context Nocedal wrote that the nuncio evaluated the circumstances in Spain regarding ecclesiastical conditions much too optimistically instead of fighting the entire system of Cánovas, including the constitution of 1876. The controversy became a matter of principle when Nocedal characterized the function of the nuncio as a purely diplomatic one, which required his subordination to the episcopate in questions pertaining to the domestic affairs of the Spanish Church. Bishop Casas of Plasencia had written a strongly worded pastoral letter. In a note of April 1885 to Nuncio Rampolla, Secretary of State Jacobini termed Nocedal's ideas Febronianism and declared, in reference to the constitution Pastor aeternus, that the Pope had the right to interfere at any time in the affairs of the bishoprics, even through the nuncios whose competence he alone determined.[5] In the case of Bishop Casas, Ram-will be molested because of his religious belief or his corresponding form of worship, provided the Christian morals are being respected. However, no other public ceremonies nor demonstrations other than those of the state religion are allowed."

---

[5] ASS XVII, 561ff. "Is it true that the Pope delegates to his legate only purely diplomatic missions without any authority over the shepherds and faithful of those states to polla also received the desired letter from Jacobini, in which the bishop was reprimanded for disturbing the internal peace of the Church.

Around this time, it was Leo XIII's general intent to prevent the formation of exclusively Catholic parties. He became increasingly reserved toward the Unión Católica, led by Alejandro Pidal, which he had still recommended in 1881, because he wanted to be considerate of the Carlists whom Pidal had failed to win for his union. In their press, the Carlists waged a venomous war against the Unión Católica because they did not regard it as sufficiently Catholic, since it recognized the Bourbon Kingdom.[6] The Pope's support of the Unión Católica could have only increased the tensions in Spanish Catholicism. Leo XIII brought his authority with the Spanish episcopate to bear in order to prevent the Carlists from acting up after the death of Alphonso XII (26 November 1885) and to assure the reign of the widowed Queen María Cristina.[7] In March 1887, a minister spoke in Parliament about the great respect of the Spanish people for Leo XIII, who had secured the peace between Church and state.

The Pope concentrated his special attention on the internal renovation of the Church, especially on the improvement of clerical education, which was to be handled by the following metropolitan seminaries: Toledo, Tarragona, Seville, Valencia, Granada, Burgos, Valladolid, Santiago de Compostela, Saragossa. The Jesuit seminary in Salamanca was authorized to award doctorates. The University of Comillas (near Santander) was established in 1890 as a papal institute and gained influence in Latin America.[8] In 1892, the "Spanish College" was opened in Rome.

After Rampolla's appointment as secretary of state (1887), the conflicts within Spanish Catholicism increased considerably. In 1889, the Pope had reason to write to the bishop of Madrid, the cardinal of Saragossa, and the bishop of Urgel; and he urged the Revista popular to end its polemics. The great pilgrimage to Rome in 1894 was tarnished by the previous Carlist disturbances in Seville, which caused vehement which they are assigned? Should we admit that the Holy Father delegates his nuncios in the same manner ministers and representatives of the state are delegated by their government? Rather, the appropriate directives and official orders show that the apostolic nuncios have not only a diplomatic mission, but also an authoritative mission regarding the faithful and ecclesiastical affairs" (U. Stutz, op. cit., 56; Schmidlin, PG II, 443).

---

[6] R. Konetzke, op. cit., 506; cf. Schmidlin, PG II, 442, n. 6.

[7] The Pope sent her the "Golden Rose" and became the godfather of Alphonso, born 10 May 1886 (later Alphonso XIII). Rampolla performed the baptism (Schmidlin, PG II, 443f.).

[8] The theological revival becomes apparent around the turn of the century in the establishment of publications: 1899: Ciudad de Dios, 1901: Razón y Fé, 1907: Estudios franciscanos, 1910: Ciencia tomista.

discussions in the press and in Parliament. In spite of the intransigent ecclesiastical attitude of the Carlists, the Pope refrained from taking sides and asked the Spanish pilgrims to accept the constitution of 1876 and to devote themselves to religious and cultural tasks.[9]

There was no lack of the kind of tasks the Pope had spoken of. In 1887, 81.16 percent of the Spanish population was illiterate. (1900: 71.43 percent). The negligence of the state and the communities was not compensated for by the efforts of the Church. The initiative emanated from the liberal philosopher of law Francisco Giner de los Ríos of Madrid (1839–1915), who rejected any kind of political agitation. But his Institucíon Libre de Enseñanza (since 1876) had developed a small but tremendously effective school complex, in which the liberal intelligentsia was nurtured.[10] The outstanding representative of ecclesiastical Catholicism at that time was a professor of literary history in Madrid, Marcelino Menéndez y Pelayo (1856–1912). In rediscovering the Siglo de Oro, he wanted to overcome the contemporary controversies within Catholicism, which were paralyzed with clichés, and he intended to resurrect the great traditions of Spain. In his speech commemorating Calderon, he recalled the great ideals of Spanish history: the Catholic faith, the Spanish monarchy, the Latin race, and Iberian liberty.[11] In his Historia de los heterodoxos españoles (1881), he wanted to present a sharp critique of all the spiritual phenomena which endangered Spain's tradition. He refrained from actual disputations because he relied on a creative restoration which would speak for itself. In his later work, Historia de las ideas estéticas, he attempted a Christian interpretation of Hegel.

The defeat of Spain in the war with the United States in 1898[12] meant the political and intellectual end of the restoration period which was passionately criticized by the "generation of 98." But a figure like

---

[9] Schmidlin, PG II, 444f.

[10] R. Konetzke, op. cit., 514, with biblio. (p. 526). Combining a high school with an elementary preparatory school, vocational training (towards a vocational school), and excursions shows the influence of Friedrich Fröbel's pedagogy. Such schools were also founded in other Spanish cities.

[11] La conciencia española (Madrid 1948), 9f.; Obras completas, 65 vols. (Madrid 1941–62); J. F. Pastór, op. cit., 41–45.

[12] Cuba's War of Independence had already begun in 1868 and was interrupted in 1878 by concessions to the Liberals. The conflicts increased because the conservative landed proprietors hesitated to realize the concessions and the Liberals began demanding absolute autonomy. The rebels operated from the United States, which intervened on 24 January 1898 (claiming an obligation to protect its citizens in Cuba). President McKinley wanted to avoid war, but the Congress insisted. After war had broken out, Archbishop Ireland established contact with the president by order of the Pope, but his attempts were in vain (Schmidlin, PG II, 445). The destruction of the Spanish fleet occurred in July.

Miguel de Unamuno (1864–1936) makes clear the complexity of the new spiritual development then breaking through which cannot be imagined without Spanish Catholicism.[13] However, the fanatical integralism of the Siglo futuro continued to live, and Cardinal Sancha y Hervas of Toledo was accused of liberalism because of his counsel urging internal peace. Consequently, he had to ask for the Pope's protection, who, on 22 August, clearly reprimanded those people who wanted to determine autocratically who was Catholic and who was not. Leo XIII witnessed the enthronement of sixteen-year-old King Alphonso XIII on 17 May 1902 and he had reasons to worry about Spain's future. During Pius X's pontificate, the internal controversies within Catholicism continued. The Jesuits had supported the integralistic line of Nocedal until Leo XIII intervened through the general of the order. But when the Jesuits, in their publication Razón y Fé (since 1901), endorsed some sort of probabilism in the election of the deputies, they were defended by the Pope against the intransigent Conservatives.

It was not surprising that the encyclical Rerum novarum (1891) encountered little interest in Spain. The Círculos Católicos Obreros, which copied the institutions founded by Albert de Mun in France and were promoted after 1876 by Bishop Ceferino Gonzáles of Córdoba, developed very slowly. Another single-handed effort was made by Antonio Vicent, S.J. At the Church Congress of Tarragona in 1894, the encyclical was on the agenda, among other things; and in 1895, the Consejo Nacional de las Corporaciones Obrero-Católicas, the central organization of the worker societies was formed. Its lack of efficiency has to be judged in view of the fact that the interest for social problems was rather slim in all parties down to the leftist Liberals; the strongest interest existed in Cánovas's party. Around 1900, only about 30 percent of the population belonged to the industrial complex of the Spanish economy.[14] But it was especially devastating that the agrarian production did not correspond to the increase of the population, which was negligible compared to other countries. The ruling class knew, without admitting it, that the anarchistic assassinations were by no means singular incidents. This is proven by the fact that there was hesitation in publishing the result of an investigation by the workers in 1884.[15] This made it even more necessary for the Church to get involved. But, to Leo XIII's sorrow the interests of the Church were almost completely absorbed by the differences within the ruling ranks. The de-Christianization in the middle class, increasing since the sixties, began to extend into the industrial world. The bombing attack during the Corpus Christi procession in Barcelona in 1896 had only been a prologue. The great crises of the twentieth century drew closer.[16] In the left wing of the dividing parties appeared the group of Alejandro Levroux, who, in the name of the Republic, proclaimed the now fashionable version of "Écrasez l'infâme!" and incited his jóvenes bárbaros to act.[17] Thirteen years after the strike against the Corpus Christi procession, the masses of workers of Barcelona burnt seventeen churches, twenty-three monasteries, sixteen parochial schools, and four asylums. They brutally shot monks and nuns who tried to flee through a city blocked with street barricades and desecrated their bodies.[18] The uprising of July 1909, following a general strike, was suppressed by the military forces dispatched from Valencia and Madrid. The repeated call for a dictatorship became louder and louder.

---

[13] F. Niedermayer, "Two Spains?", Saeculum 3 (1952), 444–76; also: H. Jeschke, see bibliography.

[14] In the Basque provinces, iron ore was mined and mostly exported, but it was also smelted, using coal from England and later from Asturias, and it became the basis for a shipbuilding industry. A strong textile industry developed in Catalonia (R. Konetzke, op. cit., 508).

[15] J. M. Jóvez, Conciencia obrera y conciencia burguesa en la España contemporánea (Madrid 1952).

In the years following 1902, ecclesiastical policies of the alternately conservative or left-liberal governments were concerned with the question of admitting or limiting the religious communities, a question which was intensified by the return of Spanish missionaries from Cuba and the Philippines. The overthrow of the liberal government made possible the Convention of 1908, which was followed by the creation of a Vatican-Spanish commission, under the chairmanship of the archbishop of Toledo, empowered to investigate the monastery and school question. The conflict came to a head again when J. Canalejas (murdered in 1912) prohibited the founding of religious orders for the next two years, abolished the religious vow in December 1910, limited religious instruction in public schools, and recalled the ambassador to the Vatican. During the Eucharistic Congress in Madrid in 1911, King Alphonso XIII consecrated the Spanish people to the Sacred Heart. By this act and by its festive repetition in 1919, he won the Carlists for the Bourbon monarchy. The Asociación Católica de propagandistas, founded in 1909 by the young Jesuit Ángel Ayala, gained great significance during the time between the two world wars.

---

[16] E. Comín Colomer, Historia del anarquismo español, 2 vols. (Madrid 1956).

[17] "The barbaric youth of today plunder and murder the decadent and miserable civilization of this country, they destroy its temples, they put an end to its gods . . . . There is nothing sacred on this earth. The people are slaves of the Church. The Church should be destroyed." (R. Konetzke, op. cit., 528)

[18] R. Konetzke, op. cit., 529.

Portugal

The often noted parallel between Spain's and Portugal's development continued into the last third of the nineteenth century, but in the beginning of the twentieth century remarkable differences developed. The agreement of 1848 between state and Church could essentially be preserved and was hardly impaired by the alternation of the two monarchal parties heading the government of the apolitical King Luis I (1861–89); the conservative Regeneradores and the Progresistas. The economic difficulties of the sixties under the conservative ministry of Antonio María de Fontes (1871–77) were turned into a brilliant recovery. The exhaustive negotiations between the Vatican and Lisbon under the liberal government of Braacamp (1879–81) resulted in a new circumscription of the dioceses through the papal constitution of 30 September 1881: the seventeen dioceses were reduced to three archbishoprics (Lisbon, Evora, and Braga) with nine suffragans. At the end of another conservative government came the new convention of 7 August 1886 regarding the rights of royal patronage in the Indian missions.[19] At the University of Coimbra, having been anticlerical since Pombal, the theology faculty renounced Church supervision in 1885, solidly supported by the other faculties.

In the last decade of the century, Portugal's crisis began in spite of the political wisdom of King Carlos I, who refrained from visiting King Umberto I in 1895 because, as Rampolla had indicated, it would be against the Pope's wishes.[20] The crisis was partly due to public debts (bank crisis) and partly to the erosion of the two-party system and the resulting power of the radical forces. The liberal-conservative ministry of Hintze Ribeiro decreed in 1901 that the clerical societies be limited to those which were devoted to teaching, charity, and mission in the colonies. Leo XIII had opened a Portuguese College in Rome in 1900. In a brief of Easter 1902 addressed to Cardinal Neto of Lisbon, he praised the episcopate for having sent an address to the King concerning the religious orders' legislation. Carlos I and the Crown Prince fell victim to an assassination on 1 February 1908. This was the actual end of the Portuguese representative system. In the land of Marquis de Pombal, all radical forces had gathered around the Republican party, founded in 1876. Its partners were the Freemason lodge Gran Oriente Lusitano Unido (formed from scattered groups in 1869) and the violent Carboneria. While revolutionary groups were organizing in the underground, willing to lay their lives on the line, Portuguese Catholicism had spiritually collapsed despite its membership in the rural areas. Shortly before the revolution, one deputy in the House of Representatives declared: "On the one hand, we have the Jesuits, the clergy and even the Parliament. On the other hand, we have the liberal people, and they have to employ all means available."[21]

---

[19] Schmidlin, PG II, 447; cf. part III.

[20] Schmidlin, PG II, 448.

The Republic, proclaimed on 5 October 1910, experienced terrorist acts against the churches and monasteries, robberies, arson, and murder (as it had during the Spanish uprising in 1909).

The minister of justice declared: "Within two generations, Portugal will have eliminated Catholicism totally."[22] The law of 20 April 1911, following the French model, carried out the separation of Church and state. The bishop of Oporto, Antonio Barroso, was arrested because of a pastoral letter; the archbishops of Lisbon and Braga, the bishops of Portalegre and Lamego were expelled. The constitution of 21 August 1911 limited the freedom of religion and suspended religious instruction.[23] On 24 May 1911 Pius X sharply condemned the separation law in an encyclical to the Portuguese episcopate. The regime favored compliant clergymen and excluded the young priests who had been educated in the Portuguese College in Rome. After the tensions in the Sidonio Paes government had eased somewhat, Pius X recommended to the Catholics the recognition of the Republic. In 1913, the papal nuncio was expelled. Portugal's long internal turbulence ended with the Conservatives' coup d'état in 1918, resulting in the dictatorship of General Carmona (resumption of diplomatic relations to the Vatican).

Latin America

The Collegio Pio latino-americano, founded in 1858 in Rome, was not very successful in changing the religious situation in Latin America. To be sure, the orders and congregations tried to strengthen their establishments with immigrants from Europe or with new foundations.[24] They wanted to ease the chronic and extreme lack of priests, which was a result of earlier negligence in training the native clergy and had been intensified drastically by the expulsion of the Jesuits and subsequent revolutionary occurrences, especially since the clergy was concentrated in the cities. The population of the South American continent increased from 20 million in 1825 to 65.7 million in 1900. But a religious revitalization could only be expected if the ecclesiastical forces within the Latin American countries themselves were activated. With this insight and after amazingly thorough preparations, Leo XIII convened the Latin American Plenary Council, which met from 28 May until 9 July 1899 in Rome and organized twenty-nine general congregations and nine solemn sessions.[25] Within several years, a comprehensive report of more than one thousand articles had been worked out. It was sent to the Latin American episcopate for comments, which, in turn, were examined by the consultants in Rome. The strongest influence came from the Catalan Capuchin Vives y Tutó (1854–1913), who had endorsed a staunch antiliberalist line in the Curia (since 1884) and was promoted cardinal in 1899.[26] Twelve archbishops and forty-one bishops of the one hundred four Latin American hierarchies came to Rome, which seemed to be the only feasible place for a meeting in view of the political situation (the majority of the prelates had voted for Rome). The welcoming address was given by Cardinal di Pietro. Mariano Soler,[27] since 1897 the first archbishop of Montevideo (the capital of Uruguay), paid tribute to the Holy Father. The chairmanship of the concluding session was given to Archbishop Tovar of Lima (the capital of Peru). The primate of Brazil gave the address in the audience with the Pope on 10 July after the conclusion of the Council. The constitutions of the Council, which included sixteen titles with 998 decrees, were sanctioned by Leo XIII on 1 January 1900. The Council's resolutions dealt with: bishops' conferences and provincial as well as diocesan synods, the canonical conduct of the often undisciplined clergy, the regionally varied pastoral work (especially in reference to the young), the charitable institutions, the dangers to the faith which secular books and newspapers, neutral schools, and the Freemasons represented, and with positivism (which had gained significance in Latin America). The Council also ruled on the principles of relations between Church and state, whereby the full authority of the nuncios in reference to the country's episcopate was emphasized, on the temporal rights of the Church regarding property, and on the claim for ecclesiastical jurisdiction. All these issues had long been the object of public debate in the Latin American states. The decrees were preceded by the consecration to the Sacred Heart and to the Immaculate Conception.

---

[21] J. Pabón, La Revolución Portuguesa, 2 vols. (Lisbon 1941, 1945), I, 82, quoted from R. Konetzke, op. cit., 356.

[22] J. Pabón, op. cit., 131; R. Konetzke, op. cit., 538.

[23] ARTICLE 4 decrees freedom of religion, but it places worship in general "under a special law" in the interest of public order, freedom, and security of the citizens." ARTICLE 10: "Education offered in public and private institutions under state supervision is to be neutral in regard to religion."

[24] Cf. biblio., chap. 17.

Toward the end of Leo XIII's pontificate, the Plenary Council had without doubt touched upon the main ecclesiastical problems in the

---

[25] Schmidlin, PG II, 449f.; see the Council's files above.

[26] His immense knowledge was book knowledge. Concerning his role under Pius X, see p. 390; concerning his contribution to the encyclical Pascendi, see chap. 33, n. 15.

[27] J. M. Vidal, El primer arzobispo de Montevideo, 2 vols. (Montevideo 1935).

Latin American countries. But the structures of society were and continued to be so rigid that the social prerequisites for a fundamental religious renovation were absent, especially since the Christianization of the people had stagnated and the European enlightenment had seduced the intelligentsia. As history proves, it was only natural in such a situation that as a rule the Church had its alliance with the great landholders in the provinces representing the Federalists in contrast to the liberal Centralists in the urban centers. The masses, even the poor white population, remained passive until the end of the nineteenth century, and the Church was unable to activate them because they were either not willing or too weak. For a long time, there was no middle class. Until World War I, there was little social welfare.[28] Even if the Church had acted with less conformism after the secularizations, it would hardly have been in the position to effect a change of circumstances beyond its conventional Christian work of charity.[29] It made no difference in those times whether a regime which favored the Church was in power or not. Nor were the Liberals interested in social questions.

By 1880, Argentina, Chile, and Brazil were the leading Latin American countries, chiefly because of their economic growth,[30] but also thanks to a relationship between Church and state which was essentially peaceful, in spite of repeated tensions. The Argentinian constitution of 1853 remained in force until 1920. It declared the Catholic Church to be the state religion and provided financial compensations for secularizations. It did, however, tolerate other denominations. President Domingo Sarmiento (1868–74), who was greatly interested in improving the backward educational system,[31] opened the country to European influences. After his overthrow and emigration to Chile, the political anticlericalism of the Liberals was strengthened by a minor, but intellectual group.[32] Nevertheless, Leo XIII was able to establish, with the approval of the government, the bishoprics in La Plata, Santa Fé, and Tucumán. Argentina's situation was strongly determined by immigrants: in 1869, 1.8 million inhabitants were counted; from 1874 to 1880, approximately 45,000 people, from 1880 to 1886 approximately

---

[28] E. Samhabera, op. cit. (1949), 93: "There existed a state, but it was a feudal state, ruled by an aristocratic society which had to fulfill certain tasks, but which strictly maintained its position."

[29] Cf. J. N. Moody, Church and Society (New York 1953), 750–807.

[30] Argentina was able to increase its cattle and wheat export in the last third of the century; Chile secured for itself through belligerent means the world monopoly for saltpeter. Brazil, whose population had grown more than the average, was expanding its coffee production continuously.

[31] For a long time, the University of Buenos Aires, founded in 1821, suffered from a lack of students.

[32] C. Bruno, El derecho público de la iglesia en la Argentina, 2 vols. (Buenos Aires 1956).

70,000 people came into the country annually, mostly Italians and Spaniards. At times, in the following period of speculation, 300,000 people immigrated per year. It was difficult to organize proper pastoral work, and the increase of bishoprics (under Pius X three additional ones) was actually a facade. In 1910, a Catholic University was established in Buenos Aires. In the same year, the liberal lawyer and politician Joaquín V. González, founder of the University of La Plata, wrote his book El Juicio del Siglo, in which he analyzed the path the country took from the culture of the Spanish aristocracy via barbarism down to the "return": it emphasized the continuity of hispanidad, transcending anticlericalism.[33]

The ecclesiastical situation in Chile resembled the one in Argentina because it had a similar constitution (1865). Basically tolerant of other religions, Catholicism was still the official religion, even for the regalists, whose belief in regard to the state church law was rooted in the tradition of the patronate's law. During the pontificates of Leo XIII and Pius X, the Chilean ecclesiastical situation was characterized by the fact that the masonic anticlericalism of the Radical-Liberals eased up considerably. An example of such curious alliances is the purely political one of 1890 between the strictly Church-oriented Conservatives and the Radicals. It was aimed at the Liberal José Balmaceda, who was rather authoritarian as president and lost the belligerent conflict in Parliament.

The establishment of the Republic in Brazil by the Radical-Liberals came about peacefully. This can be partly credited to the Pope's diplomacy; he was, however, totally ill-disposed toward Emperor Pedro II (1831–88) and his tolerance of non-Catholic sects.[34] The Pope recognized the Republic and diplomatic relations were resumed. The constitution of 1891 guaranteed the Church freedom and property, but, following the separation law, all financial aid was disallowed. The Brazilian Church now had to rely on its own resources (like the Church in the United States), and it had to centralize the revenues and donations of its diocesan treasuries. Of greatest concern, however, was the augmentation of the clergy, whose number (in 1872 not quite one thousand priests) was especially depressing compared to the rapid growth of the population under Pedro II because of heavy immigration (from approximately 6 to 14 million). The Church was also interested in raising the standards of religious education, which had suffered greatly in the era of rationalism. The Pope favored the settlements of European orders in Brazil, such as those of the Premonstratensians of Averbode in São Paulo and the Benedictines of Maredsous, who strove to renovate the Brazilian congregation of Olinda. In 1894 and 1895, G. van Caloen made visitations, the results of which were discussed in Beuron's mother house in Maredsous. Leo XIII employed his authority to this end (est mea voluntas).[35] In 1899, the Pope appointed van Caloen vicar general to the Brazilian Archabbot Machado[36] with the right of succession for life. From 1892 until 1902, Leo XIII established eight new bishoprics in Brazil. In 1905, Pius X appointed the archbishop of Rio de Janeiro, Arcoverda Cavalcanti, cardinal, the first one in Latin America. The successful foreign minister, Baron Rio Branco, made sure that this honor was recompensed properly. The Republic, again and again shaken by disturbances, sent the Pope a de luxe edition bound in pure gold, with the Pope's signature laid out in precious stones and his portrait framed by ninety diamonds.[37]

---

[33] Cf. quotation in W. v. Schoen, op. cit., 570.

[34] Catholic Church historiography considered Pedro II an "enemy of the Church" (Schmidlin, PG II, 453). The main reason is his action against the two bishops whose attitude toward the directives of Pius IX regarding the question of the Freemasons was just as correct as that of the King toward the constitution. Pedro II, who granted amnesty to the two bishops in the following year, was not a politician, but an important person, and his relation to the Church is hardly any different from that of Joseph II (cf. W. v. Schoen, op. cit., 359f.).

Bolivia was weakened by frequent military revolts and the loss of its coastal province of Atacama to Chile. Only after World War I did it recoup on account of its tin production. Even in the last third of the nineteenth century, the ecclesiastical situation remained unchanged and the Franciscans continued their missionary work among a population which consisted mainly of Indians and half-castes.[38] Though freedom of religion existed in principle, the Catholic Church was the only one supported by the state. Coupled with this support, however, was a large amount of interference, against which the Pope protested in 1906. In Peru, where a papal delegate was allowed to reside in Lima (also responsible for Bolivia and Ecuador), conditions similar to Bolivia prevailed until the turn of the century, when the situation was clouded by the introduction of civil marriage (1898). But in 1899, an agreement with the government concerning three apostolic prefectures was signed. Serious domestic controversies ended under the dictatorship of A. Leguía (1908–12; 1919–30). In 1913, a provincial council met in Lima in order to deal with the devastating shortage of priests.

It is interesting to compare ecclesiastical development in Colombia and Venezuela with that in Ecuador and Guatemala. Colombia was the first Latin American country which instituted a radical separation of Church and state (1853). Since the presidency of R. Núñez (1880), relations with the Church were exceedingly friendly, and, in 1885, diplomatic relations with the Vatican were resumed (General Vélez as ambassador). After the constitution of 1887/88, amended in 1892, the Catholic Church became the official religion and enjoyed independence. Compromises were agreed upon in controversial questions, such as the clergy's civil jurisdiction and the Church's competence in regard to cemeteries. The separation law of 1853, however, was not suspended. In the years from 1880 until 1900, Leo XIII established six new dioceses. Between 1899 and 1902, the country was once again shaken by a violent civil war, resulting in the secession of Panama, supported by the United States, from Colombia. E. Moreno y Díaz played a mediating role between the state and the Church. In 1888 he had come to Colombia from the Philippines as provincial of the Augustinian hermits. From 1895 until 1906, he was bishop of Pasto.[39] After 1904, General Rafael Reyes ruled rather dictatorially. But he is fondly remembered because he removed the consequences of civil war. He demonstrated his good relations to the Catholic Church by constructing a building for the nunciature in Bogotá (1908), where a Eucharistic Congress took place in 1913 under Archbishop Herrera Restrepo.

---

[35] P. Weißenberger, Das benediktinische Mönchtum im 19. u. 20. Jahrhundert (Beuron 1959), 59; cf. chap. 17.

[36] M. E. Scherer, "Domingos Machado—der Restaurator," SM 74 (1964), 7–162.

[37] Described extensively in Schmidlin. PG III, 92.

[38] L. Lemmens, Geschichte der Franziskanermissionen (Munich 1929), 316ff.

Venezuela also experienced the evolution of religious toleration after the regime of Guzmán, who was hostile toward the Church and had expelled Archbishop Guevara from the country in 1870. The activities of the religious orders flourished under his reign; not, however, under the dictatorship of Cipriano (1899–1908), at least not in respect to foreign relations. The seminary which was planned at a bishops' conference in Caracas (1904), was opened in 1913.

The relationship between Church and state fluctuated in Ecuador[40] and Guatemala. Even after the murder of Ecuador's President García Moreno (1875), whose work created what was called a "model Christian state,"[41] the Church continued to be favored under the more or less conservative governments. In 1881, the Concordat of 1862 was revised and Roman Catholicism in its capacity as the state religion was given extraordinary rights, as in regard to the supervision of schools. An additional agreement in 1890 alotted 3 percent of the state's property to the episcopate. In return, Leo XIII promised to use his influence on the bishops during the elections; this was generally the quid pro quo in Latin America, and it was particularly difficult because the appointment of priests was often under the direction of the ruling classes. However, the radical-liberal revolution of 1895, under the government of the otherwise moderate General Eloy Alfaro, produced severe measures against the previously favored Church, confiscating properties and expelling religious orders. After the enactment of civil marriage in 1902, the separation of Church and state was declared official (1904).

---

[39] T. Minguella y Arnedo, Biographie (Barcelona 1909).

[40] J. I. Larrea, La Iglesia y el Estado en el Ecuador (Seville 1954).

[41] Schmidlin, PG II, 451; the effects of the Church situation at that time on the relations between Ecuador and the then anticlerical Colombia are remarkable (W. v. Schoen, op. cit., 456).

The development in the Central American republic of Guatemala proceeded more quickly. Following the presidency of Carrera and Cerna, who were amicable toward the Church and dominated by the Conservatives of the white minority, the Liberals introduced a lay regime with the new constitution of 1879. With prophetic pathos, Archbishop Casanova y Estrada excommunicated President Justo Rufino Barrios, who had confiscated ecclesiastical estates, expelled the Jesuits, forbidden clerical dress in public, and mobilized the Indians and half-castes constituting the great majority of the population.[42] He was exiled in 1887. The subsequent presidents essentially followed the same line. Dictator Estrada Cabrera (1899–1919) built a "Minerva Temple" for state celebrations.

Probably the most extreme changes in the relations between Church and state took place in Mexico. After the failure of the politically respectable program of pure-blooded Indian Benito Juárez[43] the lay laws regarding the separation of Church and state, constitutionally validated by his successor, remained in force. But this separation had rather advantageous effects during the economically successful dictatorship of Porfirio Díaz (1877–81, 1884–1911). The wife of Díaz, Carmelita, who was friendly toward the Church, played an important role. The members of the orders and congregations were allowed to return more or less legally, and in the period between 1880 and 1902 Leo XIII established the bishoprics of Oaxaca, Monterrey, and Durango, as well as eleven bishoprics. It was in accord with the Indian tradition that Leo XIII decreed the consecration of the shrine of Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe in 1886, whose veneration (the name was taken after a Spanish shrine) was never disturbed by political disorders after 1531.[44] In 1896, a provincial council took place. According to the European model, Catholic Congresses were organized in Puebla (1903), Mérida

---

[42] "The so-called Justo Rufino Barrios was expelled from our blessed community. I forbid him from henceforth bearing the name of one of our Roman martyrs. We warn the faithful of any communication with the so-called Justo Rufino Barrios, who was deprived of God's mercy" (W. v. Schoen, op. cit., 419)

[43] R. Roeder, Juárez and His Mexico, 2 vols (New York 1947).

[44] In 1894, the office was expanded; in 1910, she became the patroness of all Latin America; R. V. Ugarte, Historia del Culto de María en Ibero-América I (Madrid ^{3}1956), 190–207.

(1904), Guadalajara (1906), and Oaxaca (1909). Especially remarkable is the Catholic Congress of Tulancingo (1904), during which the social problems of Mexican agriculture were discussed for the first time from a religious perspective. At the Congress of Zamora (Mexico) of 1913, the program of the Confederación Nacional de los Círculos Católicos Obreros was developed, to which Father Alfredo Méndez Medina contributed a great deal. Some of the social principles may have had an influence on the constitution of 1917 which arose from revolutionary chaos. However, ARTICLE 3 contained resolutions regarding the radical laicization of education and ART. 27 the nationalization of Church property.

There are many reasons for the failure of the religious regeneration of Latin America during this period. Without a doubt, the ecclesiastical forces concentrated too much on the relations between Church and state and on the hope of finding protection from the conservative governments, which, when given, was often rather questionable. Unfortunately, it is just as certain that the native clergy was qualitatively and quantitatively too weak, and that help from Europe not only came too late but brought ideas which did not match the Latin American circumstances. It was said that the wives of the politicians of all colors did go to church and that an open belligerence toward religion did not exist until the twentieth century.[45] One may add that Latin American Catholicism is so basic a phenomenon that it is evident even in the non-Christian literature, not to mention the Chilean poet Gabriele Mistral (Lucila Godoy Alcayaga). But this traditional Catholicism was exposed to consistent erosion after the middle of the nineteenth century due to the philosophy of Auguste Comte. Around 1880, positivism was the acknowledged faith of nearly the entire intellectual elite and of a large part of the liberal politicians (though with a different interpretation); it prevailed far beyond the turn of the century. Whoever lifted himself into the educated classes, which expanded considerably in the decades after 1880, would generally go the same route. The revolutions at the beginning of the nineteenth century had been a great disappointment, especially to Simón Bolívar. Now, it was hoped, the breakthrough would proceed past traditional Catholicism and succeed with the help of education.

---

[45] E. Samhaber, op. cit. (1949), 92; similarly in A. Bellesheim, AkathKR 81 (1901), 38: "The unifying factor in this multitude of peoples and states is the higher interests of the Catholic religion, which has remained the faith of the overwhelming majority of the South American states to this day in spite of the destructive efforts of the Freemasons and Liberalism."

CHAPTER 9

Catholic Self-Awareness in the British Empire

England and Scotland

In 1912 England had 1.79 million Catholics and Scotland .54 million, totalling 2.33 million within a population of 40.8 million (not counting Ireland). Around 1878, approximately .35 million Catholics lived in Scotland. Ireland aside (80 percent Catholic including Ulster), the Catholics were a small minority, which was concentrated for a long time in certain areas: in England, in Lancashire, London, and the Midlands; in Scotland, mainly in the vicinity of Glasgow and Edinburgh. After England had been granted an official hierarchy in 1850, Leo XIII, as one of the first acts of his pontificate (4 March 1878), established in Saint Andrews-Edinburgh the Scottish metropolitan see with four suffragans and in Glasgow an archbishopric which was directly responsible to Rome. This division was implemented with consideration for the significance of Irish immigration relative to the English Catholics, who were frequently of Irish descent. This explains why most Catholics were poor. To be sure, there were a large number of wealthy Catholics in England, which increased as a result of the conversion movement, but there was only a small representation in the middle class.

It is due in part to these sociological conditions that growing Catholicism was imprinted with the political genius of Henry Edward Manning rather than with the spirit of John Henry Newman. Manning (born in 1808), was the son of an entrepreneur, an English patriot who was shocked by Newman's conversion in 1845, and a friend of Gladstone, who also could not understand Manning's conversion in 1875.[1] The archbishop of Westminster (1865) was elevated to cardinal in 1875. That Manning was able to smoothly combine his English patriotism with his activism on behalf of Pius IX is, on the one hand, based on the religious tolerance of the Victorian period; on the other hand, it rested on Manning's social involvement which he considered a Christian as well as a national matter. This was facilitated by the fact that in Great Britain only a fool could have conceived of the idea of instituting a Catholic social movement. It was quite natural that Manning appeared as the speaker at the anniversary celebration of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Association in 1884 and that he was a member of the "royal commission for securing better housing for the poor." His main concern was not Catholicism as such, but social problems which were becoming increasingly urgent and had major political relevance in view of the election reforms. Manning, not withstanding his religious motivation, was interested in the matter itself, which can be said of only relatively few Catholics. By no means did he prefer political action to social action;[2] in fact, he refused to combine secular politics with ecclesiastical politics. For Manning, as for his friend William E. Gladstone (1809–98), the great leader of the Liberals, Irish home rule was a matter of both fairness and political prudence. To sacrifice it for the sake of the papal diplomacy of the eighties[3] was just as unthinkable to Manning as the idea of developing the overtures, exchanged during the fiftieth jubilee of Queen Victoria (1887), into diplomatic relations as envisioned by the conservative English Catholics. He had no confidence in missionary work conducted from above. "So far, the world has been ruled by the dynasties. Now it is time for the Holy See to negotiate with the peoples."[4] [1] Gladstone to Wilberforce on 11 April 1851.

---

In close cooperation with Leo XIII, Cardinal Manning resolved the difficulties which regularly occurred in the process of transition from the ecclesiastical structure under the Propaganda Fide to that of an official hierarchy. There were especially tensions between the episcopate and the Benedictine monks as well as the Jesuits, whom Manning disliked. In the constitution of 8 May 1881, pastoral work and the administration of Church property were reserved exclusively to the episcopate. The new Scottish hierarchy organized a plenary council in August 1886. Manning's concept of the spirituality of the secular priesthood,[5] whose activities he protected against the criticism of the religious orders, must be seen in this. Neither theological speculation, one of the elements of tension between him and Newman, nor the isolated priesthood was of interest to Manning. "The clergy are in danger of becoming mere Mass priests and hucksters of sacraments."[6] What he wanted was a simple profile of Catholic basic principles, which were not to be concealed by secondary issues; no useless disputations, but expansive directives for action.

As everywhere else, the educational system was an important issue.

---

[2] Schmidlin, PG II, 488.

[3] Leo XIII's letters to the archbishop of Dublin, Eduard McCabe, of 3 January 1881 (Acta Leonis II, 187–90), to the Irish episcopate of 1 August 1882 (Acta Leonis II, 129–33), to Cardinal McCabe of 1 January 1883 (Acta Leonis III, 187–91), to the Irish episcopate of 24 June 1888 (Acta Leonis VIII, 249–53).

[4] Quoted from K. Buchheim (biblio., chap. 12), 332.

[5] Manning, The Eternal Priesthood (London 1884); also P. Pourrat, La spiritualité chrétienne IV (Paris ^{6}1951), 579ff.

[6] Trapp (Vorgeschichte und Ursprung der liturgischen Bewegung [Regensburg 1940]) quotes from the biography of Purcell, p. 360.

The liberal religious policies of Gladstone, who even in his later years adhered to his Christian persuasion,[7] contained an ambivalent aspect for Catholicism in Great Britain. On the one hand, it was to its advantage that the Anglican Church, which dominated the school system and received public funds for it, began to lose its preeminence. On the other hand, the education law of 1870, which required that public nondenominational schools were to be financed by the state, resulted in the "provided schools" of the state dominating the field (general compulsory education was not introduced until 1880). The parochial private schools decreased, except for the Catholic ones, which dominated in Saint Leonard's on the Sea (Sussex), among other places. There, they were cared for by the Sisters of the Child Jesus, whose society had been organized by Cornelia Connelly[8] upon Nicholas Wiseman's suggestion. But it was not until 1902 that the Catholic schools received state funds (if they followed the general school curriculum).

In Great Britain, there were at least two different ways of dealing with the status of a minority; in fact, there were two sociologically different philosophies of Catholicism facing each other in the ecclesiastical world as it developed in the eighties and in the mentality of those who favored the attempts of an alliance with the Anglican Church (1895).

Wilfrid Ward wrote in his biography of Wiseman that the Catholics and Protestants had become "seemingly different races" in the period before 1829.[9] This is still true, when one considers the annual processions which loudly recited the Rosary as they proceeded from Newgate (East London) to Tyburn (West London), retracing the path which the English martyrs of the time of the Reformation (beatified by Leo XIII in 1886) were forced to march from prison to the place of their execution. Parliament permitted these processions, but for the people of London they were a version of the otherwise familiar nonconformism which belonged to a "different race." In 1887, clergyman Philip Fletcher and lawyer Lister Drummond,[10] two converts, founded The Guild of our Lady of Ransom and gave the society the prayer "Jesus, convert England!" At the procession's destination, the convent of the Sisters of Perpetual Adoration, Cardinal Vaughan founded an educational center for converts (1903). The Society Our Lady of Salvation declined around the turn of the century and was taken over by the Catholic Evidence Guild. The Catholic Truth Society, founded in 1884 by a converted layman, James Britten, was devoted to literary apologetics and, after 1887, set up stands in churches for pamphlets dealing with controversial religious questions, with English Church history, and also with the social question.

---

[7] P. Kluke, op. cit., 276.

[8] J. Bolten, C. Connelly (Munich 1928).

[9] W. Ward, Life and Times of Cardinal Wiseman I (London 1897), 438.

[10] With permission of Cardinal Vaughan he preached in Hyde Park and set an example.

That was the kind of Catholicism in Great Britain which, with great sacrifice, supported the clergy[11] and its schools. It was the Catholicism of the lower classes, much more so than in the United States. This social climate was a determining factor in Cardinal Manning's activities. "The coming age will belong neither to the capitalists nor to the commercial classes, but to the people. The people are yielding to the guidance of reason, even to the guidance of religion. If we can gain their confidence, we can counsel them, if we show them a blind opposition, they will have power to destroy all that is good."[12] What is characteristic in this statement is that Manning was able to see the social problems of the industrial revolution as a universal problem. In 1880 he had already formed a theoretical foundation in The Catholic Church and Modern Society.[13] In this sober analysis, the son of an entrepreneur identified himself with the cause of the industrial worker. This, not esteem for the high priest of the papal Church, is the background for the popular story dealing with the arbitration of the dockworkers' strike which broke out in London on 13 August 1889.[14] In this instance, Manning fulfilled the "duties of citizens and patriots," whose rejection by the Catholics even after 1828 he called "a dereliction of duties in and of itself illegal."[15] The question of denominational or Christian unions was of little importance in Britain, since the trade unions were not oriented toward Marxism.[16]

---

[11] "To contribute to the support of our pastors" is one of the commandments of the English catechism.

[12] Letter to A. de Mun of 25 January 1891, in the new edition of The Dignity and Rights of Labour and other Writings on the Social Questions (London 1934), 68.

[13] His important contribution regarding the position of the industrial worker appeared in London in 1891; in the same year his comment on Rerum novarum: "Leo XIII on the condition of Labour." About Manning's contribution regarding the social theory of Catholicism see chap. 12, n. 58.

[14] Two hundred thousand dock workers were on strike because of their low wages after their moderate demands had been denied by the dock directors. Along with the lord mayor of London and the Anglican bishop, Manning was also a member of the arbitration commission, especially since there were numerous Catholics among the strikers. The compromise which had been negotiated one weekend did not materialize because of deadline difficulties regarding the obtainment of signatures. Consequently, the workers went on strike on Monday. Manning negotiated single-handedly with the strikers and was chosen as their arbitration representative. The strike was of importance because of the masses of unskilled laborers aroused there. John Burns, one of the leaders in the union of highly qualified workers (P. Kluke, op. cit., 287), cooperated well with Cardinal Manning during the arbitration procedures of the strike.

[15] According to E. Taylor, op. cit., 49.

[16] H. A. Clegg and others, History of the British Trade Unions since 1889 I (London 1964).

The membership of Catholic workers was taken for granted. The Catholic Social Guild, founded in 1909 by H. Parkinson,[17] president of Oskott College, and by the Jesuit C. Plater, was devoted to the religious training of workers for the purpose of halting the spreading de-Christianization. Following the model of the Katholischer Volksverein in Germany, "penny-pamphlets" were to be distributed. The beginnings of the Catholic Social Guild were difficult. Five thousand members had been expected, but by 1912 there were only a thousand, though some were group memberships. After 1900 the National Conference of Catholic Trade-Unionists pursued similar goals.

The rest of organizational activity in Great Britain was rather limited, even though it extended over a multiplicity of social groups: 1910, The Catholic Medical Guild, with 200 members; 1911, The Catholic Stage Guild. The Catholic Young Men's Society of Great Britain had 22,000 members in 1912, including the Catholic Boy Scouts. The Catholic Women's League reached a membership of 8,000 in 1912.[18] A very bourgeois-conservative affair was The Catholic Association, founded in 1891 under the presidency of the Earl of Denbigh. It was related to the Catholic Confederation, which appeared in 1910 and was socially more embracing and above partisanship.

It was said that Manning's social activity stands isolated,[19] and that is true to a certain extent, because Catholicism's scholarly exchanges in the social question in Britain were not intensified until after 1900, in conjunction with the political growth of the Socialists.[20] But this has to be placed in the context of general history. Gladstone, who was consumed by the Irish question and in a legal sense favored the development of the trade unions, "was not a social reformer in the strict sense of the word, and the needs of the working class hardly concerned him."[21] Benjamin Disraeli, who is said to have had sympathies for Manning,[22] was a rather unique figure among the Tories for his social sensibilities (the Labour Party was founded in 1900). There was only a small number of Catholics to be found in the upper reaches of society. During the nineteenth century, the following had a seat in the government: Lord Ripon (1870, converted Freemason), in several liberal cabinets until 1909; Lord Llandaff, in the conservative cabinet of Lord Salisbury from 1886 until 1909; and the Duke of Norfolk, mediator of the papal response to the Queen during the jubilee of 1887, in the conservative cabinet of 1894.

---

[17] H. Parkinson, A Primer of Social Science (London 1913).

[18] K. Wanninger, op. cit., 110–30.

[19] "Manning's contribution was unique, for the majority of the older English Catholics were remote from the social struggle and unsympathetic towards the Irish laborers in factory and mine": C. Hollis: J. N. Moody, Church and Society (New York 1953), 822.

[20] Following the outsider E. G. Bagshawe (bishop of Nottingham) with his book Mercy and Justice to the Poor (London 1885); J. Mooney, Catholic Principle of Social Reform (London 1912); H. Parkinson, op. cit.; G. S. Devas, Social Question and the Duty of Catholics (London 1907); id., Political Economy (London 1911); the Catholic Social Yearbook appeared since 1912.

[21] P. Kluke, op. cit., 276.

[22] Cardinal Grandison in his Lothair is supposed to have certain features of Manning. K. Waninger, op. cit., 56.

The Catholicism of the upper classes was somewhat sympathetic toward the English Church Union, an organization founded in 1844 by the Anglo-Catholics within the Anglican Church. Its president (after 1868), Lord Halifax, personally inclined toward the Roman Catholic Church, had met the French Lazarist Fernand Portal, a student of Dupanloup, in 1890 on Madeira. In their correspondence during 1892, they searched for a way to unify the Roman Catholic and the Anglican Church in the near future. A discussion about the validity of Anglican orders was to serve as "a means toward that goal."[23] In July 1892, Halifax paid the archbishop of Westminster a visit in order to present his plan. Herbert Alfred Vaughan (in 1872 bishop of Salford, after March 1892 archbishop of Westminster, after 1893 cardinal) came from an old Catholic aristocratic family. In 1857 he had joined the Ambrosians, a society of the secular clergy, founded under Charles Borromeo, which Manning had introduced in Bayswater the same year. Vaughan differed from Manning and had lifted the prohibition for Catholic students to study in Cambridge and Oxford, which Manning had effected in Rome in 1895.[24] Nevertheless, he was in agreement with his predecessor in terms of ecclesiastical policy and definitely endorsed the doctrine of infallibility in the Tablet, which he purchased in 1866. Compared to Manning, he was less interested in social questions.[25] From the beginning Vaughan made it clear that, in contrast to the Anglicans, the recognition of papal primacy was the decisive element. Portal published Les ordinations anglicanes under a pseudonym in 1893 in Paris, in which he termed the consecration of Matthew Parker (appointed archbishop of Canterbury in 1559 by Elizabeth I) valid in terms of the "historical facts," but expressed doubt concerning the "intentions" of the consecrator. Church historian L. Duchesne used Catholic teaching on the sacraments to argue against this treatment of the question of intention and declared that one could consider the ordination as valid. Since Portal was able to anticipate the Catholics' objections to his arguments concerning the intention, as one would expect from an educated theologian, his essay was termed "a tactical move"[26] to get the discussion going. In 1894, Portal visited Halifax, who introduced him to the Anglican bishops. The archbishop of Canterbury, E. W. Benson, was very cool and just as aware of his convictions as Cardinal Vaughan, who was also annoyed because Portal did not follow up his invitation to visit him.[27] In September 1894, Portal was asked by Cardinal Secretary of State Rampolla to come to Rome and be introduced to the Pope. Portal's suggestion that Leo XIII should propose a conference to the Anglican episcopate was discarded. Instead, Rampolla wrote a letter to Portal, praising his desire for ecclesiastical unity and expressing hopes for "England's return to the only center of unity." Portal's second visit with the archbishop of Canterbury was even cooler than the first one. On 21 March 1895, Lord Halifax had an audience with the Pope, in which he proposed a direct offer (not through Cardinal Vaughan) to the Anglican episcopate, which was graciously noted. But in February, F. A. Gasquet, O.S.B., a Vaughan aide, was given the task of composing a papal letter[28] which was not to be addressed to the Anglican episcopate. Vaughan, who had arrived in Rome in 1895, used all means at his disposal to exert pressure against Portal's intentions. Basically his and Lord Halifax's plan had already failed in view of the apostolic letter Amantissimae voluntatis of 14 April 1895,[29] which was addressed Ad Anglos and urged using the "means" of discussing the ordinations in order to achieve a conference which could initiate the reunification. The letter, recalling Pope Gregory the Great, spoke with restraint about the Reformation ("Anglia . . . gravissimum vulnus accepit . . ., divulsa a communione Apostolicae Sedis, dein ab ea fide sanctissima abducta est"), praised the efforts toward unity of all Christians, and finally granted indulgence in a prayer to the Virgin Mary which was intended for the Fratres dissidentes and asked that they unite summo Pastori, Vicario in Terris Filii tui. The conclusion of the letter was composed by Merry del Val, who, as a young man, had been much favored by Leo XIII.[30] In spite of this conclusion, the letter was generally well received in England; even Benson spoke of an "honest appeal," but noted the important fact that it did not mention the Anglican Church. In the papal commission, appointed in 1896 for the purpose of investigating the question of Anglican orders, Merry del Val played a significant role as secretary to the president, Cardinal Mazzella, and as middleman to Vaughan. The six (later eight) members were selected equally from both parties; the one side was led by Gasquet, the other by Duchesne. However, Cardinal Mazzella, who rejected an application for admission of the Anglicans then present in Rome, and his secretary were definite opponents of the recognition of Anglican orders. The vote took place on 7 May. Voting for recognition were Duchesne and the Jesuit A. M. de Augustinis (professor of dogmatics at the Roman College); Pietro Gasparri (in 1880 professor of canon law at the Institut Catholique in Paris, later cardinal secretary of state) and another member expressed through their vote that the validity of the ordinations was "doubtful". The Vaughan group voted against it. The validity of Anglican orders was rejected in the papal bull Apostolicae curae of 13 September 1896, which was composed by Merry del Val.[31] The expectations of some that the conversions would increase if submission to the authority of the Pope was clearly demanded were not fulfilled. The hopes of others for an impending reunification of the Churches as such was an illusion in view of the contemporary historic situation. Except for the situation of the Anglican Church, oscillating between conservative and liberal tendencies, Wilfrid Ward, a moderate disciple of Vaughan and mediator to Halifax, analyzed the situation in England and Ireland clearly: "Should we be surprised that the descendants of those whose lives were ruined . . . or who died the death of a martyr . . . could muster only little understanding for the argument that their persecutors and judges belonged to a Church which, all in all, was possibly in agreement with them?"[32]

---

[23] J. J. Hughes, Absolutely Null and Utterly Void (London 1968); German: "Absolut Null und Nichtig. Zur Ablehnung der anglikanischen Weihen . . .," Studia Anglicana 2 (Trier 1970), 39.

[24] Not until 1872 did Gladstone abolish the law which made being a member of the Anglican Church a prerequisite for the obtainment of an academic degree. P. Kluke, op. cit., 278.

[25] C. Hollis, op. cit., 823.

---

[26] J. J. Hughes, op. cit., 56.

[27] J. J. Hughes, op. cit., 59f.—One should probably ask why Portal did not request an audience after his invitation by Vaughan was lost.

[28] According to the literary remains of Gasquet. Aso: K. Connelly, "An Unheard-of Thing: An Historical Study of the Apostolical Letter . . ." (unpubl. diss., Louvain 1967); J. J. Hughes, op. cit., 97.—Critical analysis of the historian Gasquet (1900: abbot of Downside, 1907: chairman of the commission to revise the Vulgate, 1914: cardinal): D. Knowles, Cardinal Gasquet as an Historian (London 1957); id., The Historian and Character . . . (Cambridge 1963), 240–63.—Concerning Leo XIII's perspective in this matter, see "The Union's favorite dream of the universal empire with Rome," Schmidlin, PG II, 489.

[29] Acta Leonis XV, 138–55; concerning its development, see J. J. Hughes, op. cit., 97f.

Leo XIII's conciliatory pragmatism was also responsible for the existing illusions, which include the Pope's own on unification. It is interesting that nearly one month before the papal bull, on 23 August 1896, Leo XIII sent a letter to Cardinal Vaughan dealing with the problem of the economic situation of converted Anglican clergymen. Here, his intentions were clearly expressed. He speaks about the "heroism" of those clergymen who converted without any consideration of the economic consequences. But there were also others who did "not possess as much courage," but yet were close to taking this step. Therefore he suggested establishing a relief fund.[33] The Converts Aid Society, however, was not very successful because of the extraordinary financial burden placed upon the Catholics and because its purpose was misunderstood. Cardinal Francis Bourne (1903–35) organized this action after World War I with great interest. In 1898, analogous to other national institutions, Leo XIII founded the Beda College in Rome, and on 13 November he elevated the Venerable Bede to the rank of Father of the Church.

---

[30] J. J. Hughes, op. cit., 32; also below, Introduction to Pt. II, n. 19.

[31] Acta Leonis XVI, 258–75.—Concerning the theological controversy, see F. Clark: *LThK*² I, 554f, incl. biblio.; also: J. de Bivort de la Saudée, Anglicans et catholiques (Paris 1949). In opposition to Clark, see J. J. Hughes, Stewards of the Lord. A Reappraisal of Anglican Orders (London 1970); id., "Zur Frage der anglikanischen Weihen. Ein Modellfall festgefahrener Kontroverstheologie," Quaestiones disputatae 59 (Freiburg i. Br. 1973; the original in German).

[32] J. J. Hughes, Absolut und Nichtig, 49. Concerning W. Ward and the Synthetic Society, see chap. 31.

In 1905, following the victory of the Liberal Party, which had been rejuvenated by youthful forces, the question of schools came up again. The objective of the education law of 1870 was reiterated insofar as the Rosebery cabinet wanted to further repress the traditional Anglican predominance in education.[34] But now Cardinal Bourne aligned with the Anglicans and the conservative opposition in the fight against the deconfessionalization of schools (religious instruction was to be given in the classroom, but not to belong to the general curriculum)[35] and, consequently, the bill miscarried in the House of Lords. But these were tactical alliances. The Eucharistic World Congress of 1908 in London, which was attended by Cardinal Legate Vannutelli, was correctly analyzed as a "brilliant expression of the unified power" of the island's Catholics.[36] But this was also the way a large part of the London public understood it, and thus protests occurred, and Lord Herbert Asquith, promoted from chancellor of the treasury to prime minister (1908), warned against carrying the monstrance in the procession.[37] It was clear to the seasoned episcopate in Great Britain, which also held back in the dispute over modernism,[38] that the founding of a Catholic party, as Leo XIII desired, would only harm ecclesiastical life. On 28 October 1911 the Pope reorganized the hierarchy. Henceforth, the Church province of Westminster was to incorporate the dioceses of Northhampton, Nottingham, Portsmouth, and Southwark; the new province of Liverpool was to add the dioceses of Newcastle, Leeds, Middlesbrough, and Salford; and the province of Birmingham included the dioceses of Clifton, Menevia, Newport, Plymouth, and Salisbury.

---

[33] Acta Leonis XVI, 246ff.; cf. I. Bolten, op. cit., 80f.

[34] P. Kluke, op. cit., 291.

[35] Schmidlin, PG III, 112.

[36] K. Waninger, op. cit., 99.

[37] He referred to several existing prohibitions; but there were numerous ones, and ignoring them had not resulted in any complications (cf. Schmidlin, PG III, 113, n. 13).

[38] Cardinal Bourne expressed himself to that effect to von Hügel; see chap. 31.

Ireland

During the first year of Leo XIII's pontificate, Cardinal Paul Cullen, the head of the episcopate in Ireland, died. In 1880 Gladstone took over the government after the victory of the Liberals in the elections, in which the Irish National Party was able to increase its seats from fifty-nine to sixty-five. In spite of Gladstone's conflicts with the Irish episcopate over the question of the universities in 1873 and his reaction to it (published in a flyer which became known all over Europe),[39] his personal involvement and current events entangled him once again in the Irish question. Bad harvests and the intensification of the political battle resulted in 1882 in nearly one hundred attempted assassinations and twenty-six murders. The terrorism in the battle for justice was also directed against those Irish who did not obey the directives of the organization.[40] This has to be taken into consideration as well as the impoverishment of the Irish tenant farmers, whose lot could only gradually be improved by a land act which Gladstone enacted in spite of the terrorism.[41] Otherwise, the solidarity of a large part of the episcopate[42] and Leo XIII's interventions cannot be adequately assessed.

On 3 January 1881 the Pope sent a letter to Archbishop MacCabe of Dublin, no doubt repeating, in reference to Gregory XVI, more of the debita obedientia and the Cupiditates in seditiones flammam,[43] than was prudent in view of the situation created by the recently enacted land act. The letter of 1 August 1882, addressed to the entire Irish episcopate, endorsed the condemnation of the terrorist acts; however, in blaming them on the "secret societies,"[44] he showed little understanding of the necessity for organized resistance in such a situation, even though the Pope generally approved of the desire for justice. Incidentally, the Irish episcopate had good reason to suggest that Rome should not altogether trust the information from London. After MacCabe had been elevated to cardinal on 27 March 1882, the Pope, in a letter of 1 January 1883, admonished the episcopate to act in concord and the clergy to obey the bishops.[45] The intrigues of the conservative Catholic deputy from Ireland, Errington, at the Vatican showed what kind of impact the massive interests of the landlords had, even on the Church's treatment of the Irish question.[46] How venomous the atmosphere was in the Church itself is documented by the case of Archbishop Walsh of Dublin, who had to undergo an interrogation in 1885 in Rome before he was confirmed.[47] The Vatican critic Gladstone was able to foresee for the next decades that the Irish question could not be solved merely by improved reform laws, but that the request for home rule had to be granted. In the beginning of 1886, he failed to win support for his bill providing for the suspension of the union of 1801 and for Ireland's own Parliament (with the exclusion of trade, foreign affairs, and the military). The bill miscarried because of imperialistic resistance, even within his own ranks.[48] The Home Rule law of 1912/14 came too late because of the war. It brought revolution. Leo XIII carried part of the responsibility for this. The old grievances did not return after Gladstone's defeat, but Ireland's being chained to Great Britain and the interests of the Unionists persisted, so that the unrest was aggravated, a consequence from which the episcopate could not escape. Nevertheless, the Pope, counseled by the Prefect for Propaganda Simeoni and the Irish College, showed little understanding for Ireland's increasing national, rather than economical demands.[49] On 20 April 1888, the Congregation on the Inquisition answered negatively an inquiry about whether a boycott by the tenant farmers was permissible, and requested an attitude of charity and fairness. However, in a letter of 24 June 1888, addressed to the entire episcopate, Leo XIII emphasized that the matter was not only subject to the authority of the bishops but also to his own authority, and he resented being insufficiently informed.[50] The Irish question had critically entangled political issues, characterized by a mixture of right and wrong, with ecclesiastical aspects on all sides. At the same time, it was an example of the dilemma of Leo's direct policies, and thus it continued to smolder. Furthermore, the legation of Vannutelli in 1904[51] only intensified the ecclesiastical situation.

---

[39] The Vatican decrees in their bearing on civil allegiance (1874).

[40] C. C. O'Brien, Parnell and his Party (London 1957).

[41] The only way out was emigration, so that the 8 million inhabitants had decreased to about 4 million from the beginning of the century until the end.

[42] Even in 1890, Manning's attitude is expressed in his words: "If the government treats its people the way lords and country squires treat their herdsmen and workers, then the free Englishmen will rebel against it;" quoted by E. Taylor, op. cit., 161.

[43] Acta Leonis II, 188.

[44] Acta Leonis III, 130.

---

[45] Acta Leonis III, 188f.

[46] Schmidlin, PG II, 488.

[47] Ibid., 493.

[48] P. Kluke, op. cit., 285.

[49] Schmidlin, PG II, 493.—D. H. Akenson, The Church of Ireland. Ecclesiastical Reform and Revolution, 1800–1885 (Yale 1971).

[50] Acta Leonis VII, 253, 251 ("Num igitur in eo temeritas inest, quod aiunt, de caussa Nos iudicavisse non satis cognita?").

[51] Schmidlin, PG III, 111.

The liberal Asquith was able to achieve in 1909 what the liberal Gladstone had failed to accomplish in 1873. In addition to the Queen's University of Belfast, he established the National University of Ireland, with its three colleges in Dublin, Cork and Galway, which were both fundamentally supra-denominational, but the school in Dublin was, for all practical purposes, Catholic.[52]

At that time, Catholicism in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland was sociologically hardly homogeneous. This is evidenced by the biographies of a line of significant writers who knew they belonged to Catholicism, but cannot be regarded as its exponents without serious reservations. C. K. Patmore (born in 1823 in Woodfore, died in 1896) grew up without any religious training; the poet of the "Unknown Eros" (1877) converted to Catholicism in Rome in 1864. His younger friend G. M. Hopkins (born in 1844 in Stratford, Essex, died in 1889) converted in 1866 under the influence of Newman and joined the Society of Jesus in 1868. Dedicated to the art of "inscape," he is one of the most original religious poets. A marginal figure was Francis Thompson (born in 1859 in Preston, Lancaster, died in 1907), the son of convert parents. He attended the seminary of Ushaw at a young age, but after 1885 became a homeless person in London, addicted to opium. In the nineties, he grew to feel somewhat at home in the Franciscan monastery Pantasaph in North Wales, where he became known as the poet of God's love, which one cannot escape ("The Hound of Heaven," 1890). G. K. Chesterton (born in 1874 in London, died in 1936) converted to Roman Catholicism in later years; but his socially grounded opposition to the representatives of the "heretics" (1905) is documented in a nonconformist fashion in his Orthodoxy (1908) and in his story about the Catholic farm boy from Scotland and the atheist who are prevented by the eternal compromisers from fighting each other (The Ball and the Cross, 1909). Together with his friend Hilaire Belloc (1870–1953), a student of the Oratorians in Birmingham, he wielded a sharp apologetic sword against British society. The fact that Belloc was of French-Irish descent (he was fascinated by Charles Maurras) fits into the continental orientation of the Irish "revival," whose most important members, however, were alienated from the Church (indicative of the problem of Irish Catholicism).[53]

---

[52] Cf. A Bellesheim, AkathKR (1910).

[53] J. C. Reid, The Mind and the Art of C. K. Patmore (London 1957); J. G. Ritz, Le poete G. M. Hopkins (Paris 1960); R. Hill, "F. Thompson," Lexikon der Weltliteratur II (Freiburg i. Br. 1961), 1074f.; M. Ward, G. K. Chesterton (London 1944); R. Hill, op. cit., 330–32; J. B. Morton, H. Belloc (London 1955).

Canada

In Canada, the Catholic part of the total population decreased slightly from 42.9 percent in 1871 to 39.4 percent in 1911.[54] The Franco-Canadian Catholicism in the province of Quebec, which had developed a pronounced conservative stance during Pius IX's pontificate and actually dominated public life with its strong ecclesiastical authority, was suffering from serious tensions in the last quarter of the century, which were at least partly ignited by its relations with France. The French-Canadian economic relations were increased after 1890, and at that time, Franco-Canadian society was more and more influenced by an image of France based on the Restoration rather than the Revolution. It was the spirit of Victor Hugo. As a result, the controversies within French Catholicism, the pro and con in reference to Leo XIII's Ralliement politics, and the ecclesiastical policy of the Third Republic were considered by the Canadian Catholics to be much their own affair. These backlashes combined with inner Canadian differences in the episcopate. E.-A. Taschereau, from 1871 until 1898 archbishop of Quebec,[55] held from the beginning of his episcopate a more differentiated opinion of the relationship between the civil society and the Church than Bishop J. Bourget of Montreal, who had died in 1876. The Conservatives, therefore, suspected him of liberalism, and he had to defend himself against immigrant extremists by demanding their return to France. The owner and editor of La Vérité, J.-P. Tardivel (1851–1905), had chosen Louis Veuillot as his model. After 1881 he fought, together with his friend Fr. J. Grenier, S.J., anyone who, in his opinion, was not exclusively oriented toward Rome. Both Veuillot and Tardivel inspired a comparison with Taschereau and Dupanloup.[56] In reference to the Spanish Catholics' disputations in Siglo futuro and the insolent behavior of Nocedal, the "Spanish Veuillot,"[57] Leo XIII wrote a letter in 1882 asking the Spanish Catholics to make peace. Archbishop Taschereau did not miss the opportunity to pass this letter on to his clergy, including a comment relative to the local situation. The writer Tardivel was too radical even for Monsignor Laflèche, Bishop of Trois Rivières and leader of the strictly conservative bishops of Canada. In his "Mandement sur les sociétés secrètes" of 1883, he reserved for himself the right to decide which societies would be subject to the ecclesiastical prohibition. On the occasion of the publication of the encyclical Humanum genus of 1884, he emphasized the need for a fight against the Freemasons, conceding, however, that there were only very few of them in French Canada.[58] But the basic attitude of Archbishop Taschereau was more in line with Leo XIII's intentions than those of his opponents, and thus Leo appointed him cardinal in 1887.[59]

---

[54] Saint-Denis, tables V and VI. The population of Irish descent decreased during that time from 24.3 percent to 14.9 percent, while the population of French descent increased from 37.9 to 41.7 percent. Immigration played an important role for a long time: in 1914, every fourth Canadian was born outside of the dominion.

[55] P. Savard, op. cit., index.

[56] P. Savard, op. cit., 84.

[57] This vol., p. 121.

In the nineties French Canada also experienced a school struggle. But it differed from similar conflicts because of the conditions there: the dominant position of the Church in education. In 1886 the Sulpicians had been accused of undermining the congregations of teaching brothers by supporting a stronger participation of laymen in education.[60] In 1893 it was demanded that the clergy pass the same examination as the laymen, from which they had been exempted in 1846. Moreover, the traditional humanistic curriculum became more and more the object of controversy. The Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada, John A. Macdonald, who had been in office since the British North America Act (1867), was replaced in 1891 by the liberal Wilfrid Laurier. When the liberal president of Quebec, F.-G. Marchand wanted to establish a department for education in 1889, a furious public reaction occurred and the project was unable to secure a majority in Parliament.[61] In 1889 Leo XIII seized the initiative and elevated the ecclesiastical University of Ottawa (founded in 1849), where Archbishop J.-T. Duhamel taught (1874–1909), to a papal institution. The University, recognized by the state in 1866, was the first in Canada to teach in English and French. An example of the increase in tensions was the unreasonable request (in 1889) that Cardinal Taschereau appeal to Queen Victoria on behalf of the Roman question and the partisan interpretation of his refusal as being a betrayal of the Pope. On the other hand, an increase in animosity toward the Church is evident, which came partly from Ontario, whence anti-Jesuitism spread to Quebec, and partly from France. The anti-Catholic Equal Rights Association founded a group in Montreal and the radical Grand Orient lodge founded a branch in French Canada. The conflicts survived the death of Cardinal Taschereau (his successor in Quebec was L.-N. Bégin, 1898–1925), corresponding to the political development in France. An example is the embarrassment of the successful French preacher J.-F.-R. Rozier in 1902 in Montreal, when he was charged (in a newspaper interview) with having failed to divorce himself sufficiently from the French government. In 1911 the first plenary synod was aimed at demonstrating the inner cohesiveness of French and English Catholicism in Canada. The opening address of the premier of Quebec, L. Gonin, at the Eucharistic Congress of 1910 showed what kind of authority the Church still possessed in spite of a certain intensification of liberalism: "The Canadian State does not consider the Church an enemy to be fought as a rival; it considers the Church an ally and its best support."[62]

---

[58] Taschereau rejected the Knights of Labor, in contrast to Archbishop J. J. Lynch of Toronto (1860–88) (1883: inquiry in Rome with negative answer, 1886: another inquiry, because the answer had only been applied to Quebec. The response this time was that the answer was a general one); P. Savard, op. cit., 212–20.—Regarding the further development, see J. Hulliger, L'enseignement social des évêques canadiens, 1891–1950 (Paris 1958); M. Têtu, "Les premiers Syndicats cath. canadiens. 1900–1921" (diss., Laval University 1961).

[59] Tardivel tried in vain to obtain an audience with Leo XIII in 1888–89; although he was received benevolently in 1896, he does not seem to have been satisfied with the result of the audience.

[60] F. S. Louis, Les frères des Écoles chrétiennes au Canada. 1837–1900 (Montreal 1921).—In regard to the school conflict in general, see P. Savard, op. cit., 177–86.

[61] An example of the change after an extreme conservative reign is the path which the politician J.-I. Tarte, who was once a friend of Tardivel and later his enemy took (L. Lapierre, "Relation between the French Canadian Episcopacy and a French Canadian Politician, 1874–96," Rapport de la Société Canad. d'Histoire de l'Église Catholique (1958), 23–39.

Australia

Catholicism in Australia entered a new period of growth, when P. F. Moran[63] was appointed archbishop of Sydney (in 1885 he became Australia's first cardinal). In spite of a decrease in Irish immigration, the portion of the Catholics in the growing white population remained fairly constant: 1841: 40,000 out of 211,000; 1901: 850,000 out of 3.78 million.[64] It was of great significance in 1888 that Cardinal Moran could found and open Saint Patrick's Ecclesiastical College in Manly (north of Sydney), thus providing for the training of the native clergy. This contributed to easing the tensions which the religious orders and secular clergy from Europe had brought into the country. It also diminished the Australian Englishmen's fear of French settlements. But the process of deconfessionalizing education had more negative consequences for the Catholic schools in Australia than it did in Britain. The cancellation of state subsidies could not easily be compensated for by individual efforts, and the Australian bishops had to solicit the assistance of European teaching orders. Until the middle of the twentieth century, the congregations were usually represented in branch foundations.

---

[62] A. Touchet, "Le congrès eucharistique de Montréal," Correspondant 141 (October 1910), 3–30.

[63] P. F. Moran, born in Ireland (1830–1911), studied at the Irish College in Rome and served after 1866 as secretary to Cardinal Cullen, his uncle. He wrote the History of the Catholic Church in Australia, 2 vols. (Sydney 1896).

[64] Around 1927, the proportions changed considerably: 1.1 million–6.3 million; 480,000 in the Church province of Sydney 320,000 in the province of Melbourne.

Among the original Australian foundations are the Sisters of Saint Joseph (in 1882 in Goulburn and in 1883 in Lochinvar) and Our Lady's Nurses of the Poor (1913). Cardinal Moran followed the example of Leo XIII's pontificate and organized regular plenary synods in Sydney (1885, 1895, 1905). The growing social awareness of Australian Catholicism expressed itself in the congresses taking place after 1900, having an active leader in their cardinal, who was a supporter of the constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia. It was in accord with the social status of most Catholics in Australia that Moran favored the Australian Labor Party and showed sympathy for the strikes of the nineties, even though that gained him the reputation among the Conservatives of being a socialist.[65]

Like the rest of the population, the Catholics concentrated in New South Wales and in Victoria. There were difficulties in establishing an ecclesiastical organization in West Australia, where natural conditions in the southwestern part favored a stronger density of population. There, the Irishman M. Gibney, who had been a priest in West Australia since 1863, was appointed Bishop of Perth in 1887 (a bishopric since 1845). The use of Trappists from the abbey of Sept-Fons in the Beagle Bay Mission proved to be impractical. In 1901 they were replaced by the Pallotines (under the generalate of Fr. Whitmee). Lacking crucial internal or external tensions, Catholicism was able to develop favorably, and Cardinal Cerretti, during his visits in 1915/17, found a flourishing Church.

---

[65] P. Ford, Cardinal Moran and the A. L. P.—A Study in the Encounter between Moran and Socialism (Melbourne 1966).

CHAPTER 10

The American Way

In 1820 there were one hundred ninety thousand Catholics among the total white population of 7.8 million. By 1870 the total population had risen to 33.5 million with 4.5 million Catholics. This growth rate, mainly due to Irish immigration, decreased in the seventies when 600,000 out of 2.8 million immigrants were Catholics (180,000 Irish, 175,000 German, and 82,000 Canadian). In the eighties, 1.2 million of the 5.2

million immigrants were Catholic (400,000 German, 300,000 Irish, approximately 200,000 East European, 130,000 Italian). In this time period the number of births within the Catholic population almost equalled that of the immigrants. In the following years, however, the largest portion of immigrants were Italians, who often came without their families and returned to their homeland. In 1900, there were about 12 million Catholics in the total population of 78 million; they had tripled since 1870.[1] For the year 1957, there was an estimate of 25.7 percent Catholics.[2]

In view of the growing mobility of the industrial age, pastoral work in regard to immigrants, especially in the United States, had been recognized as an important task. At the Catholic Convention in Mainz in 1871, the Saint Raphael Society for the Protection of German Emigrants was founded, mainly upon suggestion of the businessman Peter Paul Cahensly (1838–1923; 1885 deputy of the Center Party). Journeying to the United States in 1874, he occupied steerage in order to investigate the situation of the emigrants. Encouraged by Leo XIII, he repeated this trip in 1883. In Italy, which was harder hit than Germany, G. B. Scalabrini, bishop of Piacenza after 1876,[3] took the initiative and founded the Pia Società dei Missionari di S. Carlo per gli Italiani emigranti (1887). Cahensly, who had presented his case to the Congress of Liège in 1887, made contact with Scalabrini, who founded the Società S. Raffaele in 1890. It is the name of the rather active German Cahensly that comes to mind in connection with the controversy about "Cahenslyism" (which was unreasonable, but its proponents had good intentions), rather than the name of the diligent Scalabrini, in whose spirit Francesa Saveria Cabrini (1850–1917) worked.[4] During the Saint Raphael's Convention in Lucerne in 1890, the international character of which was somewhat diminished by the absence of the Americans, a memorandum was composed which stated that, as a result of the pastoral situation in the United States, 10 million Catholic immigrants had been deprived of the practice of their faith. Cahensly sent the memorandum to the Pope and increased the number of victims in a letter to Rampolla to 16 million. As a remedy he suggested placing the national parishes under the authority of a bishop of their respective countries.[5]

---

[1] Data according to J. T. Ellis: New Catholic Encyclopedia 14 (1967), 434f. All numbers are dubious because the American Constitution prohibits questions about one's faith. During the time of immigration, the denomination index of the home country was used, among other things.

[2] The statistician controversy is not finished yet. The calculations of G. Shaughnessy, Has the Immigrant Kept Faith? (New York 1925), are accepted by some or rejected by others (L. Hertling, op. cit., 162–66).

[3] I. Felici, G. B. Scalabrini (Monza 1954); M. Caliaro, M. Francesconi, L'Apostolo degli emigranti, G. B. Scalabrini (Milan 1968).

[4] She founded the Missionarinnen vom Heiligsten Herzen (confirmed in 1881) and devoted her life to the Italian emigrants, first in New York, later in several other cities (died in Chicago); canonized on 7 July 1946. The miserable conditions which she encountered and tried to alleviate by establishing schools, hospitals, and orphanages, should not be blamed on the American pastoral work (Hertling, op. cit., 171f; C. Caminada, Una Italiana per le vie del mondo [Turin 1946]).

The reaction of the episcopate as well as the general public in the United States was vehement. In 1891, through Rampolla and Ledóchowski, the Pope rejected the idea of a nationally differentiated American episcopate[6] and limited the measures to pastoral care of the Italians by Italian priests, as he had already recommended in 1888.[7] But the incident in Lucerne could not easily be repaired, and Leo XIII's benevolence in this matter was, among other things, an indication that European ideas obscured the view of the New World. Of course, national emotions played an intensifying role. Senator Cushman C. Davis brought the matter to the attention of Congress in 1891 and spoke favorably of the Pope, Cardinal Gibbons, and Archbishop Ireland, but was critical of the Germans. In January 1892 the Catholic World attacked the Italians, declaring that they should relieve the Pope of his burden. Denis Joseph O'Connell, then rector of the American College in Rome,[8] wrote to his friend Gibbons in 1891: For us, it is simply a clerical matter, but for it [the Curia] it is a political matter, it is part of its policy in regard to the Central Powers."[9] It is correct, however, to say that the pastoral question was not handled as carefully as would have been proper under the given circumstances. It is also true that the political calculation of the pontificate (or what was taken as such) could play a disturbing role, as was the case in other situations.[10] As for an objective diagnosis, Archbishop Ireland, who was probably more aware because of his pride in America, came closest to the truth in his estimation that 1 to 1.5 million immigrants had lost the practice of their Catholic faith, and this figure should be considered accurate.

The controversy concerning the immigrants' pastoral care was already on the horizon of the great conflict of the nineties, and it illuminates the central problem of Catholicism in the United States at that time. The difficulties of a minority in an often aggressively hostile society[11] were intensified by its national heterogeneity. On the other hand, the groups of the various immigrants found a certain security in their national parishes, so that the development of a total Catholic consciousness as well as its acculturation to American society was problematic. But these tendencies, fostered by the European mother countries, stood in contrast to existing social conditions, especially for the second generation of immigrants. The result was the emergence of problems related to parochial jurisdiction whenever there was the desire to change the parish and thus the rector ecclesiae. The language problem seems to have played a relatively minor role. The Irish spoke English, and the Germans, next to the Irish the most important group up to the eighties, quickly learned the language of the country, at least in the second generation.

---

[5] L. Hertling, op. cit., 162–66.

[6] ASS 24, 685: "Cum enim tunc temporis inanes rumores spargi in vulgus cepissent de Catholicae Hierarchiae in Statibus Foederatis ratione ita immutanda isthuc Catholicis ex variis Europae nationibus populares Episcopi praefici deberent. . . ." Schmidlin, PG II, 497.

[8] R. McNamara, The American College in Rome, 1855–1955 (New York 1956).

[9] L. Hertling, op. cit., 216–21; here, 217f.

[10] With some resignation we have to acknowledge that T. Maynard, in 1941, talks about "Teutonic hubris" in this context; quoted by Hertling, op. cit.

The situation was more difficult for the Italians and the Eastern Europeans. But the command of the English language did not erase the differences which were, last but not least, a matter of clerical estate. The German Roman Catholic Central Society (founded in 1857), for a long time the only Catholic umbrella organization in the United States, played an important role in American Catholicism. This caused understandable resentment among the Catholics of Irish descent, who were highly influential in the hierarchy, constituted the great majority, and refused to tolerate special groups. The question of parish membership[13] was delayed by the Propaganda Fide in 1887 and finally resolved in 1897, with the understanding that children of non-English-speaking immigrants born in America could, upon reaching maturity, leave the parish of their parents and join an English-speaking parish; and that English-speaking immigrants could become members of an English-speaking parish and were not subject to the pastor of their national congregation.[13] The increasing social mobility gradually drew the Catholics into the American melting pot. An unreliable census in 1916 counted 5,660 Catholic national parishes. English sermons were delivered in 3,502 of them, and [11] In regard to the agitation by the American Protective Association (APA) in the nineties, see L. Hertling, op. cit., 194.

[12] Memorandum by Ireland and Keane in 1886 regarding the "German question": "The fight for the rights of the Germans is carried on with the kind of stubborness and aggressiveness which is characteristic of Bismarck's countrymen"; regarding the language question, see L. Hertling, op. cit., 166–72. Ireland and Keane were in Rome at the same time (1886) as Pastor Peter Abbelen, who advocated the maintenance of the German parishes. He had a recommendation by Gibbons, which Hertling (188) does not seem to consider sincere.

[13] ASS 30, 256.

sermons in one additional language were even delivered in some.[14] The Irish episcopate aimed at the sensible goal of totally Anglicizing Catholicism in the United States, but this achievement was hampered by national emotions.[15]

The leaders of the Church in the United States during Leo XIII's pontificate were born in the thirties and were mostly of Irish descent. James Gibbons (1834–1921) was the son of an Irish immigrant in Baltimore, though he grew up in Ireland between 1837 and 1853, because his parents had returned there. A priest since 1861, he was consecrated bishop in 1868 and participated as the youngest council father in the first Vatican Council. In 1872, he was appointed bishop of Richmond.[16] His book, The Faith of Our Fathers, appeared in 1876 and was a great success among American Catholics, even though, theologically, it was insignificant. Gibbons was a master of well adjusted apologetics.[17] As coadjutor of J. R. Bayley, an Anglican clergyman who converted in Rome in 1842, Gibbons succeeded him in 1877 as archbishop of Baltimore. Cardinal (since 1886) Gibbons was in many respects Manning's American counterpart, and was repeatedly helped by him in his ecclesiastical endeavors. He was convinced of the papacy's mission and entertained no doubts concerning his episcopal responsibility, as he saw it, in the framework of the specific situation of Catholicism in the United States. The constitution of the United States was for him a sort of secular Bible: "I would not expunge or alter a single paragraph, a single line, or a single word" (1897).[18] His reserve toward some German-speaking Catholics was not unfounded. He contributed considerably to the development of American Catholicism and to its esteem in the total society.[19] [14] Only one language was spoken in the 530 Spanish (in the Southwest), 466 Polish, 206 German, 200 French (mostly Canadians), and 149 Italian parishes (L. Hertling, op. cit.).

---

[15] The German clergyman Peter Rosen published an essay in 1897 (forbidden by the Church), "Archbishop Ireland, as He Really Is." In it he attacked the man who tried everything to be an American and to be accepted as such; in 1891, when Cardinal Gibbons handed the Austrian Archbishop Katzer the pallium, he had emphatically rejected a national division of the Catholic Church in the United States.

[16] In addition to the biography by J. T. Ellis, cf. the more objective character description by L. Hertling, op. cit., 190–95, 200–02; Schmidlin, PG II and III several times (index).

[17] This book copies a French book, including the title. It was translated into German, like the book for priests The Ambassador of Christ (Baltimore 1897). In 1917, Gibbons presented an autobiographical retrospect.

[18] Quoted according to J. T. Ellis: New Catholic Encyclopedia, 6 (1967), 468.

[19] L. Hertling, op. cit., 210. Hertling does not do Gibbons justice when he calls him "more adroit, successful, important" than M. Corrigan, while attributing more character to Corrigan. They are both two entirely different hierarchs, whom one cannot compare. The "more adroit" man has to be more adroit as a politician, that is in the nature of things.

It is much more difficult to assess John Ireland (1838–1918). Born in Ireland (Burnchurch), he came to the United States with his parents in 1848. The French bishop of St. Paul sent him to study at the preparatory seminary of Meximieux in France, which gave him an education in the spirit of Dupanloup. Upon his return to St. Paul, he was ordained a priest in 1861; in 1875 he was named auxiliary coadjutor and in 1884 bishop. In 1888 he persuaded other bishops to sign a petition to elevate St. Paul to an archbishopric. His patriotism was not as natural as that of Cardinal Gibbons and often approached exaltation.[20] In spite of their different opinions and temperaments, Gibbons and Ireland were united in their efforts toward an indigenous American Catholicism. Ireland's address to the Council of Baltimore (1884), "The Catholic Church and Civil Society," became famous. His love for writing was documented by the collection of essays The Church and Modern Society. Ireland's endorsement of the missionary concept of I. T. Hecker was probably less controversial in respect to the dispute over "Americanism" than was his behavior after Leo XIII's letter of condemnation to Gibbons, Testem benevolentiae, of 22 January 1899.[21] The Irishman John Keane (1839–1918) also belonged to this influential group of the American episcopate. It was thanks to his initiative, supported chiefly by Ireland, that the Catholic University of America was founded in Washington in 1889.[22] He was its first president, but also one of the first victims of the "Americanism" disturbances, and was relieved of office in September 1896. From 1900 to 1911 he was archbishop of Dubuque. An important role in the controversies, intensifying in the nineties, was played by the president of the American College in Rome, Denis Joseph O'Connell (1849–1927). He was born in Ireland and was a close friend of Gibbons and his liaison man at the Vatican, where he was considered a "Liberal." Gibbons had to agree to O'Connell's dismissal from the College in 1895, and he could only save his friend's and his own reputation by appointing him rector of his titular church in Trastevere. In 1903, he made him president of Catholic University and continued to maintain the friendship.[23] The limitations of the cardinal became obvious when, in 1890, he wanted to promote John Lancaster Spalding, bishop of Peoria and cofounder of Catholic University, to archbishop of Milwaukee, but failed because of the Curia's opposition.[24] The leader of the opposition in the American episcopate was Michael A. Corrigan (1839–1902), whose Irish father had immigrated in 1828. Between 1859 and 1863, he studied at the North American College in Rome (founded by Pius IX) and was ordained a priest in the Lateran by Cardinal Patrizi. Under the patronage of Vicar-General McQuaid (later the bishop of Rochester), he was consecrated bishop (at age thirty-four) in Newark, where he had taught dogmatics since 1864. He promoted the Jesuit College in New Jersey and organized the first American pilgrimage to Rome (1874). After the Council of Baltimore (1884), he published the pastoral letter on "true freedom." Coadjutor, by 1880, Corrigan was appointed archbishop of New York in 1885. In various controversial questions he held a very intransigent view.[25] While Gibbons, Ireland, and Keane were upset about the approbation of Charles Maignen's devastating book, which increased the American tensions coupled with the French ones, it was welcomed by Corrigan.

---

[20] In 1889, during the centennial in Baltimore: "The Americans do not wish a Church with a foreign flair which could not have an impact upon them . . . I would like all Catholics to be enthusiastic patriots" (quoted according to L. Hertling, 213). All his life he told of his part in the battle of Corinth as a military chaplain of the Northern states (J. P. Shannon: New Catholic Encyclopedia 7 [1967], 611). As a member of the Republican party he fought for President McKinley.

[21] In regard to "Americanism", cf. chap. 24. Regarding Ireland's behavior after 1899, see Moynihan (chap. biblio), L. Hertling (1954), 238, and the Tagebuch (publ. in 1957) by F. X. Kraus, 739f. Kraus, who was a friend of Denis Joseph O'Connell and John Keane, assesses Ireland much more critically than Hertling, who has no objections toward the attitude of the Curia in this crisis. Regarding Ireland's behavior during a reception of the cardinals, in August 1900, where the Pope chose him to report about America, Kraus says: "And all this is just a comedy. Ireland was motivated by but one idea: to take revenge on his enemies . . . . All his concessions only served to get him the red hat . . . ." (Kraus was informed through Denis O'Connell). Regarding criticism of Ireland after 1899, see F. X. Kraus, op. cit., 749.

[22] P. H. Ahern, The Life of John J. Keane, Educator and Archbishop (Milwaukee 1955).

In this milieu of people and movements, Catholicism in the United States matured. The issues of the first Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1866 were, to a large extent, still discussed at the third Council in 1884.

---

[23] A misunderstanding during the publication of the diaries by F. X. Kraus created the ironical situation that Denis was mistaken for his namesake William Henry (p. 688), who became the new rector of the American College (1895), was a protégé of the Pope and Rampolla, and completely unsuited for closer contact with F. X. Kraus (cf. chap. 29, n. 5). Denis J. O'Connell became bishop of Richmond in 1912, suffragan of Gibbons, giving rise to the suspicion that he would be his successor (cf. C. J. Barry: New Catholic Encyclopedia, 10 [1967], 635f.). Concerning William Henry O'Connell, see the biography by D. G. Wayman (New York 1955).

[24] J. L. Spalding was a nephew of the archbishop of Baltimore, Martin John Spalding; F. X. Kraus, op. cit., 734, recorded a "very strange sermon" of Spalding in the Gesù, commenting that with him the "spectator" entered the pulpit.

[25] L. Hertling, op. cit., 208, regarding the controversy about the Protestant land reformer Henry George, whose indictment Corrigan wanted to achieve: "Here, as always, he believed adamantly in the Roma locuta, causa finita."—J. J. Zwierlein, Letters of Archbishop Corrigan to Bishop McQuaid and Allied Documents (Rochester 1946); cf. J. T. Ellis in the Gibbons biography.—Corrigan favored the presentation of American Church history by J. G. Shea, because it was in accordance with his concept (cf. J. T. Ellis).

In the previous year, Leo XIII had invited part of the episcopate to Rome in order to give the archbishops directives through the Propaganda Fide,[26] and he planned to have the council chaired by a cardinal of the Curia. The Americans were able to realize their desire to entrust the chairmanship to James Gibbons, who occupied the see of Baltimore, the most prestigious archbishopric, but was rather indifferent toward the project (J. T. Ellis). Symptomatic of the change in the structure of American Catholicism is the portion of American-born bishops at the Council: in 1852, there were 9 out of 32; 1866, 14 out of 45; 1884, 25 out of 72, 15 of them of Irish descent. Aside from these 15 prelates, there were 20 who were born in Ireland, so that the Irish almost had the majority (8 Germans, 6 Frenchmen, 4 Belgians).

A specifically American question concerned the procedure for the appointment of bishops. While the Curia wanted to transfer the European model of the cathedral chapters to America, there were also strong efforts to introduce an election system by the clergy.[27] The council decided that the "diocesan consultors" (half appointed by the bishop and the other half elected by the clergy) together with irremovable pastors[28] were to make a list, to which, however, the bishops of the ecclesiastical province were not obligated when making a proposal to the Pope. This remarkable procedure was in effect until 1918 (new codex). In the years between 1880 and 1903, Leo XIII intensified the ecclesiastical organizations by establishing 23 dioceses and 3 prefectures. After Pius X's establishments, there were now 82 bishoprics in 14 ecclesiastical provinces.[29] While the Plenary Council of 1884 took place without a papal legate, Leo XIII used the occasion of the centennial of the American Catholics in 1889 to send Francesco Satolli (1839–1910), an adviser from Perugia and a strict neoscholastic,[30] as his representative to Baltimore. On the occasion of the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893 (a celebration of the four-hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America), organized by the United States, Satolli, now titular archbishop, came a second time in order to deliver Vatican documents. While the episcopate appreciated this as an honorable gesture (Gibbons had transmitted the government's desire to the Pope), the archbishops, except Ireland, were embarrassed that Satolli would thenceforth be an official Apostolic Delegate. The attitude of Satolli, who returned to Rome in October 1896 and was replaced by Archbishop Sebastiano Martinelli (1889 Prior-General of the Ausgustinian Hermits, 1901 cardinal), is difficult to assess.[31]

---

[26] Schmidlin, PG II, 495f.

[27] Representative of this is the publication by P. Corrigan (not the Archbishop of New York!): What the Catholic Church Most Needs in the U.S. or: the Voice of the Priests in the Election of the Bishops (1884).

[28] "Tenured" were only the church rectors, because there were no canonical benefits; in Baltimore it was decided that at least one tenth of the diocesan clergy was to be elevated to this rank.

[29] Schmidlin, PG II, 495, III, 114.

[30] In 1880, Leo XIII recalled Satolli from Perugia and appointed him professor of dogmatics at the College of the Propaganda Fide and the Roman Seminary.

More crucially than in Catholicism elsewhere, the school question stood in the foreground of American interests. The constitutional right to found private schools, its necessity for the Catholic minority's development of self-awareness, the financial difficulties in this extensive country form the background for the history of the school system.[32] At the Plenary Council of 1884, the responsibility of the parents was emphatically defined as an episcopal decree, and the tendency to excommunicate offenders was repressed. Episcopal dispensation had to be mentioned because there were not nearly enough Catholic schools. By 1900, the two hundred primary schools of 1840 had increased to 3812 (nine hundred thousand students out of approximately 17 million); yet, more than half the children went, more or less by necessity, to other schools. Moreover, the standards of public schools improved considerably.[33] The Jesuits were particularly concerned with higher education. Around 1880, they had four thousand students altogether, and in 1890, five thousand five hundred. The small increase was caused by the fact that the Jesuits had not adjusted their organization and curriculum to the public schools, which was partly corrected by the initiative of the second president of Catholic University, Thomas Conaty. An increase of scientific subjects failed in spite of the efforts by Notre Dame University, founded in 1842 under the direction of the Congregation of the Holy Cross. The Sisters of the Sacred Heart, who from the middle of the century until 1890 had founded ten girls' high schools, tried to adjust within limits. It is natural that education became one of the areas of conflict in American Catholicism's attempt to gain identity. During the congress of the National Education Association in 1890, John Ireland surprised the public and his friends-in-faith with the suggestion to integrate the Catholic parochial schools with the system of the public schools, whereby religious instruction was to be given outside of the general lessons. To some, this seemed like a betrayal, to others a malicious Roman attack on the free republic. Patriotism and the worry of increasing the Catholic schools' incompatibility had joined hands in Ireland. The idea was realized in the parochial schools of Faribault and Stillwater in the Archdiocese of St. Paul, which were leased on notice to the local school board for one dollar a year as part of the public school system. The school board was also responsible for the salary of the Catholic teaching sisters (except for the religious instruction to be given in the schools). The professor of ethics at the Catholic University of America, Thomas Bouquillon, and the group of the episcopate around Gibbons supported the "Faribault plan," but Bouquillon's colleague, the German professor of dogmatics J. Schroeder, and the Jesuits opposed it vehemently. The majority of the German Catholics' resentment was based upon the Kulturkampf, rather than concern about the preservation of the German language. Rome, to which the controversy had been transferred, decided (in April 1892) in favor of a tolerari posse, referring at the same time to the resolution of the Council of Baltimore. But Ireland's idea had failed.

---

[31] Schmidlin, PG II, 498, says simply that Satolli was received "triumphantly." In accord with his attitude toward the Pope's wishes as of 1885, Gibbons did indeed ask the Pope on 4 January 1893, in the name of all archbishops (with the exception of Ireland), to disregard the establishment of a permanent apostolic delegation. On 14 January, Leo XIII wired his orders (cf. J. T. Ellis in the Gibbons biography; also New Catholic Encyclopedia 14 [1967], 441, where he speaks about a fait accompli). Incidentally, since Satolli appeared in November 1892 at the conference of the archbishops in New York as a de facto delegate, the question arises of what the meaning is of "proposing" (Ellis) such a delegation. It is remarkable that Satolli arrived in the company of Denis O'Connell, kept close contact with Gibbons and Ireland, and lived at Keane's, whose dismissal as rector of the university (1896) he had initiated before he himself was recalled. F. X. Kraus (Tagebücher, 714) notes that Satolli, who had become cardinal in 1895, had irritated Keane in Rome. There were also "American news stories" about his conduct. L. Hertling (op. cit., 225f. and 232f.) speaks about a "change in Satolli" around 1894.

[32] More information in L. Hertling, op. cit., 245–62; ibid. 221–24.

[33] Cf. E. Angermann: HM 10 (Berne 1961), 305f.

In Baltimore, in 1884, the founding of a Catholic national university was planned, an idea which Gibbons viewed with reservations (J. T. Ellis). At first Bishop John Lancaster Spalding and Bishop John Keane supported the idea. Opposed to the plan were Archbishop Corrigan and the bishop of Rochester, Bernard J. McQuaid, as well as a good part of the Jesuits, because they feared a liberal spirit. The donation of a young female convert amounting to three hundred thousand dollars facilitated the efforts to gain the Vatican's approval. On 13 November 1889, the Catholic University of America in Washington (the founders had wanted this location, while Gibbons had favored Philadelphia—outside of his dioceses) was inaugurated in the presence of President Harrison.[34] Keane relinquished his bishopric in favor of the presidency. But internal [34] J. T. Ellis, The Formative Years of the Catholic University of America (Washington 1946); id., The Catholic University of America. The Rectorship of John J. Keane. 1887–96 (Washington 1949). Keane tried in 1887–88 to have Ludwig Pastor appointed (Tagebücher, 203, 210), who declined because the place was not suited for his papal history. This was probably no great misfortune for Keane, who was a man of feeling, according to F. X. Kraus (Tagebücher, 683) (cf. P. E. Hogan [chap. biblio.]).

---

Catholic animosities within the institute continued. Within the faculty, the German Joseph Schroeder, who taught dogmatics, was the head of the opposition against Keane and his friends in the episcopate. He had emphatically supported Cahensly's criticism of America and created the teaching chair for German literary studies, which was to be filled in accord with his ideas defined in the essay "Liberalism in Theology and History" (1881).[35] Ireland succeeded through the Apostolic Delegate S. Martinelli[36] in having Schroeder, who was supported by Corrigan, recalled. The German dogmatist Josef Pohle had already returned to Europe in 1894. Leo XIII's recall of Keane from the presidency on 15 September 1896 is part of the crisis of American Catholicism.[37] In 1904, after the presidency of T. Conaty, the university, in spite of the efforts by Denis O'Connell, was driven into a catastrophic situation due to the mismanagement of its treasurer, a situation which it could not overcome until ten years later. The comparatively older universities in Georgetown (since 1805) and St. Louis had trouble adjusting to the general development. Most successful was the University of Notre Dame.

Another complex problem discussed at the Plenary Council of 1884 was the question of which societies with Freemason-like rituals Catholics would be allowed to join. This was an old problem, with which the Provincial Council of 1875 in San Francisco had dealt. They suggested that the father confessors permit membership in a society in doubtful cases, but demand withdrawal as soon as the respective "secret" society was forbidden by the Church. The discussion was bound to get more serious after the encyclical Humanum genus (1884), which contained an especially sharp condemnation of the Freemasons. But since their rituals were customary in many American societies, there was only the alternative of leaving the decision to the conscience of the faithful or to proclaim a list of forbidden societies, which was exceedingly difficult. An archiepiscopal conference in 1886 approved the Grand Army of the Republic (a society of Civil War veterans whose president was a Catholic and the brother of a bishop) and the Ancient Order of Hibernia. The explicit prohibition of other societies was debated at the conferences, but no agreement was reached. In Boston, in 1890, the majority around Gibbons decided to forbid only Freemasons, a rule that was protested by other episcopal parties (Corrigan, McQuaid, and others). Archbishop Katzer of Milwaukee complained in Rome. After the Church provinces of New York and Philadelphia had autocratically forbidden, respectively, three and four societies, the question was turned over to the Curia in November 1892 (meanwhile Satolli had arrived as papal delegate), since no agreement had been reached. After some time, on 20 August 1894, the Holy Office proscribed three societies. Rampolla's simultaneous letter to Satolli, stating that the execution of this decree was left to the judgment of the metropolitans, only caused confusion. In December 1894, Leo XIII, through Satolli, ordered the promulgation of the decree.[38] Gibbons traveled to Rome in vain (1895)—the crisis was on the way. Now, societies like The Knights of Saint John or the more important Knights of Columbus were promoted—a separation which was against the principle of accomodation.[39] The fact that individual bishops were suspicious of such organizations, and that the entire episcopate did not support a federation of the individual Catholic societies until 1905, is indicative of the social attitude of American Catholicism before World War I. On the parochial and diocesan levels, the Catholics, in spite of their economic weakness, were considerably active in the educational and social spheres.

---

[35] Schroeder's character is hard to define in view of the distorted sources. Hertling: his opponents described him as a heavy drinker. F. X. Kraus (Tagebücher, 697), records with satisfaction (Schroeder had instigated his censure) a piece of information from Denis O'Connell, according to which the German professor "disappeared for months from his apartment at the university in order to spend the night in wretched bars, drinking and frequenting the company of questionable ladies . . . ." From Washington, Schroeder went to the theological academy in Münster (died 1903) (cf. chap. 29).

[36] F. X. Kraus, Tagebücher, 697 (February 1898).

[37] The Pope appointed Keane adviser to the Propaganda Fide in Rome. But the fight against this man, who was later called "a rationalist, throwing all dogma over to modern ideas" (quoted according to P. H. Ahern, op. cit.), continued, and he returned to the United States. His friends convinced the Pope to elevate him in 1900 to archbishop of Dubuque.

The struggle over a closer definition of the "secret societies" was also one of the elements in the controversy about the association of the Noble and Most Holy Order of the Knights of Labor, which was founded in Philadelphia in 1869 and spread quickly under the leadership of the Catholic Irishman Terence Powderly (since 1879). Two thirds of its members were Catholics. When Gibbons was able to prevent Rome's condemnation of this society in February 1887, it was already (for several reasons) on the decline. Therefore, the historical significance of these events was not embedded in the history of this association as much as in the relation of American Catholicism to the [38] L. Hertling, op. cit., 202–06.

---

[39] L. Hertling, op. cit., 206: ". . . here the Catholics were among themselves and there was no danger that they would be pulled unnoticed into the wake of the lodges." (Cf. F. McDonald [chap. biblio.].)

socio-political question of which association was representative.[40] It was said that the "ever-present and recurring earning potential" of the United States had prevented the social embitterment that had occurred in Europe.[41] Although the question of salaries and working conditions was pertinent, the main long-term problem was the accumulation of capital in the hands of the lower classes and the way in which this wealth was accumulated.[42] Concentration in the agrarian sector produced a growing rural proletariat, which was welcomed by industry. There, however, the workers were victims of a ruthless labor market and had to pay the price in times of crisis as a result of legislation, jurisdiction, and an administration which exclusively served the interests of the entrepreneurs. Cheap labor was plentiful among immigrants, "freed" black slaves, and children.[43] The formation of unions was hampered by legislation and the lack of solidarity among the heterogeneous labor force. The Knights of Labor was the first significant worker movement, though vehemently attacked by American society as a whole, in spite of its sensible demands (equal wages for women and blacks, an eight-hour day, a labor arbitration court) and its reserved attitude in regard to strikes. The same sentiments were shown by the conservative segment of the clergy,[44] who, moreover, associated the Knights of Labor with the "secret societies" which were forbidden by the Church because they copied the secular "mores" of the Freemasons. Because the Catholic workers were urged, on the occasion of parish missions, to leave the associations, T. Powderly (son of an Irish worker with twelve children) changed the title of his association. In 1884, upon his inquiry in Rome, Taschereau (archbishop of Quebec, after 1887 cardinal) received the reply that membership in the Knights of Labor was forbidden by the [40] Henry Brown, The Catholic Church and the Knights of Labor (Washington 1949); Sister Joan Leonard, Catholic Attitude forward American Labor. 1884–1919 (Columbia Univ. 1946); F. Downing: J. N. Moody (ed.), Church and Society (New York 1953), 843–904; L. Hertling, op. cit., 196–202; A. M. Knoll (biblio., chap. 12), n. 236; P. Mourret (biblio., chap. 12), 292.

---

[41] L. Hertling (op. cit., 196), who, nevertheless, immediately discusses the economic crisis of 1885 and its consequences.

[42] E. Angermann, op. cit. (op. cit., n. 33), 295–302. During the "Erie War" (speculations with the Erie railroad), Jay Gould obtained huge amounts of money from the railroad king C. Vanderbilt, and when he died in 1892, he left his heirs 92 million dollars (both parties bribed the politicians). The famous pioneers of capitalism, A. Carnegie and J. D. Rockefeller, collected their wealth not just by way of diligence, but also because they fought a brutal competition, to which the small businessmen fell victim. In 1895, the banker J. P. Morgan gave the government a 60 million dollar loan, which brought his syndicate earnings of 72 million dollars.

[43] In 1870, 750,000 ten- to fifteen-year-old children were employed; in 1910, almost 2 million; in 1910, a sixty-hour-week was the rule for adults; E. Angermann, op. cit., 302.

[44] J. Leonard, op. cit., 56.

Church. The American episcopate discussed whether this prohibition applied to Canada only and decided to present the question again to the prefect of the Propaganda Fide, Cardinal Giovanni Simeoni. In Canada, where Archbishop Lynch of Toronto favored the organization, it was discussed whether the reply referred to Quebec only. The answer from Rome in 1886 was "general prohibition."[45] Gibbons's letter of 20 February 1887, which he signed himself, but had composed in collaboration with Ireland, Keane, and Denis O'Connell, effected in Rome a toleration of the Knights of Labor.[46] Gibbons' recollections thirty years later showed which internal and public problems in regard to Church affairs he had had to face. But soon more radical organizations successfully competed with the Knights of Labor.[47] The radicalization of the social differences was one of the causes for increasing de-Christianization slightly veiled with Christian slogans.[48] The encyclical Rerum novarum (1891) found little attention among the American Catholics.[49] But there were a few clergymen who called the social problems by their names, in the first place John Ryan (1869–1945), son of an Irish immigrant, who had already attracted attention at the Catholic University of America in 1906 with his dissertation "A Living Wage: Its Ethical and Economic Aspects." In 1916, his main work, Distributive Justice, was published. During the twenties he reached the peak of his public career.[50] One of his allies was Peter E. Dietz (1878–1947), son of a German immigrant, who cooperated successfully with some of the union leaders and founded a social section in the Deutscher Katholischer Centralverein. The fact that he founded a Catholic union (Militia of Christ for Social Service), in accord with the encyclical Singulari quadam of 1912, should be viewed in this context. In 1923, the Catholic members of the Chamber of Commerce persuaded Archbishop J. T. McNicholas of Cincinnati to force Dietz to close his Social Academy.[51]

---

[45] Cf. chap. 9, n. 58.

[46] In "My Memories," Dublin Review 160 (April 1917), 171, quoted according to J. T. Ellis: "If the Knights of Labour were not condemned by the Church, then the Church ran the risk of combining against herself every element of wealth and power . . . . But if the Church did not protect the working man she would have been false to her whole history; and this the Church can never be."—In the Catholic Quarterly Review, G. D. Wolff said openly in April 1886 what forces Gibbons had to fear: "It is futile for the public press to be constantly preaching platitudes concerning patience and respect for the law, whilst evasions and defiant violations, constantly practiced by mammoth capitalists and corporations, are ignored, condoned and approved de facto."

[47] See E. Angermann, op. cit., 309, who quotes the motto of the organization: "Everyone be his own master—everyone be his own employer," which suggests a certain parallel to the Vogelsang school (chap. 12); F. Downing (op. cit., 852) does not exclude the possibility that the expressed ecclesiastical toleration was one of the factors for the decline.

[48] T. Powderly, in 1893 dismissed by his organization as first master workman, joined the Freemasons in 1901 and died in 1924, excommunicated. L. Hertling (op. cit., 202) assesses him basically negatively, while F. Downing (op. cit., 852) shows some psychological understanding of this personal development.

[49] F. Downing, op. cit., 856.

[50] F. L. Broderick, Right Reverend New Dealer: John A. Ryan (New York 1963); Ryan was very critical about the social interest of the major part of the clergy. In regard to Ireland he said: "The archbishop's associations were with the pillars of the contemporary economic order"; the big businessmen, with whom he was friends, he considered "good men" (Social Doctrine in Action [New York 1941], 21–27).

The case of the New York priest Edward McGlynn (1839–1900)[52] turned into a theoretical social conflict with strong ecclesiastical and political overtones. McGlynn had lobbied for the land reform theory of Henry George and for his candidacy (1886) as mayor of New York.[53] The fact that Archbishop Corrigan had forbidden it only promoted fanaticism. After two citations ordering him to come to Rome, which he did not obey, McGlynn was suspended (1887). But in 1892, as a result of Gibbons's approval (mediated by Delegate Satolli), he was reinstated. Since Corrigan had failed to secure approval for his proposal to place the writings of Henry George on the Index because Gibbons's group opposed it,[54] this act was a serious disavowal of the archbishop.

The concept which Gibbons and his friends held of the relationship between the Church and society as a whole finds its most definite expression in their active participation in the Religion Congress of 1893 in Chicago, which was organized in the context of the World's Columbian Exposition. Jews, Moslems, Hindus, and followers of other religions had been invited.[55] Its president was the Presbyterian J. H. Barrows, who declared that no one was expected to sacrifice even the most insignificant part of his faith. Gibbons's position in the public of the United States of America is illuminated by the fact that he recited the Lord's Prayer after his welcoming speech. John Keane, one of the twenty speakers (among them Ireland and Hecker's biographer, Elliot), gave the concluding speech, which he repeated in 1894 at the Catholic Congress of Scholars in Brussels. None of the participating Catholics was religiously indifferent,[56] but they were all of the conviction that the Roman Catholic faith could not be absent from the register of world religions in the United States of America. Writing to Satolli in September 1895, Leo XIII stated that so far he had tolerated interdenominational conventions quietly; he preferred, however, Catholic events to which non-Catholics were invited.[57]

---

[51] M. H. Fox, Peter E. Dietz, Labor Priest (Notre Dame 1953).

[52] S. Bell, Rebel, Priest and Prophet. A Biography of E. McGlynn (New York 1937).

[53] The Single Tax Theory of Henry George provides that real estate tax be paid to the government as the only tax. In this respect, he criticizes the papal social doctrine in his essay "The Condition of Labour" (1894), which was published as an "open letter to his Holiness Pope Leo XIII" (H. Pesch, "Henry George und die Enzyklika 'Rerum novarum,' " StdZ 74 [1894], 365–82, 523–44; L. Hertling, op. cit., 206–08, 226).

[54] In April 1889, only a few sentences in an unpublished letter to the American episcopate by George were censored.

[55] L. Hertling, op. cit., 226ff.

It was the first year of the crisis. The long brief Longinqua Oceani of 6 January 1895 was full of praise for the United States and the religious zeal of the Catholics. However, it contained a paragraph which was understandable in view of the Pope's opinion of the relation between Church and state in "Catholic" countries and especially in view of his expectations in regard to France. At the same time, it questioned the sociological foundations of American Catholicism.[58] It may be acceptable to say that the separation of Church and state as practiced in America was not the best of all possibilities under any circumstances. But the Pope's remark that the fruits of the development of ecclesiastical life would be a lot more plentiful if the Church would enjoy, aside from freedom, the favor of the law and the patronage of the public authorities,[59] offended the secular creed of every citizen in the United States. Even Corrigan wrote to Gibbons that it was fortunate that the non-Catholics had not taken offense.[60] But this was not only a matter of concern for the non-Catholics. One cannot assume that the paragraph in the Pope's letter was incidental. That same year, Denis O'Connell was recalled from Rome; in November the same happened to Satolli, and in September 1896, Keane was dismissed as president of the university. In connection with the conditions in France and the situation in general, the "American way" turned into the ecclesiastical problem of "Americanism".

Gibbons's concept had failed. On 6 June 1911, the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination, thousands of visitors assembled, among them President W. H. Taft and former president T. Roosevelt, whose visit in Rome the previous year had resulted in complications with the Vatican.[61] But Gibbons no longer held center stage. In 1911, William H. O'Connell (1859–1944), whom Gibbons had made the successor of Denis J. O'Connell at the American College (1895),[62] was elevated to cardinal of Boston, after an official hierarchy had been established in the United States in 1908 through the apostolic constitution Sapienti consilio. In 1905, following the Russo-Japanese War, William H. O'Connell visited the Emperor of Japan on a special mission for Pope Pius X. He diligently supported the organization and funding of missions at the congress of 1908 in Chicago and of 1913 in Boston. He was a man of the new era.[63] The construction of Saint Patrick's Cathedral in New York, begun in 1858 in a neo-Gothic style (like most Catholic churches), was completed in 1906.

---

[56] L. Hertling, op. cit., 228: "The dominant theme [of the congress] stated that all religions are equally good, this being the kind of religious indifferentism which Gibbons in his opening address had wanted to exclude"; one should hardly assume that any religion would be termed inferior at this congress. That Gibbons participated in the opening was an expression of his concept; that he stayed away from the other meetings was in consideration of his office.

[57] Quoted according to L. Hertling, op. cit., 233.

[58] ASS 27, 387–99, here 390.

[59] "Longe tamen uberiores [Ecclesia] editura fructus, si, praeter libertatem, gratia legum fruatur patrocinioque publicae potestatis." (cf. chap. 14.)

[60] Quoted according to L. Hertling, op. cit., 233.

[61] Schmidlin, PG III, 66, 116; cf. below, Introduction to Pt. II, n. 6.

[62] Cf. n. 24.

[63] "I have never hesitated to speak as plainly as possible . . . whenever direction was needed"; quoted according to D. G. Wayman: Catholic Encyclopedia 10 (1967), 637.

CHAPTER 11

Catholicism in the Slavic World until 1914

Russia, as one of the great powers, lost its supremacy in Europe after its defeat in the Crimean War, but it preserved its leadership over all Slavs and propagandized for the liberation of all Slavic peoples in the Austro-Hungarian Empire and Turkey by employing, aside from foreign politics, pan-slavic idealism. The Orthodox Russian State Church, with its representation at the Holy Synod, left little chance for development to the Catholics within the Russian area of influence; the Poles especially were oppressed. Because of the impact of liberalism and nationalistic tensions, Catholic Slavs found themselves in a difficult position in the Austro-Hungarian Dual Monarchy, in the small countries in southern Europe, and in the areas of Turkey remaining after the Balkan Wars. Their efforts to preserve the mother tongue in education and preaching, which they had a right to according to Church laws and decrees,[1] created widespread conflicts, which had been caused by state orders and which could only partially be resolved.

The Russian Empire

Following the Polish uprising in 1863/64, the introduction of the Russian language into schools and church services in 1869–77, and the close collaboration of some Polish prelates and the Russian government, a break between the Holy See and Russia occurred. When the Russian diplomatic agent Prince Leon Urosov refused to accept the memorandum of 11 July 1877 which had been drafted and delivered by Cardinal Secretary of State Giovanni Simeoni and contained fifteen complaints concerning the persecution of Catholics in Russia and Poland, he was pronounced persona non grata by the Vatican.

---

[1] T. Grentrup, op. cit., 121–381.

By announcing to the "Highest Emperor and King" Alexander II (1855–81) his coronation on 20 December 1878, Pope Leo XIII tried to loosen the rigid political fronts and establish diplomatic relations with Russia. He gave his Nuncio Ludovico Jacobini full authority to conduct preliminary talks in Vienna. These resulted in a provisional agreement on 31 October 1880[2] and, after exhaustive negotiations between Jacobini (meanwhile elevated to secretary of state) and the Russian negotiators, a settlement was reached on 24 December 1882.[3] The partners agreed on the administration of the bishoprics of Minsk, Podlachia, and Kamieniec under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Mogilev and bishop of Luck-Zytomierz, on the subordination of seminaries and the Clerical Academy of Saint Petersburg to ecclesiastical direction and state supervision, and on lifting the government strictures against the clergy decreed in 1865–66. The regulation requiring that studies in Russian language, history, and literature should be increased in ecclesiastical academic institutions and indifference to the controversial problems of the oppressed Uniates foreshadowed future conflicts in spite of the agreements achieved. Moreover, the Chief Procurator, Constantin Petrovich Pobedonostsev, made no secret of his dislike of the agreement and deplored the concession to the Catholic Church, which he presented as a danger to the existence of the Russian state. As the tutor of Alexander III (1881–94), who came to power after the assassination of Alexander II, he exerted great influence on the young Tsar. He was filled with the ideals of the "Holy Russia" of the old Moscow, and wanted to overcome the internal strife within Russia by reenforcing the Orthodox State Church and by fighting against the liberal reforms and revolutionary elements. Since he rejected Catholicism, which had, traditionally, deep roots in many areas in the country, he regarded the agreement with the Vatican as pandering to revolutionary elements. He considered disastrous an alliance between the Pope and the Orthodox State Church, which, in his opinion, offered the only defense against the autocracy of the Tsar, even though Foreign Minister Prince Alexander Gortšakov and others recognized the restoration forces of the papacy. Anxious to offer moral support against revolutionary currents and to conlcude the Kulturkampf in Germany and Russia, Leo XIII endeavored to come to an understanding with Alexander III. His first success was the reorganization of the Church hierarchy by preconization of twelve prelates with whom he filled the vacancies in the archbishopric of Mogilev, in the suffragan bishoprics of Kovno, Luck-Zytomierz, Tiraspol, and Vilnius, as well as in the archbishopric of Warsaw, in the suffragan bishoprics of Kalisz, Kielce, Lublin, Plock, Sandomierz, and Seyny. The new pastors, especially Kazimierz Gintovt of Mogilev (1883–89) and Vincenty Teophil Popiel of Warsaw (1883–1912), tried to eliminate the obstacles to ecclesiastical life posed by the Russian State Church.

---

[2] A. Boudou, op. cit., 553–55.

[3] Ibid., 556–58; Mercati I, 1016–18.

The measures of the state against the Uniates and the pressures to employ the Russian language in preaching and instructions as well as the regulations of 16 January 1885 regarding the appointment of clergy (who could function only after the respective governors or governors-general in the Vistula regions had given their approval), effected another break in diplomatic relations between Russia and the Vatican. They were not resumed until after 1887/88.[4] In 1890, Leo XIII appointed a number of new bishops for Russia. On 18 June 1894, Alexander Izvolski, Imperial Russian diplomatic agent in the Vatican since 1888, became resident minister to the Holy See. Count Frederick Revertera, the Austro-Hungarian ambassador to the Vatican, called the papal efforts in regard to an understanding with Russia a "midsummer night's dream,"[5] but Leo XIII was able to ordain seven more bishops for Russia in 1896. The accession of Nicholas II (1894–1917) seemed to warrant new hopes. In 1899 the Tsar gave his permission for the construction of a new church in Saint Petersburg. But the erection of a nunciature, which the Pope desired, did not follow. In a letter to the Tsar of 21 September 1899, Chief Procurator Pobedonostsev appointed himself spokesman for the widespread mistrust toward the papacy. He ended the letter with the words: "May God save Russia from a papal nuncio."[6] He did not want to diminish the competency of the Holy Synod and of the dominant position of Orthodoxy in Russia.

By 1900, 70 percent of the Russian population were members of the Orthodox Church. After them, the Moslems and the Roman Catholics formed the strongest religious groups. Of the approximately 10 million Catholics, two-thirds were Poles;[7] the rest were Lithuanians, White

---

[4] E. Winter, Rußland und das Papsttum II, 381–454; Winter emphasizes the Vatican's part in the French-Russian treaty in its ecclesiastical policies toward Russia.

[5] F. Engel-Janosi, op. cit. I, 268.

[6] E. Winter, Rußland und das Papsttum II, 478.

[7] In 1889, there were 9,679,818 Catholics in Poland and Russia, 5,932,123 of whom lived in the Russian part of Poland; cf. W. Urban, op. cit., 255.

Russians, Ukranians, Latvians, and Germans.[8] At the beginning of the twentieth century, state funds for the Orthodox Church amounted to about 30 million rubles, while the Catholics received only about 1.5 million rubles. Payment of state salaries to the Catholic clergy through the Roman Catholic Clerical College in Saint Petersburg considerably limited their independence. The entire correspondence between the Church administration and the Curia was conducted through the Ministry of the Interior. The preconized bishops (in each case it took exhaustive negotiations in order to find a candidate who was acceptable to both the tsarist government and the Vatican) were appointed by the Tsar. He also had to confirm in office all canons and other dignitaries. An instruction from the minister of education of 1900 demanded that the topics for final examinations in seminaries be in the Russian language and include history. Since this regulation was not followed by the Polish bishops, numerous clergymen could not be employed. Archbishop Józef Elias Szembek of Mogilev (1903–05) conducted a bishops' synod in 1904, during which the Roman Catholic episcopate of Russia compiled its demands to present to the government.

A manifesto, issued on 22 February 1903 by Nicholas II, expressed religious toleration and acknowledged the freedom of the Catholic Church to act, but it did not alleviate the distress of the Catholics in any way. Only after defeat in the Russo-Japanese War of 1904/05 and the proclamation of a constitutional system of government at the end of 1904 did the Tsar decide to issue a statement in which reforms were promised (e.g., freedom of belief and conscience). On 30 April 1905, he published a belief and toleration edict, which was followed by amnesties for religious offenders; this filled the Catholics with confidence. The Orthodox Church was termed the prevailing Church; it was allowed to maintain the right of propaganda; the penalties against those who left the Church and converted to another religious congregation were abolished. The Russian Old Believers, who had been cruelly persecuted since their separation from the Orthodox Church in the second half of the seventeenth century, could relax. The situation of the Catholics seemed particularly to improve, since the Tsar, in a manifesto of 30 October 1905, ordered the government "to give the population immovable foundations of civil freedom according to the principles of absolute inalienable personal rights, freedom of conscience and speech, and the right of assembly."[9] Also, the resignations of Chief Procurator Pobedonostsev and his deputy C. V. Sabler were interpreted as a weakening of the supremacy of the Russian Orthodox Church over all other Christian confessions.

---

[8] For the Catholic settler who had migrated to the south of Russia in the second half of the eighteenth century, the bishopric of Cherson was made a suffragan bishopric of the archbishopric of Mogilev (1848). It was transferred to Tiraspol in 1852. Saratov on the Volga River became an episcopal see. Under the leadership of Bishops Franz Xaver Zottmann (1872–89), Eduard Baron von Ropp (1902–04), and Joseph Aloysius Keßler (since 1904, resigned 1929) a favorable development commenced, despite the fact that the Catholics suffered from Russification measures. In 1914, the diocese included 350,000 faithful, 90 percent of whom were Germans (cf. B. Stasiewski, Die kirchliche Organisation, 279–83).—The total number of German Catholics in Russia before World War I was 500,000; 80,000 lived in Siberia.

The optimism of the Catholics was soon shaken. At first, some relief was given them, for instance in the controversial language question. In 1906, the Curia yielded to the pressures to use the Russian language in preaching, and on 22 July 1907 it came to an agreement with Russia[10] concerning Russian language, history, and literature in the Catholic seminaries in Poland. After 1908, the Catholic monthly publication Truth and Faith appeared in Russian in Saint Petersburg. From the beginning, its editorial office had to struggle with censorship and in 1912 its publication was forbidden. It was replaced by the Russian paper Words of Truth (1913), which lobbied for the preservation of the Uniates's rites, among other things, but which collapsed in 1915.

The regime survived the year of crisis (1905/06). But after its stabilization, it stunted the growth of parliamentary life by suspending the First and Second Duma (1906/07), and through certain regulations and administrative measures it turned the relief granted to the non-Orthodox churches into an illusion. At the fourth Missions Congress in Odessa in 1908, Orthodox bishops demanded that the bishops be reprimanded and that the toleration edict be voided. In 1907, Eduard Baron von Ropp, since 1904 bishop of Vilna and a member of the First Duma and of the Catholic Conservative party, which he had founded, was recalled by Nicholas II because he had resisted the introduction of the Russian language into Catholic church services. He was replaced by an administrator sent by the Curia. In 1909, Bishop Cyrtovt of Kovno, together with three hundred clergymen, was accused of having failed to comply with the required formalities when converting from the Orthodox to the Roman Catholic Church. In 1910 the Catholic bishops were forbidden to deal directly with the Curia and to publish papal decrees without the permission of the government. The marriage decree Ne temere of the Council Congregation of 2 August 1907, the encyclical Pascendi dominici gregis of 8 September 1907 (concerning modernism), and the motu proprio Sacrorum antistitum of 1 September 1910 (concerning the antimodernist oath) were not allowed to be published. In 1911, the nearly eighty-year-old administrator of the archbishopric of Mogilev, Titular Archbishop Stefan Anton Denisovič, was held responsible in Saint Petersburg for having established a Marianist Congregation in Moscow. His successor as archbishop of Mogilev, Vincenty Kluczyński (1910–14), was so worn down by the government's reprisals that he resigned in 1914.

---

[9] P. Scheibert (ed.), Die russischen politischen Parteien von 1905 bis 1917. Ein Dokumentationsband (Darmstadt 1972), 29.

[10] Mercati I, 1097–98.

On the eve of World War I, the Catholics were being suppressed in Russia just as they had been in the nineteenth century. The Roman Catholic Clerical College in Saint Petersburg, which was responsible for the joint affairs of the dioceses, consisted of the archbishop of Mogilev and two members appointed by the Tsar from among the higher clergy and from assistants elected in the various dioceses.[11] The government maintained a controlling influence, especially the Department of Foreign Cults in the Ministry of the Interior, in spite of the papal protests that the jurisdiction of the College be limited to merely material affairs. The hierarchy consisted of 15 bishoprics, including the archbishopric of Mogilev with 7 and the archbishopric of Warsaw with 6 suffragan bishoprics. Each bishop took care of a seminary. After the suspension of the Warsaw Academy (1867) there was only one academic institution of university rank, the Roman Catholic Clerical Academy in Saint Petersburg, which earned a reputation through its scholarly and ascetic training of qualified clergymen (53 bishops came from this institution).[12]

The effectiveness of the bishops and the secular and regular clergy in dealing with the faithful entrusted to them and in securing their loyal observance of Catholic traditions was wasted by their defensive stand against state pressures. The Russification measures, which were mostly aimed at the Catholics of Latin and Uniate rites, showed that Catholicism was merely tolerated. Catholicism was exposed to new burdens by the war, the consequences of the October Revolution of 1917 relative to ecclesiastical policies, and the growing independence of Poland and the surrounding Baltic areas after World War I.

The Three Polish Territories

After the fourth division of Poland at the Congress of Vienna, Russia possessed 82 percent, Austria 10 percent, and Prussia 8 percent of the Polish-Lithuanian Empire, which had been dissolved through its partitioning at the end of the eighteenth century. The Polish question kept the European cabinets busy until the Republic of Poland was founded in

---

[11] W. Gribowski, op. cit., 169.

[12] W. Urban, op. cit., 291.

1918. The passionate determination of the Poles to retain their language and their heritage, the activities of the emigrants, the hope of recovering freedom and unity by being doubly loyal toward the three dividing powers (after the failure of the uprisings in 1831, 1846, 1848, and 1863/64), the dissolution of the Russian Empire, and the defeat of the Central Powers were essential prerequisites for the restoration of the national independence of Poland. During these efforts, the Catholic Church formed a unifying link, transcending political boundaries. In the Resurrectionist Congregation of Priests, whose members were devoted to pastoral work, education, and tutorial activities, faith in the resurrection of Christ mixed in a curious way with belief in the resurrection of Poland.

In Russian territory, after the failure of the uprising of 1863/64 in which several Catholic clergymen had participated, the governor general of the western provinces enforced a rigorous regime, with reprisals against the bishops and priests continuing throughout the next decades: the closing of monasteries, the dissolution of the Uniate bishopric of Chelm (1875), the supervision of pastoral work, and measures aimed at the introduction of the Russian language into the Church. Leo XIII tried to relieve the predicament of the Polish Catholics by direct negotiations with the Tsars Alexander II and III and Nicholas II. The Poles were afraid that their national interests were being threatened by the Pope's agreement with the Russian government. In a public consistory on 19 February 1889, Leo XIII tried to defend himself against these charges. At the same time, through one of his directives, he impressed upon the newly appointed Polish bishops that their mission was to serve the mutual accord and friendly harmony between spiritual and secular powers.[13] The Pope's warnings to the Poles to obey the law and be loyal to the Russian Tsar, and his epistula encyclica to the Polish bishops of 19 March 1894,[14] which reminded clergy and laity of their duty as subjects of the Tsar, contributed little to détente. In spite of agreement concerning the appointment of bishops and official willingness to comply with the wishes of the Curia, nothing changed in regard to the curtailment of freedom for Polish Catholics.

In 1886 the regulation requiring that the construction of a church could be allowed only by the minister of the interior, after consultation with the responsible governor and Orthodox bishop, was extended to Polish territory. The regulation was also valid for non-Orthodox religious congregations. The government placed special emphasis on religious instruction conducted in the Russian language. The law of 4 March 1885 regarding the Polish elementary schools left the decision to the curator of the Warsaw school district. He was to share the decision with the governor general whether Catholic religious instruction was to be given in Polish or Russian. In higher schools, the Orthodox teachers taught in Russian, since the Catholic priests refused to abandon their native language. In 1892, all Catholic parochial schools were placed under the supervision of the minister of national education. The result was the founding of secret Catholic parochial schools. To prevent the construction and maintenance of these illegal schools, penal regulations were enacted and again enforced in 1900. The aforementioned instructions of the minister of national education regarding examinations in seminaries were disobeyed, with the result that the governor general in Warsaw did not recognize the examinations and the appointment of newly ordained priests. When Tsar Nicholas II allowed them to reapply for the examination, there was no response. By 1905 the number of unemployed priests had risen to 156, the number of vacant parishes to 263. When, in the same year, the instruction was cancelled, the authorities declared their willingness to confirm even those candidates who had not taken an examination in the Russian language.

---

[13] E. Winter, Rußland und das Papsttum II, 421.

[14] Acta Leonis V (1898), 243–54.

Nicholas II's edicts of toleration of April and October 1905 were enthusiastically welcomed by the Poles, since it seemed that the free development of their ecclesiastical life was now guaranteed. On 3 December 1905, the Pope addressed the Polish bishops of the Russian Empire,[15] praising them for their loyalty to the Apostolic See and demanding that they stand up for the preservation of peace, justice, and Christian education. The tensions regarding the language questions were eliminated, as can be deduced from the convention signed in Rome on 22 July 1907.[16] The number of houses of religious, which had rapidly decreased in the first decades and had only slowly risen at the end of the nineteenth century, increased again. Charity centers[17] and social activities commenced, e.g., the circle of young girls which had been organized by Countess Cecylia Plater-Zyberk and published the monthly Stream (Prąd), in order to waken the population to the social responsibilities of Catholicism. Representatives of the Catholic intelligentsia, such as Wladyslaw Reymont (1869–1925) and Henryk Sienkiewicz (1846–1916), were practicing Catholics.

The majority of the Catholics forced into Orthodoxy and belonging to the dissolved (1875) Uniate bishopric of Chelm had to suffer from the Russification measures and wanted to call upon the toleration edict of 1905. Since they were forbidden to return to their faith, about two hundred and thirty thousand converted from the Orthodox Church to Roman Catholicism between 1905 and 1910. In other parts of northwestern and southwestern Russia, people who earlier had been forcefully converted to Orthodoxy now rejoined the Catholic Church. The Orthodox bishops, supported by the Holy Synod, organized counterpropaganda. The Orthodox Bishop Evlogi Georgievski of the recently created eparchy of Chelm, a diligent representative of the Russification policy, convinced the Third Duma to create the province of Chelm, a new ecclesiastical entity comprised of parts of the provinces of Lublin and Kielce (1912).[18] The purpose was to halt the expansion of Catholicism. As early as 1908, an Orthodox mission congress in Kiev had demanded the revocation of the toleration edict. The Association of the Russian People of 1906 requested in 1909 that the false interpretation of the Easter manifesto come to an end and that freedom to proselytize be granted only to the Russian State Church. In 1912, the Orthodox Bishop Nikolai of Warsaw declared in the State Council that the historic task of the Russian state used to be and still was the Russification of everything non-Russian and the conversion to Orthodoxy of everyone who was not a member.[19] [15] AAS XXVIII (1905–06), 321–27.

---

[16] Mercati I, 1097–98.

[17] K. Górski, L'Histoire de la spiritualité polonaise: Le millénaire du catholicism en Pologne (Lublin 1969), 340–42.

The growing pressure against Polish Catholicism was evidenced by the fact, among other things, that foreigners who had established religious orders after 1905 were expelled in 1910, e.g., the Redemptorists of Warsaw and the Franciscan friars of Lódź. When, on 21 January 1911, the priests came to Lublin to take the antimodernist oath, they were forced by police upon their arrival to depart immediately. They were informed that the papal directives were not valid in Russia, since they had not been announced via the proper channels of the state authorities.

In order to weaken Catholicism, the government and the Orthodox Church patronized the Mariavites,[20] who had developed from a society of nuns founded by Felicja Kozlowska (1862–1921) and an association of secular priests founded by Jan Maria Kowalski (1893), which strove for religious renewal among the clergy and people. The Mariavites' Eucharistic and Marian devotion tended toward mysticism and therefore the organization was not approved by Rome. The association of priests was proscribed by the Holy Office in 1904; on 5 December 1906, Jan

---

[18] 476,432 Catholics and 278,311 Orthodox lived in this area in 1913, cf. W. Urban, op. cit., 224.

[19] Ibid., 224.

[20] Ibid., 178–84, 245.

Kowalski, Felicja Kozlowska, and forty priests were excommunicated. As minister general, Kowalski organized a Marian Union, which on 28 November 1906 was recognized by the Russian cabinet council as a special Catholic religious community. In spite of repeated condemnation by the Roman authorities, the Mariavites spread quickly because of their support by the state; in 1909 a law regarding Mariavite parishes secured their position. Negotiations between Kowalski and the Utrecht Union resulted in the acceptance of the union by the Old Catholic churches. Kowalski had the bishop of Utrecht, Gerhard Gul, consecrate him as bishop and he established a new hierarchy with four bishoprics. The number of Mariavites may have reached a maximum of three hundred thousand to four hundred thousand when the Russian government and Orthodox dignitaries was supporting them in any way possible in order to halt the influence of the Roman Catholic Church. Even before World War I, many had left the new church. In spite of decline due to internal and external problems it is still in existence.

In Galicia, one of the Cisleithan crownlands of the Habsburgs, the Catholics were not as defensive as in Russia. In the first half of the nineteenth century, they were exposed to the effects of the state church, Viennese centralism and Germanization. However, they were aided by the self-government which the cities and rural communities had been granted in 1849, by the concordat between Pius IX and Emperor Franz I, concluded in 1855, but annulled in 1870 by Emperor Franz Joseph, and by the constitution of 1867, which favored Polish aspirations toward autonomy. Count Agenor Goluchowski, governor of Galicia, decreed the introduction of the Polish language in the schools, the courts, and civil offices. Numerous Poles were promoted by the Austrian government to the ministerial ranks and two of them to minister president (Count Alfred Potocki in 1870/71 and Count Kazimierz Badeni in 1895/97). They strengthened the special position of Galicia so that it became a "Polish Piedmont."[21] The Polonization of the two national universities in Crakow and Lemberg (which had Catholic theological faculties), the founding of the Crakow Academy for the Sciences (1872), and the collaboration of the conservative Galician aristocracy with the imperial court secured the political superiority of the Poles (about 45 percent of the total population of over 43 percent Ukrainians, 11 percent Jews, and 1 percent Germans).

Polish Catholicism of the Latin rite, which consisted of about 3.5 million faithful in 1910, had a somewhat tense relationship with the approximately 3 million Uniate Ukrainians[22] because of national differences. Even though the solution presented by the Concordat of 1870 resulted in several difficulties within the Catholic educational system and in other areas of the Church's public activity, the ecclesiastical organization of the archbishopric of Lemberg with the suffragan bishoprics of Przemysl and Tarnow and the prince bishopric of Crakow, which was placed under the jurisdiction of the Holy See in 1880 and expanded in 1886 through several deaneries of the diocese of Tarnow, could be enlarged. Outstanding Church politicians, theological writers, and priests were bishops like Cardinal Albin Dunajewski (1879–1914) and Prince Jan Kozielsko-Puzyna (1895–1910) of Cracow,[23] Archbishop Jozef Bielczewski of Lemberg (1900–23), Bishop Leon Walega of Tarnow (1901–33), and Jozef Sebastian Pelczar of Przemysl (died 1924). They were in close contact with the Holy See, as is documented by the letters of congratulation on the occasion of the silver anniversary of Cardinal Puzyna on 4 March 1911[24] and the golden anniversary of Bishop Pelczar's ordination to the priesthood.[25] [21] G. Rhode, op. cit., 413.

---

[22] Cf. below, pp. 369f.

The Polish educational system made possible the development of an academic staff in science, art, and journalism. Aside from theological, mostly pastoral publications, the monthly Przegląd Powszechny (General Review) appeared in 1883 under the direction of the Jesuits, in which prominent Catholics wrote leading commentaries on fundamental questions of current interest. It became the main publication of Polish Catholicism known beyond the borders of Galicia.

Since Galicia's economic development did not keep pace with its intellectual and spiritual life, and the large increase in population could not be absorbed by industrialization, the peasantry was in danger of progressive deterioration. The Church was aware of its duties in dealing with social problems. In the face of the predominant conservatism of the Polish episcopate, pastor Stanislaw Stojalowski took an interest in the farmers and workers. He struggled against the Conservative Polish People's Party, which he stigmatized as antisocial and, because of its collaboration with the Austrian government, as antinational. He also displayed a socialist attitude and was therefore relieved of his parish and, in 1896, excommunicated and suspended. Both verdicts were lifted shortly afterward. In spite of Leo XIII's ban on his writing and preaching, and in spite of the complaints by Prince-Bishop Puzyna, he remained active on behalf of the Polish Peasants Party until his death in 1911.[26] Other clergymen, such as suffragan Bishop Dr. Josef Weber of [23] Regarding the veto during papal elections in 1903, see above, p. 53.

---

[24] ASS III (1911), 160.

[25] Ibid. VI (1914), 181.

[26] E. Winter, Rußland und die slawischen Völker, 111–16, 159–65; F. Engel-Janosi, op. cit. I, 315–16; E. Winter, Rußland und das Papsttum II, 496.

Lemberg, worked in accord with Leo's ecclesiastical policies, which aimed at harmonious cooperation with the state. This is reflected in the address given by the Pope on 21 April 1888 to pilgrims from Galicia and Bukovina.[27] The social encyclical Rerum novarum of 15 May 1891 received attention here as well. Bishop Jozef Sebastian Pelczar initiated the founding of a Catholic Social Association in Przemysl in 1906, whose aims were the propagation of Catholic social principles.

Religious life was influenced by representatives of the older orders and younger religious communities. Jesuits who had been expelled from Prussia during the Kulturkampf found a new sphere of activity in Galicia. The Pallotines tried to establish a press apostolate in Lemberg in 1908. The Redemptorists formed an independent Polish province in the same year. Several new communities appeared: the male and female Albertines, founded by Adam Chmielowski (1845–1916), who followed the example of the Third Order of Saint Francis; the Sisters of Archangel Michael (Michaelitki), founded by Bronislaw Markiewicz (1842–1912); and the Fraternity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Queen of the Crown of Poland, inspired by Bishop Pelczar.

In the Prussian territory, the differences between the Protestant government and the Catholics, particularly the Polish-speaking population, had increased through the decades. After settlement of the conflict with Archbishop Martin Dunin of Gnesen-Posen (1831–42), his successor, Archbishop Leo von Przyluski (1845–65) persistently stood up for the restoration of Polish rights. In 1859, in the gardens of Saint Martin's Church in Posen, a memorial was erected for the Polish poet Adam Mickiewicz (1798–1855), a sign of the increase in the Polish national awareness in the ecclesiastical realm. The colonizing and Germanization tendencies of the Prussian state contributed to the growth of the Polish national consciousness. After 1870, the Polish policy of the German Empire created a struggle of nationalities in the eastern German regions, which continued (with few interruptions) until 1918. The school supervision law of 1871 and the decree requiring the use of German in the Polish schools of Silesia (1872), Posen, and West Prussia (1873), the systematic abolition of the Polish language in higher schools (1872–90), the introduction of German as the only official language in all public offices and businesses (1876), the anti-Polish measure during the Kulturkampf burdened the situation in regard to Church policy.[28]

---

[27] Acta Leonis III (1893), 61–62.

[28] J. Buzek, Historya polityki narodowościowej rządu pruskiego wobec Polaków od traktatów wiedeńskich do ustaw wyjątkowych z r 1908 (Lemberg 1909); B. Stasieski, "Zur Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in Posen," Geschichte der Stadt Posen, ed. by G. Rhode (Neuendettelsau 1953), 219–21; L. Trzeciakowski, "Stosunki między państwem a koś-

Archbishop Miecislaus Ledóchowski of Gnesen-Posen (1865–86), who endorsed Polish religious instruction in high school classes and paid no attention to the so-called May laws, was the first bishop to be arrested (on 2 February 1874) and to be dismissed by the State Court of Justice in Berlin. In 1875, the time of his imprisonment in Ostrowo, Pius IX created him a cardinal for his courageous defense of the faith. After his expulsion he proceeded to send directives from Rome to his areas of jurisdiction and was subsequently penalized with fines for having usurped episcopal rights. During the negotiations to end the Kulturkampf, he was willing to resign. Aside from Ledóchowski, both his suffragan bishops, Janiszewski of Posen and Cybichowski of Gnesen, together with nearly 100 clergymen were arrested during the Kulturkampf, so that 97 parishes were vacant and 200,000 Catholics were deprived of proper pastoral care. The diocesan administrative offices were maintained by secret delegates empowered with special plenipotentiary authority. In spite of state pressures, the Polish Catholics were not discouraged by the Kulturkampf. They accepted the challenge and intensified their efforts to expand their social, cultural, and ecclesiastical independence.

After Ledóchowski's resignation, Pope Leo XIII made an attempt to eliminate the Kulturkampf laws by appointing Pastor Julius Dinder of Königsberg (originally from Ermland), archbishop of Gnesen-Posen (1886–90), and the only German in a long series of bishops who wanted to alleviate nationalism in the controversies regarding ecclesiastical policy. The Pope's attempt failed. He tried in vain to reach an agreement concerning the government's language policies, which were passionately rejected in Poland. Both clergy and diocesan officials ignored his directives and suggestions.

The expulsion of twenty-six thousand foreigners (1885–86) from the eastern provinces,[29] the settlement law of 1886, the East Marches Society of 1894, the fireplace law of 1904 (which was to limit new Polish settlements), the law regarding societies of 1908 (which required that even Polish societies use the German language in their statutes and ciołem katolickim w zaborze pruskim w latach 1871–1914," Studia i materiały do dziejów Wielkopolski i Pomorza 9 (1968), 59–80; id., Kulturkampf w zaborze pruskim (Poznan 1970); L. Borodziej, Pruska polityka oświatowa na ziemiach polskich w okresie Kulturkampfu (Warsaw 1971); T. G. Jackowski, "Samoobrona polaków przed pruską polityką eksterminacyjną w końcu XIX i na początku XX wieku w poznańskiem," Przegląd Zachodni 27 (1971), 139–51.

---

[29] H. Neubach, Die Ausweisungen russischer und österreichischer Staatsangehöriger aus Preußen in den Jahren 1885/86. Ihre Rolle in der deutschen Polenpolitik and in der Entwicklung des deutsch-polnischen Verhältnisses (Würzburg 1966).

meetings), and the expropriation law of 1908[30] (which Cardinal Georg Kopp opposed in the House of Lords the same year) intensified the national struggle. During this time, the Poles were able to preserve and strengthen their national characteristics with determined efforts, through parliamentary activities of their factions in the Prussian Provincial Diet and the German Reichstag, and through cooperative societies and business organizations. Prelate Piotr Wawrzyniak (from 1892 until his death in 1910 president of the Polish savings bank cooperatives) and other clergymen tried to prevent the purchase of real estate from Polish hands and pursued a successful Polish settlement policy on parcelled latifundias.

Above all, the Poles demanded the reinstatement of Polish as the language of instruction in elementary schools, especially in religious instruction.[31] Their demands for the use of their own language were supported by the Center Party and the German Catholic conventions (1891–92, 1893, 1899, and 1900). Archbishop Florian Oksza-Stablewski of Gnesen-Posen (1891–1906) advocated the preservation of Polish as the language of religious instruction. He also objected to government measures requiring that the twelve- to fourteen-year-old pupils of elementary schools in Wrzesnia speak German during religion classes, which had resulted in the Wrzesnia school strike (1901). He also protested the decree demanding that 20 schools in the administrative district of Posen and 183 schools in the area of Bromberg use German during religious instruction, which had resulted in an extensive school strike in 1906. In a pastoral letter of 8 October 1906,[32] Oksza-Stablewski gave a summary of his efforts toward the protection of Polish religious instruction. He asked parents and clergy to devote more energy to the catechization of the young. He did not witness the end of the school strike, which lasted into 1907. At the beginning of the strike, 90,000 of the 241,000 children received religious instruction in Polish. In 1906, nearly 47,000 Polish children refused to attend 750 schools in the province of Posen. Since the government took rigorous steps against the parents and clergy,[33] the tensions remained.

---

[30] This caused international indignation, cf. H. Sienkiewicz, Prusse et Pologne. Enquête internationale organisée (Paris 1909). The expropriation law was not applied until 1912 and those four cases received compensation.

[31] T. Grentrup, op. cit., 266–69; J. Chamot, "Rola kleru katolickiego w strajku szkolnym w Wielkopolsce 1906/07," Studia z dziejów kościoła katolickiego 1 (1960), 101–12; R. Korth, Die preußische Schulpolitik und die polnischen Schulstreiks. Ein Beitrag zur preußischen Polenpolitik der Ära Bülow (Würzburg 1963); M. Pirko, "Stanowisko arcybiskupa Floriana Stablewskiego na tle polityki rządowej w sprawie wrzesińskiej," Studia z dziejów kościoła katolickiego 5 (1967), 88–106.

[32] R. Korth, op. cit., 161–62.

From 1906 until 1914 the archepiscopal see of Gnesen-Posen remained vacant. At the outbreak of World War I the government approved the nomination of suffragan Bishop Edward Likowski as archbishop (1914/15) in order to appease the Polish population.

In the struggle between German and Polish nationalities, the Polish population succeeded in improving its position. The portion of Germans receded from 41 to 38.4 percent between 1871 and 1905. The Polish Catholics directed their energies toward the preservation of their national identity under the leadership of their archbishops of Gnesen-Posen and prominent prelates within and without ecclesiastical life. In addition to their insistence on the use of the Polish language in schools, they expanded their press.[34] After 1879, they published the Ecclesiastical Review (Przegląd Kościelny) in place of the outlawed (1874) Catholic Weekly (Tygodnik Katolicki). In 1895, Archbishop Stablewski provided the initiative for the publication of a weekly paper, the Catholic Guide (Przewodnik Katoliki). In 1906, at his suggestion, the new Preacher Library (Biblioteka Kaznodziejska), published between 1872 and 1894, was continued with the publication of the New Preacher Library (Nowa Biblioteka Kaznodziejska). He placed great emphasis on the training and continuing education of the clergy. The number of clergymen doing pastoral work in the archdiocese of Gnesen-Posen in 1873 amounted to 813; during the Kulturkampf it dropped to 513; by 1910 it increased to 821. The old Lubrańsk Academy in Posen had served as a seminary from 1780 to 1896. During the Kulturkampf it was forced to close its doors and it was not allowed to open them again until 1889. In 1896, the theology students were provided with a new building, where they attended theological and pastoral lectures after receiving basic philosophical training in Gnesen. In this context it is worth mentioning Polish scholarly societies and their publications, in which clergymen decisively participated. By means of lending libraries and book clubs, the clergy managed the distribution of religious writings.

The monasteries were centers that radiated Polish religiosity. The Community of Servants of the Blessed Virgin Mary, which was founded by Edward Bojanowski (1814–71), a Polish nobleman, and devoted to the care of the sick and the orphans, expanded. After the conclusion of the Kulturkampf, the orders and religious communities resumed their drastically confined activities. In 1895 Maria Karlowska established in Posen a new branch of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd.

---

[33] Ibid., 165–70: List of penalties from the "documentation of convictions in criminal cases which had to do with the school strike (only convictions for nonattendence of school)."

[34] L. Müller, Nationalpolnische Presse, Katholizismus und katholischer Klerus (Breslau 1931).

The Poles of the German eastern provinces were a source of inspiration for the other Polish territories. Their tightly organized and concentric efforts towards national identity were highly esteemed by the Poles in Russia and Galicia. In view of the different political developments in the three territories, ecclesiastical life contributed to the internal consolidation of Polish Catholicism. Polish self-confidence was strengthened by reports of the activities of the chief pastors and the clergy in numerous parishes,[35] achievements of the orders and other religious communities, and the successes of associations on various levels. Adherence to the Catholic faith and to Polish nationalism merged into one inseparable entity, in spite of all social differences and parties. The Polish Catholics looked toward the popes as advocates of their national interests, even though the popes practised caution in their addresses and letters in order to avoid conflicts with the governments. Cardinal Miecislaus Ledóchowski, who, after 1883, worked in the papal Secreteriat of State (1885 secretary of the papal briefs and 1892 prefect of the Congregation for Propaganda) was their influential spokesman at the Curia.

Austria-Hungary[36]

The dual Habsburg Monarchy of Austria-Hungary, with its many nationalities,[37] harbored numerous internal and external political problems in the decades preceding its decline at the end of World War I. These problems greatly affected the Slavic population in regard to the development of its ecclesiastical history. In 1900 Austria was estimated to have 23 million Roman Catholics, 3 million Uniates, and 600,000 Orthodox.[38] At the same time Hungary was estimated to have 9 million Roman Catholics, 2 million Uniates, and 3 million Orthodox. In addition there were 700,000 Orthodox and 350,000 Catholics in the Turkish provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which had been occupied in 1878 and annexed in 1912. The Orthodox and Uniate Christians belonged to Slavic nationalities. Slavs of the Roman Catholic creed were mainly the Poles in Galicia, the Czechs and Slovaks in Bohemia, and the

---

[35] From 1850 to 1860, the number of parishes in the three parts of Poland increased from 3,007 to 3,154, the number of secular clergy from 4,682 to 5,250, cf. A. Stanowski, "Diocèses et paroisses de Pologne au XIX^e^ et au XX^e^ siècle," Le Millénaire du catholicisme en Pologne (Lublin 1969), 128–29.

[36] Galicia was part of it.

[37] See above, chap. 2.

[38] Including Galicia.

Croatians, Slovenes and some of the Serbs in the south of Austria-Hungary.

The Austro-Hungarian Ausgleich, adopted due to pressure by Hungary in 1867, was criticized by Slavic politicans who endeavored to change the Monarchy into a federation of free and equal nations as giving unjustified preference to the Magyars. By 1871 the Czechs voiced their claims against the centralistic German guardianship. In 1880 they effected a language ordinance for Bohemia which required that even in purely German areas each application had to be filled out in the language of the applicant and trials had to be conducted in the language of the accused. In 1882/83, they succeeded in having the University of Prague divided, and after 1891 there existed a German and a Czech Catholic theological faculty with eight professors and one lecturer each. In April 1897 language ordinances for Bohemia and Moravia followed. They decreed dual language usage for all judicial and administrative authorities. Even though the regulations were endorsed by the majority of deputies (comprised of Czechs, Poles, Slovenes, the two conservative groups of the Catholic People's party, and the Center), they had to be suspended under the pressure of the opposition. Not until 1913, under the impact of the impending World War, was the way paved for successful German-Czech negotiations for a compromise in the language question.

In the course of these efforts, the Catholics worked for an expansion of their rights in the following areas: in the archdiocese of Prague, which in 1886 established a Czech seminary for boys in Pribam, in the diocese of Leitmeritz (with 75 percent Germans and 25 percent Czechs), and in the archdiocese of Olmütz, where Czech was spoken exclusively in the east and south. Since the election reform of 1907, Christian forces emerged as rivals of the old national parties (Old and Young Czechs), which formerly claimed exclusive representation, especially among the rural population. From the beginnings of the Czech Christian socialist party formations at the end of the nineteenth century, which took shape in 1904, arose the conservative wing, the People's Party (Lidová strana) in Bohemia (1911) and the Catholic National Party (Katolicko-národní strana) in Moravia.[39] The Catholic clergyman Jan Šrámek (1870–1953) could consolidate his first success by merging ecclesiastical and national ideas in a true People's Party.[40] In order to alleviate the tensions between the German- and Slavic-speaking clergy,

---

[39] F. Prinz, op. cit., 118.

[40] Šrámek held several ministerial offices in Czechoslovakia between 1921 and 1938. In 1940–45 he was minister president of the Czech exile government in London.

Leo XIII turned to the bishops of Bohemia and Moravia with his letter of 20 August 1901, asking them to nurture their inherited language, to care for all of the faithful with equal love, to avoid the language controversies, to prevent disagreements in seminaries, and to seek harmony in their dioceses.[41]

Toward the Slovaks, who gradually voiced their claims for autonomy, the government of the Kingdom of Hungary showed no kindness. It oppressed all non-Magyar nationalities and conducted a strict policy of Magyarization, which extended into the ecclesiastical realm. In 1897, Pastor Andrej Hlinka (1864–1939) of Ružomberok founded the People's Newspaper (L'udové Noviny); the Slovak People's Party, whose goal was political and religious freedom for their own nationality, was formed in 1905. His propaganda on behalf of the Slovaks' national autonomy in Parliament brought him in conflict with state and Church authorities. In 1906, when he supported the opposition in the Hungarian Parliament, where Catholic deputies endorsed the cabinet's bills, he was sentenced to three and one-half years in jail and suspended by his bishop for his political activities. The Council's Congregation annulled the suspension in 1909[42] and Hlinka was allowed to resume his pastoral work. He later cooperated with the Czechs in the formation of the Czechoslovakian Republic.

Like the Slovaks, the Carpathian Ukrainians, Rumanians, and Serbs suffered under the Magyarization process, which also included the educational system under Minister of Religious Affairs Count Albert Apponyi (1906–10) and which made no exception for religious instruction. Not until 1914 did the Hungarian government give in to the pressures of the disadvantaged nationalities. It permitted religious instruction in the respective mother tongues in all elementary and civil schools as well as in teacher seminaries.[43]

In the south of the Dual Monarchy, life for the Slavs was extremely tense. The majority of the Croatians belonged to the Kingdom of Croatia and Slavonia, bound to the Austrian crown; one part belonged to the Cisleithian-Austrian half of the Empire in Istria and Dalmatia, the other to Bosnia-Herzegovina, while the Slovenes belonged to the western part of the Empire in Carnolia, in the south of Styria, and in Carinthia. The Serbs, who had achieved absolute independence at the Congress of Berlin in 1878 and had formed their own kingdom in 1878, tried to attract the minority in the south of the two Austro-Hungarian portions, mainly from Bosnia and Herzegovina, and they propagandized a Great Serbian South Slavic Empire, which was to include Serbs, Croatians, and Slovenes.

---

[41] ASS XXXII (1900–01), 321–23.

[42] A. Hudal, op. cit., 279.

[43] T. Grentrup, op. cit., 485–86.

While the Slovenes and Croatians had their roots in Western culture and Roman Catholicism, the Serbs were rooted in the East and in Orthodoxy. After centuries of oppression by the Turks, all three nationalities were filled with a tremendous desire for freedom and left no stone unturned to achieve their political, cultural, and religious independence. Attempts failed to buffer the alternating pressures of the South Slavic question by reorganizing Austria-Hungary along federalistic lines or according to a triadic empire concept in place of the current dualism (Austria-Hungary). The representatives from Croatia, Slovenia, and Dalmatia passed a resolution in Rijeka in 1905 in which they demanded the unification of Croatia and Dalmatia and the triadic organization of the state.

By the beginning of the nineteenth century the Slovenes had created a uniform written language. Their awakening national consciousness is reflected in their societies, cooperatives, and in the Sokol movement. Together with the Croatians, they attempted a solution within the framework of the Habsburg Empire. Under the leadership of the clergyman Dr. Janez Krek, the political and economic organization of the rural population improved. Dr. Anton Korošec (1872–1940) founded the Slovenian Farmers' Party (1907), approved a southern Slavic agreement, and accepted in 1918 the chairmanship of the Slovenian-Croatian National Council.

The Croatians were much more active. They were not satisfied with autonomy in regard to administration, education, and the judiciary, which they had been granted through the Hungarian-Croatian Agreement of 1868.[44] Franjo Rački (1828–94), who was the first president of the Croatian Academy of Sciences in Zagreb (1866–86) and leader of the Croatian People's Party since 1880, and Bishop Josip Jurij Strossmayer (1815–1905)[45] were the spokesmen of their national interests for decades.

The bishopric of Djakovo was headed by Bishop Strossmayer, from 1849/50 until his death, according to his motto "all for faith and country."[46] In 1900, 253,770 Catholics of the Roman rite, 29,000 Uniates, and 169,000 Orthodox lived there. Of ninety parishes, fifty-five were Croatian-speaking and three German; thirty parishes had a mixed Croatian-German population and two a mixed Croatian-Hungarian population. In spite of his political and cultural dedication to his people, Bishop Strossmayer tried to bridge differences for the sake of a union with Rome by demonstrating his loyalty to the Habsburg Monarchy, furthering the Uniates and pursuing the idea of uniting all southern Slavs, even the Orthodox Serbs. In 1872, he retired from active politics. He opposed the Hungarian claims and the hegemony of either Croatians or Serbs, and furthered with his patronage the development of Croatian culture. This can be demonstrated by his donations to the University of Zagreb (1866), the Croatian Academy of Sciences (1867, opened in 1874), and the art gallery in Zagreb. Furthermore, his support was valuable to scholarly publications and instrumental in the construction of a representative cathedral in Djakovo, which was inaugurated in 1882. In view of the concepts of the governments in Vienna and Budapest, his Catholic pan-Slavism brought about conflicts with the national Croatian politician Dr. Ante Starčević (1823–96), who ruthlessly fought the Serbs and demanded a Greater Croatia, which, in addition to its native land, was to include Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Dalmatia. It was to be on an equal footing with Hungary. Strossmayer reestablished the Croatian Institute S. Girolama dei Schiavoni in Rome, which Leo XIII, upon a motion by the Croatian episcopate, renamed Collegium pro gente croatica,[47] hoping, as did his secretary of state, Rampolla, that it might become a stepping stone for the ecclesiastical unification movement among the Balkan Slavs.

---

[44] W. Felczak, Ugoda Węgieisko-chorwacka 1868 (Wroclaw 1969).

[45] J. Matl, "Josef Georg Stroßmayer," Neue Österreichische Biographie IX (1956), sect. 1, 73–83; R. Aubert, Le pontificat de Pie IX (Paris² 1962), 409–10.

[46] J. Matl, op. cit., 74.

In contrast, Joseph Stadler (1843–1918), after 1881 archbishop of Sarajevo, expected the college to be a nursery for a Catholic Greater Croatia. He carefully pursued the development of the ecclesiastical organization aided by Jesuits, Franciscans, and several religious orders of women. In 1904–11 he wrote a textbook on scholastic philosophy in the Croatian language. During the reorganization of the ecclesiastical arrangement after the occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (in 1895 a census counted 675,000 Orthodox, 55,000 Moslems, and 350,000 Catholics), Leo XIII established the archdiocese of Sarajevo with the suffragan bishoprics of Banja Luka and Mostar. During the decades before World War I, the number of Catholics increased to almost 400,000 because of the influx of Catholic civil servants, soldiers, and businessmen. They were cared for by the archbishops of Sarajevo and the bishops of Banja Luka in Bosnia. The bishops of Mostar were the chief pastors in Herzegovina. After 1890, they were simultaneously administrators of the old bishopric of Markana-Trebinje, which had been part of the medieval metropolitan see of Ragusa.

---

[47] This was protested by various people, cf. F. Engel-Janosi, op. cit. I, 318–21, and G. Adriányi, op. cit., 330–33.

The constitutional annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1908 did not change the ecclesiastical situation, but the resulting international tensions led to World War I, in spite of the agreement between Austria and Turkey concerning the Serbian "Great Power" aspirations and because the European powers were ready for action. During this war, Catholic Slavs fought on both sides. The majority of the Slavic Catholics was supported by Austria-Hungary, while the Orthodox Slavs were protected by Russia.

Southeast Europe

Greece had received its independence in 1830. In the decades between the reorganization of the Balkan states as a result of the Russo-Turkish War (1877–78) and the outbreak of World War I, the following independent principalities became kingdoms: Rumania (1881), Serbia (1882), Bulgaria (1908), and Montenegro (1910). Bulgaria received its independence in 1912. The Ottoman Empire lost one stronghold after another in southeast Europe and had to confine itself to eastern Thrace. In all those states the Catholics were merely a minority of the population.

The ethnographical and religious cohesiveness of the population in Rumania (92 percent Rumanians, 91.5 percent Orthodox) and the long reign of their first king, Charles I (1866–1914) was advantageous for the development of the state. In 1914 there were 100,000 Roman Catholics and 50,000 Uniate Christians among the total population of 6 million. On 23 March 1883 the archbishopric of Bucharest was founded in Wallachia, for which apostolic administrators had been responsible for 150 years. The first bishops were chosen from the congregations of the Passionists, who had taken care of the Catholic immigrants for a long time. They were forbidden, however, to make propaganda among the Orthodox. As for higher education, in five of their houses members of the Congregation of the English Ladies assisted them. For the Catholics in Moldavia, the bishopric of Jassy was established in 1884 and made directly responsible to the Holy See. In Jassy, Conventuals, Jesuits, and the Sisters of Our Lady of Sion were active. It was not easy to train a native clergy because most members of the orders were foreigners.

Neighboring Bulgaria was ruled by Prince Alexander Battenberg (1879–85), who expanded his territory toward the south by incorporating eastern Rumelia, and by Ferdinand I (1887–1918), who adopted the title of tsar in 1908, but had to surrender southern Dobrudja to Rumania and Macedonia to Serbia after the Second Balkan War (1913).

The majority of the population was Orthodox Christian. The Capuchin missionary Andreas Canova, who, as bishop, headed the vicariate apostolic of Plovdiv-Sofia from 1848 to 1868,[48] participated in the Bulgarian unification movement which began in 1859–61 but could not sustain itself. In 1883 the responsibility for the Catholics living in Bulgaria was taken on by the old bishopric of Nicopolis (reinstated in 1648), whose see was transferred to Ruščuk the same year, and the apostolic vicariate of Plovdiv-Sofia with its see in Plovdiv, whose incumbents had been titular bishops since 1885. They cared for about 27,000 Catholics assisted by Capuchins, Conventuals, Jesuits, Assumptionists, Passionists, and nuns of various congregations. When the Catholic Prince Ferdinand had his son and heir to the throne baptized in the Orthodox rite (1895/96), because the Chamber had demanded this, Leo XIII protested. The Pope called it a betrayal of conscience for the sake of politics.[49] In spite of this incident, the Curia hoped that the Bulgarians would join the union. Pius X advised the Habsburg diplomats to closely align with Bulgaria and Rumania. He was concerned that the Slavs could side with the worst enemy of the Church, Russia.[50]

In Serbia, Orthodoxy was the state religion. In spite of the religious freedom guaranteed by the Congress of Berlin in 1878, the Catholics were suppressed by the government and the Orthodox hierarchy. The political uprisings and changes, the Greater Serbian movement, and the antagonism between Austria-Hungary and Russia were also a problem for them. Not until 1855 were they allowed to establish their own parish in Belgrade. The old bishopric of Belgrade existed only as a titular bishopric. In 1728/29 it had been united with the bishopric of Semendria. The Catholics' jurisdiction lay in the hands of neighboring bishops or vicars apostolic. In 1851 Bishop Strossmayer was appointed vicar apostolic for the principality of Serbia. In this capacity he made contact with Serbian government circles during his visitation travels. In 1886 the bishopric of Belgrade was reinstated, incorporated into the new Church province of Scutari, and between 1898 and 1914 placed directly under the Propaganda Fide. It had about 10,000 Catholics and was elevated to an archbishopric by the concordat of 24 June 1914.[51] As the suffragan bishopric of Scoplje, it was to incorporate all areas gained by Serbia after the Balkan Wars. The bishopric was formed from the archbishopric of the same name and included about 15,000 Catholics. The wars delayed the development of a Church organization, which did not develop until 1924 in the Yugoslavian state.

---

[48] A. Tarnovaliski, op. cit., 47–51.

[49] Schmidlin, PG II, 518.

[50] F. Engel-Janosi, op. cit. II, 125.

[51] Mercati I, 1100–3.

In the principality of Montenegro, where 90 percent of the population were Orthodox, the Catholics were under the archbishopric of Antivari, which, since the concordat with the Curia in 1886, was directly responsible to Rome.[52] In this region, the use of Old Slavic liturgical texts was permitted. They were, to be sure, almost literal translations of the Roman liturgy into modern Church Slavic (Grajdanka). When one missal was printed in Cyrillic letters (in Rome, 1893) according to Leo XIII's wish, the archbishop asked for permission to print it in Glagolitic script, so that it might not be mistaken for an Orthodox publication. The number of Catholics increased between 1886 and 1914 from 7,000 to 13,000.

In Albania, which was ruled by the Turks from 1468 until 1912, the majority of the population was Islamic. The southern and eastern areas were populated also with strong Slavic groups which confessed to Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism. A Turkish-Islamic syncretism had developed, which the archbishops of Durrës and Scutari, the Franciscans who were active as missionaries, and the Jesuits tried to confine. In 1905 the archbishopric of Durrës had about 13,000 Catholics; the archbishopric of Scutari with its bishoprics of Lezhë, Pult, and Sapë had nearly 70,000. Since the Habsburg Monarchy exercised a cultural protectorate in Albania, pursuing political as well as religious goals, and since this area was an intersection of Italian, Croatian, Serbian, and Pan-Slavic interests, conflicts resulted within Catholicism, which was partly inclined toward and partly against Austria-Hungary.[53] Aside from the language problem in schools and seminaries, propaganda in favor of the introduction of Slavic Church texts played a role.

In Greece the majority of the population belonged to the Orthodox. For the small group of Catholics, Pius IX created the archbishopric of Athens (1875) in addition to the existing archbishoprics of Korfu and Naxos. There were few Slavs among the approximately 660,000 Catholics, but their number increased through Greece's expansion toward the north. Because of the Bulgarian claim to all of Macedonia, from which Serbia had received some parts in 1913, a new ecclesiastical organization could not be effected.

The archbishoprics of Scutari and Durrës, located in Turkish territory, and their suffragan bishoprics had been incorporated into the Balkan states. The patriarch vicar of Constantinople was responsible for the few Catholics (about 50,000 in 1914), few of whom were Slavs. The Latin patriarch of Constantinople resided in Rome. They were represented at the Sublime Porte by a vekil, chief of the chancellory of the Catholic Reaya.

---

[52] Ibid., 1048–50.

[53] F. Engel-Janosi, op. cit. I, 310, and G. Adriányi, op. cit., 279–93.

The internal complaints of the Slavic peoples and the policies of the great powers, which interfered with the ecclesiastical affairs of the Catholics, prevented any increase in the religious activities of both the Roman Catholics and the Uniates (which were represented in most southeastern European states). The bishops could only maintain the heritage entrusted to them, assisted by the clergy and the religious orders.

SECTION TWO

The Development of Catholicism in Modern Society

CHAPTER 12

Catholicism in Society as a Whole

During the pontificate of Leo XIII the Catholic movements arisen from the confrontation with modern society as it evolved from revolution formed themselves into social groups in various countries within society as a whole and thus gave rise to what today is called Catholicism. The idea of restoration had failed; the revolution of the bourgeoisie could not be revoked, having achieved its last victory with the occupation of Rome, which, in conjunction with the commune uprising in Paris, marked the beginning of the revolution against the bourgeoisie. It was an epoch-making turning point in the history of the Catholic Church, representing, at first, a fundamental change in its relation to the "world," touching its very essence and self-awareness. From the time of Constantine the Great until the French Revolution, the Church was able to absorb all political figures into its own organism, duplicating or assimilating them. Indeed, in the early stages of the West, it was even capable of portraying the imago imperii. This is no longer true in the age of the liberal and democratic constitutional state and the "growing industrial society with its continuous changes in its stratification." It is no longer true, even though the Church's "lack of social station . . . was still hidden until well into the second half of the nineteenth century."[1]

---

[1] C. Bauer, Bild der Kirche, 25f.—The Church's "lack of social station" refers to its position within the total industrial society with its rapid change of economic, social, and intellectual conditions. This is not contradicted by the fact that Catholicism as a special group takes up its position with emphasis, trying to preserve the Church's guidelines since Leo XIII. These guidelines become necessarily more abstract the less the Church is able to "reflect the society" in all its contradictions and the more the differences between the various Catholicisms and the controversies within them have to be considered. The Church has its "social station" within these Catholicisms (as special groups), which can only be termed ideo-typically with the singular "Catholicism" (which will be used in this sense henceforth). Therefore, the history of the Church will from now on be largely the history of Catholicisms, "Church" and "Catholicism" not being identical.—German Catholicism is given preferential treatment in this chapter. The reason is that chapters 1 and 3 concentrate on the Kulturkampf, as was planned.

The cultural forms of Catholicism of the various countries took their classical shape during the pontificate of Leo XIII and were typical until the first third of the twentieth century. The multiplicity of denominational associations, especially in Germany, proved statistically to be rather successful. So was the press, ranging from daily papers to intellectual periodicals, whose circulation, with the exception of religious mass literature, was not competitive but did have dedicated readers supporting it. All this was an expression of a strong self-awareness, which, in turn, could affect daily life through solidarity. G. Goyau glorified the Catholicisme social, to be understood in a general sense, as a "society of saints" in the midst of the modern world, turning away from the individualism of Châteaubriand toward a fraternité, which he said was a definite reaction to the concept of a lay society, and he related his vision of the human society to the société surnaturelle: the dream of the old relationship between reality and its image.[2] But he was compelled to bewail the misfortune of the Catholics in his country, who appeared to be the rearguard of society, but were in reality the vanguard.[3] But it is exactly this assessment, be it from the point of view of the liberal bourgeoisie or the Socialists, which defines, if not the "lack of station," a deficient relationship to society as a whole. Even though Catholicism took initiatives, particularly in reference to the social question, it simply used the sociological and political configurations of the postrevolutionary world rather than accepting them from within, at least initially. This is also valid for the popular movements, for the workers' pilgrimages to Rome,[4] for the nonecclesiastical lay societies and their activities,[5] which are, after all, phenomena of an increasingly democratic society. Their tendency toward independence boded conflict with the clerical claim for leadership. The terms in which Catholicism expressed itself were borrowed, and its self-righteous expectations of asserting itself within the total society by means of its re-Christianization had the characteristics of an illusion.

---

[2] G. Goyau I, 69–78, II, 4.

[3] Ibid. I, 211; in regard to a debate in the French Chamber in 1896 about women and child labor where a deputy spoke of the identity of labor potential and worker by referring to Marx: "Ce n'est point le socialisme seulement, c'est le christianisme social, qui s'appuie sur un tel fondement; et l'on pourrait . . . rapprocher Leon XIII non moins aisément que Karl Marx" (I, 234).

[4] W. Schwer, Leo XIII, 60: "For years, the princely gate of the Vatican remained closed because the deluded kings of this world were no longer able to find their way to Rome. Then Leo XIII opened it again and in came a workers' pilgrimage which had crossed the Alps in order to take home the blessings of the Pope, just like the sovereigns of days gone by had received their imperial crown." As much as the Pope, after 1887–88, liked to appeal to the people directly over the heads of their governments, and as much as some sort of papal patriotism was able to integrate the minority groups of ecclesiastically minded people—such a rather pathetic picture neither captures the ecclesiastical nor the secular realities.—W. Schwer follows the picture of Melchior de Vogüe, quoted in M. Turmann, Catholicisme social (Paris 1901).

[5] At the Catholic Convention of 1881 in Bonn, the lawyer F. Porsch said that the lay activities spurred by the Kulturkampf "merely reflected a state of distress," and there was hope for a period of time when "they will be able to practice the guardianship which God provided in order to rule His Holy Church" (Kißling II, 78f).

In this context belongs Catholicism's realization of its internationality, which was demonstrated at congresses when foreign guests of the same religion were welcomed.[6] In reality, the national differences were quite substantial, even if one ignores the effects of international political factors, as for instance the Triple Alliance of Germany, Austria, and Italy. Of course, the concept of internationality was realized in the sovereign common to all Catholics and, no matter how controversies about certain issues regarding ecclesiastical policies arose, the authority of the Pope within Catholicism was not questioned during Leo XIII's pontificate. It was intentionally nurtured by observing certain anniversaries and was extensively interpreted by the Pope when he defined the competence of the nuncios,[7] as well as by lay representatives.[8] At major public events such as the Catholic conventions and Eucharistic world congresses (as soon as they were fully developed), the idea of the Ecclesia militans as the Church of the martyrs took an outspoken militant turn. For example, at a Catholic convention in Trier in 1887, Bishop Korum preached about the Militia Christi, and the Porta Nigra was bathed in a sea of flames, above which appeared a cross with the illuminated words: Stat crux, dum volvitur orbis.

---

[6] This is what Windthorst said at the Catholic Convention of 1883 in Düsseldorf about an "international assembly of Catholics" under the leadership of the Pope, similarly in Breslau in 1886 (Kißling II, 86).

[7] See above, p. 22.

[8] Windthorst was upset because of the Vatican's policies in Berlin, which seemed too conciliatory to him. But August Reichensperger told him at the Catholic Convention in Trier in 1887 that one had to serve the Pope, "whose position in the world does not allow him to fulfill our, the Prussian ultramontanes, every whim and wish" (Kißling II, 114).—The celebration of the year 1900, in preparation since 1896, was the subject of controversies because it was not an ecclesiastical affair and because there were reasons to doubt whether Leo XIII would survive the turn of the century. Prince Karl zu Löwenstein wrote about such opinions, toward which Cardinal Mazzella was also inclined: "The Holy Father is not only an infallible teacher, but also the helmsman at the wheel, who is distinguished by special dignity. His judgement about the expediency of a matter is not confirmed by his infallibility, but by the great likelihood of the good, the useful, and God's will speaking through him." K. Buchheim, Ultramontanismus, 497, noted in this respect: "The historian has to record the fact that this conviction of faith proved to be correct" because the Pope survived.—Theodor Wacker (cf. chap. 35), at the Catholic Convention in Koblenz in 1890, nurtured illusionary hopes: "Once the social kingdom they mention has taken shape and life, nothing will be more natural than the social Emperor and the social Pope joining hands and staying together" (quoted from Buchheim, 337). Windthorst was more sceptical. One should not overlook the fact that all Catholicisms experienced a certain indifference toward the "Roman question," not only in Germany, where Triple Alliance policies represented an element which even the Center could not ignore. The change in the slogan of protest which was obligatory for every Catholic convention was significant for the Pope: In 1890, in Koblenz (moderately edited by Windthorst), they pleaded "for restoration of the territorial sovereignty of the Holy See"—in 1898, in Neiße, in rather general terms for "sacred rights" referring to Leo's Italian encyclical of 5 August (Kißling II, 281f).

The forms of Catholicism, to be sure, were not merely at odds with the principles of the liberal bourgeoisie but were also struggling with more or less fierce internal conflicts. These differed according to the specific historic situation and obstructed an international consensus. Attempts were made to divide the Catholicism of the various countries[9] where the pre-revolutionary Church had been the "established Church" (like Spain, Portugal, Latin America, France, Italy, and Austria-Hungary), and the countries whose recent history did not accord the Catholic Church this kind of status and therefore "had fewer difficulties in adjusting to the new political conditions of the nineteenth century."[10] This general typology certainly provides some useful insights, but distinctions must be made. Catholicism in Bismarck's Germany, for instance, where the Church was never "established," significantly differed from Catholicism in the United States. What the different forms of Catholicism had in common in all countries—varied according to their respective social structures—was that they were composed of the same social strata, although less so among the upper classes, as society in general. This posed the problem to what degree Catholicism could act as an integrating force on the conflicting interests of society's subdivisions. The strength of identity of each group depended on the extent to which, in addition to the issue of Church and state, social contrasts could be bridged. A strong, distressed minority could exploit this circumstance, as Windthorst demonstrated brilliantly at the Catholic Convention of 1882 in Frankfurt.[11] [9] Chaps. 1–11.

---

[10] J. N. Moody, op. cit., "this dichotomy in the historical experience of modern Catholics in their relation to the modern state is the cause of considerable confusion."

[11] The struggle against defeat (by a majority of votes) "will be even more effective when everyone learns once and for all who we are . . . thus, let us be strong in faith, keep our eyes open, and may we be united, then no one can harm us" (Kißling II, 89).—German Catholicism, however, is different. Unlike any other, it was organized in a political party and it could handle its social heterogeneity. It emerged in the eighties after the upswing of industrialization by making use of the "possibility of balancing the interests in the field of politics" (C. Bauer, Wandlungen, 37). It was not easy continuously to restore this balance. The vehement debate over the legally mandatory guilds which the Catholic leaders of trade had demanded at the Catholic Convention in Düsseldorf in 1883 and the social politicians of the Center opposed was concluded by Windthorst with the rhetorical phrase "that we completely agree on all aspects of ecclesiastical and social life" (Kißling II, 165).

Between Total Revision and Reform

It is a characteristic mark of Catholicism that it always saw the "social question," in a narrow sense in the "perspective of the total society" and the labor question as part of the "integral social reform question."[12] This view was only held by some theoreticians in areas where Catholics were in the extreme minority, as in Great Britain and in the United States. Therefore, it is necessary to integrate the Catholic social movements into the concept of the total society. Only then does the dilemma which Catholicism faced wherever it had to strive for more than the civil equality of a small minority become visible. Either it had to inculcate fundamental changes within the total society in which it was embedded (since it was clearly not of the same spiritual descent), or it had to content itself with realizing its principles by way of reforms within the plurality of the total society, foregoing its own concepts and making compromises along the way. This dilemma survived the turn of the century and was resolved, depending on the situation of the individual countries. Even though the differences between the countries have to be considered, the "changes in the socio-political realm of ideas relative to German Catholicism in the nineteenth century," as Clemens Bauer described them, can be regarded as a model case. Change meant primarily Christianization and re-Christianization, which was difficult to equate with charitable activities as proletarization grew in a capitalist society and was increasingly recognized as a general condition that was not absorbed by the "labor problem." When Edmund Jörg termed liberalism the "ruling spirit of our time," and the "natural son of the new national economy," thus closely connecting political and ideological liberalism with the capitalist economy,[13] a "total social reform" could indeed be regarded as the main task of Catholicism, whether "class inspired" in a sentimental social sense or impregnated with socialistic features, whether it was called Christian or not. However one chooses to assess the "newly created socio-economic reality," the desire for fundamental structural alterations of society had to either vanish in utopia or, without admitting it, take on a revolutionary character. How deeply Catholicism was affected by the idea of developing a concept that would embrace all of society and putting it in competition with a liberal bourgeois ideology is documented by the encyclical Rerum novarum. It was penetrated by only a few ideas about a "total social reform," but was able to revitalize the principal disputes within Catholicism, which had acquiesced to the facts of capitalism under the leadership of the Center Party and followed the path of social reform.[14]

---

[12] C. Bauer, Wandlungen, 46.

[13] C. Bauer, Wandlungen, 23, 29 (including quotation of E. Jörg), 34, 30.—Of course, there are differences between economic liberalism on the one hand and the not necessarily identical political and ideological liberalism on the other hand (cf. C. Bauer, "Liberalismus," StL^{6} V, 370–80); but it is probably incorrect to say that the Catholic disputations against liberalism only gathered the "most extreme objects of attack under one overall term" (C. Bauer, Wandlungen, 29), since differentiating the liberal segments does not preclude considering liberalism as a total phenomenon.

The Problem of Toleration

The "broken relationship" of the Church to the liberal bourgeois society is a phenomenon which is characteristic of all forms of Catholicism, though not so much in the United States during the Gibbons era where the leading segments of the episcopate, although opposed by the Corrigan group, were firmly anchored in the Constitution, i.e., in the principles of human rights. The reasons for this attitude were not merely based on ecclesiastical policy and tactics. In reference to modern society, this is one of the Church's basic dilemmas which the teaching authority had to face in view of internal Catholic tensions as well as the position of the Church in the secular world. Since the opposition put forward by the Syllabus was clear, only requiring refined interpretation, was there an alternative? Tolerantia, in accordance with the Syllabus, was a negative term for Leo XIII and the majority of Catholics (wherever they were not an extreme minority) because it was equated with a concept wherein truth and untruth, morality and amorality are equally valid. The positive term, being alien to the Syllabus, is the patientia with which the Church is in waiting until mankind discovers the one and only truth, Catholic truth.[15] This principle is applied to religious freedom, which, when indiscriminately granted (promiscue), will result in atheism. It applies to the freedom of speech, the press, and education, upon which the state is obligated to place limits,[16] not withstanding the Church's inalienable freedom to teach.[17] All principles of liberalism, which were fundamentally condemned, were banned in the Syllabus in the same manner as in the encyclical Libertas (1888). However, and this is the only difference, the latter speaks of the consideration of "human weaknesses" by the "maternal judgement of the Church," which does not ignore the course of events and therefore does not condemn the state's occasional indifference toward certain events which do not comply with truth and justice in the interest of eventual good and prevention of evil.[18] It is clear that even a liberal who was willing to practice his principles in the face of the Catholic Church[19] was misunderstood as long as his idea of truth was identified with a radical indifferentism and his world view was tolerated by the Catholic Church as the lesser evil. He had to fear that "patience" would only last until an opportunity for the dogmatization of public life arose again.[20] But Leo XIII created a modus vivendi with respect to society's pluralism, and more could not be expected in this particular historical situation. At the same time, he offered a formula for resolving internal Catholic controversies.[21] The test case was Catholicism in the United States. It is indeed understandable that the notion that the American conditions should be considered a model for the Church was discarded as an error. But the limits of an essentially unrealized adjustment were evident in the remark that the Church could reap a rich harvest if it were granted, "aside from freedom," also "the favor of the law" and the "protection (patrocinium) of the state."[22] This required the Catholic who adhered to the constitution of the United States to reconcile the irreconcilable. In the papal proclamations on the problem of the relation between truth and freedom there were certain shifts in emphasis,[23] but no essential progress.

---

[14] C. Bauer, Wandlungen, 41ff.; and therefore it is valid (even in regard to the special conditions in Germany) to say that Catholicism there "had an alienated relationship to what one may call the "bourgeois society" in Germany. Catholicism confronts society with different social ideals and it has a hostile attitude toward the economic system which is perpetuated by this society" (C. Bauer, "Der deutsche Katholizismus . . . ," Deutscher Katholizismus [Frankfurt a. M. 1964], 52.

[15] Libertas (1888) (Acta Leonis VIII, 241): [ecclesia], "quia tam dissolutum flagitiosumque tolerantiae genus constanter, ut debet, repudiat . . ."; he opposes patientia to lenitas, which the Church practiced generously.

[16] Ibid., 229–34.

[17] Ibid., 235.

The Doctrine of Property

The doctrine of property is of as much importance to liberal bourgeois society as is the principle of toleration. In this respect, however, recent research in Neo-Scholastic social philosophy has affirmed that the teaching of Thomas Aquinas regarding personal property was transmitted in a truncated form and eventually fell under the rather strong influence of a liberal economic theory.[24] This is the area where the real theoretical decisions have to be made regarding the question of whether Catholicism should follow its own total conception of social order or whether it should comply and pursue a social reform policy (though, to be sure, in different versions, reflective of its relationship to a capitalist industrial society). It was noted that the individualistic idea of property had its predecessors. Luigi Taparelli (died in 1862) had already presented it in his exemplary work on the Natural Law.[25] He was the teacher of Gioacchino Pecci, who even as Pope remained loyal to his basic concepts, although he did not agree with the reference to the instinct with which the dog will defend its food.[26] "The exaggerated emphasis of the individual side of the concept of property, which neglected the social side . . . , did indeed have an impact on papal documents like Rerum novarum."[27] Nevertheless, in Leo XIII's theoretical writings after 1878, a considerable shift in emphasis can be noted. In the beginning, he discusses the lower classes wanting to occupy the palaces of the rich without thinking about eternal life.[28] The tone of the social encyclical is essentially different, even though Matteo Liberatore (1810–92), the master of Roman Neo-Scholasticism, who placed the natural right to personal property at the center of his social philosophy,[29] had a considerable influence on the history of its creation.[30] Two factors especially seem to have determined the Neo-Scholastic theory of property. Like Leo XIII's encyclical, it basically proceeds from agrarian property: "it is not an exaggeration to maintain that the concept of possession, property as we understand it today, basically was the result of the French Revolution."[31] Perhaps this is why the essentially academic question (in which the Pope remained neutral) of whether personal property, as Suarez claimed, was to be attributed to ius gentium is of concrete importance insofar as the historical background of the respective specific property law is concerned. If only the "ability to possess property,"[32] thus the fundamental right to have personal property, is determined by Natural Law, then there exists a great deal of leeway in which to regulate property and the proper proportions of personal and community property. In addition, Leo's social encyclical places definite value on the property of the "have-nots." That was "surprising for all those who wanted to secure their monetary interests under the patronage of Rerum novarum."[33] Yet Leo XIII "did not distinctly see the two groups of capital and labor as two social classes in the technical sense of the word,"[34] though these groups were of fundamental significance in the formulation of this modern question. Moreover, in spite of the Pope's efforts in terms of social criticism, he did "speak in the tone of a grand seigneur and a patriarch, almost with a voice descending from the realm of eternity, full of fatherly mercy and kindness when addressing his dear children, especially the workers";[35] and, without a doubt, his voice grew more "fatherly" after 1878. It was often noted that Leo XIII did not intend to develop a social theory in his encyclical, but the unquestionably strong systematic elements stem to a great extent from the Neo-Scholastic social philosophy of Liberatores, and this is the point of contact for Catholic moral theology as far as the doctrine of property is concerned.[36]

---

[18] Ibid., [ecclesia] "non recusat, quominus quidpiam a veritate iustitiaque alienum ferat tamen potestas publica, scilicet maius aliquod vel vitandi caussa malum, vel adipiscendi aut conservandi bonum."

[19] Leo XIII criticized the intolerance of the Liberals with Cicero's kind of wit: Acta Leonis VIII, 237.

[20] W. Gurian, Ideen, 262.

[21] A similar phrase was contained in Immortale Dei (1885), where the principle stating that the Church could not concede the existence of non-Catholic religions eodem iure was modified in a more pragmatic sense (Acta Leonis V, 141). Moreover, in reference to a passage in Saint Augustine's work, it was said that nobody should be forced to convert to the Catholic faith.

[22] Longinqua Oceani spatia (1895),—The Weimar constitution contains the separation of Church and state. It calls the churches "religious societies" subject to civil law; this is a compromise which was only possible in this historical context and, moreover, belongs in a later period of time.

[23] For example, in Annum ingressi (19 March 1902), which says that this is the correct doctrine, ut libertas veritate concedat (Acta Leonis XXII, 67).

---

[24] F. Beutter, with a lot of documentation.

[25] Ibid., 97, following A. F. Utz.

[26] Rerum novarum, 5; P. Jostock, op. cit., 15.

[27] O. v. Nell-Breuning, in A. Rauscher (ed.), Ist die katholische Soziallehre antikapitalistisch? (Cologne 1968), 15.

[28] Quod Apostolici muneris (1878) (Acta Leonis I, 171): "Praesentium tandem bonorum illecti cupiditate . . . ius proprietatis naturali lege sanctitum impugnant"; I, 173: Since reward and punishment in the eternal life were forgotten, "mirum non est quod infimae sortis homines, pauperculae domus vel officinae pertaesi, in aedes et fortunas ditiorum involare discupiant."

[29] Quotation in F. Beutter, op. cit., 104.

[30] Antonazzi, 13.

[31] O. v. Nell-Breuning, Eigentumslehre, 145f.

The other factor which needs to be considered when assessing the Catholic doctrine of property in those decades is the polemical dispute over socialism, that is, socialism as a complex phenomenon with all of its ideological components. Unquestionably the logic in Catholic social theory was to a large degree determined by this confrontation. Nevertheless, when attempting a historically adequate evaluation of the total situation, one cannot say that the rejection of socialism "from the perspective of the bourgeois society" should be "called a vital error of the theology of the nineteenth century."[37] That, indeed, was precisely the question: Would Catholicism under the given historical conditions of the nineteenth century be able to arrive at a comprehensive concept of society or would it have to assert itself defensively against the mutually contradictory currents of the time, against liberalism as well as socialism, in order to possibly influence reform efforts? Nonetheless, the definite rejection of ideological liberalism did not preclude a more or less strong coloration of the doctrine of property through liberal individualism.[38]

---

[32] Ibid., 155.

[33] Ibid., 154.

[34] Id., Die soziale Enzyklika, 150.

[35] Ibid., 39. Therefore, one is hesitant to follow Jostock (10) when he declares as "very remarkable" the fact that the encyclical lists among the reasons for social evil the versi in deteriora mores last, following the economic and social reasons. He certainly recognized the socio-political tasks. But his emphasis on cupiditates, with which the encyclical begins, changes from passage to passage, and one should not project the reform of present conditions from the perspective of Pius XI.

[36] F. Beutter, op. cit., 86f.; see Beutter in regard to the various moral theologians who do not speak in unisono (including extensive lit.); also important is the article by G. Gundlach about Theodor Meyer, StL^{6} V, 695f.; A. Lehmkuhl, ibid., 335f.; H. Pesch, ibid. VI, 226–29. H. Pesch is dealing with the further development of Catholic sociology. Accepting the "historical school," he declares as "good" a regulation of property that follows the law of nature "with proper consideration for the actual conditions, the historical stage of social and economic life" (Liberalismus I, 400).—In regard to the Swiss Jesuit V. Cathrein, who endorsed the interdenominational and democratic principles but opposed Socialism and paternalism (according to Soderini, he was one of Leo XIII advisers), see: J. David, LThK^{2} II, 355ff.

Social Theories

The social theoretical works of the moral theologians often went through numerous editions. But few gained as much international significance for Catholicism as Charles Périn's (1815–1905) De la richesse dans les sociétés chrétiennes (first edition 1861).[39] This Catholic economist from Belgium, who also strongly influenced the social activists in France and western Germany, was ideologically and politically a confirmed antiliberalist. But in his principal rejection of state intervention, which was augmented by his opposition to the liberal constitutional state, he acted as representative of economic liberalism. However, he did want this liberalism amended by his concept of "Christian property," meaning the social ties of charity. He accepted the concentration of property in one individual as a result of the progress of civil freedom, but he saw the possibility of achieving congruity in respect to self-interests in the sense of sacrifice natural to Christian asceticism. Of course, he deemed the ideal to be moderate wealth, which was most likely to be found among the middle class, and that shows clearly how he underestimated the process of industrialization. The French social scientist Frédéric Le Play (1802–82) had an effect reaching far into the last third of the nineteenth century. Through his sociographical investigations of the family life of workers and craftsmen in France, England, Germany, and Russia, he dealt with an issue that was the central point of Catholic social doctrine.[40] The family is intact when the patriarchal authority of the father is unimpeded. The family is also the model for society as a whole with its "social authorities," including the entrepreneurs. The rejection of liberal human rights and the constitutional state could consistently merge with economic liberalism of a distinctly paternal character, while still implying a serious aspiration toward social justice. The ideas of Le Play were predominant in the Association des Patrons du Nord. The antiliberalism of the philosopher and economist Guiseppe Toniolo (1845–1918)[41] had an entirely different background. Professor in Pisa in 1889, Toniolo founded the Unione cattolica per gli studi sociali in Italia, which prepared the Catholic social congresses in Italy. In 1891 the Socièta operaie cattoliche included 284 local chapters and was especially popular in northern Italy. The Rivista internazionale di scienze sociali . . . , founded in 1893 in Talamo, obtained a certain official character through Toniolo's consulting activities on behalf of Leo XIII. Thus the Christian social program, designed under the guidance of Franz Schindler (1847–1922),[42] who was a professor of moral theology in Vienna in 1887, was sent not only to Rampolla, but also to Toniolo. In contrast to Rampolla's sober and pragmatic reaction, Toniolo approved, regarding as essential the program of profit-sharing among the workers. He also gave his basic consent to an "organization of society according to occupations," but took exception to the idea of having infinite competition controlled through corporations by arguing that occupational egotism could ruin the consumer.[43] Being strongly influenced by the historical school of German economics, Toniolo is not so much important for the originality of his doctrine as for his influence in Italian Catholicism and with Leo XIII.

---

[37] F. Beutter, op. cit., 149, who does not mean to endorse Socialism.

[38] It was rather the same on all fronts. A. Lehmkuhl, Die soziale Frage und die staatliche Gewalt (Freiburg i. Br. ^{3}1896), 75: It cannot be denied that capitalism, "under certain circumstances, possesses some economically good aspects; but without curtailment, it is bad and a source for economic collapse." State Socialism, on the other hand, poses a threat. As far as the "curtailment" is concerned, G. Gundlach notes (in regard to the situation forty years after the issuance of the encyclical) "that the course of the capitalist economic system severely damaged the sociological function of the family as well as private property and the state . . . through paralyzing anonymous power plays"; "Berufsständische Ordnung," StL^{6} I, 1127.—To say that Western Europe did not become Marxist because Leo had made the Church "the most formidable foe" is historically wrong and biased. "It becomes evident as the story unfolds that the hand of Leo XIII was one of those strengthening the dike which held back the flood" (L. P. Wallace VII, 408).—The insight that Christ as Christ has only a norma negativa in respect to economics, society, and the state could only be gained after many trials and tribulations. This applies to the Conservatives as well as to the Christian Democrats.

[39] F. Beutter, index, esp. 30, 104, 119; Reszohazy (op. cit., chap. 7), index; J. B. Duroselle, Les débuts, 470f.

---

[40] Main work: Les ouvriers européens (Paris 1855, ^{2}1877–79); also La réforme sociale en France, 2 vols. (Paris 1864, ^{8}1901, 3 vols.).—L. Neundörfer, StL^{6} V, 357–60 (lit.); J. B. Duroselle, op. cit., 672–84 (lit.)

[41] F. Marconcini, Profilo di Giuseppe Toniolo (Milan 1930); V. Mangano, L'opera di scientifica di G. Toniolo (Rome 1940); R. Angeli, La dottrina sociale di G. Toniolo (Pinerolo 1956).

[42] The Christian social program was published by F. Funder, op. cit., 132–37; F. Schindler, Die soziale Frage der Gegenwart (Vienna 1905), frees Vogelsang's ideas, which the prelate had been exposed to during the "duck evenings," from conservative utopias; there is also a connection to the Swiss K. Decurtins.—Regarding the controversies between the Catholic Conservatives and the Christian Socialists over the Austrian Cardinals Gruscha and Schönborn, cf. chap. 2.—Regarding the champions of the Christian Socialists in Austria, such as J. Scheicher (1842–1924), moral theologian at the Seminary of Saint Pölten, see H. David, J. Scheicher als Sozialpolitiker (diss., Vienna 1946), according to which Scheicher was critical of the Christian Socialists' trend toward the middle class (56).

Just as Charles Périn's social theory radiated toward the West, so did the influence of the early Viennese school under Vogelsang toward France.[44] Catholics in countries like France, Belgium, and Austria who tried once more to create a universal order of society in the Christian image of man had something in common: they categorically rejected the liberal bourgeois society. This "reactionary" attitude was affected by various political configurations and thus presented one facet during the Third Republic of France, where such social criticism amalgamated more or less by necessity with antirepublicanism. It had a different appearance in the Habsburg Monarchy, where such criticism was suspect with the liberals as well as the conservatives, so that it came to be associated with revolutionary tendencies. This, as well as the East-West gradient in the process of de-Christianization, has to do with the fact that the Christian impetus was more direct, as it were, in France than in Austria, where socio-political objectives were approached in a more direct manner. In Germany, the defense against the Kulturkampf absorbed most theoretical and practical interests and the conclusion of the dispute later coincided with the turn toward a social reform concept. However, even here existed an incipient individual program relative to society as a whole. Most of the leading activists and theoreticians belonged to the aristocracy: in France mainly Albert de Mun,[45] and Latour du Pin,[46] in Germany Prince Karl zu Löwenstein,[47] in Austria Count Franz Kuefstein and Counts Revertera and Belcredi, who were mainly interested in politics, and the North German converts Count Blome and Carl von Vogelsang, who during his odyssey had found a protector in Alois zu Liechtenstein,[48] also called the "Red Prince." The background of these men can easily prompt the sweeping conclusion that an attempt was being made to turn back the wheel of history.

---

[43] Rampolla's answer in F. Funder, op. cit., 138–41; Toniolo's answer, ibid., 142f.

[44] C. Antoine, S.J., Cours d'économie sociale (Paris 1896), 240: "Les catholiques d'Autriche ont cru que le seul moyen de salut pour eux était de confier tout l'ordre économique social aux mains de la dynastie catholique des Habsbourg." The assessment by this author, who was close to A. de Mun, distorts the Viennese ideas through its abridgement.

[45] Impressed by the Commune Uprising in Paris in 1871 (for which he partially blamed the middle class), A. de Mun (1841–1913), a French officer, founded the Oeuvre des cercles catholiques d'ouvriers (cf. chap. 13) and the extraparliamentary Union catholique. He sacrificed his royalism in obedience to the papal Ralliement, was for socio-political reasons in conflict with the Orleanists, and slowly took exception to the theories of Charles Périn. A large part of the French episcopate, headed by Freppel, was disinclined toward the social activities of de Mun, while Mermillod, Doutreloux, and Manning took a positive stand. Nonetheless, in 1885, he began to plan a parti catholique according to the Belgian and German model, in which all conservatives were to be united in the

In the social theory of Carl von Vogelsang[49] there are elements from the social doctrine of the Romanticists (especially Adam Müller); and spirit of the Christian faith and social action. Leo XIII advised against it (H. Rollet, A. de Mun et le parti catholique [Paris ^{2} 1950]; cf. chap. 6). After the failure of the Ralliement, he founded the Action libérale Populaire in order to fend off anticlericalism, and he worked together with M. Barrès. The funeral of this man, honored as a great Frenchman in spite of all differences, was also attended by Minister President L. Barthou.—J. Piou, A. de Mun (Paris 1952; because of his personal acquaintance still important); M. Lynch, The Organised Social Apostolate of A. de Mun (diss., Washington 1952); J. N. Moody, op. cit., 146f.; J. Mehling, Essai sur A. de Mun (Fribourg 1953); C. Mollet, A de Mun: Recherches d'histoire religieuse 1 (Paris 1970), with many new letters.

---

[46] R. Latour du Pin was de Mun's colleague in the officers' corps, but in contrast to him more interested in theory: Vers un Ordre social chrètien (Paris 1907); Aphorismes de politique sociale, rev. ed. (Paris 1909). He did not go along with the political turn of the Ralliement and rather approached the Action française.—E. Borsan de Garagnol, Le colonel de Latour du Pin d'après lui-même (Paris 1934); R. Talmy, Aux sources du catholicisme social. L'École de Latour du Pin (Paris 1963).

[47] Karl zu Löwenstein (1834–1921), in 1868 president of the Zentralkomitee der Katholischen Vereine Deutschlands, founded at the Catholic Convention of Bamberg (four noblemen, three clergymen), 1872–98 (when the central committee was restored after having been dissolved during the Kulturkampf) "commissioner" of the Catholic conventions, was accredited with having organized the socio-political conference in the castle of his birth Haid (Bohemia) in 1883 and having founded the Freie Vereinigung katholischer Sozialpolitiker. But he was the representative of those Catholics who were not primarily interested in the social question, but rather in the "influences of the revolutionary movement which should be taken advantage of in the interest of the Catholic Church" (P. Siebertz, op. cit., 215, from the Wertheim archive); "one has to mount the horse in order to be able to lead"; "if we cannot prevent the social republic, at least we must be its master" ("confidential" circular, P. Siebertz, op. cit., 215f.). However, he was tolerant enough to invite people of all Catholic persuasions to the conference in Haid. The "Haid theses" and their total revision program were presented to the Catholic Convention in Amberg in 1884 in an abridged version (E. Ritter, op. cit., 83ff.).

[48] Alois Prince Liechtenstein (1846–1920), 1878–89 and 1891–1911: member of the Reichsrat; had a conflict with the Austrian Ultra Conservatives; presented in 1888 to the Viennese Catholic Convention the social problems generally ignored there; 1891: elected deputy of the Christian Socialists of the suburb of Hernals. "He introduced to the different antiliberal elements the fundamentally Catholic element" (F. Funder, StL^{5} III, 1011ff.).

[49] Carl von Vogelsang (1818–90), son of a major in the Prussian police force, resigned from his position at the district court in Berlin, became a Catholic in 1850 after studying in Munich and Innsbruck, and in 1874 joined the editorial staff of the strictly conserva-

his hypothesis of a "social kingdom" as an alternative to "state socialism" was possible only in the central European regions. However, Gustav Gundlach[50] was justified in observing that the first representatives of a system which later was called "order by occupations" cannot be understood merely on the basis of such deductions. Catholicism produced only one original concept of a constitution embracing all of society. This was intended to be a creative draft of a defense against liberalism as well as socialism. That it later became suspect was due to several reasons which cannot be discussed at this point. It should be noted that only traces of this concept entered into the encyclical Rerum novarum. The practical decision to take the path of Catholic cooperation in the social reform of the capitalist society had already been made. Though the successes accomplished were impressive and cannot be disputed, an assessment of this concept regarding society as a whole cannot be reached on this ground alone. In order to confront the real dilemma of Catholicism, one has to consider that the realization of this concept would entail the abolition of the capitalist society and would therefore not have been accomplished without revolutionizing society. Moreover, these strictly antiliberal and thus anticapitalist theoreticians, mainly located in Vienna, knew rather little about economic realities.

What Vogelsang and his friends wanted to achieve (not through upheaval but "through a gradual transformation from within") was the following: the elimination of "exploitation" through capitalism "whose only purpose of economic activity is net profit"; the formation of occutive Vaterland in Vienna. He created tensions in his relationship to Count Leo Thun, the owner of the newspaper (who otherwise appreciated Vogelsang), when he used phrases in his articles like "the marvelous strike of the railroad employees (in Pittsburgh), in which the disenchanted attacked capitalism with breech loaders and canons." In the Österreichische Monatsschrift für Gesellschaftswissenschaft und Volkswirtschaft, which Vogelsang founded in 1879, he published a universal reform plan (C. Allmayer-Beck, 66ff.). The series of articles published after 1883 entitled Die materielle Lage des Arbeiterstandes was criticized by the Liberals and Conservatives alike for pouring fuel on the hate of the "present social order." At Prince Liechtenstein's conference in Haid Vogelsang stood on the left. In Vienna, he was supported by Prince Liechtenstein as well as the moral theologian F. M. Schindler, J. Scheicher, and Pastor R. Eichhorn (R. Kuppe, Eichhorn zur Arbeiterfrage [diss., Vienna 1926]). In the beginning, A. M. Weiß belonged to this Christian Socialist circle (cf. below). In regard to contacts with the Viennese Socialists, see C. Allmayer-Beck, 90ff., 100f. In contrast to P. Biederlack, S.J., Innsbruck, P. H. Abel, S.J., supported Vogelsang: "In contrast to the un-Christian German and the un-Christian Jewish movements, this Austrian Christian movement in Vienna is indebted to Vogelsang" (C. Allmayer-Beck, 126).—W. Klopp, Die sozialen Lehren des Freiherrn von Vogelsang (Saint Pölten 1894; excerpts in French); A. Knoll, C. v. Vogelsang als Nachfahre der Romantik (diss., Vienna 1924); C. Allmyer-Beck, Vogelsang. Vom Feudalismus zur Volksbewegung (Vienna 1952).

---

[50] G. Gundlach, "Berufsständische Ordnung," StL^{6} I, 1124–27.

pational "corporations" in which capital and labor, employer and employee are united, forming a "social institution of society and state"; the replacement of the "horizontal stratification according to class by a vertical one according to occupations, which would be characterized by a "republican cooperative relationship"; elimination of "purely private, absolute, capricious property which is robbing God, society and the state." At the top of such economic and political social order was to reside the "social kingdom" as an integrating element. Vogelsang rejected suffrage by census as asocial and general suffrage as dispersing the "historical and political" individualities into "random sections divided according to external geographical criteria," and he also assigned propaganda to the "corporations." Their structure was certainly conceived from the perspective of the trade guilds, which Vogelsang wanted to modernize and organize into reliable production and sales cooperatives so that they could compete wth industry. He believed that it was possible to transfer this modernized model to industrial enterprises. Austrian anti-Semitism, too, had one of its roots in the Christian social movement because Vogelsang and others saw the Jews as the main perpetrators of the "exploitation of the workers."[51] Vogelsang's social concept solicited a limited amount of attention in other social study groups of Catholicism, particularly through Blome and Kuefstein. Considerable differences existed not only within these circles but also in the individual groups. An example of this is the Dominican Albert Maria Weiß from Upper Bavaria, who was an active apologist in Graz, Vienna, and Fribourg after 1890. To him, the social question was a weapon he employed in his wholesale war against liberalism.[52]

During a social study course of the Volksverein in Bamberg in 1893, Franz Hitze[53] called Carl von Vogelsang the kind of "teacher" Germany lacked. The same year, Hitze became professor of Christian sociology in Münster and thus inaugurated the tradition of a new teaching chair in the theology faculty. In that same year, he answered a Social Democrat deputy in the Reichstag who had criticized the social politics of the Center Party with reference to Bishop Ketteler: "I still agree absolutely with the opinions Bishop von Ketteler has voiced."[54] These are the reminiscences of a pragmatic politician during a period when he contemplated "a basic transformation of society." Next to Wilhelm Hohoff,[55] he was "the first Catholic sociologist who thoroughly studied Marx and recognized his significance" (J. Höffner). To him it was inevitable that "socialism would come, either the absolute, social-democratic version of the state or the relative, conservative, healthy version of the social classes" (Quintessenz, p. 32). Hitze rejected the theory of suplus value, but the criticism of capitalism found in his early writings follows the very phraseology of Karl Marx. Like Vogelsang, he bases his theory on the model of the medieval guilds. But he believes they have to be placed on an "expanded economic and democratic foundation," which meant the evolution of industrial enterprises into productive associations autonomously controlled by all participants. Only in this manner could a situation in which the entrepreneur has the advantage and the employee the disadvantage be changed. Hitze opposed Charles Périn's theory with determination. He also saw danger in the idea of the "company as a family," which, through its social provisions, could adversely tie the worker to his place of work. The fact that during the trade union controversy at the turn of the century some representatives of the Catholic workers' societies criticized his idea of an "organization of society on a Christian basis by occupations" was a bitter pill for Hitze to swallow. For, after divorcing himself from the idea of a reunification of capital and labor and embracing the concept of social reform within a capitalist economy, he advocated the functioning of trade unions as "sales cooperatives" (of labor) and justified striking as a withholding of the commodity of labor. The controversy between young Franz Hitze and Georg von Hertling[56] foreshadowed the victory of reform politics with the existing economy over a fundamental rejection of liberal bourgeois capitalism. Abandoned was the "corporative" idea, according to which the relation between capital and labor was not to be determined by the market conditions but by a social contract in the spirit of natural law, because labor was not to be degraded to a form of merchandise. Abandoned also was the conception of the mixed trade unions of "employers" and "employees" as presented mainly by Albert de Mun. The question yet to be answered was how the then clearly weaker partner, labor, could be protected. The following controversy over the state's intervention was dominated by paternalistic ideas (which were particularly persistent in western European Catholicism), but primarily by the relationship to the respective states. In this situation, the Pope, in the encyclical Rerum novarum, had to find a moderate position from which to mediate.[57] Now the comprehensive "social question" of Catholicism turned into the more specific question of the workers.

---

[51] W. Klopp, Lehren, 65ff.—Aside from being "revolutionary" and "socialistic," anti-Semitism was also charged with being one of the elements with which the Conservatives fought the Christian Socialists in Rome in 1895.

[52] Aside from his apology (chap. biblio.), Lebens- und Gewissensfragen der Gegenwart, 2 vols. (Freiburg i. Br. 1911); autobiography of A. M. Weiß (1844–1925): Lebensweg . . . (Freiburg i. Br. 1925).—In regard to his action against the Christian Socialists, see F. Funder, op. cit., 144ff.

[53] In 1878, Franz Hitze (1851–1921) went as priest to the Campo Santo in Rome and studied Karl Marx and the works of Vogelsang. His main works are based on these studies (cf. above). After his return in 1880, he became the secretary general of the association Arbeiterwohl, which had been founded by the Catholic industrialist F. Brandts, in whose factory he was social adviser. After 1882 deputy in Prussia and later in the Reichstag, Hitze became one of the leading and (in opposition to the employers' lobby) most decisive social politicians of the Center Party.—Franz Müller, F. Hitze und sein Werk (Hamburg 1928); A. Pieper, "Hitze und die Korporationsidee," Die soziale Frage . . . , ed. J. Strieder et. al. (chap. lit.), 86–98; K. H. Schürmann, Zur Vorgeschichte der christlichen Gewerkschaften (Freiburg i. Br. 1958), 53–57; J. Höffner, StL^{6} IV, 107f.

---

[54] Quoted in J. Mundwiler, Ketteler (Munich 1927), 145.—Ketteler's impact, even on Leo XIII, who called him his "great predecessor and imitator," was considerable (Schmidlin, PG II, 368). In spite of the romantic ideas of his youth, his understanding of "the new socio-economic reality" (C. Bauer, *StL*⁶ IV, 953–57) grew.—Since Ketteler offered ideas that aim at structural changes (productive associations with joint ownership of the workers) as well as social reforms, different movements relied on his work.

[55] Wilhelm Hohoff (1848–1923), a Westphalian like Hitze, retired as vicar and led the reclusive life of a scholar, protected by Cardinal Schulte. He tried to combine the scholastic theory of labor with the theory of Karl Marx (Die Revolutionen seit dem 16. Jh. [1887]; Warenwert und Kapitalprofit [1902]; Die Bedeutung der Marxschen Kapitalkritik [1908]).—An evaluation does not exist. E. Alexander, in J. N. Moody, 525, considers him remarkable, even though he rejects other attempts in the German and Austrian Catholicism.

Catholicism had finally evolved into a group within the total liberal bourgeois society and it was responsible for resolving its internal differences over economic interests (the problem of its political parties). The representatives of "Christian Socialism"[58] existed in the background;

---

[56] In regard to the socio-political stand of the philosopher and statesman Georg v. Hertling (1843–1919), see C. Bauer, Wandlungen . . . (1931), 38–41; Schürmann, 53–61; E. Deuerlein, StL^{6} IV, 61–64; it is significant for the tactical-political differences between Hertling (who was a pragmatist) and Löwenstein that the Catholic convention of 1890 was held in a different location, out of consideration for Prince Regent Luitpold (P. Siebertz, op. cit., 265–71; G. v. Hertling, Erinnerungen, 122–26).

[57] Acta Leonis XI, 108: "ad eamque rem (workers' question) adhiberi leges ipsas auctoritatemque rei publicae, utique ratione ac modo, putat oportere"—ibid., 121: ". . . in potestate rectorum civitatis est, ut ceteris prodesse ordinibus, sic et proletariosum conditionem iuvare plurimum . . . debet enim respublica ex lege muneris sui in commune consulere." But the intervention, which exceeds the elimination of a situation rebus extremis, was rejected, being under suspicion of state socialism; therefore (but also in the interest of the employee's accumulation of assets, not, however, for the purpose of preserving entrepreneural interests), the opposition to "inappropriate" taxes is rejected: "Faciat igitur iniuste atque inhumane, si de bonis privatorum plus aequo, tributorum nomine, detraxerit" (p. 133). The accent is clearly on advocating state intervention, for which the Pope was criticized by the disciples of paternalism.

[58] The early version of Christian Socialism in France disappeared in the face of the radical development of Socialism after 1848. But the idea emerged repeatedly, as in the bishop of Nottingham, E. G. Bagshaw's Mercy and Justice to the Poor: The True Political Economy (London 1885). Bagshaw combined his strict anti-Protestantism and anti-individualism with anticapitalism. He felt that the state was obligated to prevent agrarian and industrial accumulation, free enterprise (which he considered devastating), and the exploitation of the tenants. The state was to create revenue through social legislation which would enable it to remedy social abuse (19–21). The rejection of capitalist but the idea of an "order according to occupations," along with its "revitalization" (Gundlach) in the magnificent encyclical Quadragesimo anno (1931), became essentially a theoretical affair.[59]

Catholicism's multiple efforts in the seventies and eighties toward the design of a comprehensive social system were often mutually exclusive, but their fundamental significance could not be erased by mere pragmatism. They were the work of various study circles,[60] whose ideas utilization of rivers and coastal waters has to do with the interests of some Catholics in the land reform program of Henry George (cf. chap. 10). The pragmatist H. E. Manning (cf. chap. 9) advocated in his essay "The Rights and Dignity of Labour" the social priority of labor as compared to capital. He wanted to assure the free distribution of labor (5–14) and believed state interventions to be necessary; but he renounced H. George in his commentary on Rerum novarum (in regard to George, see Peter d'A. Jones, The Christian Socialist Revival [Princeton 1968]; also V. A. McClelland, CHR 58 [1972], 423ff., where the context within Catholicism is lacking).—Abbot Gasquet, O.S.B., opposing the recognition of Anglican orders (cf. chap. 9) at the Conference of Nottingham in 1898: "We all claim to be Socialists of one kind or another" (quoted in Waninger, 98).—Liberal Catholicism is represented by S. Merkle (1914, p. 71) who disdainfully quotes Abbé Pottier of Liège stating that he saw the future of Catholicism in union with the Socialists. He also refers to A. de Mun as an involuntary helper (Merkle relies in this respect on F. X. Kraus). He could have also mentioned the Swiss K. Decurtins (chap. 4). He interprets Rerum novarum in the sense of a clearly antisocialist theory of property (O. Schilling, Staatslehre, 120). The translation into German and its distortions (Herder edition) are interesting.

---

[59] H. Pesch, Liberalismus I, 567–76, objectively describes the contemporary discussions in the Catholicisms from France to Austria. He himself advocates the need for organizing the "classes as 'organs' of the social body" (556) whose authority would also adjust production to demand (565); but he warns "of a direct projection of purely theoretical constructs to reality" (579) and considers dangerous the idea of installing the classes as "large production and sales cooperatives," arguing that "nowadays the reaction to the liberalism of free enterprise often leads to an exaggeration of the idea of Gemeinschaft" (582). In contrast, Scheimpflug demands in his article published in the Staatslexicon under the title "Capital and Capitalism" (1894): "The classes are to be dissolved and regrouped"; capitalism evolved out of the "disintegration" of the medieval forms of society and is to be replaced by new "corporations" which would be responsible for "the national management of production."

[60] The Conseil des études de l'œuvre, mainly handled by A. de Mun, the founder of the Cercles catholiques d'ouvriers, and R. Latour du Pin, began publishing the Questions sociales . . . . In Rome, Count Kuefstein, a member of the Vogelsang circle, suggested the founding of the Circolo dei studi sociali ed economiche, which was joined by, among others, Liberatore, Mermillod, and Count Soderini. Different groups, predominantly the Viennese (dissolved in 1888), were represented in the Freie Vereinigung katholischer Sozialpolitiker, founded in 1883 by Löwenstein. The Union catholique d'études sociales et économiques à Fribourg tried to unite these circles internationally; it existed until Rerum novarum was issued. The Swiss K. Decurtins, in 1887 invited to Fribourg, was "the democratic element in this highly aristocratic association" (Fry II, 177); he wrote to Segesser: "As different as the representatives of the various ideas—the sovereign and the democrat—may have been, the power of Communion united them all" (Fry II, 179). There is a survey of these circles in A. Knoll, Der soziale Gedanke, 116–22.

merged in the Union catholique of Fribourg (founded in 1884 by Mermillod). The image of unity which Catholicism presented in its defense toward the "modern world" needs to be modified considerably if one is adequately to appreciate the difficulties which had to be overcome in formulating Rerum novarum.[61] The Neo-Scholastic abstract character of many parties has its explanation in the need to cover the rather contradictory concepts within Catholicism itself as they came to light, for example, at the international congresses in Liège, particularly in 1890. Only by placing it in the total historical context of these decades can we comprehend the significance and the limits of this encyclical in historical terms. Perhaps its greatest significance lies in the recognition of the workers' right to organize, along with its cautious affirmation of the state's right and duty of intervention.

Marriage and Family

Although tensions between Catholicism and liberal individualism on the one hand and collective socialism in the economic realm on the other hand were deep, doctrinal authority was united regarding the sovereign origin of the family. In the dispute with socialism, theories which aimed at revolutionizing the traditional concept of the institution of marriage were occasionally offered by bourgeois Catholics and had to be fended off. There was concern that the parents' rights and obligations regarding the care of their children could be diminished or suspended by state measures.[62] The struggle against liberalism in this respect referred to the legalization of divorce, a prerequisite for which was the introduction of civil marriage. Leo XIII pointed out that marriage, insofar as it served the maintenance of human society, created civil correlationships which the state had a right to regulate. But matrimony is primarily a sacrament and as such subject only to ecclesiastical authority. This poses a problem in view of the de-Christianization and the pluralization of society at large. A solution aiming at differentiating the civil contract from the sacrament, which was respected as such, was rejected by the Pope. In respect to the extrasacramental "relation" (coniunctio), he said, avoiding a more pungent expression, that in this manner a "rightful marriage" (iustum matrimonium) could not be constituted.[63] No less important for the family than the dwindling attitude of society regarding the institutional character of marriage were the changes of the economic conditions resulting from growing industrialization as they affected the family. Leo XIII in Rerum novarum spoke only in general terms about a fair wage. He also said that the pater familias had to be able to support his family; but aside from the economic problems it was probably the patriarchal concept of the family which prevented the amount of wages from being determined as a "family wage" according to natural law.[64] To be sure, industrial female labor from the perspective of the worker's protection is an important aspect discussed among groups studying the social problem in Catholicism. But this kind of work was basically considered an evil which had to be alleviated.[65] For a long time, the changes in the family structure of the industrial society were ignored and the family of the agrarian society continued to serve as a model.[66] In this context belong representations of the image of the "Holy Family" in Nazareth.[67] Women's emancipation was diagnosed by Christian social doctrine as a symptom of decline.[68]

---

[61] The first draft of the encyclical was probably written by M. Liberatore. The second one was amended by secretaries G. Boccali and A. Volpini, who also used suggestions from Fribourg. Cardinals Zigliara and Mazzella, and again Liberatore, worked on the third version. Schmidlin, PG II, 373, critically continues where G. Antonazzi, op. cit., 8–11, 37ff., left off.—The danger of an interpretation by the interested parties prohibited the Pope from "taking an overly concrete and detailed stand" (P. Jostock, op. cit., 11).

[62] Rerum novarum (Acta Leonis XI, 106).

The School Question

The classical battlefield of the Catholic Church, society, and the modern state is the school and especially the elementary school. This fight is a defense against the state's claim, having come to full force through the French Revolution, to educate its adolescent citizens in accord with its needs and concepts. In the eighteenth century the predominant part of education had still been, at least indirectly, a Church matter. But the purely defensive character of the ecclesiastical school struggle was demonstrated by the fact that it focused principally and, above all, factually on the religious element of instruction. The parents' right and duty to raise their children authoritatively was not defined in general terms but according to Christian mores.[69] The ecclesiastical ideal was a Catholic school financed by the state, which the state had the right to exert influence upon, but only as far as it was congruent with its innate authority. In the sense of choosing the lesser evil, these ideals were infringed upon when non-Catholic schools were also admitted. To tolerate this in the city of Rome was, of course, disagreeable to Leo XIII.[70] Bordering the tolerable was the system wherein only Catholic private schools were allowed, even if, as was the case in the United States, they had the same constitutional status as other schools.[71] The "neutral schools,"[72] which, as a rule, were antiecclesiastical, continued to be principally condemned, even if it was permissible to administer religious instruction within or outside of the school building during the time off. The achievements in the individual countries differed according to the respective political situation[73]: In France, education was largely secularized by the turn of the century after initial favorable interpretation of the law of 1882 by J. Ferry, because Catholic private schools were, in spite of quantitative increases, considerably limited by the laws enacted against the religious orders and congregations. In Italy, the Catholic victories in the local elections slowly counteracted the prohibition of religious instruction in elementary schools. In Belgium, the Liberals were defeated in the school question with their very own political principles. In the Netherlands, the political coalition of Catholics and Protestants prevented a de-Christianization of the schools. In Bismarck's Germany, the school was the responsibility of the Länder, and either in practice or through legislation the predominant problem of denominational diversity could be solved while preserving the Christian character of the school, even though the school laws were still vehemently debated after the Kulturkampf.[74] In Great Britain, the liberal de-Anglicanization of schools gave the Catholics some leeway (which they took advantage of), assisted by state subsidy of private schools. But the rising standards in education here as well as in the United States made it more difficult for the Catholics to remain competitive. This was not only a question of financial means. At the Catholic Convention in Aachen in 1879, Prince Karl Löwenstein presented the motion to form a commission which was to develop learning goals and corresponding teaching plans for universities and all the way down to elementary schools. Though it was modeled after the school of the Middle Ages, it was an outstanding motion, but it faded out after being handed over to the Görres-Gesellschaft.[75] The Jesuits, who were especially active in higher education wherever they were admitted, finally adopted nolens volens the existing school plans,[76] but they were, except where absolutely necessary, not able to develop their own modern concept. With good reason, the shortcomings of teachers' training were pointed out.[77] In [63] The encyclical Arcanum (1880) (Acta Leonis II): against Communist ideas: 19; against divorce: 30ff.; against civil marriage: 21f.; state rights: 34f.; Sacrament and authority of the Church: 23; against the separation of the civil license from the Sacrament: 25f.; extra-Sacramental "union" of Christians: 37.

---

[64] See O. v. Nell-Breuning, Eigentum, 147, with important documentation.

[65] Rerum novarum (Acta Leonis XI, 129): "Sic certa quaedam artificia minus apte conveniunt in feminas ad opera domestica natas: quae quidem opera et tuentur magnopere in muliebre genere decus, et liberorum institutioni prosperitatique familiae natura repondent."

[66] O. v. Nell-Breuning, Eigentum, 147, calls the "rural family" a family which is closest to nature, to the natural order of things, and thus to the direct application of natural law" (1931); this addresses the problem.

[67] Cf. chap. 16

[68] "The Socialists demanded the absolute equality of the sexes in regard to civil and private law, within and outside of the family. This demand contradicts reason and Christianity" (V. Cathrein, Sozialismus, 347).—One reason that the Katholische Frauenbund (founded in 1903 in Cologne) encountered conflicts with the Church lies in its trend toward emancipation, moderate as it may have been.—The motion at the Catholic Convention of Düsseldorf in 1908 to admit women as independent members was voted down.

---

[69] Sapientiae christianae (1890) (Acta Leonis X, 39).

[70] Letter to the cardinal vicar of Rome of 25 March 1879, Acta Leonis I, 202–10. The establishment of a Protestant school, anche sotto gli stessi occhi Nostri, fin presso alle porte del Vaticano (204), was, naturally, an inappropriate provocation. But Leo XIII rejected (on principle) the attempt to spread falsi principii del Protestantesimo in Italy and particularly in Rome.

[71] Cf. chap. 10.—Leo XIII called it unfair to force parents by means of taxes to finance schools which their children could not attend for reasons of conscience: Quae coniunctim (ASS 24, 656).

[72] Acta Leonis II, 118; IV, 15; VI, 154.

[73] Cf. chapters on the individual countries in Pt. I, Sec. I, and Pt. II, Sec. III.

---

[74] In Prussia, in 1892, a bill of the Center and the Conservatives regarding parochial schools miscarried because of the Liberals' opposition. But the "customary habits in everyday school life, which were moderate and in accord with ecclesiastical desires" (Brück-Kißling IV/2, 314), were finally legalized. In Bavaria, the parochial school became the legally "regular" school in 1883, and the change into nondenominational schools required an ecclesiastical verdict stating "whether or not adequate religious instruction would be impaired" (ibid., 318). In Württemberg, the parochial school had never been questioned. In Baden, there had existed since 1878 the principle of the nondenominational school, but this was practiced in such a way that the teacher of a local school of a certain denomination had to adhere to this creed personally. In mixed schools, the denominational majority determined the teacher, though a constant minority group was also provided with the appropriate teacher (Catholic religious instruction was regulated in 1888 by a "proper episcopal ordinance" (ibid., 318f.). In Hesse, the situation relaxed in a "practical" regard (ibid., 320).

[75] Kißling II, 194, noted that this society of scholars was "strictly speaking" not competent, because at that time such societies did not deal with didactic problems; see G. M. Pachtler, S.J., Die Reform unserer Gymnasien (Paderborn 1883), in which he pleaded for a Neo-Scholastic orientation and against the "devastating attitude of a know-it-all!"

[76] H. Becher, Jesuiten, 341.

[77] M. Spahn, op. cit., 30.—After the Prussian school law of 1906, this Catholic historian, who favored the state but defended the clerical supervision of schools, asked the question whether Catholic cooperation "in national schools whose legal system they helped create would be more successful" than the achievements of their French fellow believers "in regard to the development of education and their own philosophy" (27). It is interesting that this lecture was presented to the Catholic Teachers' Association. The social difference between the academically trained pastor and the elementary school teacher often effected an opposition which resulted in the de-Christianization of the faculty, especially since even during their training in denominational seminaries resentments were frequently aroused.

Italy, Murri bewailed the traditionalism of Catholic education and the lack of religious instruction.[78] Without a doubt, education in all its stages was one of the most important areas in which to halt the rapid or slow process of de-Christianization. This is why the tensions between Catholicism and society as a whole became most vigorous in this sphere. The dilemma which Catholicism had to face relative to its various relations to the total society became especially apparent: the dilemma of the desire to adapt until a special society could be developed, a desire which arose from the hope for re-Christianization.[79]

Catholic Associations

The history of the Catholic Church since the middle of the nineteenth century is partially, at least in Europe, a history of Catholic associations. Even here national differences are considerable, depending on the political situation.[80] In France, which was not particularly friendly toward associations, the internal political tensions within Catholicism, among other things, impeded a strong development. Aside from the social associations, the Association catholique de la Jeunesse française was probably the most important. It was founded in 1886 by Robert du Roquefeuil (headed later by Albert de Mun) and grew considerably after 1899 because the organization reached out toward the social classes as well as to all age groups. The impact of the political problem shows most clearly in the two major movements emerging around the turn of the century: the religiously inspired Sillon of Marc Sagnier and the Action Française,[81] in which monarchal Catholics and representatives of classical culture in the sense of Maurras joined hands. Whichever concept they followed, the French Catholics were always interested in the whole of France. Germany became primarily the classical land of the Catholic association movement because Catholicism there, in contrast to Anglo-Saxon countries, was such a strong minority that it could organize itself successfully within the general society, especially since it maintained certain regional strongholds in spite of the confessional mixture, and because it could not ignore the historical decisions of 1806, 1866, and 1870, and had to come to grips with the Protestant Hohenzollern Empire. The most famous organization was the Volksverein für das Catholische Deutschland [People's Society for Catholic Germany] of 1890, which also impressed many Catholic leaders in France and Italy. It [78] R. Murri (cf. chap. 15), 117–23.

---

[79] T. Zeldin, Conflicts in French Society. Anticlericalism, Education and Morals in the 19th Century (London 1971); also, A. Daumard, RH 148 (1972), 202ff.

[80] Cf. n. 73. Regarding the workers associations, cf. chap. 13.

[81] In this regard, see below, pp. 473–76.

also encountered criticism, but was regarded by many important forces in Switzerland and Austria[82] as a model worth emulating. The founding process involved considerable internal struggles because the conservative agrarian politician Felix von Loë and Bishop Korum of Trier were striving for a society to "teach the German people about the religious and social errors of the present" according to the apologetic of Tilmann Pesch, S. J., who opposed the strongly anti-Catholic Evangelischer Bund (Evangelical Union) of 1887. Windthorst saw in it a danger to the Center Party, striving, together with others, for an extensive association for the masses which was to be separate from the Center Party (no election funds, no participation in the election campaign), but was to follow the same goals. This organization succeeded.[83] The association became intensely active with publications, training institutions (for which lecture material was provided), and its "people's offices" (counseling places; after 1900). These activities with their emphasis on reform and decidedly social accent were instrumental in fending off the impact of social democracy on the Catholic workers.[84] Most Catholic employers took a distant or negative stand toward the association, similar to the segment of the episcopate which was suspicious of an association not officially established by the Church, and especially of its democratic concepts.[85] An opponent of the Volksverein was also the group around Chaplain Dr. Oberdörffer, who, in 1893, once again took up a "Catholic social program" with an occupational orientation and rejected parliamentarism. The Volksverein had, in 1891, nearly 109,000 members, in 1901: 185,000, in 1902: 230,000, and in 1914: 805,000. One should consider that the demands on the members of a mass association are necessarily minor. The association's stronghold was in the Rhineland, while Bavaria kept aloof. There were several conflicts with the many other associations[86] of German Catholicism.[87] The Volksverein continued to have one handicap: it was not altogether successful in mobilizing the laymen in the organization itself. The official ecclesiastical suspicion of lay participation should not mislead one to imagine that the activities of the laymen were too intensive. A good part of pastoral work was consumed by care for the associations.[88] But the fact that the associations established without Church direction were a product of the post-revolutionary era, in spite of their significance for the Church in modern society, was not overlooked. Leo XIII emphasized the summa potestas of the Pope in his magisterial role even though the laity (privati) were allowed industria nonnulla. He underscored the fact that they could assume only a "resonance" of the teaching authority.[89] The real reason for this statement was certain tendencies of the Opera dei congressi, which was divided after 1884 according to function and placed under strictly hierarchal command despite the lay presidency.[90]

---

[82] In Switzerland, in 1904, the Katholische Volksverein was founded combining the associations there (chap. 4). It had local chapters, cantonal associations, and a central executive board which elected the central president. The Schweizerische Kirchenzeitung in Lucerne had pointed to the German model in 1898, but it was not considered belligerent enough. In regard to its background, see J. Meier, Der Schweizer Katholische Verein (Lucerne 1954).—In Austria, the numerous societies combined to form the Katholische Volksbund (1909), a central organization which, even in face of the differences between the Conservatives and the Christian Socialists, was strictly apolitical.

[83] E. Ritter, op. cit., 140–44; P. Siebertz, op. cit., 191ff.—Windthorst became honorary president, but died a year later. Upon his initiative, the industrialist Franz Brandts (Mönchen-Gladbach), well-known for his social activities, became the first chairman. It was his wish that the lawyer Karl Trimborn become his deputy. Franz Hitze became secretary (see above). August Pieper (1866–1942; 1889: priest) succeeded Hitze in 1892 and became director general of the Volksverein in 1903. In 1905, the Volksvereinsverlag GmbH began functioning as the owner of the society (O. v. Nell-Breuning, StdZ [1972], 35–50).

[84] The program in A. Pieper (1866–1942), Sinn und Aufgabe: "Every Catholic German of age who pays his yearly dues of one mark is a member of this society."

[85] The archbishop of Cologne, F. v. Hartmann (1912–19) disapproved of the introduction of general suffrage in Prussia.

---

[86] The Katholische Frauenbund (1912: 60,000 members), founded in 1903 and addressing mainly the upper class through Trimborn, Bachem-Sieger, and others (the Katholische Mütterverein, founded in 1856 in Mainz by Bishop Ketteler and Countess Ida Hahn-Hahn was not organized on a diocesan level until during World War I), rejected the fact that the Volksverein was also soliciting membership of women (1914 agreement: the Volksverein is to remain an essentially male affair); closely related to the question of the "Christian trade union" was the conflict with the Katholische Kaufmännische Vereinigung (1907: 20,125 members, 1912: 35,000), which had members among employers and employees. There were also conflicts of competence with the secretariat general of the Catholic youth organizations in Düsseldorf.

[87] Special emphasis was placed on the development of youth groups. The Katholische Jungmännerverband with its 1200 chapters had 140,000 members in 1908 (after 1913, Carl Mosterts, youth vicar, was the president general). The Zentralverband der Katholischen Jungfrauenvereinigung Deutschlands was not founded until 1915 (the female organizations usually came later everywhere). The Gesellenverein of A. Kolping remained very active (1914: 1,276 local chapters with 86,339 active and 129,714 inactive members (Meister). The Catholic students were organized in three socially and politically different associations: in the fraternity Cartellverband der katholischen deutschen Studentenverbindungen (CV; after 1866) and in the Kartellverband der katholischen Studentenvereine Deutschlands (KV; after 1866), as well as in the related but more theologically interested Unitas society (UV; after 1860); the CV had 8,966 members in 1910, the KV 9,072 in 1912 (including alumni).—The Katholische Lehrerverband (after 1889) had 21,000 members in 1912; the female organization 15,000 (after 1885).

[88] M. Faßbender, "Laienapostolat und Volkspflege," Caritasschriften 15 (Freiburg i. Br. 1906); he stressed that the main area of activity was not accessible to the priest.

[89] Encyclical Sapientiae (1890) (Acta Leonis X, 21); "qui, quoties res exigat, commode possunt non sane doctoris sibi partes assumere, sed ea, quae ipsi acceperint, impertire ceteris, magistrorum voci resonantes tamquam imago."

[90] Cf. chap. 5.

The Catholic Press

The daily press was also a child of the Enlightenment and the Revolution. When one pastor spoke of the "authority of the masses" which "threatens to silence the preacher,"[91] he was passing the same judgment that the Historisch-politischen Blätter expressed on an elevated level: a "specifically Catholic press" was a "necessary evil," having emerged because Christian society was not "in its normal condition."[92] The remark that Catholics had neither "the writers nor the readers" was valid for some time and with respect to subscribers generally continued to be a problem, especially since this reflected on the revenue from advertisements. But the "evil" increased in terms of necessity. It had another aspect: Catholic journalism reflected and compounded internal strife within the various forms of Catholicism.[93] In this respect, the Kölnische Volkszeitung[94] and the Berlin Germania[95] in Germany were competitors. The Kölner Richtung, to which Julius Bachem contributed (especially political and literary articles such as "Heraus aus dem Turm!" [Leave the Tower!]), joined the dispute that had broken out in 1906, endorsing the principally supradenominational character of the Center Party and its political freedom in the face of direct ecclesiastical instructions. The paper took an analogous position in the controversy over the "Christian trade unions." In Austria, the conservative Vaterland (founded in 1860) and the Christian-social Reichspost (founded in 1893) opposed each other (the papers united in 1911). A false image of journalism in German Catholicism is created when only the leading organs are considered and not the weeklies and the many small local papers. In 1865, the total number of subscribers was estimated to be about 60,000; in 1890, about one million were reported. Nevertheless, these numbers were relatively low: the Berliner Tageblatt alone had 250,000 subscribers.[96] The Kulturkampf had effected a significant breakthrough. Of course this was related to the fact that the Catholic daily newspapers after 1870 were practically the mouthpieces of the Center Party.[97] This and the bishops' desire to have a direct impact on the editorial staff resulted in an emphatic recommendation of the Church papers at the Catholic Convention in Metz in 1913.[98] These were a medium of the Church authority itself, but they had to try to address Catholics of all political persuasions and therefore generally refrained from sharp polemics in areas outside of the religious and moral spheres. In the Catholic press which represented intransigent conservative viewpoints—in Belgium Le Bien Public, in the Netherlands the Maasbode, in Spain the Siglo futuro, in Canada the Vérité of Tardivel—the French newspaper La Croix stands out, not just because of its circulation (in 1897: seven hundred thousand, including the nearly one hundred local editions), but also because of its sometimes almost fanatical attitude.[99] In the realm of journalism, the dilemma between Catholicism as a socially, politically, and philosophically coherent group and the essentially universal orientation of the Catholic Church is also evident.[100]

---

[91] Cf. J. Lukas, Die Presse, ein Stück moderner Versimpelung (Regensburg 1867).

[92] Quoted according to K. Löffler, op. cit., 57.—Leo XIII's statements to the press, aside from giving general religious and moral advice, request avoiding internal Catholic disputes in the press, (1882) and repeatedly in reference to Spain (Acta Leonis III, 178). He deals increasingly with submission to ecclesiastical authority (in regard to France in 1899, see Acta Leonis XIX, 208). An instruction by Rampolla in 1902 reads: "Inoltre i giornalisti democratico-cristiani, come tutti i giornalisti cattolici, debbono mettere in pratica i seguenti avvertimenti del Santo Padre" (following a quotation from Nobilissima Gallorum of 1884 about ecclesiastical authority); Acta Leonis XXII, 12.

[93] In regard to France, see chaps. 6 and 36; Italy: chaps. 5 and 34; the Netherlands: Rogier (1957), 269–75 (quoted in chap. 7).

[94] The title Kölner Volkszeitung after 1869 means a change insofar as the conservative patrons who financed the founding of the Kölnische Blätter (1860) felt that the word Volk sounded too democratic (K. Buchheim). In 1869 Julius Bachem became the head of the editorial staff; editor in chief from 1878 until 1907 was the historian Hermann Cardauns. Copies in 1871: 7,200; in 1874: 8,600; in 1881: 9,000.

[95] In 1871 under the leadership of Councilor F. v. Kehler, the Catholic committee of Berlin founded the Germania. Chaplain P. Majunke of Silesia, who maintained that Luther committed suicide, was replaced as editor. During the Kulturkampf, the paper was particularly persecuted with prohibitions and penalties; nonetheless, it adhered to its intransigent course.

The Enemy

Even if one were critical of a "world conspiracy," refrained from regarding the Grand Master of the Italian Freemasons, Andriano Lemmi, with his pathological hatred of the Church, as representative of all lodges, and made a distinction between the Roman and all the other organizations, it must be stated that we are dealing here with the intellectual leaders of the time who waged a ruthless war against the Catholic Church, no matter how the humanitarian ideals of that movement are evaluated. This and the successes of the Freemasons within Catholicism itself, especially in Latin America, cannot keep us from considering what impact the intensity of the Catholic struggle against the Freemasons had for the consolidation of group-consciousness in the face of the enemy. Even Leo XIII differentiated in his encyclical Humanum genus (20 April 1884) between individual Sectatores, who, he said, are not without blame, but do not participate in the malicious actions and do not have a clear picture of the ultimate goals of Freemasonry. But the encyclical begins with a reference to the Invidia Diaboli, and it ends with the request to the world episcopate to uproot this "wicked pestilence" (impuram luem) because an attack as vicious as theirs requires an equally vicious defense. In the first paragraph, the Pope places God's realm in opposition to that of Satan. The accusations against the "naturalists" are basically the same as those which the Pope had earlier brought against the "socialists and communists" and which he would bring against liberalism a year later, only that he describes it as work in solitary darkness comparable to that of the Manichaeans. Leo XIII reiterates the prohibition of membership under penalty of excommunication which his predecessors had proclaimed.[101]

---

[96] In Germany, there were 221 Catholic newspapers in 1881; 288 in 1890; 378 in 1903; 446 in 1912 (without Kopfblätter; 305 were privately owned, 141 the property of a corporation). In the early Weimar Republic, there existed 65 newspapers that had been founded between 1848 and 1871.

[97] K. Bachem, Julius Bachem I, p. vii. Earlier, the "political leaning was uncertain, unclear, frequently changing;" K. Bringmann, Die konfessionell-politische Tagespresse des Niederrheins im 19. Jahrhundert (Düsseldorf 1938). The Augustinusverein, founded in 1878, spoke either of the "Catholic press" or the "Center press" (W. Kisky, op. cit., 77). Now and then there were tensions within the party because it prohibited any kind of criticism (ibid., 167ff.). The temporary presidency of the Augustinerverein, consisting of seven members, had only one editor and four clergymen; in 1889 a layman was the president for the first time. There were also disagreements between the publishers and the editors (ibid., 100ff., 148).

[98] A definition was attempted according to which the ecclesiastical papers were "to serve the purpose of pastoral work only" (W. Kisky, op. cit., 154). Cf. chap. 14, n. 19.

[99] Regarding Italy, cf. above, p. 90; regarding La Croix: above, p. 105—An international comparative analysis of Catholic journalism according to its tendencies, its quality, and its impact is sorely needed.

[100] Concerning the integralism of the press, see below, p. 473.

The positive definition of a Freemasonic lodge led to complications in Canada and the United States.[102] For the Catholic Convention in Amberg in 1885, Prince Löwenstein, according to the account of his biographer, could not find a bishop who was willing to give a speech appropriately warding off the Freemasons. After the papal letter Praeclara of 20 June 1894[103] which repeatedly condemned the Freemasons (who had now emerged from the dark into the light), Bishop Korum himself was of the opinion that the leadership of the planned Anti-Freemason Congress in Trent had to be the responsibility of the laity.[104] Gabriel Jogand-Pagés, an ex-Freemason who, with reference to the papal encyclical Humanum genus, had been opposing the lodges since 1885, was to appear there. As "Leo Taxil," Jogand-Pagés invented a Miss Diana Vaughan, who had supposedly penetrated the secrets of the Satan cult and since her conversion was forced to live in hiding in order to escape death at the hands of the Freemasons. Jogand-Pagés' accomplice was the physician Charles Hacks who, as Dr. Bataille, published the essay "Le Diable au XIX^{me} siècle." The revelations of one Domenico Margiotta about the Italian Grand Master Andriano Lemmi drew the attention of some French bishops. An excerpt appeared in German translation, as well as the sermons of the Dominican Monsabré who demanded a crusade against the lodges. As president of the "Committee for Roman Affairs," Prince Löwenstein tried at the Catholic Convention to circulate such publications in Germany. But Bishop Korum[105] and others expressed reservations toward such "disclosures" about the Satan cult. Italy initiated the international congress, which took place from 20 September to 30 September 1896 in Trent under the patronage of Cardinal Parocchi. Löwenstein was convinced that in the fight for the Church it was his obligation to take over the chairmanship. Yet some scepticism toward "Leo Taxil" was still brought forward as the result of information which arrived just in time.[106] A Roman investigative committee established in Trent pronounced judgment on 22 January 1897: the existence of Miss Vaughan could neither be proven nor disproven. On 17 April "Taxil" revealed his hoax. It was the general problem which came to light through this affair, rather than the psychology of this man, which is important: large parts of Catholicism found themselves facing a basically anti-Christian and antiecclesiastical world.[107] A difficult path had to be followed between adaptation and absolute resistance.

---

[101] Humanun genus (Acta Leonis II, 43–70, here: 50, 65, 69, 43, 49).

[102] Cf. chaps. 9 and 10.

[103] Praeclara (Acta Leonis XIV, 208f.).

[104] P. Siebertz, op. cit., 478. Löwenstein's biography glorifies its hero, but, in spite of certain naive qualities, it contains a considerable number of facts found in the family archives. Under the pseudonym Ewald, he published articles against the Freemasons, even after the Congress of Trent. They were collected and edited under the title Die geheime Armee im Kampf gegen Thron und Altar, but prominent and intelligent Catholics prevented their publication.

On another yet not completely separate plain are the anti-Semitic tendencies which permeated various parts of Catholicism, especially in [105] Korum's letter to Löwenstein of 24 August 1896 (after the Bishops' Conference in Fulda): The revelations may be true for France and Italy, but "cannot be proven in regard to Germany;" see P. Siebertz, op. cit., 483.

---

[106] C. Hacks was a brother-in-law of Julius Bachem. He divulged to him the deception. According to P. Siebertz, Bachem seems to have informed Löwenstein rather superficially; K. Bachem, Erinnerungen eines alten Publizisten und Politikers (Cologne 1913), 161ff. In August 1896, the Jesuit H. J. Gruber, who had believed the revelations for a long time, published an article of warning in the Kölnische Volkszeitung (initialled H.G.). As H. Gerber he wrote Taxils Palladismus-Roman, 3 vols. (Berlin 1897–98); id., Betrug als Ende eines Betrugs (Berlin 1897).

[107] A. Boulenger, Histoire générale de l'Église III (Paris 1947), 748: It is difficult to believe that Freemasons devised this affair; yet, they derived profit from it. Kißling II, 284–86, tries to diminish the problem and draws attention to Hermann Schell (cf. chap. 29), who has to be given credit for not playing up a marginal event, but rather seeing the affair as a symptom of the internal status of the Church, for which he shows concern.

Austria and France. The reasons are complex: a subcutaneous anti-Semitism in the history of Christianity surfaced due to the animosity of liberal, Jewish writers toward the Church, and this anti-Semitism joined with a general social resentment toward the Jewish world of finance and business. In France, both the right and the left wing of Catholicism were affected.[108] In Austria, a middle-class mentality and Christian social reform ideas joined together. In France, in 1899, Abbé Gayraud called the Jews "la nation malfaisante et parasitaire," and the election slogan of the "Christian-Social Party" in 1903 read: "Catholics and Protestants, unite in brotherly love against Jewish capitalism and the Asian money ethic."[109]

---

[108] G. Hoog, op. cit., 106, is justified in speaking of an "almost international" phenomenon. However, the Congress of Lyon in 1896 did not consider it necessary to be "inspired" by the Viennese anti-Semitism.

[109] K. Rengstorf, Kirche und Synagoge II (Stuttgart 1971); P. Sorlin, La "Croix" et les Juifs (Paris 1967); P. Pierrard, Juifs et catholiques français. De Drummont à Jules Isaac (Paris 1970); I. A. Hellwing, Der konfessionelle Antisemitismus in Österreich (Vienna 1972).

CHAPTER 13

The Social Movements

In the second half of the nineteenth century, social organizations emerged from the forms of Catholicism which dealt with the needs and interests of the farmers, the middle-class, and the industrial workers. The attempts to meet these needs were primarily inspired by religious motives. Such a combination of religiously irrelevant economic facts and ecclesiastical attitudes was more in accord with the social awareness of Catholicism than with the self-awareness of Protestantism, in spite of similar and often pioneering events. The activities were actually initiated by the clergy and individual laymen, less so by the workers and farmers concerned. The fact that after the first third of the twentieth century the religious aspects became more or less insignificant in comparison to the economic ones does not allow the original combination to be considered ideologically suspect. Instead, it refers to the problem of the relationship between Church and state in the sense of the image and the model which was discussed earlier. In this context, it is important that the leadership of the organizations was more and more transferred from the clergy to the laity. This process, viewed objectively, was appropriate, but it resulted in the predominance of the representation of economic interests over the initial religious motivations.

Farmers

In Germany, beginning in the sixties, Wilhelm Raiffeisen (1818–88) devoted himself to the development of a rural cooperative system. Raiffeisen was a church-minded Protestant. In 1862 the Catholic aristocrat Burghard von Schorlemer-Alst (1825–95) founded an interdenominational (according to its statutes) Farmers' Association in Westphalia. It spread so rapidly in the areas with a Catholic population because of its limitation by the Kulturkampf;[1] since the social union was impeded by the state, the Catholic farmers became even more active in their local societies.

In Italy the movement began in Venetia, where Cerutti founded a cooperative credit bank in 1880. This institution, (1904: 855 credit institutions) together with the already existing supporting funds of the Opera dei congressi, became the foundation for the development of the farmers' associations. In accord with the agrarian condition in Italy, there were societies for farm laborers and for farmers (in 1904: 33 and 43 respectively).[2] In Belgium, the Boerenbond, founded in 1889 by G. Helleputte[3] and the priest Mellaerts, achieved considerable significance (1902: 359 local "guilds"). In 1896, a Catholic farmers' union was founded in the Netherlands. In France, in 1892, E. Duport and L. Durand created a rural system of cooperatives in the vicinity of Lyon, and rural youth groups were active. From these activities emerged the Ligue agricole chrétienne. Its goal, formulated in the statutes of the Farmers' Society of Schorlemer-Alst, was "to further the members in religious, moral, intellectual, social and material respects." It was applied in all rural organizations and, in its universal formulation, was especially pertinent in areas where de-Christianization had already early affected large parts of the rural population, mostly in western Europe. The organization of the credit system, buying, and selling played a special role in the Christian farmers' movement. This was a result of modern economic exigencies which also affected the agrarian sector. However, after World War I, the religious character of the farmers' societies survived only in Belgium and in the Netherlands. Consequently, economic interests were intensified.[4] [1] F. Jacobs, B. Freiherr von Schorlemer-Alst (Hiltrup i. W. 1953).—In Bavaria, where the societies formed a special association, Georg Heim was later the initiator (1865–1938).

---

[2] A. Gambasin, Il movimento sociale . . . (biblio., chap. 5).

[3] Cf. chap. 7.

[4] An early example of this problem is the Catholic Convention in Aachen in 1879. In the previous year, Bebel had had a surprising electoral victory in this city. At the convention of the Piusverein, taking place at the same time in Aachen, Schorlemer-Alst defended the strongly agrarian protective tariffs policy which was supported by the Center against the Liberals' opposition, and which also encountered the disapproval of the

The "Middle Class"

The term "middle class"[5] needs to be defined in generous terms, because the ecclesiastically active industrial entrepreneurs and businessmen (the denominational statistics themselves mean little) were running only medium or small businesses, and with regard to their social policies they stood isolated from their colleagues, especially from those in higher ranks.[6] This explains, aside from socio-theoretical questions, why the idea of the mixed trade unions and paternalistic ideas dominated Catholicism for a long time. The entrepreneur regarded his small business (in which he knew everyone) as sort of an extended family. Since there were only minor economic differences, it was possible for employers and employees alike to belong to the Catholic organizations of this social stratum. (While farmers were among the self-employed, they constituted a separate category.) The journeymen's union of Adolf Kolping followed the tradition of the class of craftsmen, and the journeymen who were promoted to masters continued to be special members of the union. A similar situation existed in the mercantile associations within Catholicism. In 1884, an association of Catholic entrepreneurs emerged in the north of France, and in 1889, Léon Harmel and the priest Alet founded the Union fraternelle du Commerce et de l'Industrie, which consisted mainly of shopkeepers and small manufacturers who, because of their religious affiliation, also wanted to help each other economically. The members of such associations were largely paternalistic, and entrepreneurs who liked to experiment incurred displeasure.[7]

Catholic workers. Schorlemer-Alst also tried to promote solidarity with his slogan of the "poor man," who, together with the other classes, had defended the Church during the Kulturkampf (Kißling II, 65f).

[5] Regarding this concept, see O.v. Nell-Breuning, StL[6] V, 783–90.

[6] Regarding Germany, cf. C. Bauer, Deutscher Katholizismus (Frankfurt a. M. 1964), 32–42. It is especially significant that the main areas of industrialization, the Rhineland and Upper Silesia, were rather uniformly Catholic regions, which changed their denominational structure little, in spite of mobility. However, there was "hardly any Catholic participation in the leadership of industrialization," but rather a "completely disproportionate participation in the enterprises of industrial entrepreneurs" (38).—Denominationally homogeneous countries can only be assessed adequately if one can look beyond the more or less active participation in Church life and include the factual religious attitude.—The isolated social activities in the companies owned by religiously and morally responsible entrepreneurs brought these companies into a disadvantageous competitive situation.

[7] H. Rollet, op. cit., (1947 ed.), describes the resistance the entrepreneur C. Feron-Vrau encountered at the Congress of Mouvaux in 1895 because he had allowed a works council to be elected, even though he had added that it was necessary "to accustom the worker to respect the areas of business which are the responsibility of the entrepreneur."

Since the interests were different in the various economic sectors, a central federation with various special sections was founded in 1901. Abbé Puppey-Girard had suggested this federation, and in 1892 he also initiated the union of young engineers, the Union sociale des ingénieurs catholiques, which became a trade union in 1902. In the Netherlands, at the beginning of the twentieth century, Catholic employers' combines emerged in the tobacco and mechanical engineering industries. In Belgium and Germany, given the political partisanship, there was no need for such organizations. In Austria, in the nineties, the Christian Socialists emerged in opposition to the Conservatives. They were interested in the labor question, but they themselves were a decidedly middle-class movement, in which many employed and independent people of the petite bourgeoisie gathered.[8]

At the beginning of World War I, the two Catholic indistrialists Léon Harmel (1829–1915)[9] and Franz Brandts (1834–1914)[10] died. As heads of their own companies and in their capacity as organizers they had tried to find a solution to the labor question. They both used a patriarchal style, though it was different in each case because of the situation in their respective countries and their personal way of thinking; and they were both from the textile industry. These men are not at all representative of their colleagues of the same denomination, but they document what was a serious paternalistic reform. Harmel, le bon pére, was theoretically indoctrinated by Le Play,[11] and he endorsed and practiced himself a certain form of workers' participation in company policies (the Conseil professionel of 1888 changed to the more precise term Conseil d'usine in 1891). Harmel also tended to induce the workers to execute their own initiatives. His distant goal was a corporation of employers and employees, but, in contrast to Albert de Mun, he believed that it could only be accomplished if the idea of trade unions was accepted. He was critical of state intervention, but also of his colleagues, whom he charged with being idle in terms of the workers' question, except for their customary charitable activities. He formulated his principles in the Catéchisme au patron (Paris 1889). Harmel was one of the main organizers of the French workers' pilgrimages to Rome, and after 1895 he was the president of the Oeuvres des cercles catholiques d'ouvriers, which he wanted to lead out of the conservative conception of de Mun in order to win the workers themselves. Through F. Brandts's recommendation he served as consultant during the founding of the Arbeiterwohl in Mönchen-Gladbach, an association of "Catholic industrialists and friends of the workers" (1879). Through this association and its publication, the German textile entrepreneurs wanted to propagate their socio-political ideas. Members of the executive board were Georg von Hertling and Prelate F. C. Moufang of Mainz, who brought with him the traditions of Ketteler. In 1880 Hitze, who had just returned from Campo Santo, joined the group as its secretary. Hitze had great impact on the social policies of the Center Party and was able to carry through the "Mönchen-Gladbach concept" over the Viennese Vogelsang school and the clerical "Berlin concept" (in 1890, Brandts became the chairman of the Volksverein).[12] Brandts was also a patriarch,[13] and as such, in 1886, he moved with his family to the Saint Joseph's House, in whose original structure he had accommodated the welfare institutions of his company in 1878. He was well aware that all the social works of the company would not suffice. He was a decisive representative of the state's right and duty to intervene, and, after initial reservation toward his resistant colleagues, he finally pulled his weight to grant the workers the same right to form coalitions in the trade unions that the employers enjoyed. However, the legal reform was needed to assure that "the activities of the trade unions would be restricted once the fight was launched."[14]

---

[8] F. Funder, op. cit., 82–155.

[9] In the seventies, L. Harmel was a disciple of the Bourbon Monarchists, a supporter of the Count of Chambord, a grandson of Charles X who was loyal to the fleur-de-lis. He was strictly ultramontane and supported the Syllabus. He divorced himself from antirepublican tendencies. His main estate was located in Val des Bois near Rheims (G. Guitton, Léon Harmel, 2 vols. [Paris 1925, ^{2}1930]; id., L. Harmel et l'initiative ouvrière [Paris 1938]; H. Rollet, op. cit., index).

[10] F. Brandts was the son of a wealthy textile merchant (Verlagssystem). During his stay of several months in England in the sixties, he learned about industrial weaving and equipped his mill in Mönchen-Gladbach accordingly ("How can one be afraid of becoming too rich, we are only beginning," according to Hohn, 25). He was an energetic and self-conscious man, who occasionally quarrelled with his later collaborator F. Hitze (when Brandts pleaded for harmony in the Center and made reference to his relation to Hitze, Windthorst said: "Yes, this is what your wife does!" Schwer-Müller [biblio., chap. 12], 59)—W. Hohn, ed., F. Brandts (M.-Gladbach 1914, ^{2}1920), Brandts's quotations, memorial addresses by A. Pieper and C. Sonnenschein; E. Ritter, Volksverein (biblio., chap. 12), index.

[11] Buchheim, Ultramontanismus, 327; cf. chap. 12.

---

[12] Cf. chap. 12.—In 1892 F. Hitze invited Father August Pieper (1866–1942) to join the group; in 1903, he became director general of the Volksverein (A. Rhode, "Die sozialpolitischen Ideen A. Piepers" (diss., Cologne 1950).

[13] In 1890: "Alongside the absolute recognition of the worker as an equal human being (as head of a family and as a 'voting member of society') . . . the feeling of the old patriarchal relationship between worker and employer, the feeling of belonging together should not disappear" (W. Hohn, op. cit., 109). Brandts considered his factory an "extended family" (ibid., 23).

[14] W. Hohn, op. cit., 81, 111–17; Brandts planned workers' councils in which both partners would be represented.

The Socio-ethical Justification of the Workers' Movement

In regard to this topic, concepts were being formulated which emerged from the socio-theoretical debates within Catholicism, and, in spite of continued differences, found a magisterial basis in the encyclical Rerum novarum (1891). The endorsement of state intervention in this document[15] represented a fundamental decision toward the liberal capitalist society and now left it up to the Catholics to act within the political parties of the constitutional state according to the principles of ecclesiastical sociology. How this was reflected in specific individual decisions (for instance, when designing a social insurance plan, or in parliamentary coalitions) is a matter of general history and belongs to Church history only insofar as it resulted in conflicts with the hierarchical claim to a magisterial role.[16] The other, equally important directive of this encyclical, the recognition of the workers' right to form coalitions, had a direct effect on the social structure of Catholicism and had to go through a process of critical assessment. In this respect, the Pope elaborated on the title of the encyclical (De conditione opificum) by turning to the workers themselves. In the paragraph on the "workers' associations" (sodalitia artificum), Leo XIII dealt with the discussions of the medieval guilds, but he also stressed the necessity of adapting to modern conditions. This was of pressing importance at the time and had practical implications because it expressly left unsaid whether the societies were to be exclusively composed of workers or were to be mixed organizations. Since the formation of such associations is justified on the basis of the natural law, the state has no right to forbid them, and the state is warned not to misuse its right to justified intervention under the mere pretext of public interest.[17] Leo XIII considered a strike categorically evil because it harms the employer and the employee as well as the public welfare (mercaturae, rei publicae utilitates), especially since strikes usually entail violence. It is the duty of legislation to eliminate the causes of such conflicts. The subsequent discussion of Catholic social theoreticians proceeded from the paragraph on employees, who are to fulfill absolutely the work contract which they signed voluntarily and under the conditions of equity (libere et cum aequitate).[18] At this point, the encyclical clearly expressed that the wealthy do not require the protection of the state to the extent that the miserum vulgus does, and there was no doubt that work contracts had to be consented to which were anything but voluntary and fair. Moreover, the encyclical could and did deal with the question of fair wages only in very general terms.[19] The problem of strikes, to be sure, touched on a fundamental aspect of a stratified society.[20] With which ordo could this phenomenon of antagonism be met?

---

[15] Cf. chap. 12, n. 57. This encyclical can only be assessed fairly if it is placed into the historical context of the traditional sociology of the Catholic Church. It was certainly not innovative within the general socio-historical development, but it was significant as the word of an outstanding conservative power, and it contributed considerably to alleviating conservative as well as liberal opposition toward a decisive social policy.—A good study in terms of the history of the papal social doctrine up to Pius XI in particular and of the history of social theory in general: A. Simon (Brussels): H. Scholl (ed.), 13–49.

[16] Regarding the Center controversy in 1906, cf. chap. 35; regarding the special problems in Italy, cf. chaps. 5 and 34.

[17] Acta Leonis XI, 133–35.

Leo XIII strongly emphasized that the fostering of piety was to be the priority of the workers' associations and that, in the name of episcopal authority, the clergymen, in regard to the associations, were responsible for everything that had to do with pastoral work.[21] For the early Catholic workers' movement, this was hardly a problem, since many socially concerned clergymen devoted their energy to the workers' questions in a comprehensive sense, even though they did not always meet with the approval of their superiors. However, the rural and middle-class organizations of Catholicism practiced religious solidarity primarily in regard to economic questions. Their mutual assistance in economic distress strengthened the religious solidarity of the Catholic special groups within the de-Christianization of the society at large. Therefore, the workers' movement, whether it was Marxist or not, was on the whole an anti-middle-class bellicose movement. Is it true that the more the Catholic workers' movement was religiously determined, the less it was a workers' movement according to the above definition? On the other hand, was its religious character as a Catholic workers' movement less pertinent when it was more belligerent, as in the "Christian trade unions"? This touches on the key question of the Catholic workers' movement, the only one, incidentally, Leo XIII spoke about. Were its religious character and the character of a necessarily belligerent movement compatible? In case of a possible conflict, was it not necessary to separate the representation of interests from the Catholic workers' societies and transfer it to the trade unions? What reason was there for representing economic interests in religious form? The "Christian trade unions" wanted to distinguish themselves through this particular name from then mostly atheistic socialism without giving expression to a strongly religious motivation in regard to their concrete goals. The subsequent controversy about the "Christian trade unions," above and beyond the denominational issue, had its basis in the lack of such differentiation and also partially in the rejection of the idea of trade unions per se.

---

[18] Regarding the strike, see ibid., 126; regarding pactum operae, see 110.

[19] I. Healy, The Just Wage, 1750–1890 (The Hague 1966).

[20] The problem of strikes became increasingly more urgent with the formation of "Christian trade unions." The moral theologian A. Lehmkuhl declared in his book Arbeitsvertrag und Streikrecht (Freiburg 1899, ^{4}1904), that the immediate "defense strike" for the purpose of self-defense was permissible when the workers were forced into an "unfair" contract; the employer is at fault if, despite profits, he does not pay the kind of wage which would "suffice for the livelihood of the worker and his family" (and is difficult to establish, of course [55–59]). An organized strike is permissible if it is not a question of a "fair" but a higher wage, whose proper increase is naturally not as clearly defined as its decrease" (59ff.). Canonist A. Vermeersch from Louvain expressed a similar idea (Quaestiones de iustitia [^{2}1904], 627). I. Treitz, secretary general of the Catholic workers' societies in the diocese of Trier, published in opposition to the Christlichen Gewerkschaften a pamphlet entitled Kann ich, werde ich für eine Arbeiterbewegung auf katholischer Grundlage eintreten? ("Can I, will I support a workers' movement based on Catholic principles?") (Trier 1904). Treitz, in his article Der moderne Gewerkschaftsgedanke vom Standpunkt der Vernunft und Moral ("The modern idea of trade unions from the perspective of reason and morality") (Trier 1909), rejected the idea of a strike and granted to the state only the right of arbitration, as did Secretary General Fournelle of Berlin. The statutes of the "special sections" of the Catholic workers' societies of Berlin, which were directed by clergymen, read: "The clergymen cannot find a place in belligerent organizations, only in organizations dedicated to reconciliation, law, and peace" (quoted according to H. Brauns, Christliche Gewerkschaften oder Fachabteilungen [1904], 50). The answer of J. Biederlack ("Die Frage der sittlichen Erlaubtheit der Arbeiterausstände," ZKTh 34 [1910], 302): Who would be optimistic enough "to dare hope that our present day rulers would end the economic struggle only having in mind the well-being of their state and their people." H. Pesch ("Streik und Lockout," Stimmen aus Maria Laach 77 [1909], 1–12, 142–54) is critical of the "infamous freedom of contract" and believes that a strike is a great evil but "does not necessarily need to be condemned." He expresses the most significant opinion, stating that, today, it is still a matter of "groups" (and not "organized professions") that should be subject to civil law and, once they are established, to society and not to the state (148).—For a moderate concept of the Christian social doctrine, see O. v. Nell-Breuning, "Streik," LThK^{2} IX, 1111f.; id., Festschrift für E. Liefmann-Keil (in prep.).

Industrial Workers

If one were to superimpose the European map which delineates the industrial centers developed after the second half of the century onto the map of the Catholic denomination, one would find that the following areas coincide: Upper Silesia, the plains of the Po river around Milan and Turin, the areas around Barcelona, Bilbao, and Oviedo as well as the southern regions from Hamm to Dunkirk. In Upper Silesia, associations emerged in whose publication Robotnik purely pastoral goals were pursued; and in Spain, there were no or only very insignificant Catholic workers' organizations (Barcelona became a showplace of horror). In Italy, the institutions of the Opera dei congressi concentrated in Venetia and Lombardy (1904: 1,339 out of 2,432) and, around this time, 170 workers' associations were counted. The ecclesiastical conflicts were kindled by the question of leadership and the character of the organizations.[22] The stage of the Catholic workers' movement during Leo XIII's pontificate was essentially the Rhenish-Westphalian, the Belgian, and the northern French industrial areas.

---

[21] Acta Leonis XI, 138f. Supporters of Rerum novarum as integralists: cf. below, p. 472.

Around 1880, the Cercles catholiques d'ouvriers, founded in 1871 by de Mun, had about 40,000 members. They declined as a result of the political differences within Catholicism in France and revived slightly in 1892 through the Ralliement. In 1906, there were about 60,000 members in 418 workers' societies. The relatively small numbers are not as decisive as the social status of the members. In a speech before the then entirely bourgeois Catholic youth association, de Mun said: "The simple folk, gentlemen, the workers in the cities, the factories, and the fields—this is the great problem which you should keep in mind!"[23] But this appeal found little response except with the interested Catholics of the landed gentry and the upper middle class. Moreover, it did not succeed in "taking root in the world of the workers"; it continued to be "agir de l'extérieur."[24] The reasons were partly of a political and partly of a specifically French nature. Even when de Mun, in 1885, in response to the Pope's wish relinquished the idea of founding a Catholic party, and even though he had sacrificed his political convictions during the Ralliement, the following goal remained decisive: to unite the Catholics in the "défense religieuse" and the "action sociale."[25] Indeed, it was a question of a "religious, social, and political counterrevolution" which could not, however, break the economic liberalism predominant in the upper ranks and was therefore not approved by the antibourgeois working class.[26] But the incorrect assessment of working class political psychology[27] was compounded by the problematic question of which way the bourgeois spirituality (aside from its political implications) could match the mentality of the working class. The symbol of the cercles was a combination of the cross and the Sacred Heart.[28] But even such a movement was much too revolutionary for Bishop C.-E. Freppel of Angers (1827–91).[29] In 1911, toward the end of his life, de Mun admitted the failure: It had been almost impossible to touch the workers, let alone impress them.[30] This was the candid word of a candid man, and he should not be blamed for the fact that for many of the northern-French patrons[31] this religious activity was only an escape from the social question. The first beginning of a Christian trade-union movement was the Syndicat des Employés du Commerce et de l'Industrie of 1887, whose executive board, in 1891, rejected a protective committee of Catholic employers,[32] as well as a clerical advisory body. From this and similar organizations emerged the Confédération Française des Travailleurs Chrétiens (CFTC).

---

[22] Carl Sonnenschein (biblio., chap. 15), 8–12, in regard to the social question, differentiates five social groups: 1) the Rosminian liberal Catholics, who deal almost exclusively with the social question; 2) the intransigents, "men with the exclusive loyalty of a praetorian group"; a member of this group was the priest and journalist Davide Albertario (1846–1902), who, after the general strike in Milan between 6 and 9 May 1898 (suppression of the strike left over one hundred dead), was sentenced to prison along with the Socialist Filippo Furati (Magri [biblio., chap. 5] I, 216ff.; E. Nolte in: T. Schieder [ed.], Handbuch der europäischen Geschichte 6 [1968], 415f.); 3) the Curia in a city without industry; 4) the feudal south where Freemasons and clergymen lived in harmony; 5) the Opera dei congressi, which was conducted according to hierarchical principles, but fell under the influence of landed proprietors and industrialists and was known for a "formalism of immense proportions, a few Catholic conventions without people and a surfeit of Byzantine protests."—This is the picture that was so vividly drawn by Sonnenschein, pastor in Berlin, in 1900: priest in Rome, in 1906: counciior of the Volksverein in Mönchen-Gladbach (cf. chap. 34; A. Gambasin, also in S. H. Scholl [ed.], 214–42). In 1902, the controversy in the Opera dei congressi over purely occupational societies (usually attempting to be transformed into trade unions) increased, resulting in a crisis and the suspension of the Opera. In 1907, the first general congress of the Unione economica-sociale took place in Bergamo. Its president pleaded with Pius X in vain to put more emphasis on the economic character of the struggle. Nevertheless, the religious demands were actually very tolerant. In 1919, there were (including rural laborers) 104,614 Catholic ("white") trade unionists out of a total of 817,034 trade unionists in Italy (out of 9 million employees) (cf. chap. 34).

[23] Quoted according to M. P. Fogarty, op. cit., 309.

[24] H. Rollet, op. cit. II, 372–74.

---

[25] H. Rollet, A. de Mun . . . , 118f.

[26] W. Gurian, 278 (biblio., chap. 12).

[27] "This renascent social movement . . . imagined a working class hostile to the Revolution and missed totally the workers psychology" (J. N. Moody, op. cit., 146f.).

[28] Lynch, 187. The society's anthem had the following text: "Quand Jésus vint sur la terre ce fut pour y travailler / Il voulut, touchant mystère, Comme nous être ouvrier / Espérance / De la France, / Ouvriers, soyez chrétiens: Que votre âme / Soit de flamme / Pour l'auteur de tous les biens."

[29] Until his death (1891), he was an opponent of state intervention (for instance, at the Congress of Liège in 1890) because it infringed upon individual freedom and was Socialism (Terrien II, 696). He wanted to "restaurer la société "chrétienne par l'affirmation de la doctrine catholique contre la Révolution, qui a détruit l'ordre social, où régnait le Christ" (ibid. II, 204).

[30] Combats VI, 194: "Il faut bien dire la vérité. Nous avons des œuvres nombreuses, souvent florissantes, cercles, patronages, associations. Cependant, nous n'avons pas entraîné la classe ouvrière, je dirais presque que nous ne l'avons pas atteinte, du moins que nous ne l'avons pas pénétrée."

[31] H. Rollet, op. cit. II, 322: "The entrepreneur's wife coming into the firm and firing non-Catholic women; the chaplain of Fourmiers preaching in the works council about the peace of the Holy Scriptures; the entrepreneur of Roubaix forbidding a visit to the local pub instead of raising wages."

[32] The proposal came from L. Harmel, who gave the movement of Count A. de Mun a more realistic basis and organized the workers' congresses in Rheims after 1893. After 1901, the movement joined the Sillon.

In Belgium, the meeting place of the international Catholic social conferences, Bishop Doutreloux of Liège with his charitable activities and the establishment of the Aumôniers du travail (1895), the political Professor G. Helleputte with his workers' guilds, the social priest Pottier in Liège, and Fr. Rutten initiated a Catholic workers' movement which was not concerned with the political problems of the French and was much more pragmatic, but which could only assert itself against the supremacy of the conservatives through the increasing influence of the Ligue démocratique belge (since 1891). But here as well, the de-Christianization of the working class spread more and more. In the Netherlands, two movements developed: the one of Leiden, which was oriented toward trade unions, and the one of Limburg, which pursued a religious-social program.[33]

"During this trip through Belgium, my sojourn in Aachen and the tour up the Rhine river I have come to the conviction that we have to combat the clerics vigorously, especially in the Catholic areas . . . . The scoundrels are flirting with the workers' question whenever it seems appropriate (e.g., Bishop Ketteler in Mainz, the priests at the Congress of Düsseldorf, etc.)." Karl Marx wrote this to Friedrich Engels on 25 September 1869.[34] This observation about the enemy is also a warning against underestimating the efficiency of the Catholic workers' movement in the northwestern corner of the European continent. So was Bismarck's remark condemning the numerous "so-called Catholic local newspapers," which were often edited by chaplains and mocked the state measures against the "workers' intrigues" even though the uprising of the Commune in Paris should have opened their eyes.[35] The "Congress of Düsseldorf" that Karl Marx wrote about was the Catholic Convention of 1869, during which—after previous individual foundings—the question of workers' organizations was discussed, but with utmost restraint relative to independent associations (or sections in Catholic male associations). In 1869, Chaplain E. Cronenberg of Aachen working together with Chaplain Dr. Litzinger, who had been transferred from Essen (Chaplain Laaf had been called from Aachen to Essen), founded the Arbeiterverein vom heiligen Paulus [Workers' Society of Saint Paul]. Litzinger was an intellectual among the "social chaplains," who could be quite disagreeable among themselves. Thus, Cronenberg carried on a controversy in his Christian Social Voices against the Christian Social Newspaper in Aachen, edited since 1869 by Chaplain Joseph Schings.[36] Cronenberg was of the opinion that "the Christian workers should take the workers' question into their own hands" and that, in spite of their Christian affiliation, the social problems should be considered relatively independently. He went bankrupt with his building society (in 1878, he was sentenced for forgery of his accounts). Around 1875, the Paulusverein in Aachen had a considerable reputation with its approximately five thousand members. That is when the battle began over the nomination of a Center Party candidate, which, at first, was won by the middle class; in 1877, in Essen, the worker J. Stötzel won and was elected to Parliament by a great majority.[37] The final breakthrough of an independent Catholic workers' movement did not occur until 1884, at the Catholic Convention of Amberg (thanks to Hitze's efforts). The unification into regional associations was accomplished between 1892 and 1910 (at the Catholic Convention in Mainz, a cartel association was formed in 1911).[38] This development already stood under the sign of the struggle over the "Christian trade unions."

---

[33] See the contribution by S. Hermann Scholl, 52–77, who set an excellent example when he placed the Catholic workers' movement in Belgium into the general socio-economic history, avoiding a distortion of perspective often unintentionally caused by Catholic literature. Scholl differentiates between "social Catholicism" from 1789 until 1886 and "Christian democracy" from 1886 until 1914 (which concerns the era discussed here). In 1891, Helleputte founded the Belgian People's Association at the Congress of Louvain. It was to unite the various efforts of the Catholic workers' movement, which was rarely led by workers, neither in Belgium nor in other countries. At the annual convention in 1901, Father Rutten gave his first lecture on the Christian trade unions, which had 11,000 members at that time. In 1909, there were 40,521 and 142,035 Socialists.—Regarding the Netherlands, see P. H. Winkelmann: Scholl (ed.), 255–286, also presented in context.

[34] Correspondence between Marx and Engels IV (ed. Berlin 1950), 272.

[35] H. Rothfels, Bismarck und der Staat. Ausgewählte Dokumente (Stuttgart 1958), 235.—In a letter addressed to Viennese Legate von Schweinitz of 27 January 1873, Bismarck mentions the Christlich-sozialen Blätter of Aachen in order to prove the "merging" of clerical and socialist tendencies (Gesammelte Werke VIc, 31f.).

The trade unions were the problem of the religious workers' associations and these, in turn, were the problem of the trade unions. This was not primarily a question of belief, which was only pertinent in Germany. It was also not just a question of the direct ecclesiastical leadership which was claimed by the integralistic concept during Pius X's pontificate in Germany as well as in other countries.[39] The key issue becomes clear when considering the disputes which were carried on during the organizational period of the "Christian trade unions" and when assessing the situation after the first third of the twentieth century. During the general meeting of the leaders of the German workers' associations in 1892 in Mainz (Hitze's participation had considerable impact), it became obvious that religious education was to remain a priority, that occupational questions were to be dealt with separately, and finally that the struggle was part of the essence of a true workers' organization. The "individual trade sections" within the Catholic workers' associations differed from the "individual trade sections" in Berlin during the subsequent trade union controversy. This is substantiated by the fact that the participants in Mainz accepted a strike as the inevitable "last resort,"[40] but they believed strikes not to be feasible under "local and denominational limitations" (of the workers' associations). At the Catholic Convention in Cologne in 1895 they spoke about the "individual trade sections" as being the first step toward the "professional organization of the industrial worker on a Christian foundation" (H. Brauns). But this was the opinion of a minority. At the Catholic Convention in Bonn in 1900 it was difficult to arrive at a compromise: "Catholic workers' associations and Christian occupational organizations," avoiding the term "trade union," intended to include "the entire economic life."[41] Yet, in 1899 the first congress of the Christliche Gewerkvereine Deutschlands [Christian Trade Unions of Germany] had taken place in Mainz, which later caused the reaction in Berlin. The men initially involved in the Christian trade union movement showed "true denominational courage" in the struggle with atheistic socialism on the one hand and the (mostly Catholic) employers on the other hand—not to mention the opposition of bishops Korum and Kopp.[42] But did Brauns not imply more than just the German denominational problems when he differentiated between the "spiritual attitude" in the "Christian trade union" and the "moral-religious attitude" in the workers' association?[43] In other countries such as in Belgium and Holland, one followed the path discussed in Mainz in [36] Schwer-Müller, 187f.; E. Naujoks, op. cit., 101–16, offers much material, however, he exaggerates the differences between the protagonists due to his anticlerical leaning; H. Lepper, "Kaplan F. E. Cronenberg . . . ," ZAGV 79 (1968), 57–148; J. Thielmann, Die Presse der katholischan Arbeitervereine Westdeutschlands (diss., Munich 1935).

---

[37] A "bourgeois" reaction, also to be seen in the context of the difficult situation during the Kulturkampf, can be documented in the seventies with the changes in names. The publication of the Gesellenverein in Munich called Arbeiterfreund (1873) called itself Arbeitsfreund, and the Christlich-soziale Arbeiterverein (1874) in Augsburg dropped the word "social" in 1876 (Naujoks, op. cit., 81).

[38] The number of members in 1914 in western Germany: 203,000, in eastern Germany: 132,000, in southern Germany: 122,000 (Kißling II, 376).

---

[39] Regarding the "trade union controversy," cf. chap. 35.—The manner in which it was conducted can be partially deduced from a letter by Prince-Bishop G. v. Kopp addressed to August Pieper: "I only need to say one word and you will be condemned, as was Marc Sangnier in Paris" (Ritter, 327).

[40] H. Brauns, Christliche Gewerkschaften oder Fachabteilungen in katholischen Arbeitervereinen? (Cologne 1904), 5–13, in retrospect.

[41] Kißling II, 373.

[42] O. v. Nell-Breuning, *LThK*² IV, 857.

[43] H. Brauns, Die Wahrheit über den Gewerkschaftsstreit. . . (Mönchen-Gladbach 1912), 11.

1892, differentiating between "league" and trade union within one and the same Catholic workers' organization (in the trade union, the clerical leader was merely a "councilor"). In 1921, Cardinal Gasparri remarked that the Catholic workers' movement in Holland, Belgium, and Switzerland[44] had sensed more acutely than elsewhere "that the personal development (the foundation of a Christian class movement) would be subjugated more and more to the predominant economic activities if there were no common authority to keep the balance."[45] But whichever path was taken, the Belgian, the German, the French (which only led to a Christian trade union in the broadest sense) or the Italian (where the Associazioni Cristiane Lavoratori Italiani remained a purely educational movement) the historical result was basically the same everywhere. The Christian trade unions remained in the minority as compared to the others, and on the battlefield of labor they were in competition with them, which made it more difficult to assert their own principles. Within Catholicism itself, the Christianity of the trade unions only rarely permitted the antagonism of the class society to take on a different appearance; the religious "personal development" became insignificant in comparison to the fight for labor, or it was limited to a small circle, and this happened even more where the general development of trade unions took its own course.[46]

The fact was often discussed that industrial workers especially were becoming alienated from the Church, and with good reason. The apathy of bourgeois Catholicism was deplored, clearly recognizable in the opposition which the Catholic workers' movement had to overcome within the ranks of its own fellow believers. But two points have to be made: The process of de-Christianization extended over all of society, but appeared more pronounced among the industrial workers because here, instead of a "fourth class," a new class, which essentially differed from the agrarian bourgeois society, was emerging. Therefore, it was unable to relate to the Church traditions through which a conventional form of Christianity could yet survive for decades. Above all, the industrial workers were earlier and more directly than any other class affected by technology and thus by the epoch-making break with tradition[47] which affected all of society.

---

[44] Following the denominational attempt of Vicar J.-B. Jung in Saint Gall (cf. chap. 4), the Christian trade unions were organized interdenominationally (in 1907 in Winterthur), but they were practically dominated by Catholics.

[45] Quoted according to Fogarty, 237.

[46] A survey of the general history of the trade unions and the specific position of the Christian unions (Catholic) can be found in O. v. Nell-Breuning, op. cit., 853–58.

[47] The Swiss Capuchin Father Theodosius Florentini was applauded at the Catholic Convention in Frankfurt in 1863 for his thesis: "The factories need to become monasteries!" (J. Höffner, 33f. [chap. 12]), but in the literature he was ridiculed. In 1859, he acquired a textile mill in Obersleutensdorf (Bohemia); in 1862, he opened a paper mill in Thal (Saint Gall). His experiments there would probably have failed had he not died in 1865, because the nuns, whom he sent because the "directors of factories" are expensive people, were indeed cheap, but they did not appear trustworthy to the moneylenders, who canceled their loans. The often quoted example puzzles us today because the serious attempt to extend the monastic ora et labora into the age of technology by pretending nothing had happened and technology was merely an improved form of trade clarifies in its utopian absoluteness what had really happened to the essence of work.

This explains why the general problems entailed in the relationship of Catholicism to modern society as a whole so oddly climaxed in the Catholic workers' movement. Its religious urge to exceed the goals of the trade unions[48] caused it to be felt as a foreign body within the general workers' movement, even in the non-Marxist movement. Its efficiency, to be sure, was not the showpiece of Catholicism. But it represented Catholicism's utmost effort to reconcile tradition with a radically secularized world, or at least to demonstrate the feasibility of such reconciliation. The question remains whether an independent Catholic workers' movement that was able to combine religious education and the inevitable belligerent goals regarding labor was indeed possible. In a similar situation, the socialist movement was able to combine the party and its trade union. However, it also remains to be noted that, varying from country to country, Catholic workers' movements significantly contributed to counteracting the de-Christianization[49] and social radicalization within society at large.

---

[48] The treatment of M. Berger, outstanding in its descriptive parts, prohibits a historically adequate interpretation because the criteria are not derived from the object itself (the Catholic workers' movement in Wilhelminian Germany and its inherent problems), but from the "democratization of society" as a normative goal. This does deny that the political Christian Democrats overcame the paternalism, which, by the way, should also be understood and appreciated historically, and that they were successful with certain reforms. That the Catholic workers' societies were "multi-purpose organizations, typical for a transitory society" (215), characterizes the facts precisely. What else could they have been?

[49] M. Schmidt, "Die Entchristlichung . . . im deutschsprachigen Gebiet," ZKG 79 (1968), 342–57.

CHAPTER 14

The Relationship to the State and the Parties

The encyclical Graves de communi of 18 January 1901, which does not contain a trace of the political meaning implicit in the term "Christian democracy," is often assessed as a document of the later period of Leo XIII's pontificate demonstrating a departure from the initial program. Indeed, in those years the style, the climate, and the emphasis changed in nearly all aspects of ecclesiastical leadership. But when the pragmatic conciliatory attitude in the Pope's earlier statements regarding the democratic form of government is carefully interpreted, a change of course in the true sense can hardly be found. Yet it is misleading to systematize the didactic statements which Leo XIII made throughout his pontificate in regard to the various questions of politics and social life, especially if one consequently neglects to differentiate between principles and the respective pragmatic adaptations to situations in individual countries.[1] Above all, however, the exceedingly vague term Démocratie chrétienne[2] could simultaneously have different, even contradictory implications at different times and in different countries. It could be taken religiously, in the sense of social reform, or even from the perspective of constitutional politics (from the constitutional and parliamentary monarchy to the republic); in short, it covered a highly diffused area of meanings. Subsequent to the encyclical Rerum novarum, the usage of the term (it had been used in connection with the revolutionary events of 1830 and 1848) considerably expanded, because it had become a verbal signal in the Catholic social movements of the various countries, often interchangeable with Catholicisme social or "Christian social." It was also significant that this development coincided with the Pope's Ralliement policy regarding the French Republic. A fundamental interpretation of this policy was able to raise the value of the political content of the term "Christian democracy" to the point that it caused considerable complications.[3] The Pope himself never made official use of the term (after its circumscriptive usage in the address of 1898) except in Graves de communi; and Rampolla's instructio De Actione populari christiana seu democratico-christiana of 27 January 1902 not only underlines the papal confinement of "Christian democracy" to Christian charity, but also emphasizes that this was not at all a cosa nuova.[4] What had started out as an attempt to interpret the democratic ideals of equality and freedom (in accord with political theology) as the realization of the gospel[5] ended here with the observation (which was meant to define the conflicts within the Opera dei congressi[6] in Italy but was more encompassing), that a relationship between Church and democracy is not possible in the same manner as it had existed between the Church and the sacred monarchy.

---

[1] This is particularly prevalent in the works of O. Schilling (biblio., chap. 12).

[2] Concerning the history of this term, see H. Maier, op. cit., 303ff.; concerning the history of ideas, see 227–43; at the time of Leo XIII: 259–71.

[3] At the Catholic Convention in Osnabrück (1901), E. M. Lieber said, subsequent to quoting the Pope, who confined the term to Christian activities benefitting the people: "In this sense, we are all democrats"; Kißling, 307.

[4] Acta Leonis XXII, 8–28: "L'azione democratico-cristiana non è da ritenersi come cosa nuova; essa è antica quanto i precetti e gli insegnamenti evangelici."—The remark (H. Maier, op. cit., 277) that "the Pope's effort (Ralliement) had introduced an extensive rehabilitation of the Christian democratic movement" can only be applied to the concrete tactical goal which the Pope was pursuing with his French policies (cf. the introduction), or it may be referred to the consequences which the active French pioneers of the Ralliement experienced as a result of the papal policies.

Nonetheless, there existed in Leo XIII's pontificate a certain cosa nuova, but it had already taken place twenty years earlier and was anything but a way toward "Christian democracy." The encyclical Diuturnum illud of 29 June 1881 mentions the cupiditates populares which had emerged from the unfortunate doctrine of the people's sovereignty; and according to this encyclical, the patriarchal monarchy is unquestionably the ideal form of government, perfected at the time of the imperium sacrum, when the popes consecrated political power in a unique way.[7] But it does not contradict the Catholic doctrine stating that in certain cases the principal representative of civil authority can be elected "according to the desire and the judgment of the masses," whereby power is not transferred, but rather it is determined who will execute it.[8] With this contrivance, democracy is introduced as an ecclesiastically tolerable form of government. But at the same time it is deprived of its historical essence; that is, its revolutionary character is eliminated. It should be noted (and this is true for all encyclicals which attempt an accommodation with the modern era) that this piece of text is short and enclosed in a voluminous traditional text. The polemics against the social contract and the people's sovereignty clearly have priority.

More so than the encyclical of 1881, the encyclical Immortale Dei of 1 November 1885 is composed, with respect to France, in order to avoid at least an intensification of the situation regarding Church policies and to prevent the separation of Church and state. In fact, its aim is to find a way of reaching an agreement which would lead toward Leo XIII's ultimate goal: re-Christianization of the modern, democratic world.[9] Also in this encyclical, the paragraphs in which the democratic form of government is recognized as equal to the other systems stand isolated within the main theme "Church and State" (utraque [potestas] est in suo genere maxima), and the doctrine that the elected official need only execute the will of the people is rejected. But these paragraphs are rather positively flavored, for instance when the Pope says that it is not worth a reprimand per se if the people (populos, not multitudo) more or less take part in the government. In fact, "at certain times" and "under certain laws" it may not only be useful but also the duty of the citizen to do so. This argument was used to justify the opposition toward the founding of an antirepublican party.[10] This attitude is called an expression of ecclesiastical lenitas and facilitas. Also the encyclical Libertas of 20 June 1888, in which liberal human rights are condemned, concedes at the end that is not per se a violation of one's duty to prefer a democratic system of state.[11] [5] K. Buchheim, Ultramontanismus, 516: "The problem of democracy was present from the beginning, because the ideals of freedom, equality, brotherhood are rooted in Natural Law and especially in the Gospel."—In regard to the "sacred democracy" which was to replace the "sacred monarchy," see H. Maier, op. cit., 276.

---

[6] Cf. chaps. 5 (p. 94) and 34.

[7] Acta Leonis II, 269–87; concerning the people's sovereignty (imperium populare) which Leo XIII attributes (as can be seen again and again) to the Reformation, like all other modern evils: 282.—In regard to the monarchy: there is no society "in qua non aliquis temperet singulorum voluntates ut velut unum fiat ex pluribus" (274); analogy to the one and only divine legislator and judge and to fatherhood: "isto autem modo diversa genera potestatis miras inter se habent similitudines" (275).—With respect to the medieval empire in which power reached "the climax of its dignity": 282 (by using the term instituto imperio sacro, Leo XIII avoids the theories of translation).

[8] Ibid., 271f.; it seems remarkable that he uses popularis in a negative sense and that he speaks of iudicium multitudinis.

---

[9] Cf. chap. 6.—A perfect example of the confusion that the abstract language of doctrine can create is the controversy between Bishop Freppel of Angers and Archbishop Thomas of Rouen breaking out as a consequence of this encyclical. Thomas had interpreted it in the vein of Lacordaire and had been so careless as to differentiate it from the Syllabus of Pius IX. Freppel called this heresy. He was supported by Oreglia, cardinal of the Curia, who said that the abuse of Immortale Dei only served de dénaturer le Syllabus). Leo XIII criticized the comparison of his encyclical to the Syllabus; however, he finally sent a letter of praise to Thomas, who was more useful to his French policies. Subsequently, Cardinal Pitra tried to console the Bishop of Angers, saying that he was living in "abnormal times," the repetition of which was a banality (tendentiously described in Terrien II, 517–28, 541–47).

[10] Acta Leonis V, 118–50: "Immo neque illud per se reprehenditur, participem plus minus esse populum rei publicae: quod ipsum certis in temporibus certisque legibus potest non solum ad utilitatem, sed etiam ad officium pertinere civium." In October 1885, the Pope had inhibited A. de Mun's plan to found a Catholic party (cf. chap. 6).—It is significant for the situation of the Church as a whole that F. Hettinger, in the Herder edition (2nd collection, 1887), translated participem . . . esse populum rei publicae, adapting it to the German situation, into: ". . . Anteil empfängt [sic] am öffentlichen Leben" (to participate [sic] in public life); P. Tischleder, Staatslehre, 249, in his battle against the legitimists of the Weimar Republic, interpreted these words: "a constitution designed to be democratic and moderate."—The following passage has to be seen in the context of the development of the Kulturkampf in Germany (chap. 3). It states that the Church does not condemn those governments that, "in accordance with traditions and customs, tolerate divini cultus varia genera in their state for reasons of considerable public advantages or in order to avoid calamities," even though the Church does not permit these varia genera to have equal rights (cf. chap. 12).

[11] Acta Leonis VIII, 245: "malle rei publicae statum populari temperatum genere, non est per se contra officium"—the rejection of the people's sovereignty is conditional.—The following remark stating that it is honorable to participate in public life is specifically in regard to Italy: "nisi alicubi ob singularem rerum temporumque conditionem aliter caveatur."

The contemporary disciples of a politically understood "Christian democracy" did not sufficiently consider in their interpretations (or perhaps they wanted to overlook it) that the Pope indeed accepted the democratic form of government (among others), but in spite of differentiations, he recognized it merely as a fait accompli. Leo XIII had always imagined that democracy was the result of revolution. In the encyclical Quod Apostolici muneris of 28 December 1878, which primarily turned against socialism and preached obedience toward the state's authority, the Pope brought to mind that the Church, even if the princes did not execute their authority ultra modum, refused to tolerate an autonomous rebellion against them (proprio marte). Even if the situation were hopeless, there is only Christian patience and prayer available to expedite rescue. Obedience can only be refused if the demand contradicts the law of God and nature.[12] The encyclical Libertas (1888) exceeds the admonition for patience. It speaks of the "unfair power" which oppresses the citizens or denies freedom to the Church, and it calls lawful (fas) the request (quaerere) for "another constitution" which would permit action "in freedom."[13] It is not said in this context how this quaerere is to occur, since unfair regimes are not in the habit of resigning voluntarily. At the same time, the violent resistance of the oppressed Irish is condemned. But the encyclical letter to the French episcopate, the clergy, and all French Catholics, Au milieu des sollicitudes of 16 February 1892 and the letter to the French cardinals Notre consolation of 3 May 1892,[14] which inaugurated the Ralliement, cannot speak in such general terms to the land of obviously irreversible revolution, especially since it requests loyalty to the French Republic "comme representant le pouvoir venu de Dieu." Of what was called "venu de Dieu," the sons and grandsons of the age of the "great Revolution"—however they felt about it—had very precise memories. The questions in regard to the Diuturnum illud (1881) whether the rejection of the people's sovereignty only meant to condemn Rousseau or also the theory of Suarez, was answered rather cautiously by Rome.[15] However, now it was stated that all authority emanated from God, though this was not to be taken to mean that the divine designation defines "always and directly the way power is transferred, nor the contingent forms and personalities." The modes de transmission were naturally the decisive element. Who affects them? "Time, this great transformer of everything which exists here below." This is probably the only place in the encyclicals of Leo XIII where he does not refer exclusively to history, be it to bring to mind the achievements of the papacy for the benefit of the West and specifically for Italy, or to characterize the devastating consequences of the Reformation. He also invokes history to facilitate an understanding of his request to accept this Republic "comme venu de Dieu." Compared to this, the Neo-Scholastic remark about the "pouvoir considéré en lui même," not touched by the "innovation," appears weak and abstract. The most remarkable statement by the Pope with respect to the Revolution as such is the one maintaining that the changements of the era—Leo XIII refers to the Eastern Empire of antiquity—are far from ever having been legitimate. Indeed, it is difficult to say that they are legitimate ("il est même difficile qu'ils le soient"). Not one word is said to restrict the doctrine of the Church which states that the Church does not permit rebellion against the authority in power; instead, the actual power having emerged from the Revolution is to be accepted for the sake of the general welfare ("le pouvoir civil dans la forme où, de fait, il existe").[16]

---

[12] Acta Leonis I, 170–83.—Similarly, Diuturnum illud.

[13] Acta Leonis VIII, 245.

[14] Acta Leonis XII, 19–41, 107–16.

[15] Feret was informed by Billot that only Rousseau was meant and that the Pope had deliberately excluded Suárez's differentiation of the direct or indirect transferral of power (L. Feret, Le pouvoir civil devant l'enseignement catholique [Paris ^{2}1888]; also P. Tischleder, Staatslehre, 216f.).

Leo XIII noted that internal pacification in France was not only in the interest of the Catholics but in the interest of the entire country, even though the religious goal was not only the ultimate but also the only sufficient motive. Of course, this raised the question of whether the acceptance of the Republic as a mere fact still allowed the traditional conception of the relations between Church and state. In his political encyclicals, the Pope repeatedly evoked the medieval image of the relationship of body and soul, though he did refrain from mentioning the papal theories of the late Middle Ages. In Au milieu des sollicitudes he happens to mention that form of separation of Church and state in which the Church is reduced "to the freedom to live according to the common law of all citizens." What was apparently practiced in "some countries"—he obviously meant the United States—implied great "inconveniences," but it also offered some advantages, especially if the legislation allowed itself to be inspired by Christian principles due to a "fortunate inconsistency." The principle of separation continued to be false even though the aforementioned situation "was not the worst of all." But France, a "nation catholique par ses traditions et par la foi présente de la grande majorité de ses fils," was not to be brought into this "precarious situation."[17] In spite of the somewhat relatively favorable results recorded by an investigation of the ecclesiastical and religious attitudes conducted by the state in the years between 1879 and 1888 in France,[18] the question needs to be asked whether a country which, at the end of the nineteenth century, according to denominational statistics, was nearly homogeneous can really be called a "Catholic nation." The term grande majorité stems from the preamble of the Concordat of 1801, while the term nation catholique ignores the fact that almost one hundred years earlier other sects had been provided with equality before the law. Meanwhile, the process of de-Christianization continued. This did not necessarily result in the separation of Church and state, and certainly not in hostility. But the old image of the correlation between body and soul—no matter how much Leo XIII stressed that each power was the highest in its area of competence—was a contrivance which clouded an essential condition of the constitutional state, namely, that the position of the Church had become dependent on the majority standing of the political parties in a pluralistic society and was not dependent on the degree to which the constitution pronounced the Catholic faith to be the state religion or not. This is closely related to the complex problem of the Catholic parties in a democracy which is partly determined by the alternation of position and opposition and by the relations of the substantially differently structured Catholic Church to such political entities.

---

[16] Acta Leonis XII, 112, 31, 32, 113, 111.—P. Tischleder, Staatslehre, 233, wants to distinguish the practical situation in Ireland and the question of whether Leo XIII "expressly and on principle intended to reject the right of a people to practice resistance because it disagrees with Catholic doctrine." Actually, in his dispute with the Bavarian legitimist F. X. Kiefl, Leo XIII's only argument was the recognition of political facts, notwithstanding the question of when the "changing times" had solidified them sufficiently.—In regard to the principles of the Ralliement, cf. the introduction.

In 1885, Leo XIII inhibited the founding of a Catholic Party in France through Albert de Mun, and on 12 May 1892, a few days after the papal letter Notre consolation, the anti-republican Union de la France Chrétienne" was dissolved. Both incidents should initially be seen from the perspective of the papal Ralliement policy and the attempt to close the cleft in French Catholicism between republicans and monarchists. But it contradicted Leo XIII's principles to involve the Church in the battles of the political parties (Ecclesiam trahere in partes) because he presumed that religion (i.e., the Catholic faith) had to be sacred and inviolable to everyone. There is no doubt that on purely political grounds (in genere politico), the Christians can fight for the success of their respective opinions (opiniones), "given the observation of truth and justice." But the Church cannot become a party because it is common to every one.[19] This is applicable to the differences within Catholicism in

---

[17] Acta Leonis XII, 39.

[18] Cf. chap. 6.

[19] Encyclical Sapientiae christianae of 10 January 1890; Acta Leonis X, 28f.—The Pope raised an issue which was a problem everywhere, even in Germany, where Rechtskatholiken (Catholics of the right) protested against "political Catholicism," for instance F. X.

France, Spain, and Italy, where each group operated under the assumption that it alone represented the rights of the Church; and to the papal admonition aimed at furthering the unity of the Catholics so that they could form a phalanx against the enemies of the Church. But his goal was the universal re-Christianization of state and society, where religion will be sacred to every one and the Church does not have to be represented by a party. There is a close connection between the tactical viewpoint that political party formations entangle Catholicism in internal strife and the principle that religion is not a matter of parties at all, because it has priority for all citizens.[20]

An equally important problem in the relationship between the Church and the Christian parties was the concept of the hierarchical authority of giving directives. The Vatican's attempt to comply with Bismarck's wish and exert influence on the Center Party relative to the antisocialist law and the question of the septennate failed[21] because of the polical self-awareness of this party, which surpassed all other political entities of Catholicism in its cohesiveness. But this attempt was characteristic of Leo XIII's idea about the universal responsibility of the papacy. Ferrata's ecclesiastical internal policies exceeded such intervention. He was not content with prohibiting the French monarchists from a religious and ecclesiastical argumentation; rather he demanded the sacrifice of a fundamental political conviction. It was in accord with the character and range of this problem that the Pope in Italy reserved the right to make the decision in the question of the Non expedit and its exegesis to himself and to censor all special actions. But it was also in keeping with this policy that the movement of the Opera dei congressi, which was strictly organized in 1884, became the battlefield for all political questions whose resolution was therefore subject to hierarchical directives. In comparison to other countries, the interpretation of the competence of the nunciatures practically resulted in a potestas directa over political matters which had been rejected in Leo XIII's theory concerning the relationship between Church and state.

Kraus (cf. chap. 29), especially rejecting the Center party as the only representative of German Catholic interests and often forming their own lobby within this party (I. Schauff, Die deutschen Katholiken und die Zentrumspartei [Cologne 1928]; W. Ferber, "Der Weg Martin Spahns," Hochland 62 [1970], 218–29; id., "R. Baumstark," Anregung [Cologne October 1970], 333–35; id., "Fred Graf Frankenberg," Deutsche Tagespost [7 May 1971], 11).

[20] Schmidlin, PG II, 365: "Initially pursuing the formation of Catholic parties, Leo XIII, after 1885, energetically proceeded to disapprove a purely denominational or clerical organization of the Catholics and to recommend their assimilation into the national entity." Such a disapproval, however, is not documented anywhere.

[21] Cf. chap. 3.

Since the Church had to deal with very different political constitutions, only the recognition of all forms of government could be decreed didactically, given the known conditions. On the other hand, if, on the basis of the historical situation, Christian motives regarding the transformation of social conditions should coincide with political convictions, then both the French and Italian "Christian democrats" and—though in a different manner—that part of the episcopate which did not merely respect the constitution of the United States but also on principle accepted it, faced a dilemma between the necessarily abstract ecclesiastical political doctrine and their concrete political conviction. The term "Christian democracy" grew enriched in content when the paternalistic social practice flowing from top to bottom was replaced or at least supplemented by a social reform movement from below, conducted by the disadvantaged themselves. This enrichment essentially meant that the term also gained a political profile. This did not necessarily affect the form of government as such.[22] But the state itself changed when the "self-liberation of the classes"[23] began. The Christian republican, in turn, derived a good deal of his political convictions from the view that the paternalistically oriented social activities of the monarchists missed their target, and a real social reform was only possible in a democracy.[24] A de-politicization of the term "Christian democracy" did not merely affect the form of government, but also the concept of politics in general.

However, wherever Catholics gathered in parties, as in Belgium, the Netherlands, Germany, Switzerland, and Austria, they were confronted with the task of balancing the various social interests if they wanted to gain political weight as a "people's party." This difficult process was only successful when the common Christian belief became the catalyst of the development of a political will. One can certainly say that in France "the Démocratie chrétienne, in turn, repeated the mistake of the monarchists when it entered the political arena and turned the problem of the form of government into a question of religious principle."[25] It must be added that most of the Christian democratic parties of the twentieth century have their antecedents in those which made this mistake.

---

[22] "Dans la monarchie italienne comme dans la république française la Démocratie chrétienne pouvait donc présenter le même visage économique et social: ce n'était pas une question de régime politique" (G. Hoog, 120).

[23] R. Murri (op. cit., 32) calls this process "logical in its true essence, human, and quite Christian" and he is unhappy that it occurs "in an anti-Christian party"; in his opinion, the Conservatives, "separating the religious cause from that of democracy," are solely guided by political interests of power and they do not want to be disturbed by a religious movement.

[24] "Il ne s'agit pas seulement d'enraciner les ouvriers dans de ravissants petits jardins, de leur offrir de petites habitations tandis que le le patron se dira en se frottant les mains: maintenant, mes ouvriers seront bons, ils seront sages car il ont un joli joujou. Non il faut que les citoyens soient eux-mêmes responsable de ce qu'ils font" (M. Sangnier, in Rollet II, 26f.).

The first time Leo XIII discussed the problem of "Christian democracy" was in his address on the occasion of a French workers' pilgrimage on 8 October 1898, wherein he was apparently responding to an "allusion à la démocratie." If democracy would be inspired by a belief in enlightened reason, if it accepted in "religious humility" and as a necessary fact ("comme un fait nécessaire") the difference between classes and living conditions, if when seeking a solution for the social problems, it would never lose sight of the superhuman love ("charité surhumaine") that Christ held to be a sign of his followers, then if democracy wanted to be a Christian democracy ("si la démocratie veut être chrétienne"), it would bring France peace, well-being, and fortune.[26] The dangerous evil, from which this "democracy" is distinct, is socialism. In March 1896 Rampolla had still supported the abbés and laymen in France who were political believers in democracy. But since they failed to make Catholic voters agree upon promising candidates, the election of May 1898 was not successful. The Ralliement policy had failed and, in the address of 8 October 1898, no longer played a role.[27] The tone in the socio-political questions also was quite different from that in Rerum novarum. The de-politicization in the sense of religieuse résignation was extensive. The speech reminds one of the encyclical Quod Apostolici muneris of 1878, which was subsequently quoted (before Rerum novarum) in the introduction to the Graves de communi of 18 January 1901. This letter was actually occasioned by the tensions in the Opera dei congressi, but the key sentences have a general character. The differentiation of the terminology is interesting: the Pope states that the term "Christian Socialism" was rightfully abandoned; Actio christiana popularis is evaluated positively; it is used in the Italian "Congressi" organizations for which episcopal leadership authority is emphasized. Of the two terms "Christian Socialism" and "Christian Democracy," the second one, "not so much" the first one,[28] is said to have caused displeasure apud bonos plures because of its "ambiguity" and its "danger." One fears that it could "favor the people's state" (popularis civitas foveatur) and that it could be preferred to other forms of government. After the encyclical had emphatically differentiated between the democratia socialis ("social democracy") and the democratia christiana, it clearly rejects "the distortion" of the latter "into a political term" (ad politica detorqueri).[29] "Democracy," in contrast to the general usage, could in connection with "Christian" only mean "beneficial Christian action for the people" (beneficam in populum actionem christianam). The earlier statements that democratic constitutions are just as feasible as any others are amended with the negative statement that the Natural Law and the Gospel are not dependent on any constitution. In this respect, none of the basic teachings of the Church are changed. But it is added that the Catholics would neither theoretically nor practically want to prefer one form of government to another or introduce a new one (catholicorum mens atque actio).[30] With respect to social politics, the climate had changed even more compared to the address to the French pilgrimage of 1898. The Pope not only emphasized that the Church has to be available to all classes and may not prefer the lower, but also stated that in spite of shorter working hours[31] and higher wages the workers' life is "crowded and miserable" (anguste et misere), which does not indicate an intensification of social reform but means that the workers still live with "rotten morals" and

---

[25] H. Maier, op. cit., 268.—Goyau II, 16f. (1901) differs: The time when attempts were made to combine Catholicism and democracy has passed; both are faits and "Des faits ne se concilient pas, ils se constatent."

[26] Acta Leonis XVIII, 223.

[27] In the Catholic debate about democracy of that time, in which especially Tischleder referred to Leo XIII, O. Schilling (Staatslehre 43 and 148) said about this speech, and rightfully so: "Since the list of demands apply to any form of government and the term Christian democracy is not to be understood in a political sense, a political interpretation totally contradicts Leo's intentions."

[28] The non adeo is an allusion to the resistance which the Christian Social party encountered in Austria from the Conservatives and especially from Cardinal Gruscha (cf. chap.

2; H.-D. Wendland, Der Begriff "Christlich-sozial" [Cologne 1962]; R. Knoll, Zur Tradition der christlichsozialen Partei [Österreichs] [Cologne 1972]).

[29] Interestingly, the Herder edition (1901) 8, translated democratia christiana with "Christian social democracy," even though the encyclical itself differentiated between the two terms.

[30] The encyclical: Acta Leonis XVI, 3–20; in regard to Acta christiana popularis, 14f. (whether one chooses this term or "Christian democracy" is irrelevant; also important is: "si quidem impertita a Nobis documenta, quo par est obsequio, integra custodiatur); cf. also 17.—The abstract expression Catholicorum mens atque actio is not quite clear. It can mean one should not introduce in the name of the faith and Catholic Action, or Catholics should not introduce another form of government. In 1888, this had been generally approved (n. 13, above).—The first draft of Graves de communi was written by Cardinal (1901) F. Cavagnis and was more pointed than the encyclical (G. Martina, RSTI 16 [1962], 492–50; R. Lill, Der Kampf . . . [biblio., chap. 24], 110).

[31] The success, partially achieved through strikes, partially through the active initiatives of the legislation pertaining to worker protection (which was promoted by the Catholic lobbyists and parties in Parliament) was of historical significance: in 1877, France still permitted children between the ages of twelve and fourteen to work twelve hours (in Switzerland and in the Netherlands, child labor was forbidden), in Germany (1878), six hours were allowed (under certain conditions). Around 1910, most members of the labor force in most of the industries worked from nine to ten hours (cf. R. Kuczynski, Arbeitslohn und Arbeitszeit in Europa, 1870/1909 [Berlin 1913]; a survey in A. Knoll, 143–52).

without religion.[32] The fight against socialism dominated the intention of the encyclical.

If the principal statements in all of Leo XIII's magisterial writings are distinguished from the modifications incited by the given situations,[33] the following transpires: democracy is a result of the "transformer time" with which one can and has to come to grips for the sake of ecclesiastical goals if the hierarchical leaders deem it opportune. Also the Christian social reform policies are less interested in the economic conditions of the working class than in a defense against atheistic socialism, which includes the elimination of social misery. These, in fact, are also the essential goals to be pursued by the official teaching of the Church. In the framework of his splendid universal program, aimed at presenting the papacy to the world as a moral, spiritual, and clerical authority and freeing this institution from the negative aspects of the Syllabus, Leo XIII had to confront the actual problems of his time, and he had to do so in the face of a society which was involved in a continuous dialectical process, oscillating between political parties and economic classes, and in the face of a Catholicism struggling with its own internal differences. The French monarchists were reported to be closer to his own political-clerical persuasion than the Catholic supporters of the Republic.[34] But Leo XIII expected that they, as he had done, would sacrifice their conviction for the sake of a higher goal and that they would accept the democratic constitution, which he had officially only tolerated (along with others), restricting it by adding "per se."

In Neo-Scholastic social philosophy the Pope believed to have found a generally binding synthesis based on Natural Law which could confront the antagonisms of the time.[35] In reality, however, Catholicism represented special groups within the general, increasingly secularized society, and it had its own problems of integration, with or without identifying with a political party. Since the religious aspects were decisive in this respect, a dilemma regarding the universality of the Church could possibly emerge if the religious motives were combined with certain social and political goals whose actuality could only coincide very generally with the Neo-Scholastic social philosophy. The dilemma increased the more Christian faith and social political convictions were tied together and the more they were simultaneously intent on changing inherited conditions. Each in his own way, Leo XIII and the political "Christian democrats," were unable to see that the old relationship between Church and world, that is, the world as a duplicate of the Church, was not real any longer. This is the ultimate reason for the conflict which resulted from the subsequent pontificate's interpretation of hierarchical magisterial directives in political questions. This conflict was already on the horizon in Leo XIII's pontificate.[36]

---

[32] Acta Leonis XXI, 10.

[33] P. Tischleder, Staatsgewalt, 61, tried to interpret the Graves de communi against the background of Marxism and the Italian situation, which is not possible.

[34] Cf. Introduction.

[35] A thorough, critical assessment of this social philosophy and Neo-Scholasticism as a whole is desirable (it should outline its limits, but also its generally accepted achievements). This is especially necessary since the subsequent development of the "Christian social doctrine" after Pius XI is almost forgotten by the Catholics and since the "critical theory" contains a lot of ideas that cannot be found elsewhere.

---

[36] Cf. chap. 35.

CHAPTER 15

The Position of Catholicism in the Culture at the Turn of the Century

The relationship of Catholicism to its various national cultures in the last third of the nineteenth century and at the beginning of the twentieth century varies greatly. What was classified as cultural "ghetto-Catholicism" existed only in Germany, because there the confessional minority was strong enough to develop a sound self-consciousness, and its social structure was considerably different from that of the society at large. For Irish Catholicism in England, constituting a majority, the Anglo-Saxon culture was foreign for religious reasons; moreover, in its social isolation it did not even have a chance to deal with this culture. In Ireland itself, the "revival" around the turn of the century clearly documents that the affiliated writers were born Catholics, but the movement, spiritually indebted to France, divorced itself from Irish traditionalism by emancipating itself from the Church. The two smaller Catholic groups in England, the Old-English Catholics and the converts, belonged to the Anglo-Saxon culture, conducted their intellectual disputes in the English language, and the significant poets were immersed in the tradition of English poetry. Catholicism in the United States, itself culturally scarcely creative, tried to adapt to society as a whole.

In the Catholic countries of France, Spain, Italy, Austria, and Poland it is difficult (regardless of the intensive national Christian traditions) to determine which phenomena should be viewed as Catholic in an ecclesiastical sense and what distinguishes those who cannot be understood outside general Catholicity from those who are almost or completely alienated from the Christian tradition.

This is especially true of France. The poet Charles Baudelaire (1821–67) with whom modern French poetry begins stands at the beginning of the epoch treated here. This man whose career ended so early dominated the field for generations to come. He is certainly not to be reckoned in the same category as Chateaubriand as representative of the Christianity of the restoration. Yet it cannot be denied that the author of the Fleurs du Mal which he originally called Limbes and who saw abandonment of the idea of original sin as the basic evil of the age[1] was at heart a Catholic, yet no one would ascribe catholicisme to him. At the end of our era stands Charles Maurras (1868–1952), who was entirely different from Baudelaire (even though he also hated the eighteenth century). But he is an example of how wide the borders of French Catholicism range. Working for conservative newspapers in his early years, he lost his faith in Catholicism, but not in the monarchy or classical literature. He was an opponent of Romanticism and democracy and, in 1899, founded the Action française, which raised the hopes of many conservative Catholics in France and not just their hopes. He confessed to having lost the Christian faith, but he belonged to a catholicisme, which (he said) had saved mankind.[2] The condemnation of some of his works in 1914 was not publicized by the Church until 1926. But even if one proceeds from such marginal personalities into the middle of the cultural life of French Catholics at that time, one does not find an extraneous group, but members of the Littérature française: converts, not in the usual sense of the word, but men who had experienced their conversio, and this in the middle of their engagement in one of the literary trends which they shared with other Frenchmen. In this respect, the Renouveau catholique[3] differs essentially from the literary movement in German Catholicism. But an apologist writer such as Paul Bourget (1852–1935), who from the start wanted to describe the demoralization of the middle class of the French Republic, the adultery, the hypocrisy of the anticlerics, and the asocial individualism of the liberal bourgeoisie; even he was considered "for thirty years an original representative, as it were, of the French novel as created by Balzac and George Sand."[4] Just as much a part of the Littérature française was his spiritual friend Ferdinand Brunetière (1849–1906), who, after his visit to Leo XIII in 1894, published the Visite au Vatican and who appeared as a polemical Catholic.[5] With his critical essays, which he published in the Revue des Deux Mondes, he had quite an impact on the Académie Française, which he joined in 1893, and his public turn toward Catholicism was the result of his basic attitude, which prompted him to place the seventeenth century, the century of French classicism, in opposition to the century of enlightenment, romanticism, and the resignation of the fin du siècle, which was entirely in the spirit of French rationalism. Incurring the ridicule of the leftist intellectuals, the former disciple of Comte spoke of the "faillites partielles de la science." The conservative Brunetière pilloried contemporary pessimism, attacking the "believers in the Great Revolution and the legitimate, though perhaps decadent heirs of Voltaire and Rousseau" who are nurtured more by their anticlericalism than by their own tradition.[6] But despite whatever hypocrisy his adversaries charged him with, nobody could dispute that Brunetière had a brilliant French style. G.-P. Fonsegrive-Lespinasse (1852–1917) (philosopher and writer, editor of the publication Quinzaine [1896–

---

[1] A. Thibaudet, Histoire de la Littérature Française de 1789 à nos jours (Paris 1936, Freiburg i. B. 1953 [Germ.]), 340–43; J. Pommier, La mystique de Baudelaire (Strasbourg 1932).

[2] La politique religieuse (Paris 1914), 23.—That he died reconciled with the Church (in 1937 he had written a submissive letter to Pius XI from Lisieux) is a phenomenon to be assessed differently than the will of the positivist historian Fustel de Coulenges: "I demand a burial according to French customs" (during the funeral of Victor Hugo in 1885 in the Pantheon, the city council of Paris had removed the cross). Even though C. Maurras, who died in 1952, had a long and hard life, the possibility of such an end should not be dismissed, especially in view of the situation around the turn of the century (A. Cormier, La vie intérieure de Ch. Maurras [Paris 1956]).

[3] The poet F. Coppée (1842–1908), very popular in France around the turn of the century, had achieved success as one of the Parnassiens with his book Intimités (1868). He was the poet of the lower class and small things. In the wake of his religious conversion, he wrote La bonne souffrance (1898) (P. Le Meur, F. Coppée [Paris 1932]).—G. Huysmans (1848–1907) was one of the great representatives of naturalism, equal to É. Zola, a pioneer (En route, 1895). In his autobiographical novel L'oblat (1903), he describes his return to the Catholic Church (G. Chastel, Huysmans et ses amis [Paris 1957]).—The poetry of F. Jammes (1868–1938) can be compared to another representative of Flemish culture, the priest and poet Guido Gezelle. Jammes returned to the faith of his youth through symbolism (De l'Angélus de l'aube à l'Angélus du soir, 1898) (J. P. Inda, Du faune au patriarche [Paris 1952]).—Each belonging to one of the "two Frances," the author and poet C. Péguy (1873–1914, died in the battle of the Marne River) and the writer of pamphlets, L. Bloy (1846–1917), were political enemies. Péguy, siding with Dreyfus, joined the Socialists, posed as a mouthpiece of the different opponents of the Combe regime in his Cahiers de la Quinzaine (1900–14), and wrote Mystères and especially Ève (1914), great religious works, even though he could never be an "ecclesiastical" Catholic (R. Lauth, Lexikon der Weltliteratur im 20. Jh. II [Freiburg i. Br. 1961], 610–15).—Bloy belonged to the "reactionaries," yet, in his passionate struggle against the disciples of the Ralliement policy of Leo XIII, against the anticlerical and the conservative armchair Catholics, he found himself in "splendid isolation." Nevertheless, in France he is still considered "one of the greatest prose writers of his century" (A. Thibaudet, op. cit., 406; J. Bollery, Léon Bloy, 3 vols. [Paris 1949–54]).—The religious experience that eighteen-year-old P. Claudel underwent in 1886 in the church of Notre Dame in Paris and that was to be the foundation for his creative work concurred with his discovery of the symbolist A. Rimbaud.

---

[4] A. Thibaudet, op. cit., 453.

[5] Cf. chap. biblio.—V. Giraud, De Chateaubriand à Brunetière (Paris 1936); J. G. Clark, La pensée de F. Brunetière (diss., Paris 1954); A. Thibaudet, op. cit., 480–84 and passim.

[6] Discours de combat III (1903), 142f.

1907]), who had to be protected by Leo XIII against his conservative critics, said toward the end of his life that "thirty years ago one could barely detect in the French public the kind of interest in spiritual questions that has surfaced now" (in the Renouveau catholique).[7] The Jesuits also saw in the Études of French cultural Catholicism a form of new ecclesiasticality, though L. Laberthonnière, a strict disciple of Blondel, appeared very sceptical. As in the case of all cultural forms of Catholicism, one would have to distinguish between the profit gained from making Catholic existence possible in the modern world and the effect it would have on general society, which had abandoned its aggressive anticlericalism only because its apathy had become too great.[8]

M. de Vogüé, in the Revue des Deux Mondes (1901), described the "two contradictory concepts of national history" in France. This does not apply to Spain of that same time period. Even the famous "Generation of 98" does not permit overt discussion of "two Spains."[9] Therefore, the appeal of the politician Joaquín Costa (died in 1911) "Lock the grave of El Cid with three keys!" was immediately opposed by the true representatives of this generation, even though they were open to modern currents. Above all, it was rejected by Miguel de Unamuno, a Spanish Catholic who did not agree with Church dogma but had nothing in common with the Catholicism of Charles Maurras ("El Cristo de Velázquez", 1920). The Civil War of the twentieth century destroyed the unity of the spirit of the Hispanidad. In comparison, Italy was split so deeply because of the Roman question that even Dante's greatness as reflected in the various interpretations by national writers was no longer a unifying element. The intransigent Pope-supporting Catholics had become homeless in their national culture because they had nothing to counteract the positivism invading Italy from France as well as Hegelianism, and they had to stand by and watch while the Tuscan Giosuè Carducci, a fanatical anticlerical, was celebrated as the poet of the new Italy. Alessandro Manzoni (died in 1873) had overcome the Enlightenment, had confessed his Catholic belief in fiery language in the Inni sacri (1812–22), and had written the Italian national novel, I Promessi Sposi (1827). His heirs could not understand the Non expedit for the same reasons which compelled Manzoni, the great pioneer of the religious-national unification of Italy, to become silent. Antonio Fogazzaro (1842–1911),[10] the most outstanding of them all, in his main work Piccolo mondo antico (1895) described the Italian fight for freedom against Austria with as much national as religious enthusiasm. His novel Il Santo (1905), equally filled with deep religious sentiment, was condemned because of the four evils of the Church described therein. In 1887, during the critical year of Leo XIII's pontificate, forty sentences from the work of the famous theologian and philosopher A. Rosmini-Serbati, to whom Fogazzaro was very much indebted, were extracted and censored.[11] Thus, cultural life in Italy was dominated by verism, G. d'Annunzio (the successor of G. Carducci), and the neo-Hegelians.

---

[7] L'èvolution des idées, 228.—P. Archambault, P. Fonsegrive (Paris 1932).

[8] W. Gurian (biblio., chap. 12), 300: "They love everything about Catholicism, but dogma is only beautiful metaphysics to them and the Church a brilliant organization"; this is the argument of H. Bremond, Vingt cinq ans de vie littéraire (Paris 1908), 70, especially in view of the Action française.

[9] Cf. chap. 8.

In Poland, after the failure of the uprising of 1863, the identity of creed and nation had become stronger, but the disappointment created a mood which was a fertile ground for western European positivism (Comte, Taine, Darwin), which seized "Young Poland." Thus emerged a fierce opposition between the leftist liberals and the conservatives. Their most eminent representative was H. Sienkiewicz (1846–1916), the author of historical novels about the era of Polish wars in the seventeenth century and of the internationally famous novel on the early Christian period, Quo Vadis (1896). A Polish example of conversio is the important poet Jan Kasprowicz (1860–1926), who was persecuted in the Prussian province of Posen because of his nationalistic attitude. From the atheism of his early socio-critical writings he proceeded to religious hymns, rooted in his native peasantry.

In Austria, the names Grillparzer and Stifter characterize the tradition of the kind of Catholicity which, in spite of its liberal and at times even anticlerical features, derives from a Catholic spirit. This spirit, to be sure, was watered down by anticlerical tendencies in the plays of Ludwig Anzengruber (1839–89) and in the folk tales of the Styrian Peter Rosegger (1843–1918), who was influenced by Anzengruber. Catholicity is most strongly represented in the writings of Hugo von Hofmannsthal (1874–1929), who, in the spirit of Grillparzer and Calderon renounced the "magical power over the word" in symbolization and returned from his areligiosity to the great tradition of the West, whose historic tragedy he witnessed in the decline of the Habsburg Empire.[12] This can be compared to the unfortunate poet Georg Trakl of Salzburg (1887–1914), who wanted to find the world's secret harmony in the language of the symbolists. A contemporary of these non-ecclesiastical poets was the convent-bred Enrica von Handel-Mazzetti

---

[10] Cf. chap. 32, n. 18.

[11] Cf. chap. 5 and p. 312 below; in chap. 32, the religious situation in Italy.

[12] K. Lazarowicz, LThK^{2} V, 426f.

(1871–1955). Her novel Jesse und Maria (1906), dealing with the era of the Counter-Reformation, incited after its serial publication in the Hochland (1904) of Carl Muth a "literary controversy" because in this novel the Catholics as well as the Protestants are guilty. The novel was written with deep Catholic conviction, but it broke with the tendentious literature which had become popular in German Catholicism after the Romantic period.[13]

At the general meeting of the Görres Gesellschaft in Constance in 1896, its president, G. v. Hertling, said: "But what we need now are not so much apologists but rather real scholars."[14] Until Carl Muth, this was true not just for scholarship but for literature in general. When Hermann von Grauert, at the Catholic Convention in Munich in 1895, expressed his envy of French Catholicism of Brunetière (while Germany was dominated by Nietzsche[15]), he referred to the wide public reputation which the French literary critic had acquired. What was later called the "educational deficit" in German Catholicism of that time had several causes. Lessing, Schiller, Goethe, Kant and the philosophy of idealism, J. G. Herder and Humboldt, the representatives of the German spirit, were Protestant. The significance of Catholic features in Romanticism is not easily assessed. Its Catholic spokesman, the convert Friedrich Schlegel was a protean figure, who turned to gnosticism in the last phase of his life in Dresden and died in 1829. In this movement, the Catholics had been as much a part of German literature as the ecclesiastical Catholics had been of French literature. Not just converts, but also born Catholics such as Clemens Brentano and Eichendorff participated. In his later years, the Silesian poet wrote about the "event in Cologne" (1837): here emerged what "the Romanticists had dreamt of and did not possess themselves: a Catholic spirit." But prophetically he had also warned of the "rigors of ecclesiastical restrictiveness," which, of course, was to some extent unavoidable in the belligerent position which German Catholicism as a minority group was forced into by a largely Protestant society, and which it brought upon itself by its awareness of being a strong minority. This is another point which explains the isolation of German Catholicism after the second third of the nineteenth century.

---

[13] W. Grenzmann, Lexikon der Weltliteratur im 20. Jh. I (Freiburg i. B. 1960), 850ff.; cf. chaps. 2 and 35, and p. 427 below; cf. F. Fuchs and P. Funk (cit. chap. 29, n. 1).

[14] Erinnerungen II, 168; in regard to Hertling's pamphlet (biblio., chap. 15), Brück-Kißling VI², 329, maintains that the mistrust of Catholics "was mostly justified: many Catholics, who had been able through considerable sacrifices by the clergy and generous laymen to obtain a higher education, turned against their faith later." F. X. Kraus (Dt. Lit. Ztg. 21 [1900], 12–19) is critical of the fact that Hertling's principles were denounced de facto.

[15] Kißling II, 270.

This was the price that Catholicism paid for being able, unlike other sects, to structure itself within society. The German Catholics were underrepresented in higher education and especially at the universities (particularly, if one ignores theology). This was the result of cultural and historical development and at the same time the cause of its intensification, especially if the socio-cultural and the socio-economic facts are combined.[16] It was correctly pointed out then (1803) that secularization was a catastrophe for Catholic education;[17] the academic career of Catholics at universities was, even after the Kulturkampf, greatly impaired by the intolerance of the Liberals. But one has to see the whole complex situation at once if one is to understand the reaction of Catholics in the overall cultural world during these decades. One has to isolate the key issue from the polemical global reproach of "inferiority." German Catholicism had at its disposal pertinent means of communication, and it was an internal matter when the "calendar for time and eternity," published by the Alemannian priest Alban Stolz (1808–83), and his own strongly autobiographical essays, which contain more than the usual polemics against liberalism, were pushed aside by a sort of literature of which Das Opfer eines Beichtgeheimnisses (The Sacrifice of a Confession) by J. Spillmann is an example (Spillmann's novels appeared between 1882 and 1903 and were a great success). It is Friedrich Wilhelm Weber's (died in 1894) Dreizehnlinden (1878), rather than Heinrich Hansjakob's true-to-life folk story Der Vogt auf Mühlstein (1895), which is representative. This work, written in concise language that was meant to satisfy sophisticated demands, could be found into the twentieth century in the bookcases of Catholics who had to live in the limited circumstances for which history had destined them.[18] Yet the situation is not so much characterized by clumsy attempts such as that of Weber, but rather by the respectable effort, as it were, to offer a decent selection in the "library of German classical writers for school and home," for which the inclusion of Lessing's Nathan must have been a difficult decision. The belligerent Swiss Jesuit Alexander Baumgartner laid bare in his three volume work Göthe (1879–86) the "dirty love novels" of his idol and called the humanity of Iphigenie a "Trojan horse," whose content he wanted to expose.[19] The breakthrough brought about by Muth in Hochland resulted in conditions much like those in France: the works of these writers ceased to appear in Catholic publishing houses because the authors—once again to a large extent converts—wanted to be part of the general German literature.

---

[16] Utilizing the census of 1907, H. Rost found that the Catholics (36.5 percent) had a share of 44.2 percent in agriculture, 29.9 percent in business, 18.5 percent among the mining entrepreneurs. At the same time, in the county of Koblenz, the Protestants (33 percent), had a share of 50 percent of the tax yield, in Cologne (14 percent) a share of 25 percent. Regarding the problems of statistical studies, see C. Bauer, Deutscher Katholizismus (biblio., chap. 12), 33.—In 1886, in Prussia, the Catholics (approx. 35 percent) had a share of 21.3 percent of the students in Gymnasien (a share that is proportionate to the population average of 1910 in the Prussian school district); in the Realschulen, the share went down from 16.7 to 14.5 percent between 1886 and 1910. At Prussian universities, 13 percent of the students were Catholic (1885–97); W. Lossen, Der Anteil der Katholiken am akademischen Lehramt in Preußen (Cologne 1901), 1.

[17] See G. v. Hertling, Kleine Schriften, 569.

[18] P. L. Haffner (philosophy professor at the seminary of Mainz, from 1879 until 1886 editor of the apologetic Frankfurter zeitgemäße Broschüren, later bishop of Mainz) said at the Catholic Convention of Amberg in 1884 that even "harmless" novels had a devastating influence; F. Hülskamp made a similar statement in Trier in 1887 when talking about the metrical language of the Dreizehnlinden. This evaluates the novel as being the literary genre of the bourgeoisie that emerged from the Revolution.

The scholarly works in Catholicism gravitated naturally toward theology, philosophy, and (Church) history.[20] Here, tradition provided a starting point and Neo-Scholasticism, which had become official through Leo XIII's Thomas encyclical, offered not only an international basis but also the possibility of developing, beyond the disputations and apologetics over the zeitgeist, an independent and even partially creative system and of giving the retarding forces a positive orientation. Also, the old and the new universities, founded during Leo XIII's pontificate, made attempts toward a comprehensive modern curriculum. Louvain distinguished itself in Near Eastern studies as well as in biology; Fribourg (1889) had started a philosophy and a law faculty and, in 1896, established a mathematics and natural science faculty; Washington (1889) developed its sociological emphasis, which was also pursued in Louvain. In France, the Catholic universities in Paris, Angers, Lille, Lyon, and Toulouse, founded around 1875, had to change their name to Institut catholique following the law of 1880, according to which the title université was reserved for state institutions. But with imperturbable enthusiasm they held on to their academic programs; and the plan also to establish schools of medicine was not a symptom of ambition but of the realization that intellectual decisions were particularly at stake in this field. Of course, grave technical difficulties stood in the way. That the establishment of theological faculties occurred subsequently is primarily a result of their problematic relationship to the diocesan seminaries. The names of the scholars affiliated with the individual institutions represented the rather different spirit of each institution.[21]

---

[19] O. Köhler, Bücher als Wegmarken . . . , 46–49; J. Antz, Der Katholizismus . . . , 173–81.

[20] Cf. chaps. 21 and 22.

[21] In regard to the focal points (with the exception of theology and philosophy): Angers began with law, literature, and natural sciences (the Thomist L. Billot, S.J.); Lille developed the social sciences (also the technical fields) and he was able to establish a medical

In 1810, the University of Salzburg was closed, and attempts to expand the theology department, installed in 1851, into a full university were not successful, in spite of Leo XIII's encouragement through briefs in 1890, 1900, and 1902. During the Catholic Convention in Aachen in 1879, the decision of 1862 to create a Catholic university in Germany was reiterated; but in 1882, there were no more than three hundred thousand marks in the budget, and too many serious arguments were blocking the plan. However, the Görres-Gesellschaft, founded in 1876, the year of Joseph Görres's one hundredth birthday, may be called one of the most significant societies of Catholic scholars. The initiative had come from Georg v. Hertling (1843–1919)[22], in 1867 lecturer of philosophy in Bonn, in 1882 professor at the University of Munich. With his Neo-Scholastic philosophy of law, politics, and society and as a Center Party politician (in 1875–90 and 1896–1912 member of the Reichstag), he was one of the most intelligent leaders of German Catholicism, a man who knew how to combine determination and restraint. The Görres-Gesellschaft enjoyed the ecclesiastical patronage of the incumbent of the diocese of Cologne, but it was founded as a private society. It renounced a theological section, although theologians formed a great part of its membership. The original four sections were devoted to philosophy, history, law, sociology, and natural science.[23] The Austrian Leo Gesellschaft, founded in 1891 by J. A. Helfert and named after the ruling Pope, published mainly studies of the general and ecclesiastical history of Austria.[24] In Germany and Austria it was of special significance that the theology faculties had remained in the academic structure of the universities. Thus, they were in a better position than the diocesan seminaries to preserve for Catholic theology a place in the general school.—Lyon, where only a few medical disciplines and a department for natural sciences could be developed, had a law school and a college for social sciences (after 1898, theology was headed by Tixeront, professor in patrology, after 1906 by Podechard, Old Testament scholar from the seminary).—Paris offered law, Far Eastern studies, natural sciences. Famous rectors were M. d'Hulst (until 1896) and Baudrillart. Among the faculty in theology were the Church historian Duchesne, in canon law Gasparri, in apologetics A.-T.-P. de Broglie, in philosophy Sertillanges (after 1900) and later Maritain.—Church historian Batiffol (1898–1907, rector) taught in Toulouse.

---

[22] Cf. chaps. 1, 3, 12, 21 and 35.

[23] These focal points were adopted from the most important publications of this time period: HJ (since 1880), PhJ (since 1888), Staatslexikon (^{1} 1887, ^{2} 1901–04), publications of the Council of Trent (after 1901). In 1888, the Roman Institute was founded. It was supported by the rector of Campo Santo, A. de Waal.—W. Spael, Görres-Gesellschaft, 1876–1941 (Paderborn 1957).

[24] F. Schindler, Die Leo-Gesellschaft 1891–1901 (Vienna 1902); A. Dörrer, LThK^{2} VI, 959.

scholarly and scientific public.[25] In spite of the conflicts within "reform Catholicism" and "modernism," into which theologians such as H. Schell, A. Ehrhard, F. X. Kraus, F. M. Schindler, and L. Wahrmund were drawn, there was rarely a real schism (contrary to the time of Döllinger).[26]

The numerous scholarly publications in all forms of Catholicism, which received fresh impulses and were newly founded,[27] document that Catholicism had defined its self-concept more in the realm of scholarship than anywhere else, even though the natural sciences came up for discussion more indirectly in the apologetic literature. There were a few exceptions, such as at the University of Louvain (the only Catholic institution which was a full university), the research on ants by the Jesuit E. Wasmann (published in the nineties), and the astronomical works of the Jesuits Hagen, Kugler, and others. Wasmann's studies of Haeckel's monism was based on his own scientific research. Tilmann Pesch approached the same problem on the basis of his natural philosophy (Die großen Welträtsel, 1883–84). Although the questions posed by the natural sciences were taken quite seriously, the many French Catholic scientists were more directly affected by the discussion taking place in Bible exegesis, which, since the nineteenth century, had resulted in more and more radical interpretations within liberal Protestant theology.[28] It is understandable that they did not succeed in carrying out their intention to exclude this complex of questions at the international congresses of Catholic scholars and scientists in the last decade of the nineteenth century. This failure, in conjunction with the crisis of modernism and integralism, ended an attempt which could have become quite significant for the development of a common Catholic intellectuality able to confront modern problems decisively. The idea had emanated from the future president (1894) of the Institut catholique in Toulouse, Duilhé de Saint-Projet (1822–97), who in 1875 had been one of the men instrumental in the founding of the Catholic universities in France. In his Apologie scientifique du christianisme (Toulouse 1885) he developed a program for international congresses, which was worked out in detail in conversations with the first president of the Institut catholique in Paris, Maurice d'Hulst. This man, who represented such a remarkable combination of views[29] and was actually the personification of arbitration, seemed to be the suitable promoter of the congress idea. Of course, he encountered strong reservations, because there was fear that at such congresses nontheologian participants would ask questions about dogma and exegesis and thus create great confusion. As always in such cases, Leo XIII was optimistic and asked Maurice d'Hulst for his expert opinion. D'Hulst suggested excluding the treatment of all questions concerning ecclesiastical teachings, but he emphasized the necessity of discussing the contemporary status quo of the sciences. In a letter of 1887, the Pope approved the plan.

---

[25] Regarding Würzburg, see Festschrift zum 350 jährigen Bestehen der Universität Würzburg (1932), essays by S. Merkle, A. Bigelmair, etc. Regarding Innsbruck, see "100 Jahre Theologische Fakultät Innsbruck," ZKTh 80 (1958), 1–235; E. Kleindam, Die kath. theol. Fakultät Breslau, 1811–1945 (Cologne 1961); E. Hegel, Gesch. der kath. theol. Fakultät Münster, 1773–1966 2 (Münster 1971). Regarding Tübingen, see ThQ (1970; anniversary ed.). Regarding Bonn, see 150 Jahre Rhein. Friedrich Wilhelm Universität zu Bonn, 1818–1968. (Bonn 1968). A systematic continuation of these histories is desirable.

[26] Cf. chaps. 2 and 29. Concerning the problem of the modernist oath, see chap. 33.

[27] Cf. biblio., chap. 15.

[28] Cf. chaps. 23, 30, 31, 32.

The first congress in Paris in 1888 proceeded to everyone's satisfaction, even though its international makeup was limited, as was the second one, which took place in 1894 (also in Paris) under the presidency of Bishop Freppel.[30] During the third congress in Brussels in 1894, when university President Abbeloos of Louvain was honorary president, a paper by M. d'Hulst attacked the theologically controversial material which had accumulated. He warned against minimizing dogmatic statements of the Church. He strenuously advised against exaggerating them and suspecting everyone of rationalism who did not share one's own opinions. During the fourth congress in 1897 (in Fribourg), which was able to attract three thousand participants under the presidency of G. v. Hertling, the participants had the courage to form, aside from newly founded sections, a special group in which "exegesis and related disciplines" were to be discussed. What the Görres-Gesellschaft had avoided when it renounced the creation of a theological section happened here. The Dominican A.-M. Lagrange was the leader in the group concerned with exegesis and would later insist in vain that the group had approved his principles.[31] The convention in Munich in 1900, which attracted even more participants, parted with the expectation of convening again in Rome in 1903. This was an illusion.[32] The Istituto cattolico internazionale per il progresso delle scienze, which had been announced in the encyclical Pascendi for 1907 and for which Pius X had appointed Ludwig Pastor secretary general, failed to survive the initial stages. At that time, Albert Ehrhard had been deprived of his title as prelate; G. von Hertling was only going to be accepted because he could not be ignored in his capacity as president of the Görres Gesellschaft; the Church historian Duchesne was rejected by the Pope. In spite of Rampolla's misgivings, Pastor succeeded in winning the Pope's support for men like the radical apologist A. M. Weiß and the historian E. Michael, S.J. of Innsbruck.[33] Rampolla asked the Pope on 13 February 1909 to relieve him of the chairmanship of the commission. The institute did not materialize. Most likely it would not have represented the kind of Catholicity which unfolded after World War I in the cultural life of the Church.

---

[29] Cf. chap. 23, n. 15.

[30] In 1888, the Görres Society as a whole did not participate. Only individual members were on the list of participants. An embarrassing incident took place at the congress of 1891: The echelon of the Görres Society, G. v. Hertling, H. v. Grauert, and H. Hüffner, had appeared. While the congress was going on, the German version of a letter that Freppel had written to the French correspondent of the Berliner Lokalanzeiger on 17 March 1891 was published. In it, the Alsatian demanded the return of Alsace-Lorraine to France. The German congress participants cancelled their attendance of the dinner given in honor of Bishop Freppel (G. v. Hertling, Erinnerungen II, 133).

[31] Cf. chap. 23.

[32] Hocedez III, 93–96. Very critical in regard to Munich: G. P. (F. X.) Kraus, Allg. Zeitung, 4 October 1900.

[33] Pastor, Tagebücher, 482–96, 499–502, 511.

SECTION THREE

Forms of Piety

CHAPTER 16

Externalization and Internalization of Nineteenth-Century Spirituality
Beginnings of the Eucharistic Congress Movement
Veneration of Saint Thérèse of Lisieux

The forms of piety which had developed in the second third of the nineteenth century grew in scope during Leo XIII's pontificate. They were invigorated through demonstrative gestures in ceremonies of consecration, through liturgical festivities, and through the confirmation of congregations and fraternities. They were valued as socially integrating factors in the forms of Catholicism taking shape within the various countries. And yet their significance cannot be recognized unless they are valued as the daily religious nourishment of the faithful who were living in a strange or hostile environment and who, in those pious exercises, found the strength to remain loyal to a faith which was finding less and less support in the secular world. Depending on the country, the situation was quite different, of course, and cannot generally be differentiated according to urban and rural areas. There were rural areas in France where de-Christianization had progressed far,[1] and the development during the course of the Third Republic was characterized by juxtaposing the "déchristianisation du peuple" and the "rechristianisation de la bourgeoisie."[2] Agrarian concentrations in southern Spain resulted in the rural proletariat's alienation from the faith. In the German-speaking area, the Catholic rural population remained untouched by the modern spirit; to the right and to the left of the cross in the reliquary they hung a picture of the Sacred Heart and the Virgin Mary, as the pastor had recommended, without their religious attitude changing in essence. The rosary, lead by the head of the family in the livingroom, continued to be popular as part of the deeply ingrained veneration of the Virgin Mary. The political development in France toward the end of the nineteenth century contributed to the revitalization of the consciousness of faith. However, during the same period in Germany, a partial paralysis could be detected, because the stimuli of the Kulturkampf were missing.[3] [1] Chap. 6.—The missionary J.-B. Berthier (1840–1908) was successful among all classes.

---

[2] A. Dansette, op. cit., 30–51; cf. chaps. 15 and 36.

Contemporary observations regarding the significance of the political battle (including its national variations) are applicable to the style of religiosity in all forms of Catholicism, whereby we have to consider that the conservative group consciousness in religious life was accompanied by a subjectivism which, on the one hand, was generally embedded in the spiritual trend of the outgoing nineteenth century after the disappointments of the bourgeois revolutions, and which, on the other hand, was consciously nurtured by the pastors as a defense against the materialistic-collectivistic spirit of the time.[4] This juxtaposition of sociality and subjectivity is one of the reasons for the late emergence of the liturgical restoration. Also significant is the positivistic concept of the "sanctity of the Church,"[5] which was believed verified through reference to the catalog of beatification and canonization examinations conducted by the Congregation of Rites of 1901. Moreover, since for the most part religious orders and congregations promoted the canonization of members and since they predominated among the Latin peoples, the picture was distorted. Reflected in this naive quantitative interpretation is the idea of the Catholic "membership" movement, which was necessary for the development of Catholicism and represented the result of often tremendous efforts as well as a mere reaction to processes in the secular society. The contemporary Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in Deutschland by Brück-Kißling, with its (for that time) pertinent two volumes of altogether 1,014 pages, is characteristic of that movement in that it devoted 55 pages to the inner life of the Church, more specifically to organizations of this kind. That the organizational element remained [3] J. C. Schulte, Die Kirche und die Gebildeten (Freiburg i. Br. 1912, ^{3}1919), 12.— Another phenomenon, popular at that time, but nevertheless rather unpleasant, was the mutual assessments of religiosity among the French and the German Catholics. G. Goyau, Les catholiques allemands et l'Empire évangélique (1916) was countered by H. Schrörs, Deutscher und französischer Katholizismus in den letzten Jahrzehnten (Freiburg i. Br. 1917). If one disregards the polemical aspects, then one discovers that the two authors are sophisticated enough to make correct points in spite of their animosity.— Regarding the problems of urban pastoral work, see H. Swoboda (Regensburg 1911).

---

[4] Anton L. Mayer, op. cit., 49f.

[5] K. Kempf, introduction: M. Scheeben already described the divine mark of the sanctity of the Church, "however, he could not furnish the kind of documentation available now." Kempf then describes the "first steps" toward Pius IX's canonization. He lists the saints (or those nominated for canonization) according to their hierarchal position (bishops: 24–49, secular priests: 50–78, members of orders: 79–265, laymen: 266–334, including relatively extensive biographies). He indicates the various stages in the canonization process regarding J. B. Vianney, Klemens M. Hofbauer, Konrad von Parzham, G. Bosco. V. Pallotti, Bernadette Soubirous, and Contardo Ferrini.

"fashionable" to the extent "that the inner life, the grace, the mystery were frightened away"[6] also had an effect on the organization of devotional practices. One of the examples of this is the manner in which First Communicants were now brought into the old Corpus Christi fraternities in groups and forced to sing hymns of Eucharistic theology,[7] which were difficult to comprehend even for adult Christians. Religious devotional art was quite popular at that time and is a difficult phenomenon to assess. In its precise meaning, this kind of popular devotional art appears for the first time in the late nineteenth century as the result of certain cultural and historical conditions. Favored by the possibility of reproduction, popular devotional art demanded and furthered participation in conventional art which was simultaneously isolating itself from society. These demands could not be satisfied. Therefore, they were appeased by elevating popular devotional art one step above banality—a phenomenon which cannot be compared to the disintegration of high art, sustained by an elite, into handicraft.[8] Upon investigation of the mystical essence underlying Eucharistic piety and the Sacred Heart devotion of that time, it becomes clear that the faithful were overtaxed by this bid for sophistication. It is also evident that they were given an acceptable version with the best of intentions and thereby possessed an adequate means of expression in the art forms of the Nazarenes,[9] who had fallen below their original level of quality. These conclusions are comparable to the analysis of secular popular art. Notwithstanding the nationalistic aversion to "the French," the fact remains that these expressions of piety, stemming from the Latin mentality, could only be transferred with difficulty to Germanic countries. The close relationship between art and religion is unquestionable; yet drawing conclusions from this assumption alone would result in a simplified judgment about the religiosity of that period: the faithful of the middle and lower classes were pious in regard to traditional forms of expression. An assessment of the religious quality itself escapes historic evaluation.

The considerable increase of charitable activities in all countries, flourishing in individual parishes, in diocesan societies and (especially in

---

[6] A. Mayer-Pfannholz, op. cit., 129.

[7] In der Monstranz/Ist Christus ganz/Nicht Brot-Substanz/Ave Jesu/Wahres Man-hu.

[8] R. Egenter, Kirsch und Christenleben (Etal^2 1958; biblio.). It is possible to follow the ethical assessment and to see the function of kitsch, an apparent satisfaction of the senses, as a religious variable without considering the problem of the relation between the shortcomings or elimination of the muses and the quality of religious life to be solved. Nonetheless, the existence of this problem, naturally, reveals something about the situation of the religious experience in the society of the late nineteenth century.

[9] Cf. chap. 19.

France, Italy, and Germany) in national organizations, can be measured by the number of institutions and participants.[10] Lorenz Werthmann (1858–1921) received encouragement from France and the organizational forms of the Protestant "Home Mission" when, in 1897, he founded the Deutscher Caritas-Verband and propagated its goals in the publication Caritas (since 1896). He had to defend himself against the often-heard reproach that Christian charity had to take place without fanfare,[11] and he had to fend off the envy of the episcopate, which did not recognize the organization until the conference of Fulda (1915) and Freising (1916). This placed it under episcopal supervision and suggested the formation of diocesan branch organizations. The organizational amalgamation of the many charitable institutions did not only aim at the concentration of the various enterprises, but proceeded from the assumption that in the age of industrialism the initiative to help your fellow men was by no means dispensable. However, in the interests of maximal effectiveness, a theoretical investigation of the economic conditions was unavoidable. The Dictionnaire d'économie was a model for Werthmann, the first president of the association, whose headquarters he moved to Freiburg in Breisgau, where his bishop had released him for charitable tasks.

How vital it is not to interpret the organizational features of piety as mere externalizations is documented by the emergence of the Eucharistic congress movement. E. Marie Tamisier (born in 1834 in Tours) was one of those restless religious personalities who could not easily be pressed into institutional molds. After having had first a gentle and then a rather rigorous pastor, she was finally fortunate to meet Gaston de Ségur, who assigned to her Eucharistic youthful piety the proper area of activity. Ségur designed a plan of operations entitled "France at the feet of the Most Holy Sacrament," in which he listed the locations of Eucharistic miracles. But we should not forget that he is also the author of Jésu vivant en nous, which was condemned because of pantheism and quietism.[12] Upon the industrialist Philibert Vrau's suggestion, a central pilgrimage to Douai was decided on at Lille in 1874. The site of miracles, Avignon became in 1876 the stage for the first Eucharistic mass demonstration (the study conference in connection with this seems to go back to Mermillod, whom Marie Tamisier had encountered earlier in Rome). During an event in Favernay, Besançon in 1878, the first beginnings of the movement's internationalization emerged. Due to the unfavorable political circumstances in France, E. M. Tamisier traveled to see Cardinal Dechamps, who was indeed benevolent, but had misgivings about the Belgian government's reaction and therefore recommended the Netherlands. The archbishop of Utrecht was equally amicable, but advised a talk with Bishop Snikers because Amsterdam had been mentioned as the place for the congress. His hesitant attitude was like a cold shower for the Eucharistic enthusiasm of Tamisier. Finally, on 17 January 1881 in Paris, at the deathbed of Ségur (the Jesuit Verbeker, a Belgian enthusiast for the cause, had come for the occasion), it was decided to organize the congress in France after all, that is in Lille. On several occasions, Leo XIII had given his blessing, but not until 16 May 1881, scarcely one month after the date was announced internationally, did he give his approval.[13] Ségur, who in the face of these difficulties had intended to cancel the congress, did not live to experience it. Three hundred sixty-three clergy and representatives of the laity came, yet the French were in the great majority, in spite of participants from Belgium, Holland, Austria, Switzerland, and Italy. The opening address was entitled "The Social Kingdom of Jesus Christ." The concluding procession was accompanied by about four thousand of the faithful from Lille. Upon Cardinal Dechamps's invitation, Avignon was followed by Liège in 1883, where E. M. Tamisier had had a patron in Bishop Doutreloux for a long time. The congress in Fribourg in 1885 was presided over by Mermillod, who had meanwhile become president of the congress movement. This event for the first time included the entire public. The movement's center of gravity remained for the time being in France (in 1888 in Paris) and in Belgium (in 1898 in Brussels with Cardinal Goossens). National congresses took place in Italy (1891: Naples, 1896: Orvieto, under Cardinal Parocchi, 1897: Venice, under the chairmanship of Patriarch Sarto). The first event to be attended by a papal legate was the congress of Jerusalem in May 1893 under the leadership of Cardinal Langénieux. This congress was characterized by the efforts of the Pope regarding the Near Eastern Churches (fifty Latin bishops in contrast to eighteen Uniate Eastern bishops).[14] At the regional Congress of Washington, Protestants were admitted for the first time. The international congresses in London (1908) and in Amsterdam (1924) resulted in vehement anti-Catholic reactions.[15] [10] Regarding the centennial of the Société de S. Vincent de Paul: Livre du Centenaire, 2 vols. (Paris 1935); Manuel de la Société . . . (Paris 1958).—Cf. biblio., chap. 16.

---

[11] L. Werthmann, op. cit., 7. The founding of the Caritas Verband contributed greatly to the needed variety of general charitable activities.

[12] Illustrative purposes were served by places such as Bourges, where a Eucharistic miracle had proven the Albigensians wrong in 1224; Paris, where one of the countless demonstrations of anti-Semitism (1290) took place; Pozilla (Perpignan), where the atrocities of the Revolution were remembered.

---

[13] P. Vrau, the superior general of the Assumptionists Picard, and the Vicomte de Damas had traveled to Rome for that reason. In addition to these men, the following became important for the movement: Msgr. de la Bouillerie, M. de Benque, and Comte de Nicolay. They were indicative of the "atmosphere of the Vieille France, where the enterprise had found its first disciples" (R. Aubert, op. cit., 62).

[14] Cf. chaps. 25–27.

These boisterous events were in curious contrast[16] to the old and now rejuvenated idea of Perpetual Adoration. But in this form of piety, which happens in complete quietude, the idea of religious reparation was coupled with something like a silent protest. In Rome, in 1883, the "Society of Reparation of the Catholic Nations" was founded, which allotted to individual countries certain weekdays for worship in order to unite the whole world in support of the "imprisoned" Pope. The principal fraternity of daily "Perpetual Adoration," founded in 1890 in the Franciscan church of Turin, was extended in 1893 to all of Italy and in 1909 to include the Catholic world. More congregations and fraternities in the same vein emerged. Among them were the Sisters of Perpetual Adoration, which had branched off in 1893 from the Steyler Missionsschwestern. They observed enclosure and spread especially in the United States. Other societies, generally devoted to the worship of the Eucharist, such as the Sacerdotes Sanctissimi Sacramenti (S.S.S.), which had been founded in 1856 in Paris and held its communal prayer before the exposed Sacrament, radiated beyond their places of origin during this time. In Rome, in 1902, the "Society of the Acolytes of the Holy Sacrament" was organized for children from five to fifteen years of age. The Eucharistic encyclical of 28 May 1902, Mirae caritatis[17] places the institution of the Last Supper at the end of Christ's life in curious analogy to the impending end of the author's life. The encyclical points to the papal approval in regard to Eucharistic institutions and confines itself in other respects essentially to general practices. A few paragraphs, however, point into the future: Mass, though somewhat set off, is placed in line with the other traditional forms of Eucharistic worship, but it is also indicated that it had been the Church's wish all along "that at every Mass the attending faithful should go to the table of the Lord."[18] Three years earlier, in his encyclical Annum Sacrum of 25 May 1899,[19] Leo XIII had ordered the consecration of all mankind to the Sacred Heart (after elevating it in 1889 to the liturgical rank of a feast day). This encyclical hardly suggests the mystical love between the Lord and his own because the nonbaptized are "still sitting as the unfortunate ones in the shadow of death," so that only the power of the sovereign and the law can be applied to them. In this respect, the Pope adhered, with Thomas Aquinas, to the medieval conception of the pagan world. Also characteristic is his mention of the cross as the Constantinian sign of victory, replacing it with the "Most Sacred Heart, transcended by the cross surrounded by the splendid halo of a fiery wreath."[20] In 1891 the church of Sacré Cœur on Montmartre in Paris was completed. The restraint with which Pius IX had reacted to the desire for a wordly dedication had been abandoned, and Leo XII, in the conclusion of his letter, supplemented the new motives with a "purely personal, yet noteworthy and valid reason," namely that God had just recently delivered him from a serious illness. The number of Sacred Heart societies founded or confirmed under this pontificate does not fall short of those of Pius IX's era: five societies of priests, twenty-four women's communities, and two brotherhoods.[21] Societies that had an impact on both Americas were favored. The Jesuits were especially involved in the propagation of this form of piety. In 1872, they had consecrated all provinces of their society to the Sacred Heart.[22] Unquestionably, the demonstrative and seigneurial character of this worship under Leo XIII's pontificate intensified; but no one can determine in which way it was the source of true piety for each individual.

---

[15] Regarding the congress movement after Pius X, see R. Aubert, op. cit., 63–66; here: 419f.

[16] The itinerary of the Benediktinerinnen von der ewigen Anbetung (1909) includes the French motto: "In isolation, the Eucharistic Savior shall speak, heart to heart, with the one who prays" (quot. in Anton L. Mayer, op. cit., 26).

[17] ASS, 34, 641–54; German in Rohrbasser, 106–25.

[18] Rohrbasser, 109, 119, 121.—Cf. chap. 27.

[19] ASS, 31, 646–51; Rohrbasser, 77–84. Concerning the spirit of the time, see L. Chasle, L. Sattler, M. Droste zu Vischering (Freiburg 1906), 362–67.

Leo XIII had devoted nine encyclicals and seven apostolic letters to the rosary. Their individual tones were rather different. A great portion of the letters deals with the spiritual guidelines for this prayer and only occasionally contains polemic passages. The encyclical Octobri mense of 22 September 1891,[23] introducing the daily rosary for the month of October, recalls the "murders and outbursts of hatred" of the Albigensians, who could only be conquered through the power of the rosary; similar incidents are called to mind as well (such as the victory of Lepanto). The Albigensian impii were none other than the Freemasons. An interesting token of social criticism is contained in the Laetitiae sanctae of 8 September 1893: previously, "the undisturbed security of life was considered the reward for one's toils; today, the masses are only interested in filling this life with a maximum of pleasures, laboring under the illusion that the government system could be perfected to the extent that everything unpleasant would be eliminated."[24] While the October encyclical limited an extreme Mariology through a fere,[25] this period, as did others before and after, witnessed extremes regarding Marian worship (e.g., when the rosary became an independent cult).[26] The entreaty Regina sacratissimi Rosarii, introduced in 1883 to the Litany of the Blessed Virgin, referred directly to Mary herself. In 1891, Leo XIII approved the Festival of the Appearance of the Virgin for the Church Province of Auch (Pius X did the same for the Church at large in 1907); in addition to the church situated above the grotto (dedicated in 1876), the Church of the Rosary was built between 1883 and 1901 just 20 meters below. Particular attention was given to the Marian Congregation, which had grown a great deal after the rejuvenation of the Society of Jesus. In addition to the Eucharistic congresses, there were now also Marian congresses, such as in Livorno in 1895, in Turin in 1898, in Lyon in 1898, and in Fribourg in 1902 with international attendance. At the same time, along with the consecration to the Virgin of individual nations, the movement beginning with Pius IX to dedicate the whole world to the Heart of the Virgin grew stronger, intensifying at the congresses between 1908 and 1914. Throughout the nineteenth century, many ecclesiastical societies were founded and dedicated to the Virgin. One of the more outstanding ones, because of its practical work, was the Societas Mariae, founded in 1871 by Chaminade. Its statutes were approved in 1891 and it did a great service for the educational system in the United States: the Marianistes de Sainte-Croix (founded in 1841), taking care of the girls' schools in North America (1883, an independent branch in Canada); the Missionaires de Notre-Dame de La Salette (founded in 1852), expanding beyond the diocese of Grenoble; the Sons of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (founded in Spain in 1849 by A. M. Claret y Clará [canonized in 1950]),[27] who gradually spread all over the world, devoting themselves to domestic and foreign missions. There is no question that the increasing Marian devotion entailed abuses far into the twentieth century, particularly sentimentalizing prayers and hymns;[28] but even though the longing for motherly warmth expressed therein could tempt one to withdraw into insular illusion,[29] this form of piety has to be understood in its historical context.

---

[20] Rohrbasser, 80, 81, 82, 83f.

[21] Cf. K. Hofmann, *LThK*² V, 294–99.

[22] In all areas of the Church, countless small papers appeared with Sacred Heart titles or signets (in 1894: B. E. Bougaud, Histoire de la Bienheureuse Marguérite Marie et les origines de la dévotion du Cœur de Jésus).

[23] ASS, 24, 193–203; Rohrbasser, 669f. (excerpt).

---

[24] ASS, 26, 193–99; Rohrbasser, 678–85 (excerpt).

[25] ". . . ut, quo modo ad summum Patrem, nisi per Filium, nemo potest accedere, ita fere, nisi per Matrem, accedere nemo possit ad Christum" (ASS 24, 196).

[26] In the Annuaire de la Très Sainte Vierge . . . (1887): "O mon Rosaire chéri, o ma couronne des roses, je vous offrirai tous les jours . . ." (quot. by Anton L. Mayer, op. cit., 52); one needs to consider that this is recited in connection with the Marian interpretation of each day of the year.—Officially banned from the Church were the sisterhood founded in 1888 in Plock (Poland) by Felicja Kozłowska and the Mariavites, a society of priests founded in 1893 by Vicar J. Kowalski, after they were refused recognition by Rome in 1904.

[27] Biography by C. Fernández, 2 vols. (Madrid 1946).

The fact that the figure of Saint Joseph played a role in the education of workers, especially in France, was the reason for French postulates under Leo XIII to enter his name in the Confiteor, Suscipe, etc.[30] This circumstance was also mentioned in the encyclical Quamquam plures of 15 August 1889, where Saint Joseph, after 1870 the patron of the whole Church, was labeled the model of a good husband and father and a consolation to "the proletariat, the workers, and all people in modest circumstances." The Pope emphasized that they had the right "to strive for an improvement of their situation with all legitimate means," but they had no right "to overturn the order ordained by divine providence."[31] As popular as the devotion to Saint Joseph (one of the most frequent patron names) was in all levels of society, this manual laborer of a patriarchal period of history could not be made a model to be realized in an industrial society; neither could the image of the "Holy Family,"[32] as numerous as the foundings of religious societies named "Holy Family" may have been at that time.[33]

The Catholic enlightenment did not just reduce the multiplicity of forms of piety, it often eliminated them entirely. The reaction to this in the Catholic restoration created even more institutions to practice the numerous new forms of worship whose style was often an expression of the contemporary popular taste, but which differed markedly from the Baroque because they were isolated from the culture as a whole. It is equally significant that while in the wake of the French Revolution class differences between the hierarchy and the people had been eliminated, the clericalism of the nineteenth century established new barriers. This is demonstrated clearly in the focal point of Catholic piety, the Mass. The prologue of H. Bone's Cantate (Mainz 1847) says that the "quietly praying congregation" derived "benefit" from being able to participate, from being permitted to "repeat the words."[34] The political implications were expressed by the fact that the liturgical indications of enlightenment are called "communion of the divine service" and furthermore by the statement that the "Catholic temple" would maintain its eminence even if the congregation would never gather there, "because it is not the congregation that is the inspirational principle of the Catholic temple, but rather the indwelling of the All Holy and the sacrifice of the priest."[35] The polemical mentality, which was implicit in the expiatory sacrifice, is documented by the fact that Leo XIII added the prayer of St. Michael to the Marian prayer, which Pius IX had introduced as the conclusion of the Mass.[36] Part of the Catholic restoration were Prosper Guéranger's[37] efforts in Solesmes to restore the liturgical text, to eliminate Gallicisms and to return to the Roman liturgy—efforts which had very fertile effects in later years. They aimed primarily toward a renovation of monastic life, similar to the efforts of the Benedictines, inspired by Solesmes,[38] in their new monastery at Beuron. The distance between the officiating priest and the people, which had a history of a thousand years, was confirmed by the prohibition against translating the text of the Mass. This was renewed once again in 1857 by Pius IX, but violations were not seriously prosecuted any longer.[39] The prohibition was quietly dropped when Leo XIII did not mention it again in the revision of the Index of Forbidden Books in 1897. But the translation of the canon of Holy Scriptures and even more so that of the consecration text was postponed until the twentieth century. By then, however, translations appeared whose subsequent significance could hardly be anticipated at that time. In 1878, the missel des fidèles by Gérard van Caloen was published in Maredsous, where, among others, the Beuron monk Anselm Schott resided during the time of the Kulturkampf. His Meßbuch der heiligen Kirche, published in 1884, had already sold one hundred thousand copies by 1906.[40] It took a long time, however, until the "Mass devotions" in the prayer books were supplemented by liturgical texts. Diocesan prayer books multiplied in Germany during the nineteenth century, but they were only very slowly introduced to the public because of the Holy See's regulations. They contained a wide variety of Mass devotions for special occasions, which were often far removed from the liturgical process itself, even in regard to their psychological interpretation.[41] A German specialty was the "sung Mass," which had been compiled during the period of Enlightenment and now had a very subjective flavor, especially the songs for Communion. Even though Leo XIII pointed out that Communion was a part of the sacrifice of the Mass,[42] "spiritual communion" continued to be recommended. The separation of special prayers of preparation and thanksgiving at the Communion remained the custom until far into the twentieth century.[43] In view of the hectic economic, social, and spiritual developments, one was, as in all areas of ecclesiastical life, intent on devotional writings, which were often carried so far that a differentiation between essential and incidental issues was said to be a "deeply devastating illusion."[44] But in retrospect, even progressive ideas can be discovered. For example, in the case of ritual books, it was recommended that Hosts be offered which were consecrated during Mass itself, because "in this manner, the essence of the Eucharist as consecrated bread and wine and the community of the worshippers . . . is so much more prominent."[45] But such rare pastoral thought remained, for the time being, the privilege of the theologians who were in fact the real pioneers, especially in regard to the significant scholarship in liturgical history.[46]

---

[28] The collection of songs devoted to the Virgin Mary by D. Delama (1898) also contains: "O bella mia speranza, Dolce amor mio, Maria, / Tu sei la vita mia / La pace mia sei Tu." But unless one has joined Italians in the singing of this almost classic sentimental song, he does not know anything about the vitality contained therein, amalgamated as it may be.

[29] A. Mayer-Pfannenholz, op. cit., 128, points to this element in connection with the relationship to the Church.

[30] Jungmann, MS I, 221.

[31] Acta Leonis IX, 175–82; Rohrbasser, 1110–16 (excerpt).

[32] Brief Neminem fugit of 14 June 1892 (ASS 25, 8–10), Rohrbasser, 1103ff. (excerpt). In Graves de communi (Acta Leonis XXI, 18), the Holy Family is an example of poverty leading to virtue.

[33] K. Hofmann, LThK^{2} V, 94f.

---

[34] Introduction, VII; cf. Trapp, 278.

[35] Jungmann, op. cit., 206.

[36] ". . . worried by the devilish spoof created by Leo Taxil": T. Klauser, op. cit., 58.

[37] Jungmann, op. cit., 210.

[38] Cf. chap. 17.

[39] Jungmann, op. cit., 214.

[40] D. Zähringer, 75 Jahre Schott (Freiburg i. Br. 1959).

Even though the statistics of canonizations do not constitute a "century of saints" like the seventeenth century, the very few outstanding spiritual personalities constituted, together with the great number of anonymous devotees, a historical "balance," without which a period cannot be understood. Charles de Foucauld (1858–1916) was one of them, no matter whether the impending beatification process will be finalized or not. After his conversion in 1886, the officer lived at first as a Trappist in France and Syria (1890–96), then, until 1900, as a hermit in Nazareth. In 1901, he was ordained priest.[47] His idea of realizing Jesus' message entirely through the example of his own life without any physical protection in the midst of a Moslem world (which remained closed to all missions from the beginning to the present day) can be seen as a prophecy of the conditions of Christian life in the future, despite—or because of—the fact that Foucauld died in absolute solitude (he was shot by Tuaregs).

---

[41] J. Hacker, op. cit., 132ff.; Anton L. Mayer, op. cit., 61. In the "Mass in honor of the sufferings and death of Jesus Christ," the prayer in intervals reminds one of the olive grove, the kiss at the altar, the kiss of Judas, etc. Similar features in Livre de piété de la jeune fille (1885).

[42] Concerning the debates before Pius X, see chap. 27.

[43] Well-known examples are also: C. Fievet, Formulaire de prières pour les enfants de Marie (1904); J. Millner, The Key of Heaven (1891); cf. J. Hacker, op. cit., 68, Anton L. Mayer, op. cit., 63ff.

[44] F. Hettinger, Aphorismen über Predigt und Prediger (Freiburg i. B. 1888), 276. According to Hettinger, the liturgy, like the Biblia pauperum, includes all the secrets of faith and the whole of Christian ethics. In his work about the liturgy and the Latin language (1856) he had said that the liturgy carried "the mark of constancy . . . like faith itself" (16) and any kind of variation should be rejected (36) (cf. Trapp, 277; Jungmann, op. cit., 210).

[45] A. Gaßner, Pastoral . . . (Salzburg 1881), 997.—Concerning Pius X, see 426.

[46] Anton L. Mayer, op. cit., 75ff.—V. Thalhofer, Liturgik, 2 vols. (Freiburg i. Br. 1883–93), I, 246, welcomes "the most recent custom" of letting the people at least sing the responsory. He saw in the liturgy a "constant order" (Trapp, 277) and not the genetic element; however, this is true for most historiographic theologians who limited change to the adiaphora (cf. chap. 22).

In contrast, Thérèse Martin, the saint of Lisieux (1873–97), was completely a witness of her own time, in spite of her effect on the twentieth century. This statement, to be sure, requires that her recent reassessment as an existentialist be regarded sceptically. It is probably no exaggeration to say that Thérèse of Lisieux[48] embodied the entire structure of piety as it had developed since the second third of the nineteenth century. This piety was propagated by the milieu Catholicism which was to be ridiculed later, at a time devoid of understanding. It was expressed in the tasteless pictures of her time, embedded in the clan spirit and subsequent exuberant sentimentality of a devout French family. The extraordinary feature of this saint was her conventionality, which caused her to take the "narrow path" of mystical love for God, like Teresa of Avila, who remained a stranger to Thérèse and her friends. Though remaining in the Carmelite tradition, Thérèse activated it, however, when she recognized that the clergy, revered "like gods," required intercession. But in spite of her submersion in the New Testament, she did not depart from the contemporary image of Jesus. The revision of her literary remains[49] by the Carmelite order and the significance of the critical edition has been overestimated as well as underestimated. However, and this is crucial, there is no difference between Thérèse Martin's influence, which was quickly felt all over the Catholic world, and her own religious existence.[50]

---

[47] Ed.: Oeuvres spirituelles (Paris 1958); M. Carrouges, Ch. de Foucauld (Fribourg^2 1958); J.-F. Six, Itinéraire spirituel de Ch. de Foucauld (Paris 1958, biblio.); R. Aubert, DHGE 17, 1394–1402.

[48] Thérèse Martin was the fifth surviving daughter of a French middle class family that conducted a successful lace business in Normandy (Alençon) thanks to the mother's energy. Her father was a watchmaker and jeweler. The atmosphere in the home was determined by strict piety and scorn of the modern "world"—even though the family participated in its economy. All the daughters joined the Carmelites of Lisieux (Normandy, where the father had moved to settle in his house in the country after the mother's early death). The last of them to join (after Thérèse's death), Léonie, was a difficult child and probably not quite understood by Thérèse. When her mother died, Thérèse was barely four years old and was raised by her sister Pauline (later Mére Agnès), who later, against the will of the spiritual director and the bishop, instigated Thésèse's admission to the convent when she was fifteen. Pauline herself had been a member since 1882. During the years until 1886, which were the most painful years of her life, according to her own testimony, she was torn away from her childhood amidst a happy family. She suffered periodically from a severe mental illness, including tremendous scruples and unusual, frightening visions. The crisis resulted in the awareness "que j'étais née pour la gloire," and she felt destined to be "a great [stricken in the precritical edition] saint," but not in the eyes of man. At a pilgrimage to Rome in 1887, she asked Leo XIII to grant her an audience. She did this according to the plan of her prioress, Marie de Gonzague, and her sister Pauline-Agnés, but in disobedience to the episcopal representative. However, the Pope sent her in a friendly, but correct manner to the proper Church authorities (more in chap. 6 of the Histoire d'une Âme; I. F. Görres [n. 56], 198–208). On 9 April 1888, Thésèse received the bishop's permission to enter the Carmelite order. In 1893, under Prioress Agnès, it had twenty members, four of them Martin sisters. They formed a special group within the spiritually average community. Even when disregarding the sisters' criticism of Marie de Gonzague, who was again elected prioress in 1896, as several times before, it is clear that the aristocratic nun was not equal to her task, which, indeed, was particularly difficult in this group (I. F. Görres, 258–88, practices more restraint than most biographers). "Most of all, today I had nothing but bitter dryness for the daily bread of my soul" (chap. 8 of Histoire d'une Âme): This word [dryness], which is not literary but original (Juan de la Cruz, whom she used to read later, left her "cold"), is the motto of her monastic life. Moreover, her four sisters, though dear to her, were one of her main problems. The "dryness" increased until God was totally absent, even at the hour of her death (she died of tuberculosis, twenty-four years old). Her last words, spoken while looking at her small cross, are preserved: "O, I love Him. My God, I love you."

---

[49] Ed.: Her literary legacy, published in 1898 under the title Histoire d'une Âme, contains her memoirs, which she recorded between January 1895 and January 1896 at the instigation of her real sister Agnès, at that time prioress. It also includes the letter to her sister (in both senses of the word) Marie written in September 1896, writings instigated by Prioress Marie Gonzague in June 1897, letter fragments, notes of conversations, and poems added by Agnès. The critical facsimile edition, edited by the Carmelite François de Sainte-Marie in 1956, demonstrates that a lot of essential material had been changed stylistically or eliminated. Moreover, the edition of 1898 contains considerable additions. The correspondence edition by A. Combes (Lisieux 1948) was followed by editions of notes, poetry, and prayers (cf. A. Combes, LThK^{2} X, 102ff.).—For decades, the edition of 1898 determined the image of Thérèse; but it is, in her own words, a "synthesis of the best expressive elements from different photographs" (François de Sainte-Marie, Visage de Thérèse de Lisieux. Portrait [Lisieux 1961]).—Biblio.: After her canonization in 1925: A.-P. Laveille, Sainte Thérèse . . . d'après les documents officiels du Carmel de Lisieux (ibid., 1926).—After the beginning of the critical eds.: A. Combes, Introduction à la spiritualité de Ste. Thérèse (Paris 1948, Trier 1951 [German]); H. Urs v. Balthasar, Thérèse de Lisieux (Cologne 1950); G. Bernoville, Ste. Thérèse . . . (Paris 1954); I. F. Görres, Das Senfkorn von Lisieux (Freiburg i. Br. 1958), revised edition of Das verborgene Antlitz (Freiburg i. Br. 1944); St. J. Piat, Ste. Thérèse à la découverte de la voie d'enfance (Paris 1964); J. F. Sise, La véritable enfance de Th. de Lisieux (Paris 1972); Th. de Lisieux au Carmel (Lisieux 1973); R. Laurentin, Th. de Lisieux. Mythes et réalités (Paris 1972).

[50] The Histoire . . . of 1898 sold 700,000 copies in France within three decades. A popular edition sold 2.5 million copies. By 1925, the book had been translated into thirty-five languages.—From 1897 until her canonization, 30.5 million pictures of the saint were sold and 17.5 million sent off as souvenirs (A.-P. Laveille, op. cit., 455).

CHAPTER 17

The Organization in the Old and New Orders Inner Reform and the Power of Attraction

Even though Pius IX had repeatedly interfered in the reorganization of the Franciscan order (O.F.M.), it was not possible to bring about the necessary revision of the statutes in view of the more or less anachronistic discussions within the order. At the general chapter of 1862, one proposal received a great majority, but appeared in 1882 only as a draft.[1] A memorandum presented at this chapter, according to which the Observants, Reformed, Discalced, and Recollects were to unite under the name "Franciscans," was rejected as inopportune. Only at the general chapter in 1889, which took place in the new Collegium S. Antonii in Rome, were uniform constitutions passed. They were not, however, accepted by the Reformed, who were allowed to keep their special statutes and who consequently began a lively propaganda campaign against the union despite the prevalent opinion among the Reformed that the monastic discipline of the Observants was no less strict than theirs. But even now, the new constitutions were only practiced in the numerous provinces in different versions. Leo XIII made Cardinal Mauri, a Dominican, president of the General Chapter of Assisi in 1895, and he announced that the union of the different branches of the orders was to be the main topic of the Chapter. The draft contained the demand that the statutes be applicable to all, that they determine the customs in the territorial divisions of the provinces, and that the order not have, as heretofore, only one general, but also one procurator. At the voting, which took place separately in each of the four orders, the Observants voted almost unanimously in favor of the bill, the Reformed and the Discalced voted against it. After the interpretation of the order's poverty was accepted by the Recollects, a general secret vote turned out in favor of the union by 77 to 31 votes, a result which changed considerably after subsequent "yes" votes (8 no, 100 yes). Leo XIII ratified the resolutions on 15 May 1897, and he issued the constitution Felicitate quadam. Friars who were conscientious objectors were delegated to special houses. The Spanish provinces, however, insisted on their privileges, recognizing the constitutions, but continuing to refuse submission to the order's general. In the eighties, the order counted only 14,000 friars; by 1907 there were 17,092 (8,152 were priests) in 1,460 houses. Pius IX's plan to unite the Conventuals and the Capuchins failed. The Conventuals still had 1,481 members in 1893 (in 1884, they succeeded in uniting with the Spaniards). In 1907 the nuns of the Order of Saint Clare (Poor Clares), which was mostly destroyed after the French Revolution, numbered 10,204 sisters in 518 cloisters. The Third Order developed remarkably after 1883, when Leo XIII had modernized the rules, reducing, on the one hand, the regulations for prayer exercises and fasting, on the other hand, requiring monthly confessions (previously only three per year). It is estimated that around the turn of the century 2.5 million belonged to the order, which tried to differ from the activities of other orders primarily by intensifying religious life.[2] [1] H. Holzapfel, op. cit., 371–79.

---

"The day we become centralized will be the day when a reform will be impossible. The lively spontaneity will be eliminated and replaced by bureaucracy, which may be very well, but it imitates life and is not life itself;" this idea, attributed to Prosper Guéranger, the founder of the Abbey of Solesmes (1837),[3] is more than a social theory of the constitution of the Benedictine order. It is the expression of a spirituality of contemplation, which is impossible without spontaneity. Conversely, the spirituality of activism requires organizational concentration. Significantly, the following sentence belongs in the context of this statement: "What is strength for the Jesuits, is a danger for us." In 1862, Prior Maurus (Rudolf) Wolter was in Solesmes for three months, where he was deeply moved by the spirit of Guéranger. Wolter had just negotiated with the royal court of the Prince von Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen to transfer the secularized Augustinian Beuron monastery to his as yet very small community of monks.[4] After the catastrophes of the Revolution and the secularizations, and for internal reasons also, the Benedictine order had difficulties recovering. This is evidenced by the efforts both in France, where Solesmes certainly inspired new foundations, and especially in Bavaria, where Ludwig I encountered little response to his desire to revive the Benedictine order (1830: reopening of Metten Abbey, beginning of the Bavarian congregation, which flourished in the course of the nineteenth century).[5] Here, it was a question of revitalizing old monasteries; Solesmes and Beuron in form and concept were new foundations. The theoretical and practical inclination to the liturgy as the focal point of spirituality[6] was at first an internal monastic affair; but finally, this renascence was to penetrate the public life of the Church. In view of the small number of order members,[7] the tendency to found more and more filial monasteries and to achieve the status of a congregation is striking. In the newly reopened Metten Abbey, Fr. Bonifaz Wimmer strove to expand to the United States, where the bishop of Pittsburgh gave him the community of Saint Vincent in Latrobe (1846). But the bishop vehemently resisted its elevation to an abbey, particularly since the Irishman did not wish the pastoral work of the Germans to become even more independent.[8] Fr. Wimmer succeeded in Rome with the assistance of the Bavarian delegation, and the monastery became the pioneer foundation of the American Cassinese Congregation. While the Propaganda Fide had reservations about Metten's activity, the Swiss monks from Einsiedeln were welcomed in Indiana, where, from the Abbey of Saint Meinrad (1871), they devoted themselves to the mission of the Sioux Indians. In 1884, this abbey joined, within the Swiss-American Congregation, the Swiss branch of the Engelberg monastery in Missouri, which had likewise been elevated to an abbey. One of the motives for these Swiss activities had been the concern that the radical Liberals could abolish the monasteries in their homeland. The eagerness of the young Beuron Abbey[9] to found more branches was given ample opportunity in Maredsous in 1878, where (in the same year) Placidus Wolter became the first abbot. The abbey owed this opportunity to the initiative of the Desclée family. The monastery, in which a flourishing abbey school was established in 1881, had a gifted journalist in the monk van Caloen, who, in 1884, founded the periodical Messager des fidèles (since 1890: Revue bénédictine). In Anselm Schott of Beuron they had a mediator of the liturgy for the lay world and later the reorganizer of the Brazilian Benedictines. At the suggestion of Bishop Ullathorne, O.S.B. (Birmingham),[10] Maredsous initially branched out into Erdington, which became an abbey in 1896 but disappeared in 1922. Another branch, founded by Bishop Ullathorne, the Priory of Fort Augustus (Scotland), which was established in 1878 from Downside, was elevated in 1882 by Leo XIII to an abbey and placed under direct jurisdiction of Rome. After a visitation by Placidus Wolter and Leo Linse, prior of Erdington, undertaken by order of Rome, the latter was appointed adviser of Prior Kentiger-Milne, who ad nutum Sanctae sedis had to resign for Linse's benefit in 1887 (Linse became abbot in 1888). The closing of Beuron in 1875 during the Kulturkampf[11] turned Maurus Wolter's attention toward Austria. After an unsuccessful attempt in the Tyrol, through Cardinal Schwarzenberg's mediation, Wolter was given the almost empty Emaus monastery in Prague by Emperor Franz Joseph. Emaus, in turn, sent monks to the former canonry of Seckau (Styria; 1887 abbey). After Placidus Wolter had taken two trips to Rome (1882–83) and had brought about the approval of the constitutions of the Beuron congregation, Maurus Wolter became archabbot of Beuron (1885).[12] Like Fr. Wimmer of Metten, Fr. A. Amrhein turned to the Propaganda Fide (1882),[13] where he was exclaustrated by the Pope in 1884. The mission monastery of Reichenbach (Upper Palatinate), under episcopal jurisdiction, was transferred in 1887 to Saint Ottilien (near the Ammersee) and elevated to independent priory (1902 abbey) by the Propaganda Fide after some controversy (1897).[14] Thanks to the transferral of the apostolic prefecture, which, upon Bismarck's suggestion, was established in Zanzibar (German East Africa), it became the starting point of the Kongregation von Sankt Ottilien, which developed world-wide missionary activities.[15] The first archabbot of Saint Ottilien, which became the largest abbey of the order, was Norbert Weber (1902–1930). The plan, favored by Bishop Korum, to settle the former Abbey of Saint Matthias in Trier in 1888–91 with monks from Beuron failed, because the diocesan clergy did not want to relinquish a parish.

---

[2] H. Holzapfel, op. cit., 671.—In 1909, this historian of the order assumed "that in more than one respect the author's opinions were not shared by the order's leadership" (foreword, VII). This should prove to be correct, but with certain consequences; the criticism of the order's legalism had caused dismay (cf. K.-V. Selge in the review of K. Eßer and E. Grau, "Franziskanisches Leben [Werl 1968]," ZKG 82 [1971], 133f.).

[3] In P. Delatte, Dom Guéranger, 2 vols. (Paris 1909), II, 344.—Regarding the expansion of Solesmes until the turn of the century, see Schmitz IV, 165; P. Weißenberger, Das Benediktinische Mönchtum im 19. u. 20. Jh. (Beuron 1953).

[4] Maurus (Rudolf) Wolter (1825–90), after 1850 priest and high school teacher in the Rhineland, followed his brother Placidus (Ernst) as a novice into the Benedictine monastery of S. Paolo fuori le mura in Rome (1856). There, the brothers made the acquaintance of the widowed Princess Katharina von Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen (née Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst). An admirer of the Benectine monks, she had negotiated with Pius IX a new monastery in Germany and, with her stepson, a settlement in Beuron after an attempt in Cleve had failed (U. Engelmann, *LThK*² X, 1220f., including biblio., also about the connection with Guntherianism).

---

[5] Schmitz IV, 171ff.

[6] Cf. chaps. 16 and 18.

[7] Heimbucher I, 173, reports for 1896 the "approximate sum" of 2,000 patres in approx. 120 monasteries, organized into 14 congregations. Statistics of 1929 in S. Hilpisch, op. cit., 390–95; id., for 1958; more than 12,000 friars in more than 200 monasteries (LThK[2] II, 192).

[8] S. Hilpisch, op. cit., 274ff.; the bishop is said to have "undermined" his elevation (cf. chap. 10). Saint Vincent became an archabbey in 1892.

[9] V. Fiala, Ein Jahrhundert Beuroner Geschichte. 1863–1963 (Beuron 1963).

The historian of the Dominican order rightly remarked that Leo XIII involved himself in the affairs of the Franciscans (1892) and the Benedictines (1893) much "deeper" than in those of his own order.[16] The papal plan in regard to the Benedictines had been prepared for some time after the congregations had negotiated in vain. In 1886, a congress of the abbots of the Monte Cassino congregation took place in Rome. After separating from the congregation of Subiaco (1871) in order to realize a stricter observance under Abbott Casaretto,[17] this congregation had gone through a process of rejuvenation. The main issue was the renewal of the College of Saint Anselmo as a Benedictine world center. It opened in 1888 temporarily in the Palazzo dei Convertendi under the leadership of Archbishop J. Dusmet, O.S.B. (born in Palermo), to whom Leo XIII had explained his ideas of a totally Benedictine college in 1887 (Dusmet was elevated to cardinal in 1889). The next step was the ordination of Hildebrand de Hemptinne[18] in Monte Cassino as abbot of Maredsous, after Placidus Wolter had become archabbot of Beuron and thus successor to his brother, who had died in 1890. A brief of 9 December 1892 called all Benedictine abbots of the world to convene for the occasion of laying the foundation stone of Saint Anselmo on the Aventine in Rome in April of the following year. During a trip in 1887 by order of the Pope for the purpose of preparing the congress, O'Gorman, prefect of the English Benedictine congregation, encountered considerable resistance from the Benedictine abbots. In spite of that, Leo XIII decided to act. In a speech on 20 April 1893, Cardinal Dusmet interpreted the intentions of the Pope, stating that the Societas quaedam should not abolish the individual characteristics of the congregations.[19] The abbots were to make a decision on the following points: the election of an abbot primate to represent the entire order in Rome (after consultation with the abbots; election of a repraesentans [rather than a primate] with a two-thirds majority [however, in accordance with Leo XIII's wish the first primate was appointed by the Pope]); the abbot primate to reside in the College of Saint Anselmo, which does not belong to any congregation and represents its own community, composed of various congregations (consultation with the abbots: the confederation should not imply dependence on a certain congregation); the primate's term of office to be twelve years (the term of the abbot prefect heading a congregation: six years). On 12 July, the "confederation" was confirmed by the papal brief Summum semper. The confederation meant a deep invasion of the old structure of the Benedictine monastic life and certainly did not correspond to Prosper Guéranger's ideal. Whether this ideal could generally be realized and whatever the confederation really meant, is equally debated. Even Pius XII had to deal with the constitution of the confederation.[20] [10] Schmitz IV, 168f.; cf. chap. 7.

---

[11] Concerning the development of Beuron, see Schmitz IV, 174f. and V. Fiala (see n. 9).

[12] Concerning art in Beuron, cf. chap. 19.

[13] Abbot Maurus Wolter permitted Fr. Amrhein to join a missionary society, but in such a manner that the Beuron congregation could "profit from your apostolic activities" (P. Weissenberger, op. cit., 36).

[14] In 1896, Abbot J. Schober of Seckau visited Saint Ottilien by order of the archabbot and "as the representative of the archabbot of Beuron" (Weissenberger, op. cit., 55). In November, Schober became the superior general and inspector in Saint Ottilien by order of the Pope "to overcome internal difficulties" (Weissenberger, op. cit., 56).

[15] F. Renner, ed., Der fünfarmige Leuchter, 2 vols. (Sankt Ottilien 1971).

---

[16] A. Walz, Frühwirt, 166.

[17] Regarding the internal tensions because of the new constitutions, see Schmitz IV, 184.

[18] Hildebrand de Hemptinne (1849, Geneva; 1913, Beuron) was sixteen years old when he became a Zuave (member of the papal body guard created in 1860), and in 1870 he became a novice in Beuron (H. de Moreau, H. de Hemptinne [Paris 1930; Germ., 1938]; Schmitz IV, 168–246f.

[19] "Advertendum interea existimo verba Summi Pontificis . . . ita accipienda esse et intelligenda, uti si ex foederatis familiis Societas quaedam formetur et stet, quae uniuscuiusque familiae specialem ac nationalem characterem ac propria statuta revereatur et servet"; S. Hilpisch, op. cit., 386ff.; S. Mayer, Die benediktinische Konföderation (Beuron 1957); Schmitz IV, 244–47, also regarding the discussion about a confederation within the order in 1868–69.

After the Beuron congregation had sent at first only a few monks to the desolate Brazilian abbeys, van Caloen made two inspection tours in 1894/95, reporting about them to the Beuron general convention in Maredsous. Olinda, where van Caloen became abbot,[21] was the point of departure for the rejuvenation of the Brazilian congregation, whose headquarters was the abbey of Saint Benedict in Rio de Janeiro. The Portuguese monasteries of Cucujaes and Singeverga, which were integrated into the Beuron congregation and visited in 1894 by the abbot of Seckau, became victims of the political development. The archabbey of Beuron, which was chosen by the abbot primate in 1896 as the place for a convention of the abbots, initiated the establishment of Maria Laach, whose church Emperor Wilhelm II gave to the Beuron monks in 1892 after an audience with Placidus Wolter (1893 papal erection of the abbey, W. Benzler first abbot).[22]

Shortly before his death in 1872, the master general of the Dominicans, V. A. Jandel, witnessed the reincorporation of the Spanish provinces which had been separated in 1804. After the interim of the vicariate general under J. M. Sanvito, the provincial of the Roman province, Jandel was succeeded by J. M. Larroca (elected by mail), who had been the vicar general in Manila and contributed to the restoration of the order's unity in Spain. In spite of Jandel's efforts, the membership of the order had diminished under his office, even by 1910 it had barely reached the status of 1844.[23] The general chapter of 1885 in Louvain decided to purchase a new residence for the general in Rome in the Via San Sebastiano. Shortly before his death, Larroca became "somehow"[24] entangled in the controversy regarding papal politics toward the Italian state, having made some positive statements about Bonomelli's (bishop of Cremona)[25] translation of the Homiliae by Monsabré, who had been the preacher of Notre Dame until 1890. As with the Franciscans and Benedictines, Leo XIII had also directed his attention to the rearrangement of the Dominicans, and in a letter of 31 May 1889 he impressed upon them the observance of the vita communis. After Larroca's death on 8 January 1891, the Pope wanted to appoint a vicar general. However, J. A. Laboré, the provincial of Lyon, presented himself. The general chapter, whose residence determines the office of the vicariate general, was convening in Lyon.[26] At the general chapter, the greatest majority of votes went to Andreas Frühwirth, who had just been made provincial of the Austrian imperial province for the second time; the intransigent Laboré was nominated as the second candidate. The Styrian Andreas Frühwirth (1845–1933) had joined the order in 1863, had studied in Graz and Rome, and became provincial of the imperial province for the first time in 1880–84. Until 1904 he was to the Dominicans an equally energetic and diplomatically adroit general, who prevented the order from showing any signs of weakness, and who was eager, primarily, to make himself indispensable for Neo-Thomism. With amazing energy he visited province after province[27] and regularly conducted general chapters (1895 in Avila, 1898 in Vienna, 1901 in Ghent, 1904 in Viterbo).[28] Frühwirth devoted himself with special passion to the establishment of colleges.[29] In a letter of 4 October 1893, [20] Concerning centralization, see Hostie, 239f.

---

[21] Chap. 8, n. 36; also: M. E. Scherrer, "Ein großer Benediktiner, Abt Michael Kruse von São Paulo, 1864–1929," SM 17, suppl. (1963); id., "Beuron und die Restauration der Abteien in Brasilien," V. Fiala, Beuron 1863–1963 (Beuron 1963); J. Jongmans, "A Restauração da Congregação beneditina brasileira. Papel de Gerad van Caloen," Revista eclesiast, brasileira 32 (1972), 640–54.

[22] Wilhelm II demonstrated his benevolence with his visits in 1897 and 1901. Beuron entertained him in 1910. S. Merkle, 66 (biblio., introduction), remarked in 1914 during a presentation in honor of Wilhelm II that the Benedictines "were the least involved in the quarrels of this world."

---

[23] 1844: 4,562 members; 1876: 3,341; 1910: 4,472 (A. Walz, Compendium, paragraph 20).

[24] A. Walz, Frühwirth, 166; according to Walz, Larroca destroyed all documents related to this context.

[25] Chap. 5.

[26] A. Walz, Frühwirth, 166: "It was unfortunate that the Pope was initially informed incorrectly about the general vicariate of the order after Larroca's death. It seemed as if the Pope was to appont him." When Laboré appeared in Rome, the Pope is supposed to have said: "Why does one not simply follow the constitutions?"

[27] On 23 April 1895, the German order province was restored (Albert Trapp: first father superior).

[28] A. Walz, Frühwirth, 167, noted that the voters of the general were careful not "to dissatisfy the great patron of the order, Leo XIII." Pius X must have been more to Frühwirth's liking, according to the Dominican writer Walz, who knew him personally. Pius showed the general "sympathy in the handling of individual problems, while Leo XIII was balancing on the high wire of general benevolence . . . . More could be achieved with Pius X in one year than with Leo XIII in one decade" (272).

[29] List in A. Walz, Frühwirth, 241–43.

Leo XIII made the Dominican order solely responsible for the edition of Thomas Aquinas.[30] After three years, in 1882, the commission of cardinals appointed for this edition had published the first volume, and by 1892 seven volumes (Cardinal Giuseppe Pecci, the Pope's brother, headed the commission of the cardinals for the edition). In April 1903 the Pope received volume XI from the Dominicans.

During the generalship of Frühwirth there occurred the initial controversies regarding the Dominican M.-J. Lagrange. His first attempts to develop a "critical method" for interpreting the Pentateuch produced often crude suspicions after the Congress of Fribourg in 1897. Frühwirth, who had given Lagrange the title of "Master of Theology" in 1901, provided his research with some protection in his capacity as general of the order (until 1903).[31] However, Pius X assigned the leadership of the new Biblical Institute not to the Dominicans, but to the Jesuits.[32] In terms of spirituality, the order went along with the consecration to the Sacred Heart and the pledge to recite the rosary as was the general trend of the time.

After the death of the general of the Jesuits, P.-J. Beckx (1795–1887), during whose long term in office (since 1853) the number of members had increased remarkably (in spite of the prohibitions),[33] the Swiss A. M. Anderledy, assistant for German-speaking provinces, took office. His predecessor had generally practiced moderation, but under Anderledy, who, as head of the German province, had emphatically supported the Syllabus (1864), those indiscriminate polemics against everything modern broke through, polemics which clouded the apostolic goals of the Society of Jesus. It is significant for the new general that he neglected the Fathers and the religious authors in his writings and that he preferred to rely on papal letters addressed to the society and on selected quotations from general congregations and generals.[34] His successor, the Spaniard Luis Martín (general 1892–1906), deserves credit for the history of the order, and he assigned the edition of the Monumenta Historica Societatis Jesu to the Spanish provinces. After his election he was greeted warmly by Leo XIII.[35] The Society of Jesus still preferred to think of philosophy as ancilla theologiae rather than theology itself, which theme the Jesuits concentrated on in terms of the question of grace and an ecclesiology oriented toward the papacy. During Leo XIII's pontificate, however, the tendency of the Gregoriana toward postive theology, and against speculative theology, was corrected, and as a result the Pope's brother, Giuseppe Pecci, left the Jesuits (he was reinstated shortly before his death). The general congregation of 1883 decided to choose the encyclical on Aquinas, Aeterni Patris, as its guideline, and in 1886 Leo XIII confirmed the privileges of the society. The traditional emphasis on moral theology proved fruitful in dealing with the problems of modern society, with Jesuit authors providing important contributions.[36] To the influential publications of the order were added the Przeglad Powszechny (in Cracow since 1884), Razón y Fé (Madrid since 1901), America (New York since 1909). Wherever Jesuits were allowed to be active in schools, especially in the United States, lively discussions were held about curricula, primarily the relationship of humanism to the exact sciences. These debates essentially ended in 1906 with an adaptation to the secular schools.[37]

---

[30] A. Walz, Compendium, 527, 616f.; cf. chap. 20.

[31] Cf. chap. 23.

[32] A. Walz, Frühwirth, 216f.; "the courageous Dominican pioneer of a reasonable and progressive exegesis . . . should expect new trials." Regarding the further development of the Bible Institute and the nunciature of Frühwirth in Munich (1907–15), cf. chaps. 33 and 35.

[33] 1838: 3,067; 1850: 1,874; 1874: 9,260; 1900: 15,073; 1914: 16,894 (1950: 30,579).

[34] "He stressed more the "old intrinsic values" of the order . . . rather than demanding to look for the positive aspects in our modern time" (H. Becher, *LThK*² I, 507); id., Jesuti en, 370.

[35] Schmidlin, PG II, 567.

It is a remarkable phenomenon that the Jesuits continued to have relatively large numbers of new recruits in spite of the prohibitions. In Portugal (which refused admission of Jesuits in 1814, accepted them in 1829, and retracted admission again in 1834), the Jesuits had only a short period of activity from 1880 until 1908. In France, schools had to be closed in 1880, because the order could not accept the school laws. In Italy, where the general of the order had been expelled from the professed house al Gesù, and had to settle in Fiesole (1895, Curia transferred back to Rome), the Jesuits were prohibited or at least inhibited from living together. New members were scarce, in contrast to Austria, Germany, and Switzerland, where the order obtained many new members for its activities in foreign countries, particularly in the United States.[38] A majority resolution of the German Reichstag (168 to 145) for reinstatement was voted down in the Bundesrat. However, the Redemptorists, who had turned to Latin America after their suppression in Europe, were not considered an illegal organization any longer. Rather unencumbered, the Jesuits were able to develop in Austria-Hungary after 1820. There they had high schools, and also the college Stella matutina (since 1856) in Feldkirch and the theological faculty of the University of Innsbruck,[39] centers of learning that influenced Germany also. In the province of England, which was combined with Ireland, Maryland, New York, and Missouri through a vice-province, conflicts arose concerning pastoral work, which were intensified when the College of Chelsea was established through direct papal authority over the heads of the episcopate; consequently the Jesuits did not have Cardinal Manning as a friend. After his death, the celebration of the hundredth anniversary of the College of Stonyhurst in 1894 served as a kind of conciliatory event. Conflicts between the German-speaking Jesuits in the United States were emotionalized by the question of nationalities.

---

[36] Cf. chaps. 21, 12, and 13.

[37] Cf. chaps. 10 and 12.

[38] With 1,167 members around the turn of the century, the German province was the strongest among the twenty-three provinces; Heimbucher (1897) II, 135.

[39] The anti-Jesuit activities of the Liberals in Vienna during the seventies failed, last but not least, because of the opposition of the Tyrolese provincial diet.

Since the Cistercians of the Strict Observance and the Reform congregations could not come to an agreement, the Reformed Cistercians (Trappists) separated in 1892, a separation which Leo XIII confirmed in his brief of 17 March 1893 and the decree of 1902, including the privileges of the old order. In 1898 they were able to obtain the original monastery of Cîteaux. The Cistercians of the old observance still possessed at the end of the nineteenth century thirty-two monasteries, most of them in Austria-Hungary (Mehrerau on Lake Constance was the only Swiss-German congregation). Papal unification tactics, successful with the Franciscans, would have been out of the question in this case.[40]

Another reform attempt at this time failed and ended in the isolation of the initiator. Mère Marie du Sacré-Cœur (died in 1901) had intended to improve the training of the Filles de Notre-Dame according to the model of Bruges, but she had encountered the resistance of the bishop of Clermont. Even though she had gained the support of Monsignor d'Hulst in 1895 and finally the partial assistance of the French episcopate, she was sent back to her old convent, which, however, did not accept her.[41]

The extraordinary activity regarding the new establishment of congregations had peaked by the middle of the century. Most congregations were unable to extend their local impact. The Christian Brothers, one of the older congregations, achieved significant success and could be found all over the world toward the end of the century. The Redemptorists experienced a similar upswing. By 1900 they had 132 foundations, 30 of them in Italy, and after 1894 they were also admitted in Germany. The Salesians of Don Bosco, who counted 774 members in 57 foundations in 1888 at the death of their founder, expanded also outside of [40] A. Wulf, Compendium of the History of the Cistercian Order (Milwaukee 1944); C. Grolleau and G. Chastel, L'ordre de Cîteau. La Trappe (Paris ^{2}1954).

---

[41] Dansette (biblio., chap. 16), 26f. Msgr. Sueur, the bishop of Avignon, had allowed her book Les religieuses enseignantes to be printed. The chief opponent was the archbishop of Aix. It was a question of adopting the curriculum of the écoles normales in order to prepare the students properly for their teaching duties.

Italy, and by 1900 they had gained about 2,000 members in 300 houses (since 1903 also in Austria). They intensified their activities, begun in 1875, in the foreign mission.[42] The Pallotines (finally confirmed in 1904) experienced a more rapid development only after World War I. In terms of members, the Sisters of Charity (Vincentians) were leading all female congregations. They suffered civil restrictions relatively rarely and in general only for short periods of time, because everyone was dependent on their hospital care. At the end of the century, they counted approximately thirty thousand sisters in 2,500 houses. The Sisters of the Sacred Heart, founded in Paris, began in 1879 the beatification process of their founder Sophie Barat.

It was a character trait of the activities of the Dominican general Andreas Frühwirth that he paid special attention to the financial situation of the provinces of his order and the office of the general. Economic foundations had always played a significant role in the history of the orders and the congregations, but it was only natural that the conditions of the industrial age had an impact in this area as well. A good example was the founding by the Assumptionists of their publishing house Bonne Presse.[43] The political circumstances in Europe (less so in the Near East) were rather unfavorable for the congregation. However, two other enterprises were able to develop unencumbered by political factors, even though they were not confirmed by the Church until the beginning of the twentieth century: the Societas Divini Salvatoris (S.D.S., Salvatorians) and the Societas Verbi Divini (S.V.D., Society of the Divine Word). Even through the hagiographical style of the biographies of the societies' founders one can sense that genuine religious engagement was combined with the virtues of an industrial manager.

The founder of the Salvatorians, Johann Baptist Jordan,[44] was an ornamental painter, who had privately obtained a high school education and in 1878, as a priest, received through his pastor a stipend in Rome. The Alemannian, born on the Rhine River near Baden (1848–1918), got an audience with Leo XIII in 1880 (arranged by Cardinal Bilio). He extensively expounded the papal blessing of the founding of his Apostolische Lehrgesellschaft in Rome. He secured his position through recommendations by Cardinals Hergenröther and Parocchi. With the help of his publication Der Missionär, which he managed and which was approved by the bishop of Linz but directed from Rome, he wanted to establish an "association" whose program was to show no clear contours, but which was to have a diverse membership.[45] His main problem was to find trained priests, and he therefore wanted to educate young people speedily, using his own career as an example. In spite of considerable difficulties, including financial ones,[46] he was able to establish one foundation after another after obtaining a mission in Assam: 1890 in Tivoli, 1892 in Vienna, then in North and South America, 1898 in Meran, then in Rumania, Belgium, and Brazil (1902), for the most part developed from modest beginnings. It was with reservations that he finally decided to convene a general chapter in 1902, and the chapter's criticism, presented in 1906, of the extremely self-willed general superior is rather understandable.[47] Under Jordan's successor, his biographer P. Pfeiffer (died 1945), began the great expansion of this society.

---

[42] A. Schmitt, LThK^{2} IX, 263f.

[43] J. Monval, Les Assomptionistes (Paris 1939); concerning their role in France, see chap. 6; in the Middle East: chap. 25.

[44] P. Pfeiffer, J.-B- Jordan und seine Gründung (Rome 1930; the author is the second superior general of the congregation); E. Federici, G.-B. Jordan (Rome 1948); concerning the early stages, see B. Lüthen, Die Gesellschaft des Göttlichen Heilandes (1911).

Arnold Janssen (1837–1909), founder of the Society of the Divine Word,[48] was the son of a transport business owner on the Lower Rhine River. In 1861 he became a priest and a high school teacher and began his activity by also founding a publication called Kleiner Herz-Jesu-Bote (1874). After a fund-raising trip through Germany and Austria in 1875, Janssen purchased a piece of property with an old inn in Steyl, a town in the Netherlands near the border. Together with a carpentry apprentice, a Franciscan brother, and his real brother (a Capuchin from Münster), he founded a society here. His plan encountered great scepticism among the clergy and bishops, and with his autocratic style he caused most of his fellow members to leave in 1876.[49] The same year, Janssen found a capable economist, the future superior general Nikolaus Blum, and so he began the construction of Steyl, even though he had only one tenth of the construction funds at his disposal. Within a few years he had accumulated three hundred thousand marks worth of debts. When the construction of Saint Michael's with its double church was completed in 1886, his debts were repaid. To the publication of the Herz-Jesu-Bote he added the magazine Die heilige Stadt Gottes and a calendar, printed in his own press, for which the lay brothers provided cheap labor. In 1888, he founded Saint Raphael's in Rome, 1889 Saint Gabriel's in Vienna, 1892 Heiligkreuz near Neisse,[50] 1898 Saint Wendel's in the Rhineland, 1904 Saint Rupert's near Bischofshofen. Janssen acted according to the principle that it is not a question of the availability of funds, but of the necessity of the building.[51] Regarding the general chapter, Janssen followed J.-B. Jordan's attitude: he procrastinated as long as possible (1884 the first chapter with four priests, 1885 with twelve priests, the only ones eligible to vote). The constitutions were designed in a centralistic fashion (instead of provinces only "regions"), approved (with reservations) in 1901, and after some dispute regarding the general chapter's competence, they were confirmed in 1905 (not finalized until 1910).[52]

---

[45] Three categories were planned: (1) full members (priests and laymen); (2) permanent, academically educated "staff"; (3) the readers of the journal, which was to appeal to all classes from the clergy to the maid (P. Pfeiffer, op. cit., 71f.).

[46] In 1882, the Curia forced him to change the name of his society and erase the word "apostolic"; in 1886, he had difficulties because the words "approved by the Church" were not set off clearly enough; in 1892, a Carmelite came to inspect him, "a heavy cross to bear" for Jordan (P. Pfeiffer, op. cit., 260), but probably also for the inspector.

[47] P. Pfeiffer, op. cit., 336–339; the priest B. Lüthen of Westphalia was a loyal assistant.

[48] H. Fischer, S.V.D., Arnold Janssen, der Gründer des Steyler Missionswerkes (Steyl 1919).

[49] Vaughan's assessment was very negative. Later, he became an English cardinal who founded the Mill Hill mission and visited Janssen; his evaluation: he was insufficiently educated in theology and not practical. Indeed, Janssen's interests in theology were probably rather limited, which was the reason for his break with Dr. v. Essen, towards whom Archbishop Melchers had wanted to direct Janssen's activities (H. Fischer, op. cit., 382: Janssen did not think much of "educated professors"). He was not an "impractical" organizer, but rather a quite daring manager. However, his leadership style was somewhat unpleasant (e.g., a conflict over who should officiate at what time), yet, he was supported by the bishop of Roermond, who called the opponents "social democrats" (H. Fischer, op. cit., 155). H. Fischer, op. cit., 436, quotes a characteristic statement made by Janssen in 1900: "As far as the brothers are concerned, they shouldn't read but the Sunday paper, this is certainly sufficient." Regarding the support Janssen received from the German Catholic convention, see Kißling II, 126–30.

Because the congregations for women were, aside from education, primarily active in charity and hospital care, they were, as a rule, less touched by state laws. Because of that, and thanks to their active religious willingness to make sacrifices, they were able to develop under the pontificate of Leo XIII. The Sisters of Mercy of Saint Charles Borromeo had founded, via their original congregation in Nancy, new congregations in Germany, Austria, and the Netherlands, which developed considerable activities (the Saint Hedwig hospital, founded in 1846 in Berlin, took care of 5,500 patients in 1895). Aside from the largest female society, the Sisters of Charity (Vincentians), smaller societies like the Niederbronn Sisters (1880 the general mother house in Oberbronn/Alsace) and the Ingenbohl Sisters (1894 confirmed by the Pope) also had an excellent reputation across religious borders.[53]

---

[50] Heiligkreuz became the subject of political favoritism. Bismarck preferred the Steyl missionaries to the Jesuits. Heiligkreuz was involved in the question of the protectorate of South Shantung, where Anzer from Steyl was missionary bishop. The Prussian government did not want Steyl to become a papal congregation. This conflicted with Janssen's plans, but was acceptable to Prince-Bishop Kopp. The Silesian Janssen did not like the new settlement any more than the Salzburg authorities liked theirs; financial problems were feared.

[51] H. Fischer, op. cit., 188f.

[52] Regarding the missionary activities of this and other congregations, cf. P. III.

[53] W. Hohn, Die Barmherzigen Schwestern vom hl. K. Borromäus (Trier 1900); id., 300 Jahre Barmherzige Schwestern vom hl. Vinzenz von Paul (Munich 1933); H. C. Wendlandt,

Looking at the history of the older religious societies and the new foundations during the pontificate of Leo XIII as a whole, one cannot ignore the desire for an internal rejuvenation of the Church (not least in the foreign mission) and for a social impact upon education, hospital care, and social action. There was also the amazing attraction of the religious life for a considerable part of the youth in the Catholic Church in spite of the political tactics of suppression, the general attitude of the time, the continuously increasing resignation and scepticism, and the way of thinking which resulted from the growing role of technology in life. But the religious societies found in Catholicism, which had meanwhile reached self-awareness, a resonance of resistance to the secularization of life and a religiously motivated willingness to devotion which bore witness to the vitality of the Catholic Church. This vitality is particularly obvious in the societies with "simple vows," which by now found full recognition. To gather these impulses, to eliminate or prevent sterile divisions, and to make use of these societies for the ideals of his pointificate were the goals of Leo XIII's ecclesiastical legislation, whose most significant feature was the concentration of orders and congregations in Rome. It is historically understandable that such efforts were most difficult in regard to the oldest order of the West, the Benedictines. Its decentralized structure had corresponded to the specific liberties of a feudal society. The principle of centralization was the principle of a growing highly industrial society—and it was also the principle of Leo XIII and his successors in the sense of an economy of spiritual powers. Most religious societies were induced to transfer their headquarters to Rome. In 1908 Pius X established the Sacra congregatio negotiis religiosorum sodalium praeposita as the highest authority for orders of the Latin Church, to whom the religious of both sexes were subordinated.

Die weiblichen Orden und Kongregationen der kath. Kirche und ihre Wirksamkeit in Preußen. 1816–1918 (Paderborn 1924); A. Sinningen, Kath. Frauengenossenschaften Deutschlands (Düsseldorf ^{2}1944, biblio.).

CHAPTER 18

The Dispute over Church Music

Since church music is directly connected with the liturgical action, the question of how musical forms of expression of the zeitgeist can be incorporated in the Church service is much more crucial than in regard to the fine arts.[1] Indeed, the religious subjectivity of the sacred music of a Franz Schubert does correspond to the subjectivity of general piety;[2] however, it is certain that as the representative musical creations of Classicism and Romanticism emerged from the modern spirit born in the Revolution, frequently Christianity was simply the occasion for their creation. In France, the interest in the Gregorian chant of the Benedictines at Solesmes was primarily an esoteric and historical matter, and the Schola cantorum, which had just been introduced in all Romance countries according to the model of the Lateran Church (1868), lived in harmony with the well-known plain-chant, a popularization of the chorale. Even Charles Gounod's Cecilia Mass (1882) or the romantic harmony of César Franck, (died in 1890) did not give offense. However, in German Catholicism, a movement developed which wanted to restore the "pure" sacred music, believing that a musical reform, which was unquestionably necessary, could only be achieved by turning away from modern developments. The German example found an echo in many other forms of Catholicism (the Netherlands, Belgium, Ireland, North America), but not in Austria, where attempts were made to apply contemporary forms to the ecclesiastical spirit. Pierluigi da Palestrina (died 1594 in Rome) was for the revival of church music in the nineteenth century what Thomas Aquinas had been for philosophy and theology.[3] Composition and declamation of the "Palestrina style" were renewed in the first half of the nineteenth century. Regensburg, the episcopal see of Michael Sailer, was the leading center, a city from which spread the tradition which Karl Proske (died 1861) started with his editions from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. That musicians who composed in the "Palestrina style" (such as M. Haller [died 1915 in Regensburg], who was called the Palestrina of the twentieth century) were unable to produce important works is due to the process of superficial imitation. It is more important that, through the efforts of the highest church authorities, the a capella music of vocal polyphony was canonized, which was equally a historic misunderstanding of the great master Palestrina and a disregarding of artistic originality.

At first, there was criticism of the church music which was composed of elements of the symphony and the opera.[4] Now, by separating the musica sacra from the musica profana, the church was separated from the world. In regard to instrumental music, as it was then composed by the church music directors, and which continued to be played, though not as often, the Belgian Edgar Tinel (died 1912[5]) stands out, because he refused to follow this separation. Of course, he was not played very often. During the Catholic Convention in Bamberg in 1868, the priest F. X. Witt (1834–88) founded the Allgemeinen Cäcilienverband für die Länder der deutschen Sprache, which Pius IX confirmed in 1870 as an organization under papal law with a cardinal protector. The brief contains the society's statutes as presented. Its first and foremost obligation is: "Gregorian chant (cantus planus) is to be cultivated intensively everywhere. Polyphonic arrangements for several voices (cantus figuralis) of older or newer compositions are to be furthered, as long as they comply with church regulations." Palestrina was not mentioned in this document, but he was the idol of the Cecilian movement.[6] The society was thus authorized to determine in its catalog what sacred music was.[7] The struggle over true Catholic church music was considered one of the most important ones in the battle with the zeitgeist.[8] Deviations were condemned with extreme intolerance and with reference to the Church.[9] Even the German Catholic church hymn, which treasure had been rediscovered by the Romanticists, partly fell under the influence of Cecilianism,[10] and especially the convents of women added popular, sentimental songs. F. X. Witt, who, in spite of his aggressiveness, was one of the more forward-looking minds in the movement, did not want to see instrumental music excluded and hoped for "a Palestrina of modern orchestral music." He probably had Franz Liszt in mind,[11] who respected him. The great value and impact of Cecilianism consists of the fact that it recognized the problematic relation of Classical and Romantic music to the liturgical ceremony. Its attempts to solve the problem, which should be seen in the historical and ecclesiastical perspective of that time, were inadequate. This is nowhere more obvious than in the fact that Anton Bruckner (1824–96), who as a Romanticist created his sacred music with liturgical objectivity,[12] was not accepted by the movement.

---

[1] Cf. chap. 19.

[2] Cf. chap. 16.

[3] Fellerer, Geschichte, 148, 150; *LThK*² VIII, 3.

[4] F. Krieg, op. cit., 129.

---

[5] K. Weinmann, op. cit., 249–54; following J. S. Bach, Tinel placed "active devotion and piety in his work," in opposition to formalism, which guided the church music organizations (Fellerer, Geschichte, 148).

[6] In regard to the brief Multum ad movendos animos of 16 December 1870, see H. Hucke, op. cit., 164ff.—It is characteristic for F. X. Witt to write: ". . . the better works in the 'Witt style' embrace the chorale more so than many works in the Palestrina style, at least in regard to the main point, i.e., the elucidation of the sacred melody and the text" (quoted ibid., 172). Fellerer, Grundlagen, 34, is justified in placing him in the historical situation, but that does not make reading H. Hucke superfluous.

[7] The neo-Cecilian K. Weinmann (op. cit., 189–204) considers the judgment regarding "liturgical usefulness" justified; he was critical, however, of the fact that it was also evaluated from an artistic point of view. O. Ursprung (op. cit., 280) feels that the development was hindered by the society's expert advisers in charge of the catalog because now either "a style reduced to Gebrauchsmusik" or the historic fixation on Palestrina, who was, after all, very contemporary even in the sixteenth century, became the accepted standard. Fellerer, (MGG II, 623f.) calls the catalog the "official recognition of the infinite number of sacred compositions which are devoid of any artistic significance and often not even technically well executed . . . ." Krieg, who endeavors to honor from a historical perspective F. X. Witt's "cleansing fiery spirit" (op. cit., 137), speaks of the "devotional harmony" (op. cit., 134) of the society's catalog.—F. X. Haberl, the father of the Regensburg chorale edition, originally intended to compile an index of music forbidden in church (H. Hucke, op. cit., 171). Everyone is in agreement about the society's catalog (cf. Fellerer, Geschichte, 155).

[8] F. J. Selbst, Der katholische Kirchengesang (Regensburg 1880), 133: "What terror, what mockery of our progressive century! The Cecilian movement is a return to the dark Middle Ages . . . ."

[9] P. Krutschek, Die Kirchenmusik nach dem Willen der Kirche. Eine Instruktion (Regensburg 1891): Not everyone has to be a member of the Cecilian society, but everyone has to follow its guidelines, "otherwise he would be resisting the Church itself" (240f.).

Supported by papal authority,[13] Cecilianism spread in the last third of the nineteenth century through most countries, after the Gregorian Society had been founded in the Netherlands in 1868. Its impact was particularly strong in Ireland. In the country of Giuseppe Verdi (1813–1901), where the influence of the national opera was especially problematic, the Regolamento per la Musica sacra in Italia of 1884 ruled: Except for the organ, only trombones, flutes, and drums and "similar instruments popular with the Israelite people" were permitted. They concentrated on cultivating the chorale, which was supported by ecclesiastical decrees. Cecilianism also exerted a certain influence.

Those who charged him with fanaticism were told: "You see, I call the devil devil and Christ my God and Master."

[10] W. Bäumker, Das katholische deutsche Kirchenlied in seinen Singweisen, 4 vols. (Freiburg i. Br. 1886–1911).—The statutes of the Cecilian society, which were contained in the papal brief, discuss the toleration of the hymn in devotion; the German practice of using songs during Mass is ignored (H. Hucke, op. cit., 168f.).

[11] Ursprung, 280.—Franz Liszt (1811–86), who had been ordained in Rome in 1865, attempted in his sacred music a blending of Gregorian elements, vocal polyphony, and modern orchestration (Fellerer, Geschichte, 146).

[12] F. Krieg, op. cit., 146f.: "Bruckner's personal emancipation (as a Romantic) serves this community (the Church) better than the orthographical imitation of old styles." Fellerer, Geschichte, 147: "Through Bruckner, the symphonic art has taken church music to new heights, comparable to Palestrina in the sixteenth century, when polyphony reached a climax in ecclesiastical expression."—Naturally, the difficulties of performance play a big role.

[13] F. X. Witt reached the limit of his purism when he wrote a letter to Leo XIII, accusing the prefect of the Congregation of Rites, Cardinal Bartolini, of having called Haydn, Mozart, and Cherubini "select and sincere" in a letter to the founder of the Associazione di S. Cecilia. Bartolini took revenge when he was appointed cardinal protector of the Cecilian society (H. Hucke, op. cit. 173f.).

Almost two decades after Palestrina's death, the Stamperia Medicaea in Rome, a printing office founded by Cardinal Fernando Medici and G. B. Raimundi, published an edition of the Roman gradual in which Gregorian melodies had been adapted to contemporary principles.[14] This little-known publication was adopted in Mechelen in 1848, but it did not have any historical significance for the Church until after 1871, when the publishing house of Pustet in Regensburg prepared reprints. The inspiring and driving force was the priest F. X. Haberl (1840–1910) who, after sojourns in Rome, became cathedral conductor in Regensburg, where he founded a church music school in 1874.[15] The Congregation of Rites offered Pustet a thirty-year imprimatur, even though the historical validity of the Medicaea was already being questioned at that time.[16] A decree of the Congregation of Rites of 14 April 1877 bestowed upon the edition a somewhat official character.

In the meantime, the Benedictine J. Pothier (1835–1923)[17] had conducted his research on chorales in Solesmes by order of his abbot, Prosper Guéranger, intending to do away with Gallicism and to restore tradition. After the publication of the principles of Solesmes, a congress was organized in Arezzo in 1882, to which the Congregation of Rites reacted on 10 April 1883 with a reiteration of the legitimization of the Regensburg edition. This was expressly confirmed by Leo XIII with the statement that papal directives be taken as mandates. In Regensburg, Witt and particularly Haberl fought passionately for their concept, and they did not fail to refer to the Roman authority.[18] But after the termination of the imprimatur, Leo XIII seized the opportunity and found a way out of the dilemma with his brief Nos quidem of 17 May 1901, addressed to the abbot of Solesmes. The motu proprio Inter

---

[14] L. Kunz, "Medicaea," *LThK*² VII, 230. The edition appeared in 1614–15.

[15] F. X. Haberl deserves credit for editions of Palestrina and Orlando di Lasso.

[16] A memorandum to the German bishops' conference by R. Schlecht and others in 1869 (quoted in Ursprung, op. cit., 269). L. Kunz (*LThK*² VII, 230) speaks of a "Roman contract" for Pustet; Ursprung: "It may be that the Roman Chorale Commission had already decided on a revised edition of the Medicaea or that the Pustet publishing house in Regensburg had proceeded accordingly with a petition." F. Krieg (op. cit., 53): The people in Regensburg are accomplishing "a liturgical work of pioneers" with "complete trust" in the Medicaea.

[17] In 1880, Les mélodies grégoriennes d'après la tradition appeared (after 1883, the chorale edition). Regarding the battle between Regensburg and Solesmes, see P. Combe, op. cit. 209.

[18] P. Krutschek: "In view of the official announcements of Leo XIII and the Congregation of Rites, it is incomprehensible how one can still maintain that I recommend the wrong chorale, and further retorts are wasted" (op. cit., [n. 9], preface to the second ed., XXI).

pastoralis officii (1903) of Pius X introduced a new phase in the understanding of the Gregorian chorale.[19]

---

[19] P. Krieg, 139f.: F. X. Haberl "suffered this hard fate, which destroyed his life's work on the chorale, with dignity and humility."—In regard to his reaction to Leo XIII's brief of 1901, see his essay "Geschichte und Wert der offiziellen Choralbücher," Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch (1902).—For criticism in Germany regarding the Regensburg chorale edition, see R. Molitor, O.S.B., Die nachtridentinische Choral-Reform in Rom (Beuron 1902).—The breakthrough in Rome followed in 1893 through a vote by the Congregation of Rites, which was initiated by A. De Santi, S.J., and Solesmes. The Latin-German text of Pius X's motu proprio in Krieg, op. cit., appendix.—Cf. chap. 27, also in regard to De Santi.

CHAPTER 19

Church Art in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

Since the beginning of Church history, ecclesiastical art has carried the hallmark of the contemporary relation between the Church and the world and of the different forms of the notion of salvation, according to their epochal and ethnic background. In that respect, a work of art preserves in visualized form something from a past situation and can therefore serve, provided it is interpreted correctly, as a source for Church history. Art is particularly informative when it reports incidents that were not considered worthy of literary treatment or remained in the subconscious.

There is good reason that Church art should be chosen as a topic of investigation in the part of this series that deals with the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The previous, almost naive function of Christian art has become more and more the object of serious study and decrees and is thus a special section of Church history.

Architecture

After the Council of Trent, the Church developed an awareness of the specific character of its artistic activities, especially in the countries north of the Alps, which, having been effected by the Reformation, externalized its forms of expression. Stained glass and ribbed vaults continued to be considered "ecclesiastical," even though they were not customary any longer in secular architecture. In those areas in which the Reformation had left its mark, but which had been recovered by the Catholic Church, clear relapses into medieval architecture can be observed. The result is a "sacral style" with historical dimensions.[1] However, Church art in consistently Catholic countries generally runs parallel to the contemporary development of style. It also does not lose touch with aesthetics, which grows more and more independent, even though the concept of beauty is no longer a theological one as in the Middle Ages.[2] But since 1588, beginning with the activities of the Congregation of Rites, the Church in these countries felt compelled to publish papal and episcopal decrees, edicts, and recommendations on artistic activities in order to draw the line against Protestantism and the secular areas which were in the process of emancipation.[3] The demands relate essentially to preservation of or connection to the Christian tradition, to avoidance of offensive presentations or recommendation of instructive ones, and to the observance of ethnographic customs (usus), provided they do not contradict liturgical regulations. The interpretation of these regulations and recommendations leaves a great deal of latitude and allows strict traditionalism as well as the recently increasing influence of the individual artist. The artistic context in general was thus able to be preserved by the Church throughout the Baroque and Roccoco eras, and during the secular Classicism of the end of the eighteenth century, in which the Enlightenment erected or at least designed its own edifices of art for the "Supreme Being" or the gods of "nature" and "reason."[4]

Corresponding to the turn toward Greek art within the context of Classicism,[5] churches, like palaces, theaters, and museums, decorated their entrances with a Greek temple facade in the form of a portal of columns with a pediment. In Classicism this mixture threatened to obscure the borders of profane architecture and to cloud the sacred purpose.[6] But it also offers the opportunity to find from this vantage point the transition to early Christian architecture.[7]

---

[1] E. Kirschbaum, Deutsche Nachgotik. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der kirchlichen Architektur von 1550–1800 (Augsburg 1930).

[2] In regard to medieval aesthetics, see E. de Bruyne, Études d'Esthétique médiévale I–III (Bruges 1946); in regard to architectural aesthetics of modern times, see R. Wittkower, Architectural Principles in the Age of Humanism (London ^{3}1962).

[3] The papal resolutions can be found in CICfontes, ed. by P. Gasparri and J. Serédi (Rome 1923–39), and in AAS (Rome 1909ff.). A selective synopsis in C. Gurlitt, "Kirchen." Handbuch der Architektur IV, 8, 1 (Stuttgart 1906), 63ff., 176–81; R. B. Witte, Das katholische Gotteshaus (Mainz ^{2}1951), 2ff., and LThK^{2} VI, 199–205 (A. Fuchs) and 682–87 (W. Braunfels). The resolutions were often interpreted by provincial councils. For example, the papal request to adhere to tradition (CIC fontes, 1164) was interpreted to mean the use of Old Christian, Romanesque, or Gothic styles only, and the cross-shaped ground plan was especially recommended. The last papal instructions are found in the seventh and last chapter of the liturgy constitution of the Second Vatican Council of 1963 and in the subsequent directives and amendments (cf. H. Schnell, "Der neue Kirchenbau and die Konzilsberatungen," ThGl 53 [1963] and U. Rapp, O.S.B., Konzil, Kunst und Künstler. Zum VII. Kapitel der Kiturgiekonstitution [Frankfurt a. M. 1966]).

[4] E. Kaufmann, Architecture in the Age of Reason. Baroque and Post-Baroque in England, Italy and France (Cambridge, Mass. 1955); K. Lankheit, Der Tempel der Vernunft. Unveröffentlichte Zeichnungen von Étienne-Louis Boullée (Basel, Stuttgart 1968).

[5] D. Wiebenson, Sources of Greek Revival Architecture (London 1969).

While the Classicism of the Enlightenment was understandably unable to influence Church art deeply, the sympathy for the Middle Ages emerging from the Romantic countermovement succeeded in defining the sacred art of the entire nineteenth century. This enthusiasm for the Middle Ages, furthered by the corresponding belles lettres,[8] was almost from the start determined by Christianity. But the first beginnings of art are rooted in the secular realm, in the Gothic ruins of the eighteenth century erected in English gardens as symbols of vanitas to inspire meditation,[9] or in the Gothicized garden houses which served as temporary shelter for Romantic poets.[10] Wherever enthusiasm for Gothic elements in church buildings was aroused, it was devoid of insight into the sacred character of this architecture. Goethe[11] discovered in 1772 in the facade of the Strasbourg Cathedral a "Babel-thought" of the Promethean architect Erwin von Steinbach, with which the human genius may win his freedom "on the confined and dismal clerics' stage of the medii aevi." The Gothic architecture, once mocked by Vasari as maniera tedesca, is now in a positive sense celebrated as German or Germanic architecture, determined by the forces of natural growth and striving to illustrate the majestic and infinite. At first, interpretations of the Gothic church in a historically adequate and theologically symbolic sense are the exception.[12]

---

[6] Sainte-Geneviève in Paris, begun in 1764 by Soufflot and completed in 1790 and displaying the facade of a temple, changed its function without special renovations several times. In 1791, the Pantheon was constructed for the great freedom fighters (Mirabeau, Marat, Voltaire, etc.). In 1809 it became a church again, 1830: Pantheon, under Napoleon III: Basilique Nationale (1852). After Victor Hugo's death (1885) it again became the Pantheon (M. Petzet, Soufflots Saint-Geneviève und der französische Kirchenbau des 18. Jahrhunderts [Berlin 1961]).

[7] Saint-Vincent-de-Paul in Paris (1824–44), by Jakob Ignaz Hittorf, combines a Greek temple facade with a five-nave basilica and straight beams of a Constantine type.

[8] W. H. Wackenroder, Herzensergießungen eines kunstliebenden Klosterbruders (Berlin 1997); J. L. Tieck, Franz Sternbalds Wanderungen (Berlin 1798); cf. A. Addison, Romanticism and the Gothic Revival (Philadelphia 1938); K. Clark, The Gothic Revival (London ²1950).

[9] H. Vogel, Die Ruine in der Darstellung der abendländischen Kunst (Kassel 1948); A. Kamphausen, Gotik ohne Gott. Ein Beitrag zur Deutung der Neugotik und des 19. Jahrhunderts (Tübingen 1952).

[10] P. Cleman, "Strawberry Hill und Wörlitz. Von den Anfängen der Neugotik," Neue Beiträge deutscher Forschung. Wilhelm Worringer zum 60. Geburtstag, ed. by E. Fidder (Königsberg 1943), 37–60.

[11] E. Beutler, Von deutscher Baukunst. Goethes Hymnus auf Erwin von Steinbach. Seine Entstehung und Wirkung (Munich 1943).

An exemplar of the diverging motives in evaluating Gothic architecture is the story of the restoration of the Cologne Cathedral, which had been in a state of incompletion since the beginning of the sixteenth century. The motives for its completion were very different.[13] The choir, completed in 1322, is seen as an intense image of the forest, which as an element of nature bears witness to the direct manifestation of God,[14] but at the same time is also a reminder of the prehistory of man, who built himself his first hut out of branches and tree trunks, thus creating the Gothic style.[15] Moreover, the cathedral is the "most elevating symbol of eternity,"[16] whereby the term eternity is to be understood in a general philosophical, not in a specific Christian sense. Primarily, however, the cathedral is a document of German history, striving again for national unity after its decline at the end of the Middle Ages and after its wars of independence. In the proclamation inspired by Sulpiz Boisserée and written by Joseph Görres, which appeared on 26 November 1814 in the Rheinische Merkur, the Cathedral is seen as "a symbol of the new Empire that we want to build." When the foundation stone was laid in 1842, Friedrich Wilhelm IV celebrated the planned completion as the "work of brotherhood among all Germans and all creeds," and the art historian Franz Kugler saw in it "a unifying sign for all people of the German tongue to gather around."[17] In resuming medieval architecture and in view of Classicism, there is a feeling of progress from heathenism to Christianity, from things Hellenic to things German.[18] Occasionally, the national impulse dominated the [12] F. von Schlegel in his essay "Grundzüge der gotischen Baukunst" of 1804–05, Sämtliche Werke VI (Vienna 1846), 182f.

---

[13] H. Lützeler, Der Kölner Dom in der deutschen Geistesgeschichte (Bonn 1948).

[14] G. Forster in his Ansichten vom Niederrhein u.s.w. 1790 (Berlin 1791); the cathedral as a "work of nature" also in Schelling; H. Lützeler, op. cit., 17.—Concerning nature as a manifestation of God and the most worthy object of Christian art, see H. Schrade, "Die romantische Idee von der Landschaft als höchstem Gegenstande der christlichen Kunst," Neue Heidelberger Jahrbücher (1931).

[15] J. Hall, Essay on the Origin, History, and Principles of Gothic Architecture (London 1813); cf. also J. Gaus, "Die Urhütte. Über ein Modell in der Baukunst und ein Motiv in der bildenden Kunst," Wallraf-Richartz-Jahrbuch 32 (1971), 7–70; Interest in the history of mankind, rather than an aesthetical assessment is the main motive of Seroux d'Agincourt, Histoire de l'art par les monuments etc., 6 vols. (Paris 1812–23).

[16] A. Reichensperger, "Einige Worte über den Dombau von Köln," Vermischte Schriften über christliche Kunst (Leipzig 1856), 90.

[17] F. Kugler, Kleine Schriften II (Stuttgart 1854), 41. The cathedral in Speyer, restored by King Ludwig of Bavaria, is a national monument.

[18] A. Reichensperger, Die christlich-germanische Baukunst und ihr Verhältnis zur Gegenwart (Trier 1852), 56.

Christian medieval spirit to such a degree that there was talk about the victory of the Reformation, especially in view of the active participation of the Protestant Prussian government. One also bewailed as a contradiction the fact that the "slaves of Rome" were permitted to turn the edifice into a "place of Jesuit stupefaction and mendacity." Because of these and similar opinions, the Catholic population of Cologne remained demonstratively absent from the final celebration on 15 August 1880, at the time of the Kulturkampf.[19] The first railroad bridge across the Rhine River, built between 1855 and 1859 at the King's wish as a continuation of the cathedral's axis and as a symbol of the new time connecting medieval history and technological progress, was inaugurated by the equestrian statues of Friedrich Wilhelm IV (1861–1862) and Wilhelm I (1867). Through the demolition of two churches and sixty-nine houses, free space was created around the cathedral.

Even though it had been shown in 1830 that Gothic architecture did not originate in Germany but in France,[20] and though it was recognized shortly after that the Cologne Cathedral had been constructed according to the Cathedral of Amiens, Gothic architecture continued to be considered German for some time.[21]

More enduring than the national motive proved to be the perception of the Gothic as a specifically Christian sacral style suited for the construction of churches. Sulpiz Boisserée, Joseph Görres, and August Reichensperger in Germany, A. W. N. Pugin in England,[22] Viollet-le-Duc in France,[23] and many others laid the foundation for the many churches in neo-Gothic style which had to be built to meet the demands of a rapidly increasing population. The Cologne Cathedral construction office, managed after 1833 by Ernst Friedrich Zwirner (1802–1861), sent out numerous architects now familiar with Gothic construction principles, who renovated old churches and erected new ones in the Rhineland[24] and elsewhere, and who went to revive construction offices in Strasbourg, Vienna, and elsewhere, or who were appointed to teaching chairs at technical colleges. However, the orthodox neo-Gothic generated by these activities in the second half of the nineteenth century encompassed a certain variety, since the respective geographical situation was more and more taken into consideration. Consequently the French neo-Gothic churches were modeled after the cathedral Gothic of the Île-de-France, such as Saint-Clothilde in Paris, while in Germany, according to native medieval tradition, brick buildings were also customary;[25] and in the Rhineland the so-called transition style of the late Hohenstaufen period was taken into account.

---

[19] H. Lützeler, op. cit., 75.

[20] F. Kugler, Handbuch der Kunstgeschichte (Stuttgart ^{5}1872).

[21] Georg Dehio's question, whether the German architect of the choir of the Cologne Cathedral also designed the choir of Amiens, demonstrates how scholarly judgements can be obscured by the idea of national rivalries (G. Dehio and H. von Bezold, Die kirchliche Baukunst des Abendlandes II [Stuttgart 1901], 276). On the other hand, there is Émile Mâle's statement that all the better parts of the Cologne Cathedral are French, the tasteless parts German ("Studien über die deutsche Kunst," Monatshefte für Kunstwissenschaft 10 [1917], 55).

[22] Pugin (1812–52) built more than sixty neo-Gothic churches. Converted in 1834, architect Pugin also wrote theoretical works like True Principles of Pointed or Christian Architecture (London 1853) and An Apology for the Revival of Christian Architecture in England (London 1843).

[23] Viollet-le-Duc (1814–79) was commissioned to restore many important churches (Notre-Dame and Sainte-Chapelle in Paris, Vézelay, etc.). His ten-volume Dictionnaire raisonné de l'architecture française du XI^e siècle (Paris 1854–68) was indispensable for a precise knowledge of Gothic construction principles. It was followed by a similar dictionary concerning the interior design of medievel structures. Viollet-de-Duc justified the "progressive character" of the Gothic style, explaining that technically trained laymen (Hochbauingenieure), rather than monks trained as craftsmen designed the cathedrals. Therefore his suggestion to call Gothicism style laïque (Dictionnaire raisonné I, 114).

In Italy, the revival of the Gothic was sporadic. The Florentine Cathedral was adorned with a new facade in the style of the fourteenth century (1875–1887); but the Nordic Gothic of the Milan Cathedral was rejected on the grounds of Vasari's negative verdict and particularly because in the Middle Ages numerous German (in the nineteenth century also Austrian) architects were involved in the construction.[26] In 1859 a competition was announced for the modern Galleria to be built on the cathedral grounds and dedicated to King Vittorio Emmanuele II. One of the suggestions was to tear down part of the cathedral in order to obtain decent building materials.[27]

For a very long time, the Gothic style was en vogue in America. Actually, it was not used until around 1900, and only receded in church construction in the fourth decade of our century. There, as in Germany and England during the Romantic period, many Protestant artists converted for aesthetic reasons. The architect Crom, who, like Pugin in England earlier, wrote many books praising the Gothic, induced the bishop of New York in 1911 to renovate and complete the Cathedral of Saint John the Divine in the Gothic style, even though it was begun in the Romanesque style. Upon Crom's death in 1942, it was not yet completed. The Washington Cathedral did not get its Gothic central cupola until 1963.[28]

---

[24] W. Weyres and A. Mann, Handbuch zur rheinischen Baukunst des 19. Jahrhunderts, 1800–80 (Cologne 1968).

[25] For example, neo-Gothic brick churches by Conrad Wilhelm Hase of Hannover (1818–1902).

[26] C. Boito, Il Duomo di Milano e i disegni per la sua facciata (Milan 1889).

[27] P. Mezzanotte: Storia di Milano XV (Milan 1962), 398.

[28] In regard to American neo-Gothic in the twentieth century, see J. Paul, "Chartres in Amerika. Ein Beitrag zur mittelalterlichen Ikonographie der Neuzeit," Kunstgeschichtliche Studien für Kurt Bauch (Munich, Berlin 1967), 287–300.

In view of the freedom that church regulations offered by recommending that only the form handed down by Christian tradition be followed,[29] an extensive, partly polemical dispute about the choice of proper style evolved. Reichensperger and many others advocated Gothic because they considered it progressive in contrast to the old Christian and Roman architecture, and they rejected the Renaissance because it was based on heathenism.[30] Others recommended the architecture of the Italian Renaissance, since this era was not a Protestant one and had produced, moreover, outstanding saints.[31] The popular handbook of liturgy by Franz Xaver Thalhofer[32] preferred the Gothic because the German Renaissance was not of sufficient quality. This demonstrates once again how independent of each other art and worship had grown, and how the blending of the two had moved into the realm of the aesthetic and the arbitrary.[33] The question posed by Hübsch in 1837 "In which style shall we build?"[34] was still being asked in 1899.[35]

In Protestantism, the connection to Gothic style was even more definite, having nothing but Gothic examples in mind since the Eisenach Regulations of 1856 had recommended the model of a "historically evolved Christian architecture." But in the first half of the century, the Protestants also used Classical elements and toward the end of the century they built structures copying the Baroque.[36] The Eisenach Regulations of 1908 finally did away with recommendations of a certain style and simply suggested "sincere and noble simplicity in form and color."[37]

In spite of this change around the turn of the century, there is no doubt that, even after a definite rejection of historicism, the Gothic and its elements remained effective in the construction of churches in the twentieth century, not only during the time of Expressionism in Germany, as in the case of Dominikus Böhm,[38] but also in the numerous

---

[29] At the Fulda Bishops' Conference of 1923, R. B. Witte, op. cit., 6.

[30] A. Reichensperger, "Zur Kennzeichnung der Renaissance," ZChK (1890), no. 1.

[31] J. Graus, Die katholische Kirche und die Renaissance (Graz 1888).

[32] I (1883), 741ff.

[33] The title of a small book by C. Meyer is significant: Über das Verhältnis von der Kunst zum Kultus. Ein Wort an alle gebildeten Verehrer der Religion und der Kunst (Zurich 1837).

[34] Cf. G. Palm, Von welchen Prinzipien soll die Wahl des Baustyls, insbesondere des Kirchenbaustyls geleitet werden? (Hamburg 1845).

[35] O. Prill, "In welchem Stile sollen wir bauen?" ZChK (1898), 246, 267; (1899), 83, 247.

[36] The conventions of the Protestant Church on church architecture and art taking place regularly from 1896 until today are presented clearly in G. Langmaack, Evangelischer Kirchenbau im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert (Kassel 1971), 270ff.

[37] G. Langmaack, op. cit., 290f.

[38] See the large pointed arches in the church of Frielingsdorf of 1927. The designs of A. Bartning for a "star church" (1922) have elements of expressive Gothicism.

Gothic structures after 1950 which incorporated versions of ribbed vaults,[39] rose windows with tracery, and, above all, extensive stained glass.[40]

The definitions of the Christian sacral style of the nineteenth century included, aside from the Gothic and old Christian, Romanesque and, last but not least, Byzantine architecture. Classicism provided a natural transition from old Christian to modern architecture;[41] Romanesque architecture was given attention predominantly in the Rhineland with its many structures from the Hohenstaufen period;[42] Byzantine elements are occasionally found in France.[43] Since historicism was a frequent topic of contemplation in the nineteenth century and since antiquity and medieval Christianity were not always considered opposites, it occasionally happened that one artist would make proposals using both styles for one and the same church.[44] There were also attempts to harmonize the principles of several styles, as was the case in Schinkel's hotly debated but never-realized plans of 1815 for a cathedral commemorating the wars of independence. He designed "this church in the impressive style of old German architecture, whose ultimate perfection is the task of the future after the peak of its development has been interrupted for centuries by a wonderful and benevolent glance back at antiquity, whereby, it seems, the world will be enabled to instill into this art the element which it is lacking for its perfection."[45] In other words, he demanded that the Gothic, which was interrupted by the Renaissance, be improved through the insights into antiquity gained during that period; that a progressive architecture be created.

This eclectic principle had a unique kind of ethos, which became especially effective in the second half of the century. The blending of several styles in ecclesiastical architecture was seen as a simile for Christianity, embracing time and space.[46] In secular architecture, it was considered an expression of the cosmopolitan tendency of the nineteenth century with its tremendous progress in the area of technology and with its radiant expansion in all scientific and humanistic disciplines, especially history. Thus, the Giornale dell'Ingegnere architetto e agronome of 1853 demanded that all known styles be combined, since only an architettura composita as architettura cosmopolita could equal the spirit of the new times.[47]

---

[39] Indicated with tubing in the Liebfrauen Church in Cologne-Mühlheim by Rudolf Schwarz (1955).

[40] W. Weyres and O. Bartning, Kirchen, Handbuch für den Kirchenbau (Munich 1959), passim. Indications of Old Christian and Romanesque church architecture remain alive in modern times in the form of semicircular apses, naves arranged in basilical fashion, and free-standing belltowers.

[41] See Saint-Vincent-de-Paul church in Paris, mentioned in n. 7. In Munich the Bonifatius Church of 1835.

[42] A. Mann, Die Neuromantik (Cologne 1966).

[43] For instance, Sacre-Cœur in Paris, 1876–1919 (C. Gurlitt, op. cit., 167).

[44] Like Schinkel for the church of Werder in Berlin. In 1818 an English church building society offered (for churches of suburban communities) plans for one and the same spatial layout in Classical, Gothic, and Baroque styles (H. G. Evers, "Kann die historische Kirchenbaukunst des 19. Jahrhunderts als Trivialkunst verstanden werden?" Triviale Zonen in der religiösen Kunst des 19. Jahrhunderts. Studien zur Philosophie und Literatur des 19. Jahrhunderts, 15 [Frankfurt a. M. 1971], 196).

[45] P. O. Rave, "Karl Friedrich Schinkel," Berlin, part I (Berlin 1939), 196.

Church Interiors

Similar tendencies can be observed in regard to church interiors of the nineteenth century which conformed to the liberal ecclesiastical regulations. An attempt was made to match the furnishings of the church with the historical style of the architecture. But in the first half of the century, contemporary art concepts were applied, for instance in the use of large frescoes that did not exist in the Nordic medieval Gothic. In this case, the insufficient archeological knowledge of the immobile and mobile furnishings of medieval churches as well as the intention to combine elements of the north and south may have played a role.[48]

In the second half of the century, when architecture also began to copy old plans, the interior design appeared more and more orthodox, thanks to the old book collections and drawings published in the meantime.[49] Numerous collections of medieval ecclesiastical treasures, obtained since the secularization, were created with the express goal of offering adequate models to the artisans. This was the foundation for many of our craft museums.[50] One even began to follow the instructions of medieval treatises in order to make utensils and tools in the proper style.[51]

In architecture, Romantic enthusiasm for the Middle Ages responded to secular and rational Classicism with a revival of the Gothic. Likewise, young painters from various countries reacted with new concepts to the aesthetic dogmas originating in antiquity which they had learned at the academies. They turned to the "divine" Raphael and the older Italian paintings of the quattrocento and trecento, to the Germans Dürer and Holbein, and to old German paintings. Subsequently, Johann Friedrich Overbeck (1789–1869) and similarly minded people founded a Saint Luke Fraternity (1809) in Vienna in opposition to the local academy. The society soon moved to Rome and settled in the isolated monastery Sant'Isidoro in voluntary monastic communion. They wanted to rejuvenate painting on the basis of religion. Because of their beards and long hair they were known in Rome as "Nazarenes." Like the poets and architects, many of them converted. Franz Pforr, Ludwig Richter, Schnorr von Carolsfeld, Johann Führich, Philipp Veith (the stepson of Friedrich Schlegel) and the most important among them, Peter von Cornelius (1783–1867), took up the themes of Christian iconography, whose biblical stories and medieval legends matched the newly awakened sense of history.[52] Especially popular were motives in which medieval piety and the new concept of nature as a divine manifestation could be combined, like the legend of Saint Genevieve, who, according to the tragedy which Tieck had devoted to her in 1799, was illustrated in numerous pictures, graphic series, and, most elaborately, in frescoes by Puvis de Chavannes (1874–1878) in the church in Paris dedicated to her. The popular hermit theme of Caspar David Friedrich's gloomy pictures with monks and ruins, down to the last pictures at the end of the century combined nature and religion, historical contemplation and private worship.[53] It should not be ignored that the general trend toward genre in the art of the nineteenth century included religious art. In spite of its sentimental or even trivial effect, it created a type of picture which, according to its function, can indeed be compared with the devotional paintings of the fourteenth century. Theological didacticism in church art was less prominent than sensitive private piety. The Nazarenes placed figurative Christian stories in the foreground, while in the Protestant north nature inspired religious devotion.[54]

---

[46] The critique of the French Academy of 1845 regarding the use of the Gothic style for Saint-Clothilde church in Paris (H. G. Evers, op. cit., 183–90).

[47] P. Mezzanotte, op. cit., 367.

[48] Cf. Schinkel's statement, n. 5.

[49] A noteworthy collection is, besides Seroux d'Agincourt (see n. 15), Viollet-le-Duc, Dictionnaire raisonné du mobibilier français de l'époque carolingienne à la renaissance, 6 vols. (Paris 1858–75).

[50] A late example is the collection begun in 1867 by Prebendary Professor Dr. Alexander Schnütgen (1843–1918), the basis of today's Schnütgen Museum in Cologne. These projects kept the craftsmen as well as the pastors who commissioned them in mind (A. Thomas, "Die liturgische Erneuerungsbewegung im Bistum Trier unter Bischof von Hommer," Archiv für mittelalterliche Kirchengeschichte 15 [1961], 208–38).

[51] Viollet-le-Duc, "Le grand encensoir de Théophile," Annales archéologiques VIII (1848), 95–104.

---

[52] Raphael's work inspired great allegorical compositions. Secular themes featured national history and material from rediscovered medieval epics. A first great commission of this kind was the painting of the Casino Massimo in Rome (1819–30). Goethe opposed the combination of religious and national elements in his essay "Neu-deutsche religiös-patriotische Kunst," which was largely written by Heinrich Meyer in 1817.

[53] H. Ost, "Einsiedler und Mönche in der deutschen Malerei des 19. Jahrhunderts," Bonner Beiträge zur Kunstwissenschaft, ed. by H. von Einem and H. Lützeler, vol. 11 (Düsseldorf 1971).

[54] Of interest are Der Mönch am Meer and the altar in Tetschen by C. D. Friedrich (both 1808). In regard to landscapes in religious concepts, see the essay mentioned in n. 14 by H. Schrade and H. von Einem, "Die Symbollandschaft der deutschen Romantik," Katalog Klassizismus und Romantik, Nürnberg, Germanisches Nationalmuseum (1966), 28–38.

Not only thematic-iconographic preferences, but also those for a particular genre became recognizable. The monumental art of mural painting, which had disappeared from the churches during the period of Classicism, was revived again. They wanted to "fill the lonely chapels and high cathedrals with life" and so designed large sequences of frescoes with pictures of biblical stories. Worth mentioning are those frescoes that Peter von Cornelius painted after 1840 in the Ludwig Church in Munich, the murals by Johann Schraudolph in the Cathedral of Speyer (1845–1853)[55] and the frescoes by students of Wilhelm von Schadow in the Appolinaris Church in Remagen (1843–1854).[56]

The paintings of the Nazarenes soon fell below their original level of quality due to their increasing popularity. The impersonal schematicism of their composition and the flat brush technique conquered some of the art academies in Germany, but in view of the new movement of Realism around the middle of the century and later Impressionism, the Nazarenes found their art more and more limited to the often trivial problems of Christian utilitarian art. Likewise, in Italy, the puristi, comparable to the Nazarenes, had become academic and could not endure the new trends.[57]

To be mentioned in France are the early Ingres, Hippolyte Flandrin (1809–1864),[58] and Pierre Cecil Puvis de Chavannes (1824–1889), who painted the great Genevieve series in the Pantheon in Paris (1874–1878). Puvis de Chavannes started a new style, which had an effect on the church art of the twentieth century via French post-Impressionism and Symbolism, represented primarily by Maurice Denis (1870–1943).[59] There are connections between Maurice Denis and Father Desiderius Lenz (1832–1928), the founder of the art school in Beuron,[60] and the two symbolists Jan Toorop (1858–1928) and Jan Thorn-Prikker (1868–1932), whose frescoes, mosaics, and glass paintings laid an important foundation, in connection with a new church architecture, for the religious art of Expressionism.[61]

---

[55] There are 123 paintings with 470 more than life-size figures; two thirds fell victim to the "restoration" of the following years (A. Verbeek, "900 Jahre Speyrer Dom," Festschrift zum Jahrestage der Domweihe 1061 [Speyer 1961], 138–64).

[56] The Apollinaris Church, erected between 1839 and 1843 by cathedral architect Ernst Friedrich Zwirner on a wooded hill near the Rhine River, enjoyed the highest reputation in the nineteenth century, because as a neo-Gothic structure with large mural paintings and as a memorial fitting the surrounding landscape, it fulfilled the art ideals of the time.—There is a drawing by Schinkel (Berlin), in which he had transferred the Milan Cathedral to hills close to Trieste.

[57] G. Brundu, "Preraffaelismo e Purismo," Enciclopedia universale dell'Arte X, 943–48.

[58] He did the paintings in the church of Saint-Vincent-de-Paul and in the church of Saint-Germain-des-Prés in Paris (1854–63).

[59] P. Jamot, Maurice Denis (Paris 1945).

[60] See below.

The relationship between nineteenth century art and the new styles after 1900 in France can also be found in England, where Edward Burnes-Jones (1833–1898) founded the Society of the Pre-Raphaelites, following the model of the Saint Luke Fraternity of the Nazarenes and adopting many of their religious and moral principles as well.[62] But in contrast to the Nazarenes, this community of artists, including Millais, Hunt, Rossetti, and others, kept in touch with the progressive forces of its time. They also adhered to the Nazarenes' ideals of national and religious restoration and often made use of sentimental and symbolic genre painting, but at the same time they demanded "truth to nature" and were thus able to keep contact with the basically secular Realism of the middle of the century.[63] It became customary to paint outdoors and even in religious paintings precision of archeological detail was demanded. William Holman Hunt (1827–1910), the most important among the artists, went to Palestine for several years in order to familiarize himself with the location for his biblical pictures. The century of the exact sciences, photography, and historical "truth" also challenged religious historical painting to provide reliable information.[64] "Not Christ, the supreme judge, but Jesus, the son of the Jewess Maria" was to be represented.[65] Even in the progressive nineteenth century, the traces of the Pre-Raphaelites did not fade, in spite of the early dissolution of the Society, because at the same time their patrons John Ruskin and William Morris pioneered the great art revolution of 1900 and ushered some of the principles of the Pre-Raphaelite artists, such as craftsmanship and teamwork, into the new era.

In Germany in the second half of the century, an area of church art arose that was to have an effect in the future. Not unimpressed by the art of the Nazarenes, but keeping an apparent distance, Desiderius Lenz had founded an art school in the Benedictine monastery of Beuron. This school was intent on creating in the monastic realm the liturgical unity of an artistically designed space, of music regenerated through the study of Gregorian sources, and of the devotional ceremony. They wanted to replace the contemporary principle of l'art pour l'art with the humble l'art pour Dieux.[66] They were convinced that the stylization of artwork (primarily in abstract art, using "universal shapes" like the equilateral triangle) gave the composition an air of sacred solemnity and quiet by suppressing the individual and allowing man to submerge himself in God. Intending to create "timeless" art, they used elements from Byzantine art, from the mosaics of Ravenna, and from Egyptian murals to produce the Maurus Chapel near Beuron (1868–1870), the furnishings of the Emmaus monastery in Prague (since 1880), the furnishings of the abbey of Maria Laach, populated again by Beuron in 1892, and the grave of Saint Benedict and Saint Scholastica in the vault of Monte Cassino (1899–1913).[67] The contemporary interest in Art Nouveau, and also in the beginnings of the liturgical movement, the intense encounter of Maurice Denis and Desiderius Lenz, and their collaboration with Paul Verkade (1868–1946),[68] as well as the last vestiges of the Pre-Raphaelites and the Dutch and Belgian symbolists created an art circle between 1880 and 1910 that was to become the basis for an artistic renewal in the twentieth century. The significance of the art school in Beuron lies, last but not least, in the fact that the church interior was not exclusively determined any longer by murals and glass paintings, as was the case in the previous century, where any other kind of design was considered a "craft" and entrusted to craftsmen's skills. This school subjected everything, even textiles, paraments, liturgical utensils, and furniture to one unifying design concept. This was a direction which the church art of the twentieth century carried on, paying particular attention to the vessel, which is so important for the liturgy.

---

[61] M. Janssen, Schets over het Leven en enkele Werken von Jan Toorop (Amsterdam 1928); A. Hoff, Thorn-Prikker und die neuere Glasmalerei (Essen 1925).

[62] N. Pevsner, "Gemeinschaftsideale unter den bildenden Künstlern des 19. Jahrhunderts," Deutsche Vierteljahresschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte 9 (1931), 125–54; W. E. Fredeman, Pre-Raphaelism. A bibliocritical study (Cambridge, Mass. 1965).

[63] In Germany realism took effect in regard to religious art only in Protestant painting (e.g. Fritz von Uhde, 1848 to 1911, and Eduard von Gebhardt, 1838 to 1925).

[64] St. Waetzoldt, "Bemerkungen zur christlich-religiösen Malerei in der zweiten Hälfte des 19. Jahrhunderts," Triviale Zonen in der religiösen Kunst des 19. Jahrhunderts. Studien zur Philosophie und Literatur des 19. Jahrhunderts 15 (Frankfurt a. M. 1971), 30–91.

[65] C. Gurlitt, Die deutsche Kunst des 19. Jahrhunderts (Berlin 1900), 545.

With his strict rejection of all art in the style of Giotto, his rejection of all expressive phenomena of the past (El Greco), and of the present,[69] Desiderius Lenz overextended himself, causing his former disciples in the twenties to disperse. Subsequently, polemical treatises appeared (as in the nineteenth century) which, in view of the broad framework of ecclesiastical regulations, turned against Expressionism in general and demanded a harmonic Naturalism,[70] or accepted certain elements of the art form called "expressive,"[71] but which would not permit anything unusual or shocking.[72] Finally, there were several advocates of absolute Expressionism[73] who originated, in connection with the simultaneous renovation of church architecture, the truly modern features of church art. They made possible the appreciation of religious works created outside the area of church art, like paintings by Georges Rouault, Emil Nolde, or Schmidt-Rottluff. The appreciation of individual creative achievements provided the chance to entrust even non-Catholic artists with tasks related to church art.[74]

---

[66] D. Lenz, O.S.B., Zur Ästhetik der Beuroner Schule (Vienna 1912).

[67] J. Kreitmaier, S.J., Beuroner Kunst. Eine Ausdrucksform der christlichen Mystik (Freiburg i. Br. 1923).

[68] W. Verkade, Die Unruhe zu Gott (Freiburg i. Br. ^{2}1923). Verkade, born in the Netherlands, felt close to Gauguin, Sérusier, and Vuillard and joined Beuron in 1894 after his conversion.

[69] For example, Jan Thorn-Prikker (1868–1932) and Ludwig Gies (1887–1966).

In regard to sculpture and plastic art of the time in question, we have to say that it was bound to play a more important role than painting and that the creations of Thorwaldsen (1786–1844) and Dannecker (1758–1841) largely determined the conceptions of Christ. Through Neo-Gothic, the cathedral construction offices inspired a more thorough study of medieval sculpture of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, since the Cologne Cathedral, for example, required a number of new figures for its completion. The historical assessment of these masters, who also created tomb art, has not progressed very far due to the fact that they had to subject their work to the unity of the entire structure. Iconographically significant for furnishing Neo-Gothic churches in the nineteenth century with sculptures is the solution offered in the typological programs of the Middle Ages. Aside from characters of the Old Testament,[75] those figures of the Passion and Salvation of Christ are preferred who impress in a special way through their human fate.[76] Remarkable in regard to church sculpture is a certain phenomenon that occurs rarely in older art after the sixteenth century: large groups of several figures on an altar without any retable or frame, giving expression to the idea of the memorial, which was preferred by and characteristic of the nineteenth century.[77]

---

[70] P. R. Boving, O.F.M., Kirche und moderne Kunst (Bonn 1922).

[71] Like medieval book design, Grünewald, El Greco, Gauguin.

[72] J. Kreitmaier, S.J., Von Kunst und Künstlern (Freiburg i. Br. 1926). The contemporary artists recommended in this book usually combine expressionist elements and features of the Nazarenes.

[73] For example, August Hoff with his support of Ludwig Gies and Thorn-Prikker.

[74] Cf. P. Regamey, Kirche und Kunst im 20. Jahrhundert (Graz, Vienna, Cologne 1954; French 1923). Le Corbusier, though not Catholic, was commissioned to build the pilgrimage church of Notre-Dame-du-Haut in Ronchamp (1950–55).

[75] Like the relief figures of Johannes Benk in the Votive Church in Vienna (1873).

[76] Goethe's suggestion of 1830 for a series of sculptures including Christ and twelve figures from the Old and the New Testament is not based on theological meaning but on human ethics (manuscript from his literary legacy [1830], printed in vol. 13 of the Artemis edition of 1954, 1066–72)

New Art Forms

Around the turn of the century, an art revolution caused the rejection of historicism because not the traditional, but the "living" form was deemed more effective.[78] This change occurred in church construction later than in secular architecture, because ecclesiastical resolutions and recommendations were continuing obstacles.[79] Moreover, many worthy forms of past church architecture—like the semicircular apse, the basilican succession of steps, and extensive glass paintings—retained their fascination and continued to be frequent design elements.

A first indication of the change in attitude is the fact that the utility of the space used for the purposes of liturgy—for the celebration of the Eucharist for administering the sacraments and for preaching—always having been required by ecclesiastical decrees, was put more and more into the foreground after 1900. The statement, made frequently after 1896 by Cornelius Gurlitt, that the liturgy is the architect of the church,[80] was taken up by the Protestants at the Second Church Architecture Convention (1906) in Dresden, which was connected with an exhibition of appropriate liturgical utensils.[81] Gurlitt's idea also became the main motto of the simultaneous liturgical movement, which intended to increase the congregation's active participation in the liturgy. The consequences for church construction, especially for the spatial arrangement, were impressive, particularly since the new structures were usually community churches, while medieval church construction (a model for historicism) was essentially determined by monastic churches, in which the needs of the choir service prevailed and the question of the congregation's ability to see the ceremony (around the altar) and hear the oral part of the service, was never taken into consideration. However, the exclusive purpose of the church as a church for the community as well as for the emancipation of the middle class and the democritization of political life has strengthened the urgency of the new demands.[82]

---

[77] For example, the group of Mary Magdalene with angels of 1841 by Carlo de Marochetti, which is located on the high altar of the Sainte-Madeleine church in Paris (R. Zeitler, "Die Kunst des 19. Jahrhunderts," Propyläen-Kunstgeschichte 11 [Berlin 1966], ill. 333b).

[78] "The most essential, most indispensable requirement to assure the beauty of an art work is the life which radiates from the material in which it is created" (H. van de Velde, Die Belebung des Stoffes als Prinzip der Schönheit [1910] reprinted in H. van de Velde, Zum neuen Stil. Aus seinen Schriften ausgewählt und eingeleitet von H. Curjel [Munich 1955], 175).

[79] See CICfontes, 1164, ART. 1: "The ordinaries need to take care that in church construction those forms are preserved which are part of the Christian tradition." A decree of the archdiocese of Cologne recommended in 1912 to use the "Romanesque, Gothic transition-style."

[80] C. Gurlitt, Kirchen, 83.

[81] W. Weyres, O. Bartning, Kirchen, 209f.

In accord with these tendencies of the liturgical movement was the simultaneous general architectural theory whose highest maxim required that justice be done to function, material, and construction.[83] The same perspective of religious and artistic reform around the turn of the century evolved from the ability to understand and appreciate any kind of form, including the liturgy, as an organic entity; an ability that was furthered by the development of sensitivity and perceptual psychology in the second half of the nineteenth century.[84] In regard to church architecture, the new maxims meant that quality and effectiveness of the final creation were no longer considered dependent on their approval by history. At first, the fixation on the Gothic style[85] was criticized; later on, the slightest historical reminiscence fell victim to objection. The goal and the basis for evaluation are not the precise correspondence with the architectural model but, on the contrary, the impact of the new building materials of the advancing technological age on form and construction. Thus, the use of iron for support beams and ribbed vaults in the Church of Saint Eugene in Paris (1854–1855)[86] or the use of a reinforced concrete framework in the Church of Saint Jean de Montmartre (begun 1894)[87] were praised as progressive accomplishments, even though the innovations in these basically Neo-Gothic churches came about principally for practical and financial reasons. Nevertheless, the abandonment of the exclusive use of raw stones was regretted. However, the church of Notre-Dame de Raincy, built by Auguste Perret (1874–1954) in 1923 with visible ferroconcrete, was intended to show off its innovations, and the contractor, Abbé Nègre, decided: "A paroisse jeune édifice d'esprit neuf!"

---

[82] Ibid., 95ff. Regarding the influence of the liturgical movement, see W. Braunfels, *LThK*² VI, 682–87, and A. Fuchs, ibid., 199–205. Epoch-making for understanding the new liturgy: R. Guardini, Vom Geist der Liturgie (Freiburg i. Br. 1922); cf. also R. Schwarz, Vom Bau der Kirche (Würzburg 1938, Heidelberg 1947) and T. Klauser, Richtlinien für die Gestaltung des Gotteshauses aus dem Geist der römischen Liturgie (Münster i. W. 1955). In Protestantism: O. Bartning, Vom neuen Kirchenbau (Berlin 1919).

[83] N. Pevsner, Wegbereiter moderner Formgebung (Hamburg 1957; Engl. 1946); S. Giedion, Raum, Zeit, Architektur. Die Entstehung einer neuen Tradition (Ravensburg 1964; Engl. 1941); G. Bandmann, "Der Wandel in der Materialbewertung in der Kunsttheorie des 19. Jahrhunderts," Beiträge zur Theorie der Künste im 19. Jahrhundert, ed. by H. Koopmann, J. A. Schmoll (Eisenwerth) (Frankfurt a. M. 1971), 129–60.

[84] Aloys Goergen speaks of "devotional form" (in W. Weyres, O. Bartning, Kirchen, 14ff.).

[85] When Gothic construction principles were demanded for the construction of the cathedral of Liverpool, there was opposition against this narrow-mindedness (C. Gurlitt, Kirchen, 66ff.).

[86] By L. A. Boileau (1812–96); N. Pevsner, Wegbereiter, 81.

[87] By A. de Baudot; N. Pevsner, Wegbereiter, 85.

This process of emancipation of formerly profane materials and related construction principles, which may no longer be obscured by traditional decorations, has not ceased yet,[88] even though, as mentioned above, the aftereffects of individual historical forms and formulas can still be observed. These allusions and reminders, however, turn into pliable elements in the hands of the individual architect who does not feel obligated any longer to the theological symbolism of the structure and its parts, but tries to transcend the material composition of the church by means of the individually designed form and to instill it with "sacred poetry."[89] The sacred character of the edifice is, therefore, created by the individual's sensitive interpretation of form. The natural conflict between ecclesiastical traditionalism, which does not allow, for example, "unusual" pictures and demands consideration of the formae a traditione christiana receptae et artis sacrae leges,[90] and the individuality of the artist are thus resolved in favor of the artist, at least as long as his creation complies with the demands of the liturgy. Naturally, the new demands of the liturgy (in regard to church architecture: abolition of the choir rails and altar pieces, new seating arrangements for the congregation and relatively free ground plans, abolition of the multiplicity of altars and much more)[91] was subject to the changes in theological concepts, which, in turn, are not independent of the general tendencies of the time. This opened up welcome opportunities for change to contemporary church architecture. However, this change, no longer encumbered by traditionalism, according to which the church structure belonged to the external aspects of the liturgy,"[92] entailed threatening consequences for churches of the past which are still in use today and stand in high esteem as art works.[93] Thus, according to a report in 1963 on the previous decade by the state curator of Westphalia, Hermann Busen, the congregation of an important Gothic Catholic church in Westphalia proposed in 1953 to lift the choir by seven steps, "in order to do justice to the newest liturgical insights regarding the idea of Christ the King," and in 1962, the same congregation requested that the choir "be dropped by seven steps, and to move the altar forward by fifteen meters in order to follow the newest liturgical understanding of the concept of the circumstance."[94]

---

[88] F. Pfammater, Betonkirchen (Zurich 1948).

[89] R. Schwarz, Vom Bau der Kirche, passim.

[90] CICfontes ART. 1279, 1164.

[91] T. Klauser, op. cit.; W. Weyres, O. Bartning, op. cit.; U. Rapp, op. cit. It has been noted occasionally that these demands can be compared to those during the period of the Enlightenment (W. Weyres. O. Bartning, op. cit., 88ff.) and that church architecture thus began to approach Protestant styles; for the Protestants, traditions are of less importance, but they have always kept the needs of the congregation in regard to the liturgy's visibility and audibility in mind.

[92] Thus, in ART. 128 of the resolutions regarding chapter VII of the liturgy constitution of the Second Vatican Council of 1963 (U. Rapp, op. cit., 83).

[93] G. Bandmann, "Der Kirchenbau der Gegenwart und die Vergangenheit," Kunst und Kirche XXIX (1966), 51–56, 122–25.

In church architecture, the new principles of architectural theory, as aforementioned, succeeded less swiftly than in secular architecture. An early example of the attempt to bring form "to life" is the continuing construction of a church in Barcelona which was begun in 1867 and was dedicated to the Holy Family. The project was carried out by Antonio Gaudí (1852–1926), who used a Neo-Gothic ground plan and stylized the historical elements according to Art Nouveau, taking them to new heights of expression.[95]

Only after 1920 did Germany and France build churches that corresponded to the altered demands. The early churches of Dominikus Böhm,[96] the Antonius Church of Karl Moser in Basel (1927), the Corpus Christi Church of Rudolf Schwarz in Aachen (1930), and the aforementioned Notre Dame de Raincy were the models for the many new structures after World War II,[97] which the original artists of the twenties helped to a large extent to build.[98]

Since about 1960, new architects took their place who were likewise disciples of the aesthetic maxims of modern times, but who were not compelled by the same need for expression as were their predecessors, who had been imprinted with the spirit of the youth movement of 1919–1933. Moreover, the need and the capability for worship seem to have diminished as well.[99]

---

[94] H. Busen, Westphalen 41 (1963), 21.

[95] J. Bergós, Antoni Gaudí, l'hombre i l'obra (Barcelona 1954); H. G. Evers, Vom Historismus zum Funktionalismus (Baden-Baden 1967), 61f. He realized in the building his own symbolism, hardly based on tradition. The west side was to be dedicated to Christ's majesty, the north side to his passion, the south side to his youth. The middle tower and the four surrounding towers were to mean Christ and the Evangelists, the choir tower the Virgin Mary. Only the south side was completed when Gaudí died.

[96] Neu-Ulm, 1925–26; Frielingsdorf, 1927; Saint Engelbert in Cologne-Riehl, 1933.

[97] W. Weyres, O. Bartning, Kirchen, passim.

[98] Good summaries in W. Weyres, O. Bartning, Kirchen; J. Pichard, Les églises nouvelles à travers le monde (Paris 1960).

[99] H. Schnell, "Kirchenbau im Wandel. 'Was ist eine Kirche?'," Das Münster 25 (1972), 2. The book by H. Schnell, Der Kirchenbau des 20. Jahrhunderts in Deutschland (Munich, Zurich 1973) is in the process of publication and could not be studied, though it covers many issues presented here.

The resolutions of the Second Vatican Council regarding Chapter VII of the liturgical constitution of 4 December 1963, which refrained from dependence on a certain historical sacred style (ARTICLE 123) and desired the structure to be an "external aspect of the liturgy," "dignified and functional" (ART. 128), confirm what has been in existence for a long time and is possibly facing another change even now.

SECTION FOUR

Teaching and Theology

CHAPTER 20

The Encyclical Aeterni Patris

The encyclical Aeterni Patris of 4 August 1879[1] was not just a specific doctrine about the philosophical and theological orientation of Catholic schools, but also the foundation of the entire program that Leo XII wanted to pursue in his pontificate. One can easily refer all subsequent doctrines and activities to this document. Otto Willmann called this encyclical the "ripe fruit of spontaneous regeneration attempts";[2] it reiterated earlier efforts to continue not just any form of medieval scholasticism, but specifically revive the philosophy of Thomas Aquinas.[3] At first, the program concerned the Catholic Church only, and Franz Erhle prognosticated correctly when he remarked that for those "who renounced Christ and his Church the word of Christ's deputy would fade away like the voice of one crying in the wilderness."[4] However, the encyclical did, indeed, initiate a philosophical movement whose most important representatives were able to revive Aquinas as one of the greatest thinkers of Hellenic-Occidental philosophy. To follow the encyclical and refer to Thomas Aquinas himself required tedious historical research. But philosophical thought itself also had to internalize the true work of Aquinas, that is, to include it in the philosophical process. Thus, the encyclical Aeterni Patris contains two aspects: It speaks from tradition, but this tradition must be revived in order to be able to do justice to the problems of the modern world.[5]

The heading of the encyclical reads: De philosophia christiana ad mentem sancti Thomae Aquinatis Doctoris angelici in scholis catholicis instauranda. Of this "Christian philosophy" and its creator, Thomas Aquinas (died 1274), Pope Innocent VI, six hundred years later, is quoted as having said: Aside from its "canonical doctrine," this philosophy distinguished itself from all others by its peculiar vocabulary, its modus docendi, and its truthfulness, so that those who followed it never left the path of truth, and those who rejected it became suspect (de veritate suspectus). Thomas alone (unus) succeeded in overcoming all errors of previous times and in providing "invincible weapons" to combat future ones. This school was replaced by the method of a "a certain new way of philosophy" (nova quaedam philosophiae ratio), which, however, did not have the desired effect. Instead, philosophical directions have increased to a large extent, causing doubt and finally errors. Even Catholic philosophers, eager to imitate, have fallen victim to this revival mania, instead of replenishing the "inheritance of ancient wisdoms." This does not exclude making use of the treasure of new thoughts in order to perfect this philosophy (novorum inventorum opes ad excolendam philosophiam). Later, in regard to natural sciences, Innocent VI said that the Scholastics had learned that human intelligence could only be elevated to the capacity of knowing spiritual beings by way of the sensible world; they had also studied nature with great interest, as Albertus Magnus proved. This and statements by natural scientists themselves allow the conclusion that Scholastic philosophy has nothing to counter it. The artes belles and the artes liberales also are at home in this philosophy.[6]

---

[1] Acta Leonis I, 255–84.

[2] Geschichte des Idealismus (Braunschweig ²1907), 908.

[3] In Perugia, Cardinal G. Pecci, his brother Giuseppe (Jesuit), and several Dominicans founded the Accademia San Tommaso.

[4] In F. Pelster, op. cit., 38.

[5] ". . . encyclique, traditionaliste en un sens mais assez révolutionaire par rapport aux routines antérieures": R. Aubert, Nouvelle Histoire de l'Église (in preparation).

By reviving the philosophy of Thomas Aquinas, the encyclical claims to offer a universal solution to all problems of the modern world, last but not least for social problems: Whatever Thomas Aquinas taught concerning the true nature of freedom and the divine origin of authority possessed an "invincible power" to overcome those principles of the "new law" (i.e., revolution) which harm order and public welfare. Scholastic philosophy could be the remedy because Thomas Aquinas differentiated properly between reason and faith and, at the same time, combined the two in "friendship" and because he perfected reason to the utmost degree, so that it could not easily be improved. From this, the encyclical concludes, the rationalists could be led to faith against their resistance, provided they were taught the highest rationality of Thomistic philosophy. "Aside from the supernatural assistance of God," nothing is as effective against error as this philosophy.[7]

The encyclical clearly differentiates between the philosophy of Thomas Aquinas and that phase of Scholasticism in which the philosophers proceeded nimia subtilitate, referring to the period of decline of the disputatio. The encyclical suggests that the wisdom of Thomas

---

[6] Acta Leonis I, 273f., 276, 277f., 280ff.

[7] Ibid., 274, 279.

Aquinas be drawn from other sources. But the development of Thomistic philosophy is described as a totally continuous process, leading smoothly from the old Christian apologists via Augustine to culmination in Aquinas, to whom we must return. Modern questions should be incorporated and the doctrine should be refined, but the intellectual world was perfected in the thirteenth century (in a classical sense). Aeterni Patris refers to everything, to society and politics, to the natural sciences and aesthetics; however, it leaves out the problem of history, as contemporary Neo-Scholasticism generally continued to do.[8] It is remarkable that the famous historian of Scholasticism, Franz Ehrle, in his commentary on Aeterni Patris (his first great work), should present the historical development toward Thomas Aquinas as uninterrupted progress (in accord with the encyclical); later, however, when dealing with the subsequent fate of Thomas's work and the history of Scholasticism, he expressed his historical appreciation for the pro and con of the struggle, no matter how Thomas, as the princeps, is evaluated. Ehrle emphasized most of all that the older Spanish scholastics of the sixteenth century were "for the most part intelligent, independent scholars, not inclined for reasons of mere piety to close themselves to the challenges of good arguments, and far removed from the kind of devotion which was to become characteristic of the newer Dominican school after Báñez." It should be noted that the interests of the order were involved in this matter; yet this commentary from 1880 shows that the Thomistic renascence was interpreted as a historical, creative process, not as a classical copy.[9] By commissioning the edition of St. Thomas (Editio Leonina), appearing since 1882, Leo XIII earned significant and everlasting credit in the field of historical Thomas scholarship.[10] Unfortunately, understanding Thomas as an entity removed from his historical context (which later led to canonical regulation regarding the instruction in Catholic schools) partly prohibited a philosophical and thus a real acquisition of Aquinas.[11]

---

[8] The philosophical pioneers in Italy were the Jesuits Taparelli d'Azeglio (died 1862) and mainly M. Liberatore (died 1892; his chief work 1840/42), who also dealt with social philosophy. That "its position is weakened by a (subconscious) rationalistic tint" (O. H. Pesch, *LThK*² X, 160) continues to be a basic problem in Neo-Scholasticism (P. Dezza, All'origini del Neotomismo [Milan 1940], 65–73).

[9] In F. Pelster, op. cit., 63–89.—A biographical sketch of F. Ehrle: 191–202.

[10] The weaknesses which resulted from the speed with which the edition of the first volumes was prepared were avoided by the Dutch C. Suermondt, O.P., who collaborated after 1919 (G. F. Rossi, Il 4° pioniere della commissione leonina, C. S. [Piacenza 1954]).

[11] CICfontes, 1366, ART. 2, requires that philosophy and theology are to be taught "according to the method, doctrine, and principles" of Thomas Aquinas. The definition of Aquinas's historical position was not facilitated by this requirement. "Research on the

Following the Constitutio de fide catholica of the First Vatican Council, the significance of true philosophy for theology was strongly emphasized. This is evident in the title of the encyclycal De philosophia christiana. Quoting Clement of Alexandria, the encyclical states that the doctrine of the Savior, being God's wisdom and in and of itself perfect, can not acquire more force through Greek philosophy, but by means of the proper philosophy the truth of the revelation could be defended. Moreover, it maintains that the use of philosophy compelled theology to attain the character, the appearance, and the spirit of a true science (requiritur philosophiae usus, ut sacra Theologia naturam, habitum, ingeniumque verae scientiae suscipiat atque induat).[12] This feature of theology is based mainly on the fact that the Neo-Scholasticism of the period when the encyclical was written arrived at theology via philosophy,[13] causing Neo-Scholastic theology to be largely characterized by the application of the terminological tools of the Neo-Scholastic philosophy,[14] at least until Biblical theology forced its way in the course of the twentieth century.

Stubbornly and energetically, Leo XIII implemented his encyclical. On 18 January 1880, he ordered Cardinals A. de Luca, Simeoni, and Zigliara, O.P., to undertake the editing of the works of Aquinas, as well as the commentaries by Cajetan (1507–22), who was (even by Neo-Scholastics) considered the definite expositor of Thomas, thus making it difficult to dispute his authority by using Thomas himself. In May of the same year, under the presidency of Giuseppe Pecci, the Pope's brother, the Accademia Romana di San Tommaso was opened and well funded in order to enable it to educate the next generation. The foundation became the model for the Catholic world. Leo XIII emphatically supported the theologians of his program: in 1880 he appointed his former student Francesco Satolli professor of dogmatics at the Pontifical Urban College of the Propagation of the Faith; G. Cornoldi, S.J., was called by the Pope from Bologna to help found the Academy; after 1881 S.

---

historical context of Aquinas's work begins at the end of the nineteenth century and soon . . . makes tremendous progress; however, for decades it remains, amazingly, without any influence on the systematic interpretation of Aquinas, especially when it threatens to question the absolute value of Aquinas and the presumed total identity of his doctrine with Church doctrine" (O. H. Pesch, ibid. [op. cit. in n. 8]).

[12] Acta Leonis I, 262, 263.

